[B] He was of a very antient family.] Some will have it to be deſcended from Beliſarius, the famous General of the Emperor Juſtinian. It is ſaid that FRANCIS BELISARIUS about the year 564, married Antonia, Pompey's daughter, and couſin to the ſiſter of the Emperor Anaſtaſius I. He left two ſons, PETER, and CHARLES, the firſt of whom married Mary Colonna, and died without iſſue at Milan ; the other, in order to live ſecure from the incurſions of the Barbarians, retired into the country of Vallais, and had a caſtle in the territory of Sion (4), which he left to his deſcendants (5). Such is the genealogy of a citizen of Augſburg ! But what is very ſurprizing is, that we are told that authentic proofs to make good all this, are ready to be produced. For, ſay they, JOHN BARTHOLOMEW VELSERUS, Counſellor to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and Canon of Straſburgh, wrote a letter to that Emperor in 1336, when the Diet was aſſembled at Spire, to ſupplicate him earneſtly, to affix his ſignet by way of approbation to the German tranſlation of a book, which Cardinal Stephen Colonna the Pope's Vicar had written concerning the genealogy of the Velſeri. This Emperor had himſelf ordered the writing of this book ; and the author therein produced an exact ſeries of proofs founded on publick acts and deeds, from 545, to JOHN VELSERUS the brother of John Bartholomew. Pro vetuſtiſſima familiæ ſuæ gloria ac dignitate non rogans ſolum, verum etiam obſecrans, ut Germanicam libelli verſionem ſigillo annuli ſui confirmaret, quem auctoritate ac juſſu ipſius Imperatoris Stephanus Colonna, Summi Pontificis tunc Vicarius & Cardinalis, ex omnibus inſtrumentis, tabulis, literiſque publicis ab A. C. 545, uſque ad Johannem Velſerum, Joh. Bartholomæi fratrem germanum, omni cura & diligentia complexus eſt (6). This book had been tranſlated into Latin at Rome in 1327, by the ſame John Bartholomew. We are told that EMANUEL VELSERUS Canon of Baſil in 1071, writing to his brother OCTAVIAN, mentioned CHARLES BELISARIUS, who with his wife Paula de gli Urſini retired from Rome into Vallais in 620. ‘ Agitata inibi mentione de ‘ Carolo Beliſario, qui una cum conjuge Paula Urſina ‘ Valleſiam verſus ad Rheni fontes A. C. 620 ex urbe ‘ Roma ob ſæviſſimos & violentiſſimos in omnem nobilitatem Longobardos, exemplo aliorum egreſſus ‘ eſt (7). - - - - Charles Beliſarius is mentioned in it, ‘ who after the example of others retired from Rome ‘ with his wife Paula de gli Urſini to the country of ‘ Vallais near the head of the Rhine in the year 620, ‘ becauſe the Longobards were moſt violent and cruel to ‘ all the nobility.’ This OCTAVIAN VELSERUS already mentioned was the firſt of the family, that has been Patrician of Augſburg. He was alſo Captain in that city, Director of the military affairs, and beſides Counſellor to Conrad Duke of Franconia. He died in 1074 (8). JAMES VELSERUS was the firſt of the family who ſettled at Nuremberg, whither he came in 1493. He married and died there in 1544, being the father of ſix ſons and eleven daughters. The alliances of the Velſeri have been very illuſtrious, in Switzerland, and ſeveral provinces of the empire : but the greateſt honour which they received on this account was doubtleſs the marriage of PHILIPPINA VELSERUS with Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, ſon of the Emperor Ferdinand I, and brother to the Emperor Maximilian II. That Prince fell deſperately in love with Philippina in the time of the Diet at Augſburg in 1548, and married her privately (9). She lived with him as his lawful wife till his death, above twenty-four years (10). She was a very handſome woman, and endowed beſides with a rich ſtore of good qualities. She was daughter to FRANCIS VELSERUS, Baron of Zinnenberg ; and ſiſter to CHARLES VELSERUS, Governor of the marquiſate of Burgaw (11). She died at Inſpruck on the 24th of April 1580, and left two ſons, whom their father Ferdinand could never entitle to ſucceed him. He was obliged to content himſelf with the marquiſate of Burgaw for the elder ; and the younger being an Eccleſiaſtic, became a Cardinal (12). Arnoldus cites an author (13) who affirms that Andrew, the eldeſt ſon of Ferdinand and of Philippina Velſerus, was a Cardinal, and that Charles his younger brother Marquis of Burgaw, married Sybilla ſiſter to John-William Duke of Cleves. Theſe two brothers died without iſſue. It is ſaid that Charlemagne gave three flowers-de-luce for arms to PHILIP VALISERUS, who behaved himſelf very bravely in the war of Lombardy. They add (14) that he was honoured with ſeveral other prerogatives, and that Otho the Great confirmed all thoſe privileges in favour of JULIUS VELSERUS grandſon of Philip Valiſerus, whom he made his counſellor in the council of war in 950, and a knight in 971 (15). Charles V ranked this family amongſt the immediate noblemen, whoſe cauſes are cognizable before the Emperor only (16). The Archduke Ferdinand made CHARLES VELSERUS, Philippina's brother, a free baron (17).

Obſerve that Julius Velſerus ſaved the Emperor Otho's life in a battle againſt the Huns, and that he died of a continual fever in the camp at the age of 96, in the Emperor Henry the IId's Time (18). The author whom I cite ſpeaks of ſeveral Velſerus's, who ſignalized either their valour in the army, or their prudence in the magiſtracy.

[C] .... and which had poſſeſſed vaſt riches.] Melchior Adam relates that Francis I, being by a treaty of peace obliged to pay twelve tons of gold to Charles V, the Fuggers and Velſers promiſed to advance that great ſum of money (19). Martin Cruſius ſaith that in the year 1528, BARTHOLOMEW VELSER and his partners armed ſeveral ſhips in Spain, and ſent them into America, where they diſcovered a very rich country, on the frontiers of Peru, called Venezvela, (9) Jovius, Elog. cap. cvii, pag. m. 250.

(1) From his receiving a yearly penſion from the public.

(2) They are very well explained in Furetiere's Dictionary corrected by Mr de Beauval.

(3) This appears from Raderus, who dedicated his Martial Nobiliſſimis & ampliſſimis VVV. Dominis Velſeris, MARCO Duumviro, Urbis Præfecto, MATTHÆO Ædili, PAULO Conſuli, Matthæi FFF. Antonii NNN. Patriciis Auguſtanis, B.R. natis.

(4) Sepultus in agro Sedunenſi ubi arcem Valeriam cum ſuis longe poſſedit. Arnoldus, in Diſſertatione de Marci Velſeri vita, genere, & morte, pag. 6.

(5) They have been called Valliſii, or Walliſeri, & Velſeri, Ibid. pag. 5.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. pag. 6.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Martinus Cruſius, Part. iii, Annal. Suevic. lib. xii, fol. 773, apud Arnold. ibid. pag. 12.

(10) Jacob. Mentius, apud Arnold. ibid.

(11) Arnold. ibid.

(12) See Thuanus, lib. lxxi, ſub. fin.

(13) Didacus de Lequile, Concionator & Hiſtoriographus Aulicus.

(14) Arnoldus, pag. 20.

(15) Ibid. pag. 21, 22.

(16) Ibid. pag. 22. See alſo pag. 10.

(17) Ibid. pag. 20.

(18) Ibid. p. 32.

(19) A rei nummariæ nervis apprime inſtructam, vel hoc docet quod cum Carolus V pace cum Gallo facta, tranſegiſſet ut duodecim auri tonnas Rex Imperatori dependeret, Fuggari ac Velſeri tantam pecuniæ vim bipartito ſe repræſentaturos promiſerunt. Melch. Adam in Vit. Juriſconſultor. pag. 480. He quotes Melanchth. Tom. ii, explic. evangel.

and being a lover of the Belles Lettres, he was, when very young, ſent to Rome to ſtudy under Antony Muretus (a). He was there in the year 1575. With the ſtudy of Antiquities he intermixed that of the Italian tongue, in which he became ſo great a proficient, that he wrote that language like a Florentine [D]. Returning home he applied himſelf to the Bar in the year 1589. He obtained the ſenatorial dignity in 1592. He was preferred to the little council in the year 1594, and elected Prætor in 1600. He diſcharged all theſe offices with a great deal of honour, and was an ornament to his country. He was both a lover and a protector of learning and learned men. He publiſhed ſeveral good books [E], and afforded helps to ſeveral nezvela, of which they made themſelves maſters, and kept it twenty-eight years, according to the treaty which they concluded with Charles V. But a difference aroſe betwixt the farmers of Elizabeth King Philip's Queen, and George of Spire, who governed that country in the name of the Velſers. At firſt they diſputed only about tolls, and then about the limits, and at laſt it was pretended that thoſe Germans ought not to poſſeſs any part of Venezvela. The cauſe was pleaded in Spain, and they were diſpoſſeſſed of all they held in Venezvela, by virtue of the ſentence pronounced in Spain in the year 1555. The firſt Governor whom the Velſers eſtabliſhed there was Ambroſe Dalfinger, born at Ulm, whom the Spaniards killed; but Charles V cauſed the authors of this murther to be puniſhed (20). Arnoldus is very angry becauſe Jerom Benzo calls the Velſers (to whom the Emperor engaged the country of Valentiola) (21) merchants. ‘Vano iſtius judicio & Reges & Principes magnarii negotiatores erunt, & delicatarum mercium inſtitores. Hercules tuam fidem! . . . . In his fooliſh judgment forſooth! Kings and princes are great merchants, and dealers in choice commodities.’ Thus Arnoldus exclaims againſt the word Merchant. He abridges what Herrera hath ſaid concerning the exploits of thoſe Governors, whom the Velſers ſent to that country.
authors

[D] He wrote Italian like a Florentine.] The teſtimony of an Italian to this purpoſe is cited by Mr Arnoldus (22). ‘Mirari poſthac deſinant qui linguæ Italicæ nitorem in Marco attoniti ſtupent; Orlandus enim Peſcetti in reſponſione ſua ad Anticruſcam Benii Florentinam (23), illius puritatem ſimul ac elegantiam exoſculatur, dum ait: Se'l Cavalier Guariſii (24), Uomo pur Ferrareſe, prega come nelle ſue lettere ſi vede, il Cavalier Salviati che purghi il ſuo Paſtor Fido da Lombardiſmi, e dell' Illuſtriſſimo Sig. Marco Velſero Duumviro della Rep. Auguſtana e chiariſſimo lume della Germania ſcrive all' Eccellentiſſimo Sig. Chiocco, che le ſue lettere gli paiono dettate da Uomo nato ed allevato in Firenze. Immo judicium Velſeri de lingua Italica mille aliis præfert cenſoribus: quando ogn' altra vi mancaſſe, quella del Sig. Marco Velſero addietro mentovato, mi varebbe per mille, il quale in una lettera ſcritta all' Eccellentiſſimo Sig. Chiocco, dice che nel legger le coſe del Caſa ſente tanto diletto, che non vorebbe che aveſſer mai fine. (25) . . . Thoſe who are ſurprized at the purity of Marcus Velſerus's Italian, will ceaſe to wonder, when they know that Orlandus Peſcetti, in his anſwer to the Florentine Anticruſca del Beni, admires both its purity and elegance, when he ſays: Guarini, though a Ferrareſe deſires Salviati, as we may ſee in his letters, to purge his Paſtor Fido of Lombardiſms, and writes to the moſt excellent Sig. Chiocco concerning the illuſtrious Marcus Velſerus, that his letters appeared to him to be writ by one that was born and bredat Florence. Nay, he prefers the judgment of Velſerus on the Italian tongue to that of a thouſand other critics: Tho' every other ſhould fail you, that of Marcus Velſerus before mentioned, in my opinion, would be worth a thouſand, who in a letter to the moſt excellent Chiocco, ſays, that in reading il Caſa he felt ſuch a pleaſure. that he wiſhed that book had no end.’ You will find in Arnoldus, the elogy which Nicolas Manaſſes beſtowed upon Velſerus, in dedicating to him a book of Lewis de Roy (26), which Hercules Catus had tranſlated from the French into Italian. I ſhall not tranſcribe this, but another elogy which ſeems of more weight. Galileo declaring his reaſon why he made uſe of the Italian language, in his three letters to Velſerus de Maculis Solaribus, expreſſes himſelf thus: ‘Mà in oltre ci hò avuto un altro mio particolar intereſſe, ed è il non privarmi delle riſpoſte di V. S. in tal lingua vedute da me e dagl' Amici miei con molto maggior diletto, è meravigilia che ſe foſſero ſcritte del piu purgato ſtile Latine, e parci nel legger lettere di locuzzione tanto propria che Firenze eſtenda i ſuoi confini, anzi il recinto delle ſue mura, ſino in Auguſta (27). - - - - But beſides I had another particular intereſt in view, viz. That I might not be deprived of your anſwers in the Italian tongue, which my friends and I read with much more pleaſure and admiration, than if they had been writ in the pureſt Latin ſtile; and in reading letters of ſuch propriety and elegance, it ſeemed to us that Florence extended its confines, nay the very circuit of its walls as far as Augsburg.’

[E] He publiſhed ſeveral good books.] His firſt work, according to Melchior Adam, was that which he publiſhed at Venice in the year 1594. The bare title diſcovers the uncommon learning of the author; it runs thus. ‘Rerum Auguſtanarum Vindelicarum libri octo, quibus à prima Rhætorum ac Vindelicorum origine ad annum uſque 552. à nato Chriſto nobiliſſimæ gentis hiſtoria & antiquitates traduntur, ac antiqua monumenta tam quæ Auguſtæ, quam quæ in agro Auguſtano, quin & quæ alibi extant ad res Auguſtanas ſpectantia, æri inciſa & notis illuſtrata exhibentur. - - - - Eight books of the affairs of Augsburg, containing the hiſtory and antiquities of that noble country from the firſt original of the Rheti and Vindelicii, to the year of Chriſt 552, with cuts of the antient monuments in the city and country of Augsburg or elſewhere, relating to the affairs of Augsburg, illuſtrated with notes.’ Melchior Adam had reaſon to call this an happy prelude (28). Velſerus conſecrated the firſt fruits of his labours to the glory of his country. ‘In Italiam progreſſus edidit antiquitates Auguſtanas, felix famæ ſurgentis auſpicium & pium. - - - - Going into Italy he publiſhed the Antiquities of Augsburg, which was an happy and pious omen of his riſing fame.’ In the year 1602, he publiſhed at Augſburg, Rerum Boicarum libri quinque, hiſtoriam à gentis origine ad Carolum Magnum complexi (29). He afterwards publiſhed at ſeveral times the lives of ſome Martyrs of Augſburg, that of St Uldaric, Biſhop of that city, and of St Severinus and Apollonius of Tyre. As for the antient Itinerary, which Peutinger poſſeſſed, whence it was called Tabula Peutingeriana, he publiſhed it at Venice in the year 1591 (30). Moſt of thoſe pieces are illuſtrated with Velſerus's commentaries. All the works of this author have been collected into a body, and reprinted in folio at Nuremberg in 1682. Chriſtopher Arnoldus, Profeſſor at Nuremberg, had the care of this edition, and adorned it with preliminary diſcourſes, in which he informs us of a great many particulars, concerning the family of the Velſers in general, and the life of ~~Mark~~ Velſerus in particular; together with the judgment which the learned have paſſed on his works, and the funeral elogies with which they honoured him. And as he kept a great correſpondence with the learned of Italy, and of ſeveral other countries, the editor hath collected ſeveral of his Latin and Italian letters which he hath added to this edition.

OPINIONS concerning the author of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta.

Velſerus paſſed for the author of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, which was printed about the year 1612. Gaſſendus having obſerved that ſeveral authors aſcribed that book to Mr de Peireſc, adds that they were miſtaken, and that it is very probable Velſerus compoſed it. He grounds this conjecture on Velſerus's great learning and ſingular affection to the houſe of Auſtria: ‘Non diſquiro quidem an auctor hujuſce libri fuerit Antonius Albizius, nobilis ille Florentinus, qui Chriſtianorum Principum Stemmata ediderat ante duos annos, ut nonnullis perſuaſum eſt; an, ut videtur veriſimilius, inſignis ille Marcus Velſerus, cujus ſæpius meminimus, ob conſummatam eruditionem, propenſionemque ſingularem erga domum Auſtriacam (31). - - - - I ſhall not examine ‘ whether

(a) Bonciarius, lib. ix, Epiſt. xii, apud Arnoldum, de Marci Velſeri vita, genere, & obitu, p. 42.

(20) Cruſius, Part. iii, Annal. Suevicor. lib. xi, cap. iii, iv, apud Arnoldum, ubi ſupra, pag. 24.

(21) Valentiola ditiſſimæ provinciæ oppidum, quam Cæſar anno 1528 Velzaris mercatoribus Germanis oppignoravit. Benzo, lib. i, Hiſtoriæ novi Orbis, cap. xxv, apud Arnold. ibid. pag. 25.

(22) Ubi ſupra, pag. 43, 44.

(23) Nella Riſpoſta all' Anticr. del Beni, cart. 16.

(24) It ſhould be Guarini, and it is probably an error of the preſs.

(25) Riſpoſt. cart. 112, 113.

(26) Concerning the viciſſitude of human affairs.

(27) Lettera terza, cart. 103, 104, apud Arnoldum, p. 44.

(28) It ought to be remembred that Velſerus had publiſhed a little book in 1591. See, below, citation (30).

(29) In Vitis Juriſconſult. pag. 480.

(30) He ſays ſo himſelf in his xcvith letter, ad Italos, pag. 879.

(31) Gaſſendus in Vita Peireſkii, lib. iii, ad ann. 1612. pag. m. 279.

authors [F]; and no man ever had more friends than he in the republic of letters. He would never ſuffer himſelf to be drawn [G]; but his picture was taken unknown to ‘ whether the author of this book was Antony Albizius, that noble Florentine, who publiſhed above two years ago the genealogies of Chriſtian princes, as ſome believe; or, which is more likely, whether it was the illuſtrious Marcus Velſerus, whom we have often mentioned on account of his conſummate learning, and ſingular attachment to the houſe of Auſtria.’ Mr Arnoldus (32) declares that he knows nothing of this affair, and blames their temerity who pronounce ſo deciſively concerning a fact ſo uncertain as this is. He cites Ernſtius (33), Rhodius (34), Scavenius (35), Placcius (36), who affirm that Velſerus was the author of this book. He owns that Octavius Ferrarius wrote to him that Scioppius had frequently aſſured him, that Velſerus was the author of the Squittinio. ‘ M. Velſeri ſcripta eo plauſu à ſtudioſis excipientur, quem ingens viri fama & celebre nomen meretur. Nollem tamen illis inſeri Venetæ Reip. Scrutinium, cujus illum auctorem fuiſſe ſæpe mihi Scioppius firmavit (37). - - - The writings of Velſerus will be received by the learned with that applauſe, which his great fame and reputation deſerve. But yet I would not inſert amonſt them the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, of which Scioppius has often aſſured me he was the author.’ The authority of Scioppius in this caſe ſeems to me to be of great weight, for beſides that he was generally very well acquainted with all things of this nature, he enjoyed a large ſhare of Velſerus's friendſhip, and kept a very ſtrict epiſtolary correſpondence with him (38). Mr Arnoldus was not ignorant that the author of the book, intituled, The Conſpiracy of the Spaniards againſt the Republic of Venice, attributes the Squittinio to the Marquis of Bedemar; but he hath not rightly choſen the paſſage of that piece, which moſt clearly aſcribes the Squittinio to the Marquis. His proof is grounded upon theſe words: The other point was, that in all affairs which he was to negotiate concerning the right and prerogatives of the Republic, he ſhould make uſe of the Memoirs of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, to which the Marquis of Bedemar refers in ſeveral places of this inſtruction, and that in terms which tho' ſomewhat modeſt, yet diſcover plainly enough HIS PATERNAL LOVE FOR THIS LIBEL. The Abbot de St Real, author of the Relation of this Conſpiracy, ſaith this in the laſt page but one; and in the thirty-fifth, thirty-ſixth, and thirty-ſeventh, he had related the hiſtory of the Squittinio, and how the Marquis of Bedemar had conceived and executed the deſign of this work. From whence, and not from the laſt page ſave one, Mr Arnoldus ought to have drawn his neceſſary proofs. But this is a very little fault compared with that which I am going to obſerve. He pretends that the relator of that conſpiracy is very much miſtaken, when he ſuppoſes that the Marquis of Bedemar, in his inſtruction to the ambaſſador, who was to ſucceed him, very much recommended the reading of the Squittinio. This is falſe, ſaith Mr Arnoldus, for the Marquis decried this piece, as a work abounding with falſhoods. The entire paſſage of the Profeſſor of Nuremberg runs thus: ‘ Verum quam falſus etiam hic auctor fuerit ex inſtructione ſecreta ab Alfonzo della Cueva Hiſpanico apud Venetos legato ſucceſſori ſuo Lud. Bravo data, cuivis uni ad oculum ſtatim apparet, prout Laur. Bank eamdem cum Scrutinio evulgavit (39). E perche in tempo mio fu divulgato un libretto intitulato Squitinio della Liberta de Veneziani, opretta veramente degna d'eſſer letta. Deinde omnem iſti derogat fidem, ob multas fallacias veritati inimicas quæ inibi occurrunt, ac vivos magiſtros mortuis longe præferendos cenſet. Queſto ancora vorrei che ſi trovaſſe appreſſo di lei, ſcoprendoſi per la lettura di quello molte fallacie introdotte da gli hiſtorici moderni, che traſcurando la pura verita contenuta nelle Chroniche antiche, hanno dato ad intendere à poſteri tutto quello che gli e parſo à propoſito per ſtabilire la loro liberta. Ne minor profetto ſara che Voſtra Excellenza potra trarne da libri vivi, che s'hara cavato da Volumi morti: vuoglio dire che l'informatione à bocca di perſone prattiche ſolite à frequentar la caſa noſtra, &c. Sed quid pluribus verbis opus eſt? Mentis acies ſe ipſam intuens nonnunquam hebeſcit. - - - - But it is obvious to every one, how much this author was miſtaken, about the ſecret inſtruction given by Alphonſus della Cueva, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Venice, to his ſucceſſor Lewis Bravo, as Laur. Bank has publiſhed it with the Squittinio. And becauſe in my time a ſmall book was publiſhed, intituled, Squittinio della liberta de Veneziani, a piece truly worthy to be read. Afterwards he entirely deſtroys the credit of it, becauſe of the many falſhoods that occur in it, and thinks that living inſtructors are much preferable to dead ones. I wiſh your Excellency had this by you, for by reading it you will diſcover many impoſtures introduced by modern Hiſtorians; who, neglecting the naked truth contained in antient chronicles, have repreſented to poſterity whatever ſeemed to them proper to eſtabliſh their liberty. It will be no leſs advantageous, if your Excellency can draw from living books, what you have drawn from dead volumes: I mean that an information by word of mouth from ſkillful perſons who uſed to frequent our houſe, &c. But what occaſion is there for many words? The edge of the mind turning on it's ſelf is ſometimes blunted.’

The reflexion contained in theſe laſt words, ſeems to be made only to be turned againſt it's author; for it is plain that Mr Arnoldus is dazzled with too bright a light. The paſſage, which he cites out of the inſtruction, clearly ſhews that the Squittinio ought to be conſulted by the ambaſſador, becauſe by reading it he might be informed of ſeveral impoſtures of ſeveral modern Hiſtorians. Therefore far from ſaying that it is filled with lies, Bedemar recommends it as a corrective of the falſities of others. What is moſt blameable in the Abbot de St Real, is, perhaps, that he too warmly engages in the affirmative, in aſcribing the Squittinio to Alphonſo de la Cueva. This hath occaſioned others to declare too deciſively on this head (40). He had, indeed, better have ſuſpended his judgment: and we have here an inſtance which proves that ſome books which make a great noiſe, are falſly aſcribed to various perſons, without ever diſcovering the true author (41). A French Hiſtorian, who wrote when the Squittinio appeared, makes no ſcruple to aſcribe it to our Velſerus, whoſe name he ſpells very ill. The ſecond, ſaith he (42), is a treatiſe compoſed by one Vulſer, concerning the liberty of Venice.

[F] And afforded helps to ſeveral authors.] No body contributed more than he to the large collection of inſcriptions, which Gruterus publiſhed. See the elogy of Velſerus in Gruterus's preface. Melchior Adam gives (43) us a long liſt of ſeveral antient books, the publication of which was procured by Velſerus. Mr Arnoldus enlarges (44) on the detail of the ſervices, which this learned man did to ſeveral authors, and doth not forget the two manuſcripts of Anaſtaſius, which he ſent to the Jeſuits of Mentz, after having borrowed them out of the Palatine Library, by the intereſt of Marquard Freherus. The ſtory of Pope Joan was in thoſe manuſcripts Nor doth he forget to obſerve that Velſerus was ſecurity for one thouſand Florins, in order to procure for Conrad Ritterſhuſius a manuſcript of the Epiſtles of Iſidorus Peluſiota out of the Duke of Bavaria's library, which could not be obtained but under ſuch ſecurity (45). But the generoſity of this action would not ſufficiently appear, if we did not know that Velſerus paid that ſum without pretending any obligation from Ritterſhuſius, for he did not ſo much as give him notice of it.

[G] He would never ſuffer himſelf to be drawn.] We are informed of this in Peireſkius's life. There was a great and amicable Epiſtolary Commerce betwixt theſe two learned men; but Peireſkius could never obtain this friend's picture. He was obliged to have recourſe to a ſtratagem, which he practiſed more than once: he payed a Painter to watch an opportunity of placing himſelf in a convenient place, where, unſeen, he could eaſily have a full view of Velſerus. ‘ Hoc uno ipſi durus fuit (Velſerus) quod ſui effigiem conſtantiſſime denegavit, pro eo quo omnibus aliis ardentiſſime flagitantibus denegaverat inſtituto. Et Peireſkius tamen ut alios nonnullos, ſic illum neſcientem pingi procuravit, conducto artifice qui ipſius vultum è clandeſtino loco ſpectaret. Sic obtinuit quod illi Occo ſperare nefas prædixerat, cum id abs Velſero tuliſſet reſponſum, Cato major poſteros volebat quærere cur ſibi ſtatua nulla poſita: Mi-

THE Abbot de St Real, unjuſtly cenſured.

---

(32) In Præfat.

(33) Lib. ii. Obſervat. variar. cap. xxxvi.

(34) In Auctor. Suppoſit. pag. 20, 21.

(35) In Catalogo, num. lx, in calce Libri Placcii.

(36) De Anonymis, cap. xv, pag. 116.

(37) Ferrarius, Epiſt. ad Arnold. in Præfat. Operum Velſeri.

(38) See the remark [G], of the article BONGARS.

(39) Bizzar. Polit. num. 14, 15, pag. 85, & ſeq.

(40) See the Nouv. de la République des Lettres, for May, 1684, pag. 316, of the ſecond edition.

(41) See the Cabale chimérique, pag. 214, of the ſecond edition.

(42) Le Grain, Decade de Louïs XIII, livr. x, pag. 449. The author of the Veritez Françoiſes, printed in the year 1643, ſays pag. 318, that Vulſer publiſhed his treatiſe of the Liberty of Venice.

(43) In Vitis Juriſconſult. pag. 482.

(44) De vita .... Marci Velſeri, pag. 58, & ſeq.

(45) Georg. Ritterſhuſius, in Vita Conradi patris, Salviano præmiſſa, apud Arnold. pag. 59.

to him. He died on the 13th of June 1614, and left no children by his marriage. He had ſeveral brothers, diſtinguiſhed as well by their great merit as by their conſiderable poſts (b). See his life prefixed to the new edition of his works, for which we are beholden to the care of Chriſtopher Arnoldus Profeſſor at Nuremberg. An author obſerves that Velſerus left his domeſtic affairs in an ill poſture (c), at which I am not at all ſurpriſed. When a man conſecrates himſelf as he did to the ſervice of the learned, and a general correſpondence with authors, it is extreamly difficult for him to avoid expences, and neglecting his private affairs. One Roſerius cenſured him, to whom he did not vouchſafe the honour of an anſwer. Scaliger and others adviſed him thus to deſpiſe his adverſary. Cluverius, who cenſured him in ſome particulars, deſerved an anſwer; but Velſerus had been dead a year before Cluverius's book came out (d). Pignorius wrote a very good epitaph on him, which is to be ſeen in the church of the Jacobins at Augſburg, and in John Tonjola's (e) appendix to the Baſilea ſepulta retecta continuata (f).

(b) See Schottus, in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Photius, and the remark [A], in the margin.

(c) Eximitur rebus humanis... memoria nominis ſui relicta immortali, perturbatis nonnihil ſuis facultatibus. Melchior Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſult. pag. 481.

(d) Arnold. de Velſeri vita, &c. pag. 54.

(e) Miniſter of the Italian church of Baſil.

(f) Printed at Baſil in the year 1661. That work was begun by John Groſſius, and carried as far as the year 1619.

'hi contra, quantum video cavendum ne quis aliquando miretur, ſi non & indignetur, qua ambitione conſortio magnorum virorum, quorum imagines ſe colligere Fabricius oſtendit, irrepſerim (46). . . . This was the only thing in which Velſerus was not complaiſant to him, that he obſtinately refuſed to let him have his picture, as he had conſtantly denied it to all other perſons who earneſtly begged it of him. However, Peireſkius found means to have him drawn without his knowledge, as he had ſome others, by hiring a Painter for that purpoſe, who, without being ſeen, had a full view of his face. And thus he obtained what Occo had told him it was in vain to hope for, when he received this anſwer from Velſerus: Cato, the elder, would have poſterity to enquire, why a ſtatue had not been erected for him; but I, on the other hand, as far as I can ſee, muſt take care that none hereafter may wonder, or perhaps reſent, that I ſhould ambitiouſly obtrude myſelf into the company of great men, of whoſe pictures Peireſc deſigns to make a collection.' This ſhews that Velſerus was not more complaiſant to others than to Mr de Peireſc, and that he very modeſtly excuſed himſelf to him. I cannot tell whether the picture of Velſerus in the library of Milan, was copied from that drawn for Mr de Peireſc; or whether it was taken by the ſame ſtratagem that Mr de Peireſc uſed: But I know that the picture of this illuſtrious German was placed in that Library. Boſca informs us of this, when he mentions the interview of Olgiati and Velſerus. 'Et quidem nos cùm pictam tabulam quæ expreſſam ipſius imaginem refert, in Ambroſiano Muſeo ſpectamus, gravitatem eam ex oculis conjicimus, & ex oris ipſius majeſtate vim literaturæ ac conſilii in adminiſtranda Vindelicorum provincia deprehendimus (47). - - - And indeed when we behold his picture, which is perfectly like him, in the Ambroſian library, we may ſee gravity in his looks, and diſcover, by the majeſty of his countenance, his great learning and wiſdom in governing the province of Augſburg.'

(46) Gaſſendus, in Vita Peireſkii, lib. i, ad ann. 1602, pag. m. 254.

(47) Petrus Paulus Boſca, Bibliothecarius ex Sodalitio Sacerdotum oblatorum, de origine & ſtatu Biblioth. Ambroſianæ, pag. 21, apud Arnold, pag. 48.

VELSIUS (JUSTUS) in Dutch Welſens was born at the Hague. He received the degree of Doctor of Phyſic at Louvain in the year 1542, and ſometimes gave public lectures in the room of Peter Nannius his good friend, and profeſſor in the college of the three languages. He was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, and fled from Louvain to avoid the Inquiſition, and retired to Straſburgh. He wrote a book intituled Κρίσις, ſive veræ Chriſtianæque Philoſophiæ comprobatoris atque æmuli & ſophiſtæ per comparationem Deſcriptio, which was condemned by the divines of Louvain in the year 1554. Being come to Cologn, and having declared that he had left Straſburgh on account of religion, he was honoured with a profeſſorſhip in Philoſophy, and in Philology (a). The chief of his works is a commentary on the picture of Cebes. He was a man of learning but very inconſtant in point of religion [A]. He was ſucceſsful in the practice of Phyſic, and excelled in Botanics (b). He is very much praiſed by Nigidius in ſome Latin verſes, which Paul Freherus has cited (c), and which ſhew that he ſtaid but a little time at Marpurg, where he taught publickly.

(a) Extracted from Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 605, 606.

(b) Merckl. in Lindenio renovato, pag. 727.

(c) Freh. in Theatro, pag. 1247.

[A] He was a man . . . . very inconſtant in point of religion.] The fear of the Inquiſition made him leave Louvain, where he found he was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, and obliged him to go to Straſburgh, the aſylum of Proteſtants (1). Nevertheleſs he wrote a book there which was not favourable to them, and by the very title of it declared war againſt them. The title runs thus: 'Juſti Velſii Hagani in Cebetis Thebani Tabulam Commentariorum Libri ſex totius moralis Philoſophiæ Theſaurus. In quibus nonnulla per occaſionem tum de Studiorum, Artium, & Scientiarum abuſu & corruptela: tum contra ea quæ noſtra hac ætate in Religione exorta ſunt falſa & abſurda dogmata, ad Catholicæ & orthodoxæ veritatis propugnationem & defenſionem diſſeruntur. - - - Six books of commentaries on the picture of Cebes the Theban, being a treaſure of all moral Philoſophy. In which ſome things are treated occaſionally, both concerning the abuſe and corruption of ſtudies, arts, and ſciences: and againſt thoſe falſe and abſurd doctrines in religion, which have been broached in our time, in defence of the Catholic and Orthodox truth, by Juſtus Velſius of the Hague.' This work was printed at Lyons in the year 1551, in 4to: the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Antony Perrenot, Biſhop of Arras, is dated at Straſburgh on the firſt day of the year 1550, and ſhews that the author very much condemned the new ſects. However, what he advanced to attack the Proteſtants on the doctrine of Juſtification, did not pleaſe the Spaniſh inquiſitors: for they give notice, in their Index, to read it with caution (2). They put Juſtus Velſius in the firſt claſs of the authors damnatæ memoriæ, the authors condemned. They deſire this cenſure may be applied to all the works of Velſius, which they permit to be read, and they abſolutely and for ever condemn his Epiſtola ad Imperatorem & Electores, & ad Judices terræ, &c. and his Criſis Chriſtianæ Philoſophiæ.

Hoſpinian obſerves (3), that in the year 1556, Calvin being gone to Francfort for ſome important reaſons, publickly diſputed with Juſtus Velſius on Free-will. The diviſions of the church of Francfort were the cauſe of Calvin's journey, as we learn by his letters (4), and by his life (5). It is not to be doubted but that Velſius then lived in the communion of Proteſtants, but with ſome peculiar opinions of his own. This is the more probable, as we know he wrote a confeſſion of faith, which was printed, and which is looked upon as a proof of the diviſions that reigned among the ſects ſeparated from Popery (6).

(1) Deflexit ad Argentinenſes ubi azylum hæretici habebant. Valer. Andr. Bibliotb. Belgic. pag. 605.

(2) Index Librorum prohib. pag. m. 677.

(3) Hoſpin. Hiſtor. Sacram. Tom. ii, p. 422.

(4) Calvini, Epiſt. ccxxiii, & ſeq.

(5) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1556.

(6) See Braunius, in Defenſione Cathol. Tremonenſium, pag. 51, 52.

VERDIER (N. Du) Hiſtoriographer of France, author of ſeveral books [A], which as they are not excellent, are not inferior to ſeveral which have ſupplied their authors with bread. Notwithſtanding he had the misfortune not to be able to ſubſiſt on the fruits of his pen, tho' very fertile: as I am informed by a very long parentheſis of John Baptiſt de Rocolles [B], Hiſtoriographer of France, and of Brandenburg, which I have inſerted in a remark. We may learn from it at what time Du Verdier lived.

[A] Author of ſeveral books.] Beſides others, he had publiſhed abridgments of the Hiſtory of England, France, Spain, and of the Turks, &c. The abridgment of the Hiſtory of France was printed at Paris for the third time, in the year 1655, in two volumes in 12mo.

[B] As I am informed by a very long parentheſis of John Baptiſt de Rocolles.] The author whom I cite having related the death of Baſſa Geduc Acomat, according to the narrative of the Turkiſh Pandects, extracted from the Italian of the Secretary of Sigiſmund Malateſta Prince of Rimini, adds, immediately after: ‘But poor du Verdier, who wrote in a conciſe but elegant ſtile, an abridgment of the Hiſtory of the Turks, relates it after ſeveral others. (I call this celebrated writer poor, becauſe whilſt I write this, he and his poor wife are in the hoſpital of the Salt-Peter-Houſe at Paris, where they have been for ſeven or eight years paſt, where I have viſited him, and found true what fame had long ſince divulged concerning his great probity: this made me deplore the fate of ſeveral learned men in this flouriſhing age, in which virtue and merit ought to be more valued.’) This author ſaith, &c (1).

(1) Rocolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, printed at Leyden in 1683, pag. 132, 133.

VERGERIUS (Peter-Paul) One of the learned men of the XVth century, was born at Capo d'Iſtria (a) on the gulph of Venice. He was a good Philoſopher, and ſo happily intermixed polite learning with the Law, that he was eſteemed the moſt eloquent Civilian of his time (b). He learned Greek under Emanuel Chryſoloras at Venice (c), and the Canon Law under Francis de Zabarellis at Florence (d). He was very much reſpected by Prince Carrari Lord of Padua, who choſe him preceptor to his children (e). He was not leſs conſidered by the Emperor Sigiſmund, at whoſe court in Hungary he died (f), and whom he accompanied to the council of Conſtance, if I am not miſtaken [A]. He wrote ſeveral books [B].

(a) In Latin Juſtinopolis.

(e) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 777.

(f) Volaterr. lib. iv, pag. 133.

(b) Juriſconſultorum ſuo tempore eloquentiſſimus, ſive mavis dicere eloquentium Juriſconſultiſſimus, ſimul & philoſophus fuit. Volaterr. lib. xxi, pag. m. 773. (c) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap. cxi, pag. m. 254. (d) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 444.

[A] He had accompanied the Emperor Sigiſmond to the council of Conſtance, if I am not miſtaken.] I make uſe of this reſerve, becauſe the expreſſions of thoſe, who inform us that he appeared with a great deal of luſtre in that council, claruit in Concilio Conſtantienſi (1), do not prove that he was a domeſtic to the Emperor. Perhaps the proof he gave of his merit during the holding of that council, determined Sigiſmund to take him into his ſervice.

[B] He wrote ſeveral books.] The Hiſtory of the Princes of Carrari, and that of the Princes of Mantua. An Elogy of St Jerom. A treatiſe de Republica Veneta, printed at Rome in 1526 (2). An Invective againſt Malateſta, who cauſed Virgil's ſtatue at Mantua to be taken down (3). A letter de vita & obitu Franciſci Zabarellæ Cardinalis Florentini (4). The Life of Petrarch. A treatiſe de ingenuis moribus ac liberalibus ſtudiis, which was printed at Venice in 1502, with ſome other ſmall tracts of the like nature, cum commentariis Joannis Bonardi Veronenſis & aliis aliorum de puerorum educatione opuſculis (5), and re-printed at Baſil in the year 1541, cum L. Vitruvii Roſcii de docendi ſtudendique modo, & claris peurorum moribus libello (6). This was read in the ſchools, when Paul Jovius was a young ſcholar (7). Add to this, that he was the firſt who tranſlated Arrianus de rebus geſtis Alexandri Magni (8). But this verſion being deſigned for the uſe of the Emperor Sigiſmund, who was not very learned, he therefore made uſe of very barbarous Latin, as Bartholomew Flaccius obſerves (9). We may here, by the way, obſerve a miſtake of Leander Albertus; he clearly inſinuates that Marius Æquicola is the firſt, who mentioned that Charles Malateſta cauſed Virgil's ſtatue to be thrown into the river. ‘Quamquam, ſaith he (10). à Mario Æquicola in commentariis lingua vernacula de Mantuanis principibus conſcriptis injuria hercle carpatur, ac ſi ſtatuam Virgilii poëtæ in flumen abjici juſſerit: Etenim (11) ipſo auctori huic rei Æquicolæ fides tribuitur exigua, modicæ nimirum opinionis ſcriptori. - - - - Tho' he be unjuſtly cenſured by Marius Equicola in his Italian Memoirs concerning the Princes of Mantua, as if he had ordered the ſtatue of the Poet Virgil to be thrown into the river: for Equicola, who ſays this, being an author of no eſteem, is very little credited.’ It is certain that our Vergerio lived before this Equicola.

I deſire it may be obſerved that Voſſius, when he wrote his book concerning the Latin Hiſtorians, remembred very well, that our Vergerius was author of the invective againſt Charles Malateſta; but he had forgot it when he compoſed his treatiſe of the Latin Poets: for he there declares that he did not know whether this invective was written by Guarini of Verona, or one of his diſciples. ‘Statuam Mantuæ conſtitutam Maroni ante hos annos ducentos Carolus de Malateſtis, tanquam quæ nihil ad religionem Chriſtianam pertineret, dejici curavit. Habeoque orationem Manuſcriptam adverſus Carolum iis temporibus ſuper hoc exaratam, ſatis ſanè acerbam: Et tamen auctor ait, acerbiùs ſe ſcripturum fuiſſe, ſi tutum fuiſſet in eos ſcribere, qui poſſent proſcribere. Nomen auctoris non apponitur: Sed permiſta legitur orationibus, libelliſque Guarini, ac diſcipulorum, qui auctore magiſtro hujuſmodi oneris aliquid ſuſcipere ſolerent. Ut videri poſſit ſcripta ab ipſo Guarino Veronenſi, clariſſimo ſui temporis viro, vel ſaltem diſcipulorum aliquo (12). - - - - Charles Malateſta, above two hundred years ago, ordered Virgil's ſtatue, at Mantua, to be taken down, as being a thing foreign to the Chriſtian religion. And I have by me a pretty ſmart invective in manuſcript, which was then written againſt Malateſta on that account: and yet the author ſays he would have written more ſharply, had it been ſafe to write againſt thoſe, who had power to baniſh. The author's name is not put to it: but it is inſerted amongſt the orations and tracts of Guarini and his diſciples, who, by his order uſed to undertake ſomething of this nature. So that it may probably have been written by Guarini of Verona, or at leaſt by one of his diſciples.’

(1) Andreas Divus, Præfat. in Iliada Homeri à ſe verſam.

(2) Geſner. in Biblioth. fol. 551, verſo.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 553.

(4) Panzirol. de claris Leg. Interpret. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 444.

(5) Voſſius, ubi ſupra. pag. 552.

(6) Geſn. ubi ſupra, fol. 552.

(7) Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxi, pag. 254.

(8) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 552.

(9) In Præfat. ſuper ſua Tranſlat. eorundem Librorum apud Geſn. ubi ſupra.

(10) Leand. Albert. in Deſcript. Ital. pag. 455.

(11) I ſet down thoſe words with the errors of the preſs in Albertus.

(12) Voſſius, de Poëtis Latin. pag. 27.

VERGERIUS (Peter-Paul) of the ſame city (a) and family with the foregoing (b), flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He ſtudied the Civil Law, and took his degree of Doctor in Law; but he made himſelf more famous by his embaſſies, and by eccleſiaſtical affairs, than by his learning in the Civil Law. He was ſent Nuncio into Germany to the King of the Romans (c) by Clement VII, in the year 1530, and had orders to uſe all all poſſible means to hinder the aſſembling of a national council. He ſupported the intereſt of Popery with a great deal of vigour and addreſs, and oppoſed the progreſs of the Lutherans as much as he could. He was re-called by Paul III, who deſired to be thoroughly informed of the diſpoſitions of Germany, and was ſent thither again in the year 1535, with orders to promiſe the holding of a council, and with ſome other inſtructions. On this head he conferred with ſeveral Proteſtant princes, and with Luther himſelf at Wittemberg [A]. He gave to the Pope an account of his negotiation the following year, and was immediately ordered to Naples to treat with Charles V. He was raiſed to the epiſcopal dignity in the ſame year 1536 (d), and in conjunction with eight other commiſſioners he drew up the papal indiction or promulgation of a council. He returned into Germany in the year 1541, to aſſiſt at the aſſembly of Worms: he appeared

(a) Fra-Paolo, Iſtor. del Concilio, lib. i, pag. m. 80.

(b) See what Andrew Divus tells him, in dedicating to him his Latin tranſlation of the Iliad. You will find his words in Geſner's Bibliotheca, fol. 552, and in Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 553. (c) Ferdinand, brother to the Emperor Charles V.

(d) Tunc primum factus Epiſcopus Modruſienſis, ac non multo poſt Juſtinopolitanus. Melch. Adam, ubi infra, pag. 118.

[A] He conferred with Luther himſelf at Wittemberg.] Father Paul and Pallavicini relate this very differently. The firſt aſſures us that the Pope ordered Vergerius to treat with Luther, and the chief of his party, and to endeavour to regain them by promiſes and careſſes (1), and that this Nuncio went to Luther at Wittemberg, and treated him very obligingly, according to his orders (2). He recites the diſcourſe the Nuncio made, and Luther's anſwer. He ſhews the magnificent promiſes and moſt engaging behaviour of the former in his diſcourſe. But Luther's anſwer is full of an holy contempt of all thoſe advantageous offers: he diſcovers an admirable firmneſs and reſolution. Pallavicini relates this ſtory in a quite other manner, and accuſes Father Paul of having ſtuffed his hiſtory with more lies than Homer had invented concerning the Trojan war. He complains that Father Paul diſgraces the Pope by repreſenting him as making ſuch ſhameful advances, and that he beſtows ſo much piety, wiſdom, and greatneſs of ſoul on a Heretic. He maintains that Vergerio unexpectedly ſaw Luther. This Nuncio, ſaith he, being obliged to paſs through Wittemberg, was there very honourably received. The commander of that town waited at his table during his ſupper, and came to him next morning to do him the ſame ſervice at his breakfaſt, bringing with him two doctors, Martin Luther and John Bugenhage, and telling him that the court and univerſity were both abſent (3), and that he could find no other perſons but theſe two, who were able to converſe with him in an intelligible language, and keep him company; and he begged of him to converſe with them whilſt he breakfaſted. The Nuncio could not deny it, he found that Luther expreſſed himſelf barbarouſly in Latin; he ſuffered him to ſay ſeveral things without anſwering ſcarce one word, and took him for a very haughty, malicious, and imprudent man, whoſe manners were very unpolite. Have you heard any thing in Italy, concerning the character I have there of being a drunken German (4)? was one of the queſtions which Luther aſked Vergerius. He ſaid ſeveral things of the ſame nature, which the Nuncio mentioned in his letter to the Pope's ſecretary, in which he did not forget to deſcribe Luther's habit and manners. This is the ſubſtance of Pallavicini's relation (5), which he took from Vergerius's letter written to the Pope's ſecretary on the 12th of November 1535, and he concludes from hence, that Father Paul is miſtaken when he affirms that the Pope gave Vergerio order to make large promiſes to Martin Luther. This inference is inconteſtable, and there is no other way left to bring off Father Paul than to prove the falſity of the Nuncio's letter; for if it be owned to be authentic, it plainly appears that the Pope did not order Vergerio to gain Luther by endearing perſuaſions and hopes of honours; for if he had, Vergerio, by this relation of his diſcourſe with Luther, which he ſent in his letter to the Pope's ſecretary, had rendered himſelf as ridiculous as any of the moſt ſenſeleſs wretches that are ſhut up in a mad-houſe.

Perhaps it may be ſaid, that it is at leaſt true that Vergerius held, of his own head, this diſcourſe with Luther, which Father Paul relates, from whence it will naturally follow, that Luther's anſwer, related by the ſame author, is not a pure invention. I wiſh, at leaſt, that Father Paul's fidelity on this laſt head could be juſtified; but I cannot ſee how: for in the firſt place, according to Father Maimbourg's remark, Theſe fine diſcourſes of Father Paul are not found in the writers of thoſe times; not even in Sleidan, who ſaith only in one word, that Vergerio ſaw Luther at Wittemberg (6). In the ſecond place, the curious and indefatigable Seckendorf, who met with a relation of the interview betwixt the Nuncio and Luther, ſays nothing concerning the Nuncio's promiſes (7); and this relation being made by a very good friend to Luther, it is not credible that he ſhould forget the moſt conſiderable paſſage in this narration, I mean, the Nuncio's advantageous offers, and the heroic and entirely apoſtolical contempt of them which Luther ſhewed. And therefore the ſilence of the relation, is a demonſtrative proof againſt Father Paul. It ought not to be objected that the author of this relation informs us, that he has omitted ſeveral particulars; for ſince what he relates is leſs important and honourable than Father Paul's fine diſcourſes, he would doubtleſs have inſerted them into his narrative, rather than any of the reſt, if they had really been ſpoken. He hath not omitted Luther's jeſting anſwer to his Barber, and would he then have forgot an anſwer more worthy of St Paul than of a Doctor of the XVIth century? Luther, before he made a viſit to Vergerio, cauſed himſelf to be ſhaved very early in the morning. At which the Barber was very much ſurprized. Do not wonder at this, replies the Reformer (8), I have been ſent for to talk with the Nuncio of the holy Father, and I would not be ſeen in a ſlovenly manner; and ſhaving will make me appear younger, and I ſhall the more terrify my adverſaries with a fear of my living the longer. The author of the Relation does not forget even this particular. Obſerve, that this account very plainly inſinuates, that this interview was not unexpected on the Nuncio's ſide, and that it expreſly ſays, that they talked much concerning the holding of a council. From whence we may infer that Vergerio did not write an exact account of all the particulars of this converſation with the Pope's ſecretary: ſo that one of Pallavicini's reaſons is very weak; he ſaith, the Nuncio dared not diſguiſe the truth, ſince the contents of his dialogue with Luther before a whole table full of auditors, might be ſent to the Pope by other hands (9). Obſerve alſo that Spondanus relates, that Paul III charged his Nuncio, Peter-Paul Vergerius, to treat Martin Luther in a very engaging manner, and to make him a great many promiſes (10). Once more, this is inconſiſtent with the Nuncio's letter, and perhaps we ſhould not be in the wrong to ſubſcribe to the judgment of a Jeſuit in this particular. I believe, ſaith he (11), that the moſt certain thing that can be ſaid upon this, is, that Father Paul diverted himſelf at the expence of truth, by making theſe two perſons ſpeak as he pleaſed, to whom, as it appears, he was no enemy.

Will it be objected, that the order to tempt Luther by magnificent promiſes, was a ſecret whiſpered in the ear, that only Vergerio and the Pope were acquainted with, and therefore it was not mentioned in the long letter written to the Pope's ſecretary by Vergerio, which Father Pallavicini cites? This is the laſt ſhift of a cavilling man, which may be eaſily forced; for if this particular inſtruction of the Nuncio was only whiſpered in his ear by the Pope; if the Nuncio durſt not write any thing to the Pope's ſecretary, which ſhould hint that his Holineſs had given him ſuch an inſtruction, how came Father Paul by this large account of the Nuncio's offers? Had he ſeen Vergerio's letters, which were to be read by the Pope only? This is what he ſhould inform us of, and till we know it, we have reaſon to believe Vergerio's diſpatches, that are ſtill in the archives, and to affirm that the Pope burnt all thoſe letters which were written for his peruſal only; which is a new reaſon to aſk how they then reached the hands of this Servite at Venice. And when all is ſaid, may we not object to Father Paul the ſilence of the Relation which Mr Seckendorf found amongſt the Wittemberg manuſcripts?

[B] This

(1) Father Paul, Hiſt. of the council of Trent. lib. i, p. m. 69.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 70.

(3) The profeſſors had removed elſewhere by reaſon of the plague.

(4) La prima coſa che diſſe vedendomi taciturno fù, ſe in Italia io haveva inteſo alcuna coſa della ſua fama d'eſſer Tedeſco imbriaco. Vergerius, Epiſt. ad Secretarium Papæ, apud Pallavic. Iſtor. del Concilio, lib. iii, cap. xviii, num. 9.

(5) Pallavicin. ibid. num. 6, & ſeq.

(6) Maimbourg. Hiſt. du Lutheriſme, Tom. i, livr. iii, pag. 229, Dutch Edit.

(7) Seckendorf. Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 95.

(8) Jocabundus dixit: ſe ad ſanctiſſimi Patris Nuncium vocatum eſſe, nec incultum accedere velle; ita fore, ut pro juniori haberetur, & longioris vitæ metu adverſarios terreret. Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 95, col. 1.

(9) Pallavic. ubi ſupra, num. 10, pag. m. 352.

(10) Spondanus, ad ann. 1535, num. 10.

(11) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 230.

appeared there as a perſon employed by the King of France; but this is ſaid to have been only a feint [B], and that he took that character in order to render himſelf the more ſerviceable to the court of Rome. He publiſhed an oration on the Unity of the Church, chiefly to prove that a particular council ought not to be held. Being returned to Rome, he found that ſome perſons had ſo far rendered him ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, that the Pope hearkening to their calumnies, had given over his deſign of making him a Cardinal (e). This news threw him into a conſternation, and he reſolved to juſtify himſelf. For this purpoſe he retired into his own country, and there began a controverſial book againſt the German apoſtates. He examined their books, he weighed the force of their objections, he attentively conſidered the ways of refuting them; but this diligent ſtudy only ſerved to convince him, that they were in the right. From that time he renounced all hopes of a cardinal's hat, and went to his brother (f), who was Biſhop of Pola, to whom he declared the condition he was in; he aſked his advice, and without any regard to the compaſſion he had excited in him, he exhorted him to conſult the ſcripture, and above all with reſpect to the doctrine of Juſtification. The Biſhop of Pola having followed his counſel, was convinced of the truth of the Proteſtant doctrine, and agreed with his brother to teach the truth for the future. They executed their deſign; but the Monks perceiving it, alarmed the Inquiſition, and made a great ſtir about it. One of the Inquiſitors prodigiouſly harraſſed the citizens of Pola and of Capo d'Iſtria [C]; inſomuch that our Vergerius, not believing himſelf ſafe, retired to Mantua, to Cardinal Hercules de Gonzaga: there he did not long find a ſecure retreat; for John della Caſa, the Pope's

(e) See the remark [D].

(f) John Baptiſt Vergerius.

[B] This is ſaid to have been only a feint.] Sleidan and, after him, Melchior Adam affirm it. 'Erat etiam 'hoc in conventu (Wormatienſi) Petrus Paulus Vergerius, epiſcopus Juſtinopolitanus, verbo quidem, tanquam Galliæ regis cauſa, ſed revera miſſus à pontifice, qui ſuis rebus illum inſervire magis poſſe putabat, ſi quidem alieno nomine ibi verſaretur (12). '- - - Peter-Paul Vergerius, Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria, was alſo preſent at this aſſembly of Worms, in the name of the King of France, as it was indeed pretended, but in truth was ſent thither by the Pope, who thought he might be more ſerviceable to him under a foreign character.' Father Paul affirms the ſame thing, The Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria, ſaith he (13), was preſent at this conference, not as the Pope's miniſter, though really ſent by Paul as a man very well verſed in the knowledge of that country, but in the name of France, that he might be leſs ſuſpected by the Germans, and more capable of ſerving the Pope under a foreign character. He adds, 'that ſeveral perſons there made it their buſineſs to prolong that affair, to which they were induced by the Nuncio Campegio, and the ſecret practices of Vergerio.' Cardinal Pallavicini, according to his cuſtom, here complains of the malignity of Father Paul; he accuſes him of falſely charging the Pope with a ſpirit of fraud; and to convict him of falſity, he tells us that Vergerio had been long ſuſpected at the court of Rome. Cardinal Alexander's letters had produced this effect; he had informed the Pope that Vergerio ſpoke diſadvantageouſly of the Holy See, and held correſpondence with Luther's diſciples. It was believed at Rome, that this Biſhop's continuance in Germany was a ſign of the venom of hereſy which he had ſwallowed, wherefore they endeavoured to oblige him to reſidence, and made it a requeſt to the Emperor, that a Prelate ſo much ſuſpected as he, ſhould be obliged to live far from the Empire, and not aſſiſt at the conferences concerning religion. If this be true, we may ſuppoſe that he aſſumed the character of Envoy of France, without any colluſion of the Pope. Pallavicini's words and proofs run thus (14). 'Il qual racconto è sì falſo, che molto prima 'il Cardinal Aleandro haveva ammonito * ſegretiſſimamente il Pontefice, come il Vergerio parlava con poco onore della Sede Apoſtolica, minacciava contra di eſſa, e teneva amicizia con Luterani; del che allegò per teſtimonii il Nunzio Morone, e quel di Vinezia. Ed inconformità d'una tale opinione formata di lui, nel quale traſparivano i ſemi di quelle ſerpi ch'egli covava nell' animo, e che poi uſcirono nelle ſcritture e nell' azioni: era il ſenſo che havevaſi à queſto tempo in Roma della ſua dimora in Germania: Tantoche gli s'era anch'eſibito lo ſgravamento della penſione per indurlo alla reſidenza nel Veſcovado. E tuttociò fè ſignificare il Pontefice  all' Imperadore dal Nunzio Poggi, affinche l'autorità Ceſarea (quando ciò foſſe poſſibile) il teneſſe lungi da quelle Provincie, e da que' trattati. - - - 'This account is ſo falſe, that Cardinal Alexander had long before privately acquainted the Pope, that Vergerio ſpoke diſhonourably of the Apoſtolic ſee, threw out menaces againſt it, and maintained a friendſhip with the Lutherans: for which he alledged the teſtimonies of the Nuncio Morone, and of the Nuncio to Venice. Accordingly it was believed at Rome, that his continuance in Germany manifeſted the ſeeds of that poiſon which were ſown in his mind, and afterwards ſprung forth in his writings and actions: ſo that the taking away of the penſion was intimated to him, in order to induce him to reſide in his biſhopric. And moreover the Pope ordered the Nuncio Poggi to deſire the Emperor to uſe his authority (as ſoon as poſſible) to keep him at a diſtance from the empire, and from ſuch conferences.' Obſerve that the Cardinal doth not deny what Father Paul ſays concerning Vergerio's conduct: he doth not deny the artifices of this miniſter of the King of France, which were ſo conformed to the court of Rome. He ſaith nothing on that head, but tells us that Vergerio was a man of a lively and bold genius, and of the humour of certain perſons who cannot live without being in the management of public buſineſs, and who fancy that it cannot be carried on without them. Huomo quanto vivace, tanto audace, e frà la condizione di coloro che nè poſſano vivere ſenza maneggiar negozii, nè penſano che i negozii poſſano maneggiarſi ſenza di loro (15). As for the reſt, what Sleidan ſaith, that Vergerio at his return from the Diet of Worms, had been created Cardinal, if ſome perſons had not altered the Pope's mind, he calls (16) it a fable, and maintains that in 1539 the Pope was diſpleaſed with that biſhop.

[C] One of the Inquiſitors prodigiouſly haraſſed the citizens of Pola, and of Capo d'Iſtria.] We can never too often repreſent the villany and injuſtice annexed to the profeſſion of Inquiſitor. Wherefore I ſhall here give a ſhort account of that man's conduct, who exerciſed that office in the dioceſes of the two Vergerio's. His name was Annibal Griſon. He entered the houſes of the inhabitants to ſearch for ſuſpicious books; he excommunicated thoſe who did not detect the perſons that appeared to them ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm; he promiſed to mitigate the puniſhment of thoſe who ſhould renounce their hereſy, and apply to him to aſk pardon; but he threatned thoſe with fire, who did not prevent their accuſers by an humble confeſſion of their crime. He denounced his threats from door to door, and ſpread terror every where. Some accuſed themſelves: he ſeverely cenſured thoſe, who had read the Bible in the vulgar language, and forbad their continuance in that crime. Soon after nothing was ſeen but accuſations, every one engaged in them without regard to the laws of conſanguinity or gratitude. The wife did not ſpare her huſband, the ſon his father, nor the client his patron; ſeveral perſons were brought into trouble for trifles, ſuch, for example, who had only ventured to ſpeak againſt the bigottry of others

(12) Sleidanus, lib. xiii, fol. m. 318, verſo.

(13) Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, book i, pag. m. 87.

(14) Pallavicin. ubi ſupra, lib. iv, cap. xii, num. 11, pag. m. 433, 434. See alſo ch. xiii, num. iii, of the vith book, pag. 635.

* Lettera del Card. Aleandro al Cervino, a 12 di Marzo 1539, della quale il Cervino accuſa la ricevuta in una all' Aleandri ſotto i 28 dell' iſteſſo.

 Lettere del Card. Farneſe al Poggi dell' ultimo di Febraio 1541.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Idem, lib. vi, cap. xiii, num. 3.

Pope's legate at Venice, made ſo many inſtances to the Cardinal, to oblige him to rid himſelf of ſuch a gueſt, that Vergerius found it very proper to leave Mantua. He went to Trent in order to purge himſelf before the council [D]. The Pope would very willingly have ſeized him, but being loth to give occaſion to any complaints that the aſſembly was not free, he wrote to his legates to forbid this Biſhop taking his place there, and that they ſhould order him to depart. Some reaſons that were given for that prohibition are pitiful [E]. Vergerius retired to Venice, where he took care not to conform to others. Deinde promiſcua multitudo, timore perculſis animis, deferebant quoſque certatim, nulla neque propinquitatis neque neceſſitudinis aut beneficiorum habita ratione: non parenti filius, non uxor marito, non cliens patrono parcebat. Delationes autem erant plerunque de rebus frivolis; ut quiſque forte aliquid ob ſuperſtitionem in aliquo reprehenderat (17). On a ſolemn day this Inquiſitor celebrated Maſs in the cathedral of Capo d'Iſtria, and told the people: of late years you have lain under many calamities; your olive-trees as well as your corn-fields and vineyards have been barren; your cattle have been afflicted with diſtempers. Your Biſhop and other Heretics have expoſed you to theſe evils. Do not expect any relief, unleſs you ſuppreſs thoſe Heretics, and what have you now to do but to fall upon and ſtone them immediately? Hoc tempore, & hiſce aliquot annis, multæ vos premunt calamitates: quæ nunc oleas, nunc ſegetes, modò vineas, modò pecudes, aliaſque facultates graviter affligunt: his verò malis cauſam præbet Epiſcopus veſter & hæreticorum turba reliqua: nec eſt quod levationem ullam ſperetis, niſi coërceantur: proximum autem eſt, ut impetu facto lapidentur (18). You will find all this in Sleidan's Hiſtory (19). Obſerve, that Vergerius had ſo much prudence as not to truſt himſelf to the mercy of a populace thus animated by a furious perſecutor. He made his eſcape, as Father Paul obſerves, from the fury of the people of his dioceſe, which the Inquiſitor Hannibal Griſon had irritated againſt him by charging him with being a Lutheran, and the cauſe of the ſterility of the earth (20). I cannot tell whether this Hannibal had ever read the writings of the Fathers, wherein we find the ridiculous reproaches of the Pagans, that the followers of JESUS CHRIST were the cauſe of all the calamities which befel the people (21). I do not know whether he had read this excellent paſſage of Tertullian: ‘At è contrario illis nomen factionis accommodandum eſt, qui in odium bonorum & proborum conſpirant, qui adverſum ſanguinem innocentium conclamant, prætexentes ſanè ad odii defenſionem, illam quoque vanitatem, quòd exiſtiment omnis publicæ cladis, omnis popularis incommodi Chriſtianos eſſe cauſam. Si Tyberis aſcendit in mœnia, ſi Nilus non aſcendit in arva, ſi cœlum ſtetit, ſi terra movit, ſi fames, ſi lues, ſtatim Chriſtianos ad leonem (22). - - - But, on the contrary, the name of faction ought to be given to thoſe who concur in their enmity againſt good and upright men, and thirſt for the blood of the innocent: alledging fooliſhly in their own vindication, that the Chriſtians are the cauſe of all public calamities, and of every public misfortune. If the Tyber overflows its banks, or the Nile does not cover the lands, if there is a drought, an earthquake, famine or peſtilence, the Chriſtians muſt immediately be thrown to the lions.' But I am perſuaded that though the Inquiſitor had perfectly known all this, it would not have hindred him from ſaying, when proviſions were dear, or there was a mortality amongſt the cattle, that the Heretics were the cauſe of it. Such a man conſults his falſe zeal more than reaſon, and conſequently may very well be ſo blind as not to ſee the abſurdity of caſting the ſame reproaches on Lutheraniſm which the Pagans did upon the primitive Chriſtians, and which all Proteſtants may return on Papiſts in the countries where they are ſtrongeſt. But which is more, though ſuch a man had been ſenſible of this abſurdity, yet he was bad enough to have uſed it, becauſe he thought nothing would enrage the people againſt the Lutherans, and make them ſtone them more than this. Is it aſtoniſhing that a Monk ſhould uſe this contrivance? Do not we ſee that as ſoon as the Chriſtians were able to perſecute, they reproached the Heathens with the ſame things which the Heathens had imputed to them, that is to ſay, with being the cauſe that they had not good crops, and that the ſeaſons changed their natural courſe. I do not cite a private inconſiderable author to prove this, but a very authentic piece and imperial authority. Read what follows, ‘An diutiùs perferimus mutari temporum vices, iratâ cœli temperie? quæ, Paganorum exacerbata perfidiâ, neſcit naturæ libramenta ſervare. Unde enim ver ſolitam gratiam abjuravit? unde æſtas meſſe jejunâ, laborioſum Agricolam in ſpe deſtituit ariſtarum? unde hyemis intemperata ferocitas, ubertatem terrarum penetrabili frigore ſterilitatis læſione damnavit? niſi quod ad impietatis vindictam tranſit lege ſuâ naturæ decretum (23). - - - Shall we any longer ſuffer the ſeaſons to be inverted; or the courſe of nature changed through the perfidy of Pagans? Whence is it that the ſpring denies its uſual delights? that the ſummer deprives the laborious huſbandman of his expected crop? or that the rigorous winter by its penetrating cold deſtroys the fruitfulneſs of the earth? but becauſe nature, to be revenged on impiety, departs from its common courſe.' Mr Van Dale hath made ſome very good reflexions on this head (24). When we conſider theſe prepoſterous judgments, it is not eaſy to refrain from ſaying that there are certain faults which cling faſt to ſects, not as they are ſects, but as they are predominant. Hence it is that the ſame communions alter their ſentiments and maxims, as they acquire or loſe ſuperiority. The maxim, new honours new manners, holds very true here, and we may very well invert the ſenſe of that of Cornelius Nepos (25), without falſifying it.

[D] He went to Trent in order to purge himſelf before the council.] Melchior Adam ought to be blamed for not mentioning the year in which Vergerio went to Trent. He hath taken from Sleidan all that he hath ſaid concerning the converſion of this biſhop; but though that author ſucceſſively relates theſe things under the year 1548, we ought not to believe that Vergerio was at Trent in that year. He was there according to Father Paul in 1546. ‘He believed that the moſt honourable and commodious way of juſtifying himſelf was at the council. But the Legates would not admit him into the congregation, becauſe he had not cleared himſelf to the Pope, to whom they earneſtly preſſed him to go; and if they had not been afraid of raiſing a report againſt the liberty of the council, they had not contented themſelves with bare exhortations. So that Vergerio, after ſome days ſtay, departed from Trent, intending to return to his biſhopric, where he hoped the troubles were appeaſed. But when he was at Venice, the Nuncio † forbad his return thither, having received orders from Rome to proſecute him, which obliged him to quit Italy within a few months, either induced to it by reſentment, or fear, or ſome other motive (26).' I cite this paſſage, as well becauſe it contains ſome facts not touched on by Sleidan, as becauſe Father Paul's Chronology wants a little correction. What he tells us of Vergerio's leaving Italy in 1546 is not true. He did not quit that country till after having ſeen the miſerable end of Spira at Padua, who died in 1548 (27). If we will add to this Pallavicini's cenſures, we muſt ſay that Vergerio finding himſelf cited at Rome, where he had been accuſed as ſuſpected of hereſy, went to Trent (28), where he expected a ſafe refuge, and hoped to enjoy his right of ſitting amongſt the Biſhops as judge of that faith which he was charged with having deſerted. But being excluded from this right, he obtained, by the interceſſion of the Legates, a diſpenſation from appearing at Rome; and his caſe was committed to the Nuncio and Patriarch of Venice, according to his requeſt: but being ſenſible that he could not juſtify himſelf, he retired to the Proteſtants.

[E] Some reaſons that were given for that prohibition are pitiful.] ‘Vergerius intending to retire from the council, to the deſires of John della Caſa, who adviſed him to go to Rome. A few days after he was forbid in the Pope's name to return to his biſhopric. He went to Padua, and there became a witneſs of the deplorable death of Francis Spira. This example of deſpair, to which thoſe expoſe themſelves, who hold the truth in unrighteouſneſs, made him reſolve to undergo a voluntary exile, that he might be thereby enabled to make an open profeſſion of the pure religion. He went to the Griſons, and was a miniſter amongſt them for ſome years, as well as in the Valteline: after which, he was invited to Tubingen by the Duke of Wirtemberg, where he died on the 4th of October 1565. He publiſhed ſeveral books which proved very prejudicial to the Romiſh communion [F].

---

(17) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 119.

(18) Id. ibid. ex Sleidano, ubi infra.

(19) Sleidan, livr. xxi, fol. m. 589, ad ann. 1548.

(20) Fra-Paolo, ubi ſupra, lib. ii, pag. 141.

(21) See Origen contra Celſum, lib. iii, & in Matthæum, cap. xxiv; Arnobius, lib. i; St Cyprian, lib. ad Demetrianum, and among his letters the lxxvth; Oroſius, lib. vii, cap. xxxvii; St Auguſtin, de Civit. Dei, paſſim; &c.

(22) Tertul. Apologet. cap. xl.

(23) Novella III Theodoſii de Judæis, Samaritanis, & Hæreticis.

(24) Van Dale, de Oraculis, pag. 21, 22.

(25) He ſays Sui cuique mores fingunt fortunam. - - - A man's manners make his fortune. See, above, citation (50), of the article TIMOLEON. But it may be ſaid with as much reaſon, ſua cuique fortuna fingit mores. - - A man's fortune makes his manners.

† John della Caſa, Archbiſhop of Benevento, who was Secretary of State under Paul IV.

(26) Fra-Paolo, ubi ſupra, pag. 141.

(27) Sleidan. lib. xxi, fol. m. 588.

(28) Pallav. Iſtor. del Concilio, lib. vi, cap. xiii, num. iii. He quotes the letters written by the legates to Cardinal Ardinghelli, the 27th of February 1546, and to cardinal Farneze, the ſecond and the ſixth of March in the ſame year.

Before

‘ council, went to Cervinus (29), and aſked him for what reaſons he was rejected out of the company of the other Biſhops in the council. Cervinus then anſwered: becauſe I have heard that you denied the truth of the Legends of St George and St Chriſtopher. It is true, replied Vergerio, I did, and do yet deny them; but I ground that denial on the authority of Pope Paul III, who commanded them both to be left out of the Breviary. And in the Preface to that book, he ſaith that he had commanded that all thoſe Legends ſhould be left out which are not true. Cervinus being at a ſtand, could think of no other anſwer than this: thoſe perſons ought not to paſs for good men, who ſeem to agree with the Lutherans in any particular whatſoever, and therefore do you retire from our council (30).’ Thoſe who believe it utterly improbable, that Vergerio's deſpiſing thoſe Legends could be the only reaſon which the Legate urged, will be at leaſt ſatisfied with the Hiſtorian, when he owns that at laſt the Legate quitted that reaſon and alledged another. But they will never pardon Chemnitius for ſaying, That Vergerius ran the riſque of his life by venturing to declare, that he did not approve all that was contained in the Legend of St George. ‘ Nota eſt Vergerii hiſtoria, qui cum in Tridentina ſynodo Georgii legendam, quam Gelaſius diſtinctio. 15. diſerte autoribus hæreticis tribuit, ſibi non per omnia probari oſtenderet, in diſcrimen dignitatis, imo vitæ & capitis adductus fuit (31). - - - The ſtory of Vergerius is well known, who having declared at the Council of Trent that he did not approve all that was contained in the Legend of St George, which Pope Gelaſius expreſsly aſcribes to heretical authors, ran the riſque not only of his dignity but of his life.’ It muſt be allowed that this account is not exact, and that at leaſt there plainly appears in it the ſophiſm ‘ à non ſufficienti enumeratione partium. - - - A defective enumeration of parts.’ He reduces ſeveral reaſons to that, which in all likelihood was looked upon as the moſt inconſiderable.

What I am going to ſay is not one of the circumſtances which concern the text of this remark. Crepinus affirms (32), that ſeveral Biſhops being informed that Cervinus, contrary to the opinion of his two colleagues and of ſome cardinals, perſiſted in his refuſal to admit Vergerius into the council, reſolved to write upon it to the Pope: Jerom Vida of Cremona, Biſhop of Alba, an excellent Poet, had already drawn up the letters as well in the name of himſelf as of others (33), but this Legate's ſevere advertiſement hindered his ſending them to the Pope.

[F] He publiſhed ſeveral books which proved very prejudicial to the Romiſh communion.] As he was well acquainted with the intrigues carried on in Italy, and the moſt ſecret abuſes committed in that country, he was better able than another to render Popery odious. Beſides he ſcarce wrote any but ſmall tracts, which could eaſily be diſperſed throughout Europe, and choſe ſuch ſubjects as were ſuſceptible of a particular turn which very ſenſibly touched the readers. You will find in the catalogue of his writings (34), Relatio de perſecutione facta contra Evangelium in urbe Juſtinopolitana. Contra librum cui nomen Floſculi ſancti Franciſci. Contra librum cui titulus Roſarium. Contra librum cui titulus Miracula Virginis. De libro cui titulus Lux fidei. De libro cui titulus Floſculi Bibliæ. De ſtatuis ac imaginibus. De coronatione Julii Papæ III, quid ſperandum ex papatu Julii III, de literis Othonis Cardinalis Auguſtani ſcriptis de creatione Julii III. Quatuor Literæ ſub nomine Bonini de Boninis (35). De ſtatu Romanæ Curiæ. De nugis & fabulis Papæ Gregorii I. De Idolo Lauretano (36). Scholia in orationem Cardinalis Poli ad Cæſarem qua illum ad arma contra eos qui Evangelio nomen dederunt, inſtigat. Nova editio libri Ceremoniarum Romanæ Eccleſiæ cum præfatione & ſcholiis. Quot modis vir pius qui in Italia degat ſæpe Deum & Chriſtum negare compellitur. I omit ſeveral others, whoſe titles may be found in the epitome of Geſner, and in Verheiden (37); but I ſhall take notice of that piece of his intituled, Epitome libri cui titulus, Anatomia Miſſæ ab Antonio de Adamo. I never ſaw this abridgment of the anatomy of the Maſs, and cannot tell whether thoſe who mention it, write well the name of the author of this anatomy; for I find in the Latin edition of this work, that the author's name was Antonius ab Æda. A paſſage in the Preface runs thus: ‘ Quoniam igitur Anatomiæ cognitio non ſolum medicis chirurgiſque, verum etiam aliis ſummopere commendatur: eam ob cauſam, Anthonium ab Ædam Italum imitatus, hanc miſſæ ac miſſalis Anatomiam Gallicè, ut ab omnibus percipi poſſet facilius, in lucem edere ſtatui. - - - Since therefore the knowledge of Anatomy is very much recommended not only to Phyſicians and Surgeons, but alſo to others: for that reaſon, in imitation of Antonius ab Æda, an Italian author, I reſolved to publiſh this Anatomy of the Maſs and Miſſal in French, that it might be the more eaſily underſtood by all.’ Theſe words inform us that this piece was firſt publiſhed in Italian and then in French. It was tranſlated into Latin in the year 1561. The title of the Latin verſion is: Miſſæ ac Miſſalis Anatomia. Hoc eſt dilucida ac familiaris ad minutiſſimas uſque particulas Miſſæ ac Miſſalis enucleatio. Nunc primum (ut ea res purioris fidei cultoribus ſcitu neceſſaria, ad alias quoque nationes deveniret) è Gallica lingua Latine verſa anno Domini M. D. LXI. This book contains one hundred and ſeventy-two pages in octavo, beſides an errata of fifteen pages. The place where it was printed is not expreſſed. The perſon who made the errata ſays that a very urgent occaſion obliged him to it. It was, ſaith he, to prevent the artifices of the devil; for he ſuppoſes that Satan, to ruin the effects of this book, had made uſe of two very malicious frauds; the firſt of which was before, the ſecond during the time of the impreſſion. The firſt was, that the manuſcript was thrown into the mire, and reduced to a miſerable ſtate. The ſecond was, that the Printers committed a great many faults. So that to defeat this double machination of Satan, he was obliged to reviſe the work very carefully, and to make a long liſt of the errors of the Preſs. I know very well that ſome may ſuſpect me of impoſing on my readers; wherefore I cannot help citing part of the prologue to the errata. ‘ Maledictus Sathan, ut totam MISSÆ (execrandæ filiæ ſuæ) Tragœdiam in hoc inſtituit, & gubernavit hactenus, quò Chriſti meritum prorſus in hominum pectoribus extingueret, ac mendaciorum tenebras pro veritatis luce obtruderet: ita jam quoque, dum hic ipſe libellus excuderetur, rurſum artes ſuas egregiè adhibuiſſe videtur, dum tot eum mendis conſpurcari (ut multis in locis non modò nullam ſententiam, ſed inverſam plane colligere liceat) curavit, quò ejus lectionem vel prorſus è manibus piorum excuteret: vel mendarum tedio ita lecturos afficeret, ut ad finem uſque lectionem deducere non niſi ſumma cum nauſea poſſent. Idem verò etiam antea quam ad Typographum libellus perveniret, alia via aggreſſus, eum in lacunam alicubi projectum ita deturparat, ut non paucis foliis in itinere, antequam afferretur, ex cœno ac humore illo jam corruptis ac putridis, ſcriptura etiam paſſim ita obliterata fuerit, ita multis in locis lacerata omnia, ut non modo non legi rectè, ſed ne aperiri quidem alicubi abſque detrimento, ac folia à ſe mutuò ſeparari potuerint. Huic itaque Sathanæ fraudulentiæ occurrere ſtudens, libellum jam typis abſolutum denuò percurrere, atque errata, quamlibet multa, tamen ea (nam in nullo unquam libro, vel centuplo hoc quidem majore, tot eſſe unquam commiſſa puto) hic ſubnotare, quo cuivis lectionem

‘ ſibi,

---

(29) He was one of the Legates, and afterwards Pope Marcellus II.

(30) Crepin, Eſtat de l'Egliſe, pag. m. 570.

(31) Chemnitius, Exam. Concilii Trident. Part. iii, pag. 576, Edit. Francof. 1609, in fol.

(32) Crepin, ubi ſupra, pag. 569.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) Note, that ſeveral of them were only Italian tranſlations.

(35) Here is a pſeudonymous work not mentioned by Placcius. Mr Baillet in his liſt of pſeudonymous writers, pulls off this maſk as well as that of Athanaſius, under which Vergerio appeared ſometimes.

(36) This book was tranſlated out of Italian into French in the year 1556, by PAUL VERGERIUS, the author's nephew.

(37) Verheid. in Effigiebus præſtant. aliquot Virorum, pag. 154, 155.

Before he left Italy he loſt his brother, who died by poiſon, as was ſuſpected (g). The account I have given, and which I have extracted from Melchior Adam, is defective in many

---

(g) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theologorum Exterorum, pag. 116, & ſeq.

‘ ſibi emendare in promptu eſſet, operæ pretium duxi. - - - As that accurſed ſpirit Satan firſt framed, and has hitherto managed the whole Tragedy of the MASS (his execrable daughter) that he might utterly extinguiſh the merit of CHRIST in the hearts of men, and obtrude the darkneſs of lies for the light of the truth: ſo likewiſe during the impreſſion of this book, he ſeems again to have imployed his arts, in contriving to have it ſtuffed with errors (for in many places it is not only unintelligible, but the ſenſe is plainly perverted) that pious perſons might be entirely diſguſted from reading it, or elſe quite tired out before they get through it. And even before this treatiſe was brought to the Printer, the ſame evil ſpirit made uſe of another ſtratagem; for he ſo ordered it that the manuſcript fell into the mire, by which means not a few of the leaves were marred and ſpoiled, the writing was often defaced, and many plaees ſo torn that it could not be read well, nor could it even be opened or the leaves ſeparated from one another without damage: and therefore to defeat the fraudulent intention of the devil, I thought fit to reviſe the book after it was printed, and for the benefit of the reader to ſubjoin an Errata, though numerous, and indeed I believe there never was a book, though an hundred times bigger than this, ſo full of faults.’ Obſerve that the Corrector hath ſtumbled at the very threſhold, for he reckons the firſt fault to be the word Gallicè in the paſſage of the Preface cited above. He would have it read Latinè; his correction is ill grounded: is it not indiſputable that a perſon who tranſlates a Preface into Latin, in which it is ſaid, for good reaſon a French tranſlation was made, ought to make uſe of the word Gallicè, and not Latinè? See however the remark [Q]. We muſt alſo obſerve that du Moulin, who called one of his books the Anatomy of the Maſs, is not the inventor of that title. Nor by the way did he invent that of the Buckler of Faith; for I have a book printed at Avignon by Francis Tachet 1549 (38), and intitled the Buckler of Faith, by way of dialogue, extracted from the holy Scripture, the holy Fathers, and moſt antient Doctors of the Church. Of which, Nicolas Grenier, Canon of St Victor, is the author.

Thuanus hath ſpoken amply enough of Vergerius's book, which he publiſhed againſt the proclaiming of the council in the time of Pius IV in the year 1561. Vergerius was then at Augſburg. We ſhall find how ſevere this tract was, if we examine theſe words of Thuanus (39): ‘ Contra diploma illud Paulus Vergerius Juſtinopolitanus quondam Epiſcopus, & magnis legationibus ſub Pontificibus defunctus, qui paulo ante (40) ab iis defecerat, cum Auguſtæ Vindelicorum eſſet, ſcripto edito acriter invectus eſt, & Curiæ R. faſtum, pompas, luxum, ambitionem, ſordeis, corruptos mores, quos perſpectos ſe habere dicebat, multis & acerbis verbis deteſtatus, poſtremo addit Concilium à Pontifice indictum non ut oportuit ad ſtabiliendam Chriſti doctrinam, ſed ad firmanda infirmæ carnis divinis mandatis adverſantis commenta, non ad purgandum ovile dominicum, ſed ad diſſeminandos hominum inveteratos errores; denique non ad Chriſtianam libertatem, ſed ad miſerarum animarum ſervitutem & oppreſſionem inſtitutum eſſe: quippe in quo juxta ceremonialis, &c. - - - Paul Vergerius, who had been formerly Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria, and had diſcharged ſeveral important embaſſies for the Popes, having a little before deſerted them when he was at Augsburg, inveighed ſeverely againſt that bull; and having declared in many ſharp expreſſions his abhorrence of the pride, pomp, luxury, ambition, avarice, and corruption of the court of Rome, which he ſaid he was perfectly acquainted with, he adds, that the council was called by the Pope, not as it ought to have been to eſtabliſh the doctrine of Chriſt, but to confirm the inventions of carnal men, enemies to the law of GOD, not to purge the ſheepfold of the Lord, but to ſpread the inveterate errors of men: and laſtly, not for the ſake of Chriſtian liberty, but to enſlave and oppreſs unhappy ſouls; for, &c.’ Spondanus ſays (41), that Father Paul made very great uſe of the libels compoſed by Vergerius, who, ſaith he, made all the acts of the Council of Trent, the ſubjects of his ſermons: he diligently collected all the diſputations of that aſſembly; he communicated them to other miniſters; he wrote books concerning them, and diſperſed his calumnies on the whole conduct of the council (42). I am ſurprized not to find in the Epitome of Geſner, what Vergerius wrote againſt his countryman and violent perſecutor Mutius. I find only, ad Papam Julium III qui librum Mutii approbavit. This Mutius was an aſſiſtant to Annibal Griſon in the function of Inquiſitor at Capo d'Iſtria, and publiſhed an invective againſt our Prelate. ‘ Huic (Annibali Griſonio) adjunctus Hieronymus Mutius qui & Vergerianam ſcripſit invectivam poſtea, nec id modo, ſed evulgato quoque libello Germaniam, odio religionis, maledicentiſſime traducit (43). - - - - To this Annibal Griſon was aſſociated Jerom Mutius, who afterwards wrote an invective againſt Vergerius, and likewiſe publiſhed a book wherein he moſt maliciouſly traduces Germany out of hatred to the Proteſtant religion.’ But the following words ſeem to hint that Vergerius and Mutius wrote letters againſt each other: ‘ Finalmente accorgendoſi il Vergerio che'l ſuo delitto non haveva difeſa, ſi ricoverò fra' Grigioni eretici, e di là mandò fuori contra la Religione, contra il Concilio, e contra'l Papa libri tanto indotti quanto audaci; e che non piaceranno ſe non à que' palati sì pravi che con eſſi il fele, come già la manna, fà uficio di tutti i più dilicati ſapori. Ed intorno à queſt' huomo ed alle ſue azioni baſti di leggere oltre agli altri le Vergeriane e le lettere cattoliche del Muzio ſuo compatriota (44). - - - At laſt Vergerius perceiving he could not juſtify himſelf, retired to the heretical Griſons, and there put out books both unlearned and impudent againſt religion, the Council and the Pope: and which pleaſed none but people of a depraved taſte, to whom gall, as manna was formerly, is of all things the moſt delicious. With regard to this man and his actions, you may read the letters of Vegerius and of his Catholic countryman Mutius.’ I have given this whole paſſage of Pallavicini, to ſhew that I had reaſon to ſay that Vergerius's works cruelly galled the court of Rome and its devotees. They affected to ſpeak of them with contempt and to repreſent them as performances wherein confidence, paſſion, and ignorance were notorious. This affectation is not diſadvantageous to his works. See Staniſlaus Hoſius's Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Propugnatio veræ, Chriſtianæ, Catholicæque doctrinæ (45). Our Vergerius is there treated very violently; Hoſius, among other things, complains that he had the aſſurance to dedicate a book of Brentius to his Poliſh Majeſty, and to challenge Lipomannus (46) to a diſputation on all the doctrines contained in that book, which diſputation ſhould be decided by that monarch. This is not all, he complains of ſome tracts which he had diſperſed amongſt the people, during the laſt diet at Warſaw, Tracts, ſaith he, full of impudence and falſities: ‘ Ego verò, quòd illius tam eminet, tamque projecta eſt audacia, minùs miror, quem & frontem pridem omnem perdidiſſe, & ab omni Dei metu prorſus remotum eſſe, vel ea ſola ſcripta ſatis indicant, quæ in proximis hiſce Varſchavienſibus Comitiis in vulgus ſpargi curavit. Illud non poſſum non mirari, quòd inveniuntur nihilominùs, qui non ſine quadam animorum aſſenſione commenta legant ejus hominis: qui ſic ad omnem levitatem incubuiſſe videtur, nihil ut caverit diligentiùs, quàm ne quid uſquàm veri ſcriberet (47). - - - But I the leſs wonder at his matchleſs impudence, ſince thoſe writings alone which he diſperſed among the people, during the laſt Diet at Warſaw, ſufficiently ſhew that he had long before loſt all ſhame, and had no fear of GOD. And I cannot but wonder how ſome people can read his forgeries with a kind of approbation: for he ſeems to have been ſo much given to lying, that his greateſt care was to exclude all truth from his writings.’ Add to this the paſſage I ſhall cite below (48) from Cardinal Pallavicini.

I conclude with a reflexion which ſeems to me to deſerve a place here. I am certain that in Vergerio's time

(38) This is not the firſt edition, for it is ſaid in the title, that the book was reviſed and inlarged by the author. La Croix du Maine mentions only the edition in 2 volumes, which came out at Paris in 1566, and 1567. It is true that a little after he ſays that the ſecond volume was printed in 1565. This is not very exact.

(39) Thuanus, lib. xxviii, pag. m. 570, col. 2, ad ann. 1561.

(40) Thuanus is miſtaken in that: Vergerius had profeſſed himſelf a Proteſtant above twelve years before.

(41) Spondan. ad ann. 1545, num. 13.

(42) Actis Concilii omnibus detrahens. Id. ib.

(43) Sleidanus, lib. xxi, fol. 589.

(44) Pallavic. ubi ſupra, lib. vi, cap. xiii, num. 3, pag. m. 636.

(45) It is dated the 15th of October 1557.

(46) He was then Nuncio in Poland.

(47) Hoſius in Epiſt. dedicatoria ad Sigiſmundum Auguſtum Poloniæ Regem.

(48) In the remark [K].

many particulars. We do not find there the ſervice which Vergerius did to Henry II [G] nor his conferences in Alſatia with the Apoſtolical Nuncio [H]. We are not informed by it that he bought a collection of reliques for an Elector of Saxony [I], &c. He was the cauſe that the Capitolo del Forno (b) expoſed its author to many invectives, which obliged time few books were read more than his. They were very ſatirical, they contained a vaſt many perſonal particularities which eaſily paſſed for true, becauſe it was very well known what opportunity he had to be throughly informed of them, having been ſo long engaged in public employments by the court of Rome. Yet theſe pieces ſo much eſteemed when new, could not maintain their reputation. They were favourites with whom fortune did not long continue, they quickly loſt their credit, and became ſo neglected, that ſcarce any books are at preſent harder to find. We ſcarce meet with one piece of Vergerius in the catalogues of the moſt numerous libraries. It was in vain that an edition of his works was publiſhed at Tubingen in 1563 (49). So many ſmall tracts reduced into one volume, are not leſs loſt than if they had continued in their former diſperſed condition: ſcarce any of them more ſenſibly affects my curioſity than his critic on Leander Alberti (50), and on the letters of Claudius Ptolomæus (51).

[G] The ſervice which Vergerius did to Henry II.] Before I come to the proof, I ſhall cite a paſſage of Father Paul (52). ‘The Pope by his letter invited the Catholic Swiſs to come to the council . . . . and Jerom Franco, his Nuncio, inceſſantly ſollicited them on his part, and made preſſing inſtances, which were ſupported by the good offices of the Emperor. But the moſt Chriſtian King diſſuaded them by his ambaſſador Morlot; and Paul Vergerio † perfectly acquainted with the ſecrets and artifices of the court of Rome, gave that miniſter ſo good inſtructions, beſides the book he wrote on that ſubject ‡, that at the Diet then held at Baden, the Catholic and Evangelic Cantons unanimouſly reſolved, not to ſend any perſon to Trent: And the Griſons ſuffering themſelves to be perſuaded by Vergerio, that the Pope was contriving ſomething againſt them, recalled Thomas Plante, Biſhop of Coire.’ Theſe words do not prove that the King of France employed Vergerius: Ambaſſadors frequently conceal from their maſters the name and character of thoſe perſons whoſe aſſiſtance or advice they make uſe of; ſo that it may be pretended, that Morlot made uſe of Vergerio without ever mentioning any thing of it to Henry II. But an Annaliſt, a French Biſhop, owns that that Prince was well informed of Vergerius's intrigues, and made uſe of his aſſiſtance to obtain his ends, which were to vex the Pope and the Emperor. ‘Rex . . . . . ut Pontifici & Cæſari ægrè faceret, cum Helvetiis, quos Pontifex hortatus fuerat ad Synodum ſuos dirigere legatos, egit ne tam Catholici quàm Sacramentarii, nec item Rheti mitterent, & qui jam miſſi fuiſſent revocarentur: in his, quod turpius fuit, induſtriâ uſus Petri-Pauli Vergerii Epiſcopi olim Juſtinopolitani, qui ad hæreticos delapſus inter Rhætos agebat (53). - - - The King . . . . in order to vex the Pope and the Emperor, treated with the Swiſs, whom the Pope had invited to come to the council, that neither the Catholic nor Proteſtant Cantons, nor likewiſe the Griſons might ſend any, and that thoſe who had been already ſent might be recalled: and, which is more ſcandalous, to obtain thoſe ends he made uſe of the aſſiſtance of Peter-Paul Vergerius formerly Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria, who revolting to the Heretics then lived in the country of the Griſons.’ Spondanus juſtly ſays that it was very ſcandalous for Henry II to employ a Proteſtant miniſter, who had formerly been a biſhop. If Vergerius had been in France, that Prince would have cauſed him to be burnt, and yet he careſſes him in a foreign country, employs him againſt the Pope, and makes uſe of his craft and artifice to overthrow the council, and probably rewards him for all theſe good actions. Doth not this plainly diſcover the genius of ſovereign Princes? Their conduct towards Heretics is not of a piece, they perſecute them in one place, and encourage them in another. Their conduct is void of all principles, or rather is uniformly directed by the maxim, that all things ought to be ſacrificed to the temporal glory of the ſtate, which requires that a jealous neighbour ſhould be croſſed by all poſſible means, on all occaſions.

[H] His conferences in Alſatia with the Apoſtolical Nuncio.] This happened in the year 1561. He was then in the Duchy of Wirtemberg: he firſt ſpoke with the Nuncio Delfino at Zabara (54), and afterwards at Straſburgh, and the neighbouring places, ſometimes alone, and at other times in company with John Sturmius: when he was with the Nuncio alone he talked more freely (55), but when in company with Sturmius, he was very reſerved both in the choice and turn of his words. On the one ſide he diſcovered an ardent deſire to return into Italy, and on the other he broke out into ſlanders againſt thoſe who had perſecuted him, and even againſt the Pope himſelf. He chiefly accuſed John della Caſa of having forced him to turn Proteſtant. The Nuncio exhorted him to reunite himſelf to the Church, and to recommend himſelf to the Legates (56) his old patrons. Vergerius acknowledged his infinite obligations to them, but utterly rejected the propoſal of making a recantation. He wrote two letters to the Cardinal of Mantua, one of the Legates, and gave them to the Nuncio Delfino, who ſent them to Rome before they were tranſmitted to the Cardinal. In theſe Vergerius teſtified a great zeal for his country, and for the peace of the Church; he offered his endeavours towards this great work, and ſaid he might give ſome advantageous overtures if he could ſpeak with that Legate. He did not ſhew any deſign of repenting of his errors, he only requeſted a ſafe conduct both from the council, and his Imperial Majeſty. The Nuncio paſſionately deſired the recovery of this loſt ſheep. He believed that in all Germany, there were not two perſons whoſe converſion was of ſo great importance as that of Vergerius. Not but that he took him to be an ignorant man, but becauſe he found his pen very pernicious to the Holy See. ‘Il Delfino era cupidiſſimo di ricuperarlo: imperòche quantunque, ſecondo ch'egli ſcriveva; il Vergerio niente affatto ſapeſſe; onde mentr'era ſoggiornato in Elvezia havea ſolo ſpeſa l'induſtria nel traſportare i libri eretici in Italiano; ciò non oſtante riputava, in tutta Alemagna non eſſer due Teſte il cui acquiſto foſſe ſtato di pregio uguale à quel di coſtui: tanto riuſciva la ſua penna à diſervigio della Sede Apoſtolica per una certa ſua eloquenza popolare, e audacemente maledica de' più invidiati Perſonaggi (57). - - - Delfino was very deſirous to regain him: for though, as he ſaid, Vergerius was groſsly ignorant, and therefore whilſt he lived in Swiſſerland ſpent his time only in tranſlating heretical books into Italian: yet he believed there were not two perſons in all Germany, whoſe converſion would be equivalent to that of Vergerius: ſo ſucceſsful was his pen againſt the Holy See, on account of a certain popular eloquence he employed in ſlandering the moſt eminent men.’ The Cardinal of Mantua, to whom the Pope abſolutely referred the management of this intrigue, did not think it proper to anſwer Vergerius. He thought that a letter from a Legate would render Vergerius too vain, and that he would make uſe of it to perſuade the Proteſtants, that he was eſteemed in the Church of Rome as a perſon of great merit, whoſe converſion they were willing to purchaſe with a large reward. The Cardinal cautioned the Nuncio to have a particular regard to this: Such an advice was neceſſary, for the Nuncio had made uſe of Vergerio's ambition in order to gain him by the offer of a glorious recompence. The Pope was extraordinary well pleaſed with this conduct of the Legate. The Nuncio at laſt declared that Vergerio's impudence and arrogance increaſed daily, and he received orders to ſee him no more. The Legate would have had Vergerius come to the Council of Trent, not alone, but accompanied by John Sturmius, and Jerom Zanchius, and that new expedients ſhould be taken by their means to confer with the Sectaries; but the Pope diſapproved all thoſe propoſals. This is what I find in the Hiſtorian here cited (58).

[I] He bought a collection of reliques for an Elector of Saxony.] This was the Elector Frederic, ſirnamed the Wiſe. He collected as many reliques as he poſſibly could (59). He begged ſome of Francis I, and Margaret

(b) See the remark [M].

(49) It is in quarto. See Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 601, col. 2.

(50) In Geſner's epitome the title is contra Leandrum Albertum Monachum Dominicanum, ejuſque mendacia quæ ille ſcripſit in libro cui titulus, Deſcriptio Italiæ.

(51) The title ibid. is De Epiſtolis Italice ſcriptis à Claudio Ptolemæo.

(52) Fra-Paolo, ubi ſupra, lib. iv, pag. 327, ad ann. 1551.

† He was then miniſter in the country of the Griſons: he turned Proteſtant becauſe he had miſſed a cardinal's hat.

‡ Thuanus ſpeaks of it in the 28th book of his Hiſtory, Ann. 1561. Mr Amelot is miſtaken for the book mentioned by Thuanus, was written againſt the indiction of the council in the time of Pius IV. I have quoted his words above, citat. (39 .Father Paul mentions that book of Vergerio in the fifth book, pag. m. 419.

(53) Spondanus, ad ann. 1551, num. 18, pag. 537.

(54) So it is in Pallavicini: perhaps it ſhould be Zaberna, Saverne.

(55) Take notice that all this is extracted out of Pallavicini.

(56) The Cardinal of Trent, and the Cardinal of Mantua.

(57) Pallavic. ubi ſupra, lib. xv, cap. x, num. 13, pag. m. 644, 645.

(58) Cardinal Pallavicini.

(59) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. i, pag. 223.

obliged John della Caſa to write a ſmall tract, that has been publiſhed in 1688, wherein Vergerius is cruelly treated [K]. Prudence will not allow us to believe what an enemy publiſhes of another without proof, and therefore we ought at leaſt to ſuſpend our judgment

garet of Auſtria, Governeſs of the Low-Countries, and obtained them. He had ſeveral ſent from Mantua, Colmar, Baſil, and the monaſtery of Ilmene (60). A German Monk (61) was collecting ſome for him in Italy, and employed our Vergerius, who had delivered this collection into the Elector's hands if he had not fallen ſick in his journey. James Vergerius, his brother, who accompanied him, and who, as well as he, had ſerved the German Monk, was alſo ſtopped by a like occaſion: He alſo fell ſick by the way (62). I believe that Peter-Paul hoped, as a reward, to be made a profeſſor in the univerſity of Wittemberg: for he had been recommended as a learned young man, who deſired a maintenance that would enable him to finiſh his ſtudies under the profeſſors of that univerſity. Here are the words of this Monk's letter from Venice to Spalatin, the 29th of October, 1521. ‘ Intendit ipſe Petrus Paulus, frater Jacobi, ‘ permanere & complere in Wittemberga ſtudium ſuum, ‘ ſi potuerit & ſit beneplacitum Principis noſtri. Rogavit quoque me, ut tibi ſupplex fierem pro eo, & ‘ certe credo, magni honoris & utilitatis eſſet illi Univerſitati; habet enim nobiliſſimum ingenium & memoriam, ut experientia videre licet, reputaturque ‘ præcipuus de humanitate & jure, inter juvenes ſtudii ‘ Patavini. Rogo propterea T. Dom. ſuſcipe eum, & ‘ commenda eum Principi Ser. ut filium, & primo in ‘ Univerſitate, ut inveniat locum legendi, vivendi, & ‘ proficiendi (63). - - - Peter-Paul himſelf, the brother ‘ of James, deſigns to continue and to finiſh his ſtudies at ‘ Wittemberg, if he can, and if it be the good pleaſure ‘ of our Prince. He deſired me to intercede with you in ‘ his behalf, and I really think it would be a great honour and advantage to that univerſity: for he has ‘ given proofs of his excellent genius and memory, and he ‘ is reckoned to outdo all the young ſtudents at Padua in ‘ Philology and Law. I beg therefore you would take ‘ him under your care, and recommend him heartily to his ‘ moſt ſerene Highneſs, that he may have a maintenance ‘ to enable him to proſecute his ſtudies in the univerſity.’ Spalatin anſwered, that he could promiſe nothing to the two Vergerio's; and as for the reliques which had already been received, and the payment of which the Monk ſollicited; he anſwered that he would ſend them back again, the price of them being fallen ſince Luther's Reformation, and that doubtleſs they would be more eſteemed, and ſell better in Italy than in Germany: ‘ Reliquias nobis miſſas, una cum cruce, re‘cipies omnes, à te, quanticunque poteris, venden‘das; credibile enim eſt, iſtic quam hic majoris eſſe ‘ tum pretii tum honoris. Hic enim vel vulgus ita ‘ reſipuit, ut verbo Dei edoctum ſatis ſibi eſſe putet, ‘ ut & revera eſt, fide & fiducia erga Deum & chari‘tate erga proximum (64). - - - - You ſhall have back ‘ again all the reliques you ſent us, together with the croſs, ‘ that you may ſell them for as much as you can get; for ‘ I believe they are more eſteemed, and will ſell better ‘ there than here. For even the common people here are ſo ‘ much altered, that being inſtructed from the word of ‘ GOD, they think it ſufficient, as it really is, to have ‘ faith and truſt in GOD, and charity towards their ‘ neighbour.’ The perſon who wrote this letter had told the Elector, his maſter, that it had been very well if the diſpute concerning Indulgences had began ſooner, for it had ſaved him a great deal of care and money (65).

[K] Wherein Vergerius is cruelly treated.] When I mentioned his books, I did not ſpeak of that, intituled, Contra Catalogum Joannis della Caſa Sodomiæ Patronum. He beſtowed the epithet of Apologiſt for Sodomy on John della Caſa on account of his Capitolo del Forno. He ſo defamed him throughout Germany, that this author thought himſelf obliged to addreſs a Poem to the Germans, to remove thoſe ſiniſter impreſſions which our author had made on them againſt him. I have elſewhere (66) obſerved the miſtake of a Modern, who was of opinion that Caſa wrote this poem by way of anſwer to the invectives of Naogeorgus. It is certain that it was only aimed at Vergerius. I have alſo ſaid ſomewhere (67), that the reaſon why John della Caſa was ſo defamed, when ſeveral Italian Poets remained undiſturbed, whoſe poems were more deteſtable than his, was, that he perſecuted Vergerius at Venice, which other Poets did not. But let us here ſpeak of the ſmall tract, which Mr Menage printed in 1688, at the end of his Anti-Baillet. It is a piece written in very good Latin, which Mr Menage received from the celebrated Magliabechi, and in which Caſa reviles Peter-Paul Vergerius at a ſtrange rate. He accuſes him of long and violent quarrels with his brother John Baptiſt, Biſhop of Pola; of perjury to avoid the payment of his debts, and of killing his wife, in order to advance himſelf to benefices; he charges him with having intreated Cardinal de Tournon to carry him into France, and with having offered to write concerning Germany and the Swiſs, and concerning religion, whatever ſhould be preſcribed him. Obſerve that Vergerius was then in the Griſon's country. This Cardinal, who at firſt took him for a Butcher, at laſt knowing who was, very ſeverely reprimanded him, and took no notice of his offers to repent. ‘ Qui cùm ‘ te ſqualidum, ſordidum, pannis obſitum, conſpicatus, ‘ viſuſque ſibi videre lanionem aliquem eſſet; quæ‘ſivit de te qui tu eſſes: atque ubi Vergerium eſſe ‘ dixiſti, multis, homo graviſſimus, te verbis malè ac‘cepit (68). - - - When he ſaw you in a naſty and tattered ‘ condition, and thought you was a Butcher, he aſked you ‘ who you was; and upon your telling him that you was ‘ Vergerius, he ſeverely reproved you.’ This ſmal tract informs us (69), that Vergerius, in his younger days, profeſſed Poetry; that he was afterwards admitted advocate; that he practiſed as ſuch; but in pleading, he rendered himſelf inſupſuportable to the Judges, to the litigants, and in general to the whole court, by his falſities, calumnies, and prevarications: ‘ Linguâ atque audaciâ fretus, cauſſas agere te velle dixiſti: ſed cùm, quoties diceres, ‘ toties malediceres, mentireris, pejerares, calumniare‘ris, pravaricarere, neque litigatores tibi, jam neque ‘ corona, neque Judices, fidem habebant; nemoque fer‘re te, ac ne aſpicere quidem poterat (70). -- Truſting to ‘ your tongue and impudence, you ſaid you would be an ad‘vocate; but as in pleading you were always guilty of ‘ reviling, lying, perjury, calumny, and prevarication, ‘ neither the Litigants, nor the Bar, nor the Judges gave ‘ credit to you: no body could endure you, no body could ‘ bear the ſight of you.’ That getting no money, and being a widower, (thanks to the poiſon he had given his wife,) he caſt his eye on ſpiritual benefices, and went to Rome, where his brother Antony recommended him to Clement VII, and obtained for him the Nunciature of Germany. He adds, that Francis Spiera (71), whom he repreſented to the world, as a man inſpired, one day put him into an extreme confuſion by calling him bankrupt, poiſoner, and heretic (72). To conclude; he accuſes him of flying to the Griſons, in order to ſhelter himſelf from the purſuit of his creditors (73). The Leipſic Journaliſts, in their extract of the Anti-Baillet, exactly quote moſt of the accuſations againſt Vergerio; but they ſuppoſe that Mutius had praiſed him, and that Caſa refuted that elogy: Mutii laudes Vergerio tributas, p. 377 evertit Caſa (74). This they ground on theſe words of Caſa, de MUTIO verò affirmare tibi hoc poſſum non tibi illum honorem cum de te ſcripſit, habuiſſe, ſed patriæ veſtræ. Which import that Mutius had not done Vergerius the honour to refute him, if he had not had a particular regard to the country which produced them both. And he was ſo far from praiſing Vergerius, that he publiſhed moſt injurious invectives againſt him.

Two things are to be further obſerved concerning this tract of John della Caſa. He makes two exceptions againſt the infamies with which Vergerio had charged Paul III. The firſt is, that thoſe crimes which he imputed to that Pope were of ſuch a nature, that they could never come to his knowledge: the ſecond is taken from the enmity bewixt Paul III and him: ‘ Obſecro te quid tu tibi voluiſti, aut quicumque ille ‘ fuit, qui de PAULI III vita ſcripſit? Putaſtine ‘ quemquam fore qui tibi de tot tantiſque criminibus ‘ ac ſceleribus crederet? Quî tu iſthæc ſcire potuiſti? ‘ Preſertim cùm tam multa ſint inteſtina ac domeſtica, ‘ de quibus vix unus aut alter ex intimis familiaribus ‘ etiamſi maximè vera ſint, ſuſpicari aliquid ſignis

‘ quibuſdam

---

(60) It was in Thuringia.

(61) Called Burcardi. He was of the family of the barons of Schenck.

(62) Taken from Seckendorf, ibid.

(63) Seckendorf, ubi ſupra.

(64) Id. ibid. quoting a letter of Spalatin, to the Monk Burcard, dated the 28th of July 1522.

(65) Id. ibid.

(66) In the article ORICELLARIUS, remark [D].

(67) In the article MOLZA, remark [D]; and in the article VAYER, remark [E].

(68) Anti-Baillet, Tom. vii, pag. 253, in the edition of Jugemens des Sav. by Baillet of 1725, in 4*to*.

(69) Ibid. pag. 256.

(70) Ibid.

(71) He does not name him, but doubleſs he means him.

(72) Anti-Baillet, Tom. vii, pag. 257.

(73) Ibid.

(74) Acta Eruditor. Lipſ. 1689, pag. 497.

ment concerning the infamous crimes charged on our Vergerius; but I muſt confeſs that ſome Proteſtants own that he was inconſtant, deceitful, and ignorant in Theology [L].

In

quibuſdam poſſit, quî igitur tu hæc alienus, ac prope alienigena, tantopere affirmas, præſertim ſolus? Quis ad te detulit? Qui teſtes affuerunt? Quæ proferuntur literæ? Ubi tu interfuiſti (75)? - - - Pray, what did you mean, you, or whoever it was that wrote the life of Paul III? Did you think any body would believe you when you charged him with ſo many and ſo heinous crimes? How came you to the knowledge of thoſe things? Eſpecially as many of them are of a domeſtic and private nature, concerning which hardly one or two intimate acquaintances, even tho' they were moſt true, could have any ground to ſuſpect any thing, how then dare you ſo confidently affirm them for truth, who are averſe, and almoſt a ſtranger to him, and eſpecially as you are the only one that does ſo? Who informed you? What witneſſes were preſent? What letters are produced? Where was you at that time?' A little after he expreſſes himſelf thus concerning his invectives againſt Peter-Lewis Farneſe, and Julius III. ‘A te requirunt Itali homines ſuperiora illa ſcilicet quibus teſtibus, atque adeo quibus indiciis id compereris? Cur id, quod tibi non magis quàm cæteris omnibus compertum ſit, ſolus affirmes (76)? . . . . Eadem tibi de Julio III reſpondeant, deque iis literis quas tu de Conclavi miſſas, ad te delatas ais. Negant tibi quicquam credi oportere à quoquam: vanitatis, levitatis, mendacii, te convictum defendunt. Profer igitur eas literas: Manum, ſignum, proba (77). - - - The Italians will aſk you the above queſtions, viz. By what witneſſes, and by what evidences did you diſcover it! Why do you alone affirm, what is not better known to you than to others? . . . . They may anſwer you in the ſame manner as to Julius III, and as to thoſe letters which you ſay were brought you from the Conclave. They may ſay that none ought to give credit to you in any thing: They maintain that you are convicted of vanity, levity and falſhood. Produce then thoſe letters; prove the hand and ſeal.' Theſe are preſſing and really very juſt queſtions: for juſtice requires that an author who publiſhes the moſt ſecret tranſactions of a monarch's palace, and relates a thouſand infamous crimes committed in it's moſt dark receſſes with an uncommon aſſurance; I ſay juſtice obliges ſuch a writer to inform us how he came to the knowledge of theſe events; he ought to produce and name his authorities; he muſt have either original letters or authentic copies: in a word, he muſt have good proofs for what he advances. If it be objected, that it is not poſſible to give good proofs for facts of that nature; I anſwer, that a man ought not therefore to accuſe one of ſuch facts in public: he ought to back what he ſays at leaſt with the authority of his name, I mean the title of the book ought to declare it's author. But if it be found that the author, who names himſelf, may juſtly be charged with credulity or with malice, or that he is a declared enemy to the perſon defamed, it is then certain that his evidence deſerves but little credit. I think, I have obſerved more than once, that the authors of libels do not at all conſider what I have juſt offered: nor, which is worſe, are their readers more careful herein than they. I am not fond of patronizing Caſa's applications, I content myſelf with obſerving that he pretends Vergerius was too ill a man, and too much an enemy to Paul III to deſerve that any regard ſhould be had to his evidence againſt this Pope. Do not you know, ſaith he, that perſons of the moſt exact probity are not admitted as witneſſes in a cauſe wherein their enemies are concerned (78)? On this occaſion he relates the enmity betwixt Paul III and Vergerius, and ſaith that he greatly wrongs the Germans, in thinking them capable of giving any credit to his libels. ‘Magnam tu Germanis hominibus contumeliam facis quòd idoneos arbitreris eſſe, apud quos tam impudenter mentiare, quoſque uſquè adeo contemnas, imperitoſque rerum putes, ut tibi de tuo inimico tam ineptè, tamquè apertè mentienti fidem habeant. Si literas, ſi teſtes, ſi tormenta atque equuleum, ſi omnia probationum genera proferres, nemo tibi tamen venefico atque uxoricidæ crederet; de tot tantiſque præſertim rebus. Tu innuenti modò tibi fidem haberi exiſtimas (79). - - - You offer a great affront to the Germans, when you think them perſons fit to be impoſed upon by your impudent lies, when you entertain ſo contemptible an opinion of them, and ſuppoſe them ſimple enough to believe your groſs and notorious falſhoods concerning your enemy. Could you produce letters, witneſſes, racks, and trials of all ſorts, yet none would believe a poiſoner and a murderer of his wife: eſpecially as to ſo many and ſuch heinous crimes. And do you think then you are to be credited on your bare word?'

This is the firſt of my two obſervations: the other will ſerve to prove that a ſatiriſt can put a criminal interpretation upon the moſt pious actions. We have already ſeen (80) that Vergerius, deſigning to refute Lutheraniſm, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of that controverſy, which convinced him that the Romiſh was a falſe Church; we have ſeen that his brother was of the ſame opinion, and that they both reſolved to apply themſelves to the inſtruction of their dioceſe. The artful John della Caſa gives a quite different turn to their conduct. He ſaith that Vergerius having drained thoſe ſprings which ſupplied the extravagant expence of his luxurious table, applied himſelf to dogmatizing in private, and chiefly to ſeduce ſome rich women, and, under the ſpecious pretext of inſtructing them in the pure religion, adds he, he emptied the purſes of a great many people: ‘Gula ſcilicet creverat, & luxus atque ſuperbia: Quæ quorundam hominum, qui malè te noverant, benignitate ſuſtentata aliquandiu ſunt: Sed ubi exhauſta eſt; nec enim tu parvo contentus eſſe poteras; convertiſti te ad alium quæſtum: Homines quoſdam non nimiùm ſapientes, ſuperſtitioſos, ruſticanos, ſtultaſque aliquot mulieres locupletes aggreſſus es: Sevocaſti: Docere eos te poſſe arcana quædam de religione dixiſti: Nam quæ adhuc tradita illis eſſent ab aliis, perperam eſſe tradita: Mutari ea oportere atque corrigi perſuades imprudentibus ac fatuis quibuſdam. Interea; merces magiſtri ſcilicet magna; peſſundati multi à te ſunt, atque ad ſummam inopiam redierunt (81). - - - For your gluttony, luxury, and pride, had increaſed, which for ſome time were ſupported by the liberality of thoſe, who were not well acquainted with you. But when that ſource was dried up, for a little was not ſufficient to content you, you fell upon another method of getting money: you applied yourſelf to ſome ſimple ſuperſtitious and ignorant people, and to ſome fooliſh rich women: you ſeduced them, and pretended to inſtruct them in the true religion: for what they had been taught by others, you affirmed to be falſe, and ſo perſuaded them of the neceſſity of a reformation. In the mean time, the wages of the inſtructor being large, many were ruined by you, and reduced to extreme poverty.' How many Catholics are there who believe this on the ſingle teſtimony of Caſa, Vergerio's declared enemy. This is a very great injuſtice. Perhaps ſome indifferent perſons may credit part of what he ſays: they know that a private deſign to reform a dioceſe might probably draw the purſe-ſtrings of ſome well-meaning perſons; for it is eaſy to make it appear, that for the advancement of ſo good a work, ſuch and ſuch expences are neceſſary. By this means a man becomes (without being accountable) the truſtee, with whom ſeveral alms and ſubſidies, which the zeal of the firſt brethren furniſhes, are depoſited.

[L] There are ſome Proteſtants who own that he was inconſtant, deceitful, and ignorant in Theology.] Mr Seckendorf ſhall be my evidence. Verſatile ingenium Vergerio tribuitur, ſaith he (82), nec ſuſpicione caruit quod conciliationem religionis quovis modo moliretur, & tandem ad vetera ſacra redire cogitaret. That is, that Vergerius was ſuſpected of a deſign to unite the religions even at the expence of truth, and at laſt of intending to return to Popery. It is pretended (83), that he made uſe of ſome deceit in the letters which he ſent to Paris, when he deſired to be one of the deputies whom the Duke of Wirtemberg ſent into France in the year 1561. He did not obtain this honour, either becauſe that Prince had no confidence in him, or becauſe he was not thought to be ſufficiently verſed in Theological ſubjects. James Andreas forgetting the injury he had received of him, pronounced his funeral oration, and praiſed him for profeſſing the truth, and diſcovering ſeveral wicked intrigues of the court of Rome; but he charged him with not having perfectly underſtood

(75) Anti-Baillet, Tom. vii, pag. 252.

(76) Ibid. pag. 255.

(77) Ibid.

(78) Vel caſtiſſimi atque integerrimi viri . . . à teſtimonio dicendo removeri ſolent (inimicitia.) Ibid. pag. 252.

(79) Ibid.

(80) In the text of this article.

(81) Ib. p. 257.

(82) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, p. 601.

(83) Joh. Val. Andreas, in Vita avi ſui Jacobi Andreæ, pag. 130, apud Seckendorf, ibid.

In the authors which I have conſulted concerning him, I do not find any mention of his journey to France after he was made a Biſhop: I am informed of this part of his life only by a collection of letters printed at Venice in 1558. In that collection there are ſome of his letters which acquaint us that he admired the piety and excellent qualities of the Queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Francis I, and began to diſreliſh his courſe of life, and to think of reſiding in his biſhopric [M]. There is alſo (i) one written by his brother AURELIUS VERGERIUS (k) to Julia Gonzaga. I have not much to object againſt Moreri on this article [N].

I perceived too late, that the words which I quoted from the preface to a book aſcribed to him, are capable of another ſenſe than what I gave them. I ſhall ſet down that ſtood religious controverſies (84). Surius ſays that Gablerus, Profeſſor of Phyſic, was preſent at the death of Vergerio, and made ſome obſervations, which determined him to turn Catholic (85). ‘Adfuerat is Petro Paulo Vergerio è corpore migranti apud quem mira quædam viderat quæ illi animum videbantur perfregiſſe, ut non modo Catholicus ſed pientiſſimus quoque Catholicus fieret (86). - - - He was preſent at the death of Peter-Paul Vergerius, and obſerved ſome wonderful things, which ſeemed to affect his mind prodigiouſly, ſo that he became not only a Catholic but a very pious one.’ Obſerve, that Surius is no claſſical author in point of Hiſtory. Much more ought we to diſtruſt thoſe who magnify this ſtory. They aſſure us, that the horrible death of Vergerius cauſed ſeveral Proteſtants to return into the boſom of the Church. Here follows the moderate expreſſions of of thoſe authors: ‘Petrus Paulus Vergerius, infamis Apoſtata ob horrendam mortem qua defunctus eſt, multis attonitis vicinarum civitatum hominibus ſalutare præbuit documentum, ut plerique ſeſe collegerint, & ad pacem ac unitatem Eccleſiæ reverſi fuerint, fruſtra frementibus lupis infernalibus (87). - - - Peter-Paul Vergerius, an infamous Apoſtate, by his horrible death, gave a ſalutary warning to many perſons of the neighbourhood that were aſtoniſhed at it, ſo that ſeveral returned to the peace and unity of the Church, the infernal wolves in vain raging on that account.

By a letter of Hubert Languet written from Paris on the ninth of October 1561, we learn that the Duke of Wirtemberg had ſent into France our Vergerius, who was the moſt proper man in the world to imbroil things, Languet thought it ſtrange that this Prince ſhould be deſirous to put ubiquity and other fancies of Brentius among the doctrines of the French Reformation. ‘Miror etiam Virtembergenſem nobis velle obtrudere ubiquitatem & alias nugas Brentii, nec religionis apud nos infantiam conſiderare, quæ non ſit obruenda iſtis ſpinoſis & futilibus diſputationibus, quas ne quidem intelligunt qui eas proponunt, ſed omni indulgentia fovenda, & tanquam lactis potu alenda, donec magis in Chriſto adoleſcat. Præterea huc miſit Vergerium, hominem quo nullus eſt magis idoneus ad res turbandas (88). - - - I am ſurprized that the Duke of Wirtemberg ſhould be deſirous to obtrude upon us Ubiquity and the other ridiculous fancies of Brentius, and that he does not conſider the infant ſtate of religion amongſt us, which ought not to be oppreſſed with ſuch knotty and vain diſputations, which even thoſe that propoſe them do not underſtand, but ſhould with all tenderneſs be nurſed up, and, as it were, fed with milk till it grow up and be ſtrong in CHRIST. Beſides, he has ſent Vergerius hither, the fitteſt man in the world to embroil affairs.’ Languet wrote another letter eight days after, and ſays that Vergerius was not yet come to the French court, but that it was reported he would be ſent quickly, or at leaſt that he endeavoured it. I wiſh, ſays he, he would ſtay at home (89).

[M] That he admired the piety . . . . . of the Queen of Navarre . . . . . and that he began to diſreliſh his courſe of life, and to think of reſiding in his biſhopric.] See what he wrote to Lewis Alamanni the day after he had converſed with that Princeſs: ‘Ne la Signora Marcheſa di Peſcara, ne la Signoria voſtra, che ſapete tanto ben tutti due in vive voci, e tanto bene ne i ſcritti voſtri dir cio, che volete, ne il Cardinal noſtro Illuſtriſſ. ne tutta Roma, predicandomi l'altezza & la bellezza dell' animo, & dell'ingegno, & il fervor dello ſpirito acceſo in Chriſto, & la carita ardente della ſereniſſima Regina di Navara, me ne havete ſaputo dire tanto, quanto io nel vero ho trovato hieri, che ſua maeſtà degno di fare, che io udiſſi un pezzo quelle ſue rare voci, il qual giorno mi ha portato una letitia inenarrabile, & ſenza dubbio la maggiore, che io habbi havuto gia molto tempo (90). - - - Neither the Marchioneſs of Peſcara, nor you, who both know ſo well to expreſs whatever you pleaſe either in converſation or in writing, nor his eminency our Cardinal, nor all Rome, ſpeaking of the greatneſs and excellency of mind and temper, and fervent zeal in CHRIST, and ardent charity of the moſt ſerene Queen of Navarre, I ſay, you have not been able to tell me ſo much as in truth I found yeſterday, when her Majeſty was pleaſed to let me hear ſome of her excellent diſcourſe; which day has given me unſpeakable joy, and undoubtedly the greateſt I have had this long time.’ The reſt of the letter turns on the pious ſentiments, which the great knowledge of that Queen excited in the heart of that Prelate. He was in France when he wrote a letter to Ottonello Vida, in which he deplores the progreſs of Lutheraniſm, and the little care that was taken of the LORD's vineyard. He declares that having weighed theſe words of the goſpel, What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul, againſt all thoſe reaſons which encouraged him with hopes of making his fortune, he found the ſcale turn on the ſide of the words of JESUS CHRIST. Wherefore, ſaith he, it will be beſt for me, for the future to apply myſelf to the culture of that portion which is allotted me. ‘Perciò dico, che ſarà meglio, ch'io venga à coltivare quelle poche viti, ch'io ſu quel confine Tedeſco, & veder di circondarle con un buon ſiepe, & tenerle difeſe, per poterne coglier qualche frutto da offerire a Dio; che ſtare fuori, & otioſo ad aſpettare, che altri ſi riſolvino a voler mettere in lavoro tutta la vigna inſieme (91). - - - Therefore I ſay it will be better for me to come, and cultivate thoſe few vines which I have on the confines of Germany, to ſurround them with a good hedge and defend them, that I may be able to gather from them ſome fruit to offer unto GOD: than to be idle and wait, till others reſolve to undertake the care of the whole vineyard together.’ Vida's anſwer (92) to confirm him in this reſolution is very pertinent and excellent.

[N] I have not much to object againſt Moreri on this article.] I. The two articles of Verger (Peter-Paul) are tranſpoſed; for he places the Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria before Emanuel Chryſoloras's diſciple. As for the laſt he refers us to the authors of the following article, that is, to thoſe which he cites after having amply ſpoken of John Verger de Haurane Abbot of St Cyran. This abſurdity has been left out in the Dutch edition of Moreri (93). II. What Moreri (94) affirms, that Paul III intended to make Vergerio a Cardinal, is contradicted by Pallavicini (95). III. What he adds, that he took along with him one of his brothers, who was alſo a Biſhop, is diſproved by Sleidan, who affirms, that before the Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria left Italy, the Biſhop of Pola was dead. ‘Antequam ex Italia decederet, jam erat mortuus ejus frater Epiſcopus Polæ ſuſpitioque fuit veneno ſublatum eſſe (96). - - - - Before he left Italy, his brother the Biſhop of Pola was dead, and was ſuſpected to have been poiſoned.’ IV. To what end doth he cite Paul Jovius, Volaterranus, Jacobus de Bergamo, Voſſius, &c. to confirm what he had ſaid concerning the Biſhop of Capo d'Iſtria, of which they make no manner of mention, and which could not be known to ſome of them. V. What is the meaning of theſe words, for the ſecond conſult Spondanus? They ſeem to direct us to ſome places wherein mention is made of John-Baptiſt Vergerius Biſhop of Pola: but that would be a falſe direction, and is not

---

(i) At folio 124, of book i.

(k) He was a learned man. See Seckendorf, ubi ſupra, in Supplem. Indicis 1, num. 80.

(84) Seckendorf, ibid.

(85) Surius, in the edition of the year 1567, ſays only what I mention; but in that of the year 1574, pag. 733, he adds this, Sanè aiunt viri graves, hunc apoſtatam Vergerium ſub mortem teterrimos exhalaſſe fœtores, ac bovis inſtar horrendos edidiſſe boatus: & alia quædam, quæ ſpero quandoquè certiùs prodituros eos, qui morienti adfuêre. Mihi necdum licuit omnia exactè cognoſcere. - - - Some worthy perſons affirm, that this apoſtate Vergerius at his death, ſent forth moſt offenſive ſtinks, and uttered dreadful bellowings like an ox: and they relate ſeveral other things, which I hope thoſe who were preſent at his death, will give a more certain account of. For I have not been able as yet to get an exact information of every thing.

(86) Surius, Comment. Rerum in Orbe geſt. ad ann. 1567, pag. ult. Edit. 1567.

(87) Jo. Paulus Windeck, Prognoſtic. futuri ſtatus, pag. 113. He quotes Ederus.

(88) Languet. Epiſt. lvii, lib. ii, pag. 143.

(89) Dicitur mittendus brevi, aut ſaltem hoc agere ut mittatur. Cuperem eum manere domi. Idem, Epiſt. lx, pag. 151.

(90) Lettere volgari di diverſi nobiliſſimi Huomini, lib. i. fol. 81. See alſo fol. 101, what he wrote to the marchioneſs of Peſcara.

(91) Ibid. fol. 82 verſo, & fol. 83.

(92) You will find it, ibid. fol. 83, & ſeq.

(93) There it is the preceding, inſtead of the following.

(94) He ſays ſo after Spondanus, ad ann. 1548, num. 23.

(95) See the end of the remark [D].

(96) Sleid. lib. xxi, fol. 590.

that other ſenſe, tho' at laſt I find it is not the true one [O]. It concerns the book, intituled The anatomy of the Maſs. AURELIUS VERGERIUS, brother to him of whom we ſpeak, was knight of Malta, and was employed in ſome negotiations in which he acquired much glory (l). LEWIS VERGERIUS, his nephew, fled to Baſil on account of his religion. He wrote ſome letters in the year 1549, which were inſerted in the Coſmography of Munſter (m).

(l) Munſter, in Coſmographia, lib. iii, pag. m. 694.

(m) Pag. m. 693, 914.

not Moreri's meaning. It muſt be a typographical blunder.

[O] I ſhall ſet down that other ſenſe, though at laſt I find it is not the true one.] Let us repeat here the words inſerted in the remark [F]. ‘ Quoniam igitur Anatomiæ cognitio non ſolum medicis, chirurgiſque, verum etiam aliis ſummopere commendatur: eam ob cauſam, Anthonium ab Ædam Italum imitatus, hanc Miſſæ ac Miſſalis Anatomiam Gallicè, ut ab omnibus percipi poſſet facilius in lucem edere ſtatui. - - - Since then the knowledge of Anatomy is very much recommended, not only to Phyſicians and Surgeons, but alſo to others: for that reaſon, in imitation of Anthony ab Ædam, an Italian author, I reſolved to publiſh this Anatomy of the Maſs and Miſſal in French, that it might be the more eaſily underſtood by every body.’ I took the meaning of thoſe words to be, that he intended to copy or tranſlate Antonius ab Ædam, an Italian author: and I ſuppoſed they were the verſion of the Preface to the French edition: and upon that foot I thought the Corrector ſhould not have advertiſed that it ought to be read Latinè and not Gallicè: but afterwards I perceived that it might perhaps be more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that thoſe were the words of the Latin tranſlator, and that he conſidered Anthonius ab Ædam, as the Italian tranſlator of the book, and not as the author: from whence it would follow that the work had been firſt compoſed in French. This ſuppoſition appeared to me altogether probable: but having at laſt recovered the French edition, I am intirely convinced that my firſt conjectures are the beſt. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to this edition informs me, that the Anatomy of the Maſs was firſt publiſhed in Italian, and that the Marquis del Vico deſired ſomebody to tranſlate it into French. This ſomebody having complied with his deſire, dedicated his tranſlation to the ſame Marquis, and cauſed it to be printed at Geneva for John Creſpin. His Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Geneva the eleventh of May 1555, and ſubſcribed C. D. J. It is followed with a pretty long Preface, wherein the tranſlator ſets forth why this excellent Italian perſon called Anthony d'Adam (97) (who ſome time ago throughly canvaſſed the abominations of the Maſs and Miſſal, which he diſtinctly pointed out) thought fit to give this title of Anatomy to a book which he wrote upon them, the better to expreſs briefly what he had written (98). This tranſlator took ſome liberties, and owned it in the following manner: ‘ As for the reſt, I ſhall make no long apology, for not confining myſelf ſo much as to tranſlate this book verbatim from the Italian, without adding or leaving out any thing. For that was not my intention, when I undertook to tranſlate this Anatomy. I perſuaded myſelf that the readers would not take it amiſs, if I endeavoured to accommodate myſelf to the capacity of thoſe, who are not at all inſtructed in the knowledge of the truth, juſt as the other did, in writing for the ignorant of his own nation. For I have ſometimes explained more fully what he had expreſſed in a few words (99).’

Obſerve that this Anatomy was refuted by a Doctor of Paris, and that ſome aſcribe it to Calvin. ‘ Scripſit Calvinus in contemptum Miſſæ librum quem inſcribit Anatomen Miſſæ, in quo totam Miſſam membratim diſſecat, ac medicorum more & philoſophorum in ſuas partes reſolvit ac egregiè irridet, ſubſannat, ac traducit. Hanc Anatomen confutavit Jacobus Faber Molinenſis Doctor Theologus Pariſienſis. Liber impreſſus eſt Pariſiis Anno 1563: Libri inſcriptio eſt talis; Pro ſacroſancto Miſſæ ſacrificio adverſus impiam Miſſæ & Miſſalis Anatomen, diſſectorum Laniorum, Miſoliturgorum Calvinianæ familiæ perditè excogitatam Hyperaſpiſtes, &c (100). - - - Calvin wrote a book in contempt of the Maſs, which he intitled the Anatomy of the Maſs, wherein he diſſects the whole Maſs by pieces, and after the manner of Phyſicians and Philoſophers reſolves it into its parts, and ridicules, derides and traduces it egregiouſly. This Anatomy was confuted by James Le Fevre of Moulins, a Doctor of Divinity at Paris. The book was printed at Paris in the year 1563: and is intitled, A Defence of the Holy Sacrifice of the Maſs, againſt the impious Anatomy of the Maſs and Miſſal, wickedly contrived by thoſe butchering diſſectors and liturgy-haters, the Calviniſts, &c.

(97) The Latin tranſlation ought then to have called him Antonium ab Adamo, or ab Ada, and not ab Ædam. He does not ſay, it is a typographical error.

(98) Preface to the Anatomy of the Maſs, p. m. 13. I uſe an edition of the year 1562, in 16mo. The Printer's name (John Martin) is put to it, but not the place where it was printed.

(99) Ibid. pag. 29, 30.

(100) Cornelius Schultingius Bibl, Cathol. Tom. iv. pag. 227.

VERGERIUS

VERGERIUS (ANGELUS) born in the iſle of Candia (a), tranſlated out of Greek into Latin the tract de Fluviorum & Montium Nominibus, aſcribed to Plutarch. He wrote the Greek letters ſo exquiſitely, that his writing was made uſe of as an original, or pattern, by thoſe who engraved the types of that language, for the royal impreſſions in the reign of Francis I (b) [A]. He was ſtill living in Charles the IXth's time [B]. He

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) Mr Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie, pag. 259, ſpeaks of thoſe fine Letters, that were caſt in the matrices, which Francis I. cauſed to be made with a royal magnificence. See the remark [CC], of the article FRANCIS I.

[A] He wrote the Greek letters ſo exquiſitely, that his writing was made uſe of as a pattern . . . . . for the royal impreſſions in the reign of Francis I.] This I find in the variæ lectiones of Rutgerſius. ‘ Duos, ſaith he (1), (interpretes) mihi videre contigit, Italum unum, Natalem de Comitibus, alterum Cretenſem, Angelum Vergerium eum qui tam eleganter Græcè pinxit, ut ejus manus pro archetypo iis fuerit, quorum opera in ſculpendis regiis characteribus Rex Franciſcus uſus eſt. - - - I happened to be acquainted with two tranſlators, one Natalis Comes, an Italian, the other Angelus Vergerius, a Candian, who wrote the Greek character ſo finely, that his writing ſerved for a pattern to thoſe, who were employed in caſting types in the reign of Francis I.’ The two tranſlations mentioned here are thoſe of the little book de Fluviorum & Montium Nominibus.

(1) Jo. Rutgerſius, Var. Lect. lib. iii, cap. xii, pag. 235, 236.

[B] He was ſtill living in Charles the IXth's time.] I have no other proof of this but the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Poems of Jan Antoine de Baïf. Which is inſcribed to that monarch, and beſides other things contains the following lines.

Charle Etiene premier, diſciple de Lazare
Le docte Bonamy, de mode non barbare
M'aprint à prononcer le langage Romain:
Ange Vergece Grec, à la gentile main
Pour l'écriture Gréque, Ecrivain ordinére
De vos Granpere & Pere & le VOSTRE, ut ſalére
Pour à l'accent des Grecs ma parole dreſſer,
Et ma main ſur le trac de ſa lettre adreſſer.

Charles Stephens, who was diſciple
To Lazarus, the learned Bonamy,
Taught me to read the Latin tongue with grace.
Angelus Vergerius, a Grecian born,
Who wrote that language finely, and who was
To your grand-father, father, and your ſelf
Writer in ordinary, was engaged
To form my tongue to th' accent of the Greeks,
And after his own copy to lead my hand.

He is too violently cenſured by a Dutch Critic [C]. NICOLAS VERGERIUS [D], his ſon, was a learned man, and made ſome verſes on the death of Hadrian Turnebus.

You will alſo find another place below (2), where this Candiot's name is written Vergece as well as here. Which makes me apt to ſuſpect that inſtead of calling him Vergerius in Latin, he ought to be called Vergecius.

[C] He is too violently cenſured by a Dutch Critic.] We have ſeen in the remark [A], that Natalis Comes, and our Vergerius tranſlated into Latin the tract περὶ ποταμῶν καὶ ὀρῶν ἐπωνυμίας. Theſe words are to be found in it (3): Κάδμος τὸν κρηνοφύλακα δράκοντα τοξεύσας, καὶ εὑρὼν ὥσπερ πεφαρμακευμένον φόβου τὸ ὕδωρ, περιήρχετο τὴν χώραν ζητῶν πηγήν. They are thus expreſſed in Latin by Natalis Comes: ‘Ubi Cadmus ſerpentem fontis cuſtodem jaculis confodiſſet, inveniſſetque aquam quaſi ob timorem veneno infectam, regionem luſtravit fontem inquirens. - - - After Cadmus had killed with darts the ſerpent, which guarded the fountain, and found the water, as he apprehended, infected with poiſon, he went all over the country looking for a ſpring.’ Vergerius's verſion runs thus: ‘Cum Cadmus fontis cuſtodem draconem jaculis confeciſſet, & aquam ejus veneno infectam cerneret, eam abhorrens circuivit regionem ad inveſtigandum fontem. - - - When Cadmus had pierced with darts the dragon that guarded the fountain, and ſaw that the water was infected with poiſon, he dreaded it, and went about the country to ſearch for a ſpring.’ Rutgerſius's judgment of theſe two verſions is: I believe, ſaith he (4), that Vergerius was drunk when he talked in this manner; and it is not to be wondered that Natalis Comes hath ill tranſlated a corrupted place, for he did moſt times ſpoil even ſuch places as were correct. This cenſure is ſo unjuſt with regard to Vergerius that it is leſs capable of hurting his memory than that of Rutgerſius. For his tranſlation is not only better than that of Natalis Comes, though this Critic mentions the latter much more tenderly than the former, but is the beſt which could poſſibly be made, ſuppoſing the Greek text not corrupted. The learned Mauſſac underſtood this place juſt as Vergerius did, and thus tranſlates it: ‘Cum Cadmus ſagittis confixiſſet draconem qui fontem cuſtodiebat, VERITUS ne aqua veneno infecta eſſet, circuivit regionem alium fontem quo ſitim levaret, quærens. - - - When Cadmus had pierced with arrows the dragon that guarded the fountain, fearing leſt the water ſhould be infected with poiſon, he went about the country in queſt of other water to quench his thirſt.’ So that Vergerius's fault lies only in not having conjectured as Rutgerſius hath (5), that inſtead of φόβου the reading ought to be ἐκ φόνου, hoc eſt, è ſanguine ſive tabo, - - - with the blood or gore. Mauſſac did not think of it neither; wherefore I wonder that Rutgerſius did not cenſure his verſion, which makes me believe he knew nothing of it. Though according to the time of its publication, he might have ſeen it (6); but how many printed books are there which remain unknown, even to the moſt learned? Mr Mauſſac had never heard of any verſion of this tract when he undertook to tranſlate it (7), and afterwards he ſaw indeed the verſion of Natalis Comes and Turnebus, but not that of Vergerius. An hundred examples of this nature might be alledged.

[D] NICOLAS VERGERIUS . . . . . made ſome verſes on the death of Hadrian Turnebus.] This you find in theſe words of Thuanus. ‘Ei (Hadriano Turnebo) Joan. Auratus. . . . . . Nicolaus denique Vergerius, Angeli illius Cretenſis elegantiorum Græcæ linguæ characterum ad omnem admirationem & oculorum jucunditatem formatoris F. . . . . & alii epitaphiis carminibus parentarunt (8). - - - John Auratus . . . . . And laſtly Nicolas Vergerius the ſon of Angelus the Candian, who wrote the Greek character ſo exquiſitely, that it was wonderfully beautiful . . . . and others made ſome verſes on the death of Hadrian Turnebus.’ He was born in Candia, from whence he went into France about the year 1540. This I infer from two paſſages of John Antony de Baïf, one of which informs me, that the ſame John Antony was committed to the tutorſhip of Tuſan, and the other that he contracted at Tuſan's houſe a friendſhip with Nicolas Vergerius, then lately come from Candia (9).

Amy qu'en la prime jeuneſſe
J'acointay chez le bon Tuſan,
Voicy cinq fois le cinquieme an Tout nouveau venu de la Grece.

. . . .

Bien jeune tu vis eſcumer
Deſſous toy la ronſlante mer
Tiré de l'iſle ta naiſſance
Qui vit de Jupiter l'enfance (10).

When in my youth to good Tuſanus' care
I was committed, I contracted there
With him juſt come from Greece a friendſhip faſt, Since which, now five and twenty years are paſt.

. . . .

You was but young and in your tender age,
When you beheld the ſea beneath you rage.
The very iſle, which Jove an infant ſaw,
Is that in which, you firſt your breath did draw.

Theſe lines are taken from the Contretrene à Nicolas Vergece Candiot, in which you will find the following elogy on his Muſe,

Fee, ces mignardiſes laiſſe,
Je ne puis entendre à tes jeux;
Lachons un peu couver nos feux,
A fin que m'acquite à Vergece,
Qui m'a mis en ſoucy plaiſant,
M'étrenant d'un mignard preſant
Que la Muſe avec la Charite
Ont ourdi de fleurons d'eſlite.
Ces beaux vers en langue Latine
Confits au miel Catullien,
Vers de bon heur, meritent bien
Que beuſſe de l'eau Cabaline (11).

My Fairy, theſe careſſes ceaſe,
Your toying I cannot approve,
Let us not now indulge to love,
That I from debt may get releaſe.
Vergece's gift, which is moſt rare,
Has put me in a pleaſing care,
'Tis by the Graces and the Muſes
Adorn'd with ev'ry beauty curious.
Verſe of ſuch ſublime a nature,
That he in Latin did compoſe,
Which with Catullian honey flows,
Merit Hyppocrene's water.

John Antony de Baïf, before he finiſhes this Poem, takes notice of his own poverty, and of that of his friend.

Pauvreté mes eſpaulles preſſe,
Me foule & jamais ne me laiſſe.
Je ſuis pauvre, & tu n'es pas riche:
Vien-t'en me voir, Amy treſdoux:
Embraſſons-nous, conſolons-nous:
Le ciel ne fera touſiours chiche
Envers nous du bien qui des mains
De fortune vient aux humains:
Or vivons une vie eſtroitte
En pauvreté, mais ſans ſouffrette (12).

Poverty my ſhoulder preſſes,
And to haunt me never ceaſes,
I am poor, you don't abound,
Come to ſee me, deareſt friend,
Let's embrace, and put an end
To grief. For Heav'n will not be found
Still ſparing to us of its gifts:
Fortune's fickle and often ſhifts:
Tho' we live in poverty
Yet let us ſtill contented be.

---

(2) In the remark [D].

(3) In the ſecond chapter, where the river Iſmenus is mentioned.

(4) Equidem Vergerium cum hæc ſcriberet ſobrium fuiſſe non puto. Nam in Natali mirandum non eſt ſi corrupta non recte tranſtulit cum illi pene fatale fuerit, male vertendo, ut ille ait, etiam ex Græcis bonis Latina facere non bona. Rutgerſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 236.

(5) Ibid. p. 235.

(6) The book de Fluviorum ac Montium Nominibus, tranſlated into Latin by Philip James de Mauſſac, was printed at Toulouſe in 1615, and that of Rutgerſius, at Leyden, 1618.

(7) See his preface.

(8) Thuanus, lib. xxxviii, pag. 769, ad ann. 1565.

(9) John Antony de Baif, epiſtle to the king, prefixed to his Poems, printed at Paris, in the year 1573, in 8vo.

(10) John Antony de Baif's Poems, fol. m. 119.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid. fol. m. 119, verſo.

VERON (John) a French Proteſtant lived in the XVIth century. He publiſhed in Engliſh divers books of controverſy, and amongſt others one on Purgatory (a).

(a) See the Calvino Turciſmus,, lib. iv, cap. viii, pag. m. 834.

VERONA, a city of Italy, which ſome writers ſay, was built, and others that it was only rebuilt by the Gauls. Pompey's father led a Roman colony thither (a). It was ſacked by Attila, and ſucceſſively poſſeſſed by Odoacar King of the Heruli, Theodoric King of the Goths, and his ſucceſſors down to Totila, by the Lombards, by Charlemagne, and his poſterity; but when his deſcendants loſt the empire, ſeveral lords made themſelves ſovereigns of ſeveral cities of Italy. This ſort of government continued till Otho I re-united to the empire ſeveral States, which had been alienated from it. Amongſt theſe Verona was one, but it obtained the power of electing its own magiſtrates: So that it was properly an independant republic, under the name of an imperial city. In this ſtate it continued till Actiolinus ſeized the ſovereign power, which he could not obtain but by great bloodſhed. He enjoyed his tyrannical power thirty-three years, and died in the year 1269. After him the Veroneſe elected Martin della Scala their General, whoſe conduct they ſo well approved, that five years after they created him perpetual Dictator. His deſcendants governed Verona with great reputation, and were created princes by the Emperor in the year 1310. They rendered themſelves formidable by their conqueſts, and were driven out of Verona in 1387, by John Galeazzo Duke of Milan. They re-entered it in 1404, but did not keep poſſeſſion long, for the Venetians ſeized the city in 1409 (b), and have ſo carefully kept it, that they enjoy it to this day. It is not known whether any of the illuſtrious family della Scala remained, who left any children. Julius Cæſar Scaliger, one of the moſt learned men of the XVIth century, pretended to be deſcended from this houſe. But that honourable deſcent is diſputed; and few at preſent believe his pretenſion to be well grounded. Some are of opinion, that the letters of naturalization which he obtained in France, contradict his claim, ſince he there bears only the character of a Phyſician born at Verona (c). The public doubtleſs will be very glad to ſee thoſe letters of naturalization here [A] wherefore I inſert them.

(a) Taken from Cluverius, in Italia antiqua, lib. i, cap. xvi.

(b) Taken from Leander Alberti's Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. 716, & ſeq. He made uſe of the antiquities of Verona, publiſhed by Torellus Sarayna.

(c) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, February 1686, pag. m. 164, & Menagiana, pag. 25, of the firſt Dutch edition. Primeroſe, a Phyſician quoted in Riolan's Curieuſes Recherches ſur les Echoles de Medecine, affirms that the Phyſicians of Bourdeaux refuſed to admit Julius Cæſar Scaliger into that town, unleſs he underwent an examination; which Scaliger being unwilling to ſubmit to, for fear of expoſing his reputation in a quodlibetical diſputation, he retired to Agen.

[A] The public will doubtleſs be very glad to ſee thoſe letters of naturalization.] Mr Baluze, one of thoſe extraordinary men, who are born for the good of the Republic of Letters, and who beſides the productions with which they enrich it, are pleaſed to furniſh other authors with all ſorts of aſſiſtance, did me the favour to ſend me what follows.

An extract of an original regiſter of Francis I, which is in the Repoſitory of Records at Paris.

'Francis, &c. We give to underſtand, &c. that we have received the humble ſupplication of our dear and well beloved Julius Cæſar de l'Eſcalle de Bordoms, Doctor of Phyſic, native of the city of Verona in Italy, ſetting forth that about four years paſt, or thereabouts, he came into this our kingdom to the city of Agen in Agenois, with intention and full reſolution to end the remainder of his days there; in which city, and the country about it, the ſaid ſuppliant has purchaſed an houſe, and ſeveral other poſſeſſions. But becauſe he is a ſtranger and not a native of our realm, he is in doubt whether the poſſeſſions which he may have purchaſed, or hopes to purchaſe, likewiſe the inheritances which may devolve on him hereafter from his relations or others, may not be claimed, as belonging to us by eſcheat or otherwiſe, and our officers may not accordingly give him ſome trouble or hinderance, if he be not qualified and diſpenſed with on that account, and humbly requeſting us to impart to him our favour and liberality. Wherefore we, theſe things conſidered, generouſly inclined to grant the ſupplication and requeſt of the ſaid ſuppliant, given and granted, give and grant leave and licence; willing by our eſpecial grace, full power and royal authority, by theſe preſents, that he be freely permitted to inhabit, and dwell in our ſaid realm, and in it hold and poſſeſs all ſuch eſtates moveables or immoveables, which he hath already acquired, or ſhall for the future lawfully acquire; and likewiſe that he may ſucceed to all thoſe goods and inheritances which in our ſaid realm, territories, lands, and lordſhips, ſhall devolve on or belong to him by good and juſt title, and that he may diſpoſe of them by his laſt will, as his proper goods and inheritance; and that his heirs or others to whom he may diſpoſe of them, may be enabled to ſucceed and take poſſeſſion of and enjoy the ſaid goods, and in general that he ſhall enjoy entirely all the honours, privileges, prerogatives, franchiſes, liberties, and rights which are cuſtomarily enjoyed by the originary natives of this our kingdom, and that he ſhall be held and accounted our ſubject, in all caſes as a native of our realm; and therefore we have qualified and diſpenſed, and do qualify and diſpenſe him, of our ſaid grace by theſe preſents, he paying us a moderate ſum for once only. We give in command by theſe ſame preſents to our truſty and beloved officers of our accounts and treaſurers at Paris, baillies, ſeneſchals, and to all our other juſticiaries and officers, and to their lieutenants for the preſent and for the future, and to every one of them whom it may concern, and we will that the grace, licence, habitation, and all the effects by theſe preſents granted, be by them ſuffered and permitted to the ſuppliant to enjoy and uſe, fully and peaceably without giving or ſuffering to fall on him any arreſt, diſturbance, or hindrance, in what manner ſoever on any occaſion, &c. For ſuch is, &c. Notwithſtanding all ſtatutes, ordinances againſt ſtrangers, and any other ordinances, &c. Given at Paris in the month of March in the year of Grace, one thouſand five hundred and twenty-eight, and the fifteenth of our reign. Thus ſigned. By the King, Gedoyn. Viſa. Contentor. des Landes.'

I expected from Mr Baluze a memoir which I have not received concerning Du Pin (1), Biſhop of Rieux. The Biſhop of Rieux (2), one of the moſt learned and illuſtrious Prelates of France was to ſend it to him.

(1) Joannes PINUS, his article is to be ſeen above.

(2) His family, which is that of Bertier, has afforded many eminent men. His father, firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Toulouſe, was called Mr de Montrave. He was a man of great merit. See Balzac, Lettres Choiſies, pag. 270, Dutch edition.

VERSORIS, (PETER DE) Lord of Fontenai le Viſconte, of Marilli, and part of Montoger, and head of the council of the Dukes of Guiſe (a) in the XVIth century, was an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and one of the moſt famous and illuſtrious of his profeſſion. He was born at Paris on the 16th of February 1528 (b), of a noble family, and one that had been conſiderable for a long time (c) [A]. He was deſigned by his father to be an officer in a ſovereign court; but having extravagantly ſpent, whilſt he was young, the money that was laid aſide for that uſe, he endeavoured to repair that fault by hard labour, whereby .... he became one of the chief advocates of his time: he was ſo much maſter of all the things which were neceſſary to him, that he hardly uſed any books (d). He pleaded for the Jeſuits in the year 1564, in the famous trial which they had with the univerſity of Paris; and, to ſpeak properly, he gained the cauſe. He was deputed to the ſtates of Blois in the year 1576, and ſpoke in the name of the third ſtate. He was as good a chamber counſellor as a pleader (e). He was very zealous for his clients, particularly for the houſe of Guiſe .... And he died with grief in leſs than four or five hours, on the 25th of December 1588, after he had heard that the Duke of Guiſe [B] had been killed at Blois (f). It is ſaid, that this duke took his advice only in his domeſtic affairs, but not in the cabals of ſtate (g). We ſhall ſee below wherein his talents lay [C].

Mornac

(a) Manuſcript Memoir.

(b) Opuſcul. de Loiſel, p. 556.

(c) Manuſcript Memoir.

(d) Opuſcul. de Loiſel, p. 751.

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Loiſel, ubi ſupra, pag. 527.

(g) See the remark [B].

[A] Of a noble family, and one that had been conſiderable for a long time.] The proof of this is given by Mr Joly in his notes on the alphabetical Index of the Advocates, printed with divers pieces of Antony Loiſel, in the year 1652. ‘Mr Peter Verſoris, ſays he (1), Advocate in Parliament, was ſprung from a noble family, which came originally from gentlemen in Normandy about Falaize, as he himſelf obſerved in his genealogy which he wrote with his own hand, during the leiſure which the contagious diſtemper that raged in the year 1582, afforded him in his retirement in his houſe of Clichy la Garenne near Paris. Their name was le Tourneur, which they have ſince changed into Verſoris. John le Tourneur called Verſoris, coming to Paris about the eighth year of Charles VII, was one of the firſt Doctors of the Univerſity, and writ ſeveral books in Latin, ſome of which, as this genealogy obſerves, are to be ſeen in the library of the Minimes, at Nigeon. He changed his French name le Tourneur into the Latin one Verſoris, as men of letters were wont then to do. He took his nephew with him, made him a Lawyer, and married him to Jane Fournier, of a good family, and nearly related to the Lieutenant-Civil Charmolüe. From this marriage are deſcended all the Verſoris's, who have moſt of them exerciſed the function of Advocate with great reputation both in the Palace and the Chatelet.’ There is ſomething wanting in this relation of Mr Joly, we do not find by it that the nephew whom JOHN LE TOURNEUR had with him, was called FREDERIC LE TOURNEUR, and that in imitation of his uncle, he called himſelf Verſoris. He left one ſon, WILLIAM VERSORIS, who was Lord of Garge, and a famous Advocate; and father of our PETER VERSORIS (2). It is without doubt the ſame William Verſoris, we find in the liſt of the Advocates pleading in the court of parliament in the year 1524 (3), and who died at five and twenty, after he had been married five times, as Mr Peter Verſoris obſerves in the genealogy which he made of that family in the year 1582 (4). Mr Blanchard mentions this family in his catalogue of the Counſellors of the Parliament of Paris.

[B] He died of grief .... after he heard that the Duke of Guiſe had been killed at Blois.] Mr Joly relates it thus. ‘Peter Verſoris (5) was head of the Duke of Guiſe's Council, kept his ſeals, and was very affectionate to his family, though he had no communication, or any thing to do but with his domeſtic affairs; ſo that on the very day of the Barricadoes in the year 1588, he came in his coach in the morning to the Hôtel de Guiſe, to ſpeak with him as he uſed to do, not knowing any thing of what had paſſed, and returned again to his own houſe without ſeeing him, the Duke of Guiſe having then more urgent buſineſs on his hands. He died the ſame year on Chriſtmas-day in the morning, having heard at his collation the night before, the news of what was tranſacted at Blois, for which he was very much concerned, deploring the misfortunes into which he ſaw they were going to fall, and ſpoke theſe words with grief, That thoſe princes (meaning Meſſieurs de Guiſe) were very well beloved, and that if the king had not prevented it, he would have been much embaraſſed. However he was perfectly compoſed, and went to bed, deſigning to communicate at the midnight maſs, having already been confeſſed; but finding himſelf ill, he could not go: Mr de Verthamon, Counſellor in Parliament, his ſon-in-law, and his daughters, coming to ſee him, at their return about five a-clock in the morning, found him dead in his bed. The eldeſt of his ſons, Frederic Verſoris was then young, and was admitted into the court as a Counſellor a long time after. His two ſons-in-law Mr Rancher, Maſter of the Requeſts, and Mr de Verthamon, alſo Counſellor in Parliament, followed the King's perſon and intereſt during all thoſe commotions, as well in the ſtates of Blois, as in the parliament ſitting at Tours.

[C] We ſhall ſee .... wherein his talents lay.] Antony Loiſel made a ſort of parallel between John le Maitre and Peter Verſoris. The firſt, ſays he (6), was really a very able Advocate, well verſed in points of law, cuſtoms and practice, very prudent and deliberate in his cauſes, which he made appear as well at the Bar as in the adminiſtration of his places. After he had reſigned that of Preſident to Mr de Sillery, he deſired to live and die privately in his own houſe, where he was conſulted without going to the Bar, and often employed in arbitrations. After this he adds, ‘that it was not quite the ſame with Mr Peter Verſoris; for altho' they went to him, it was chiefly to mend ſome faults which happen ſometimes in preparing a caſe for a hearing; for he was really full of fine and ſubtle inventions, and underſtood the affairs of the Bar ſo well, that tho' he had in a manner quitted it, yet the Bar never quitted him, for his houſe was frequented as much as the Bar; that he kept not only his days, his mornings and afternoons, but his hours alſo, which he ſo managed that there were always people attending at the great-hall, whilſt he gave his advice in the little one. And as he was much ſollicited in his latter years for advice, ſo he had been employed in his younger days more than any body elſe for pleading, as one who ſpoke with a ſprightly ready and natural eloquence †, and with a great facility and wonderful art of perſwaſion, which was the reaſon of his being employed in the greateſt and fineſt cauſes of his time, as that of the Jeſuits ⸸, which we pleaded together, he for them ‡, and I for the Univerſity of Paris, of which I ſhall ſay nothing, becauſe ſince both pleas are printed, every body may paſs a judgment on them. Only this I ſhall ſay, that having read his ſome years ſince, I did not think it near ſo good as when we pleaded; which proceeds from the grace, the force, and the weight that is given to a diſcourſe by the voice, and way of delivery, eſpecially by his, which was fine and agreeable, in compariſon to what a meer, dull, mute, and inanimate reading is. It is true he had one fault, which was generally pronouncing A for E and E for A, and thoſe who knew what he quoted out of claſſic authors, might perceive that he was not well verſed in them; but take him altogether he was a great Advocate.

[D] I ſhall

---

(1) Opuſcules d'Antoine Loiſel, pag. 751.

(2) From a manuſcript Memoir.

(3) It is in pag. 574, 575, of the Opuſcules de Loiſel.

(4) Opuſcul. de Loiſel, p. 750.

(5) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(6) Ib. p. 526.

† Mr du Vair compares him with Mr Mangot, at the beginning of his treatiſe of the French eloquence. We have heard, ſays he, Mr Mangot and Mr Verſoris at the ſame time: But one of them was rather a ſubtile Civilian, who eaſily explained himſelf with a cloſe and a ſharp voice, than a great Orator. The other did not want a full and free expreſſion, or a great and nice judgment; but having employed all his thoughts about cauſes, he did not go ſo far as his natural parts, if they had been cultivated by care and art, would have carried him.

⸸ Paſquier in the firſt letter of the xxiſt book to Mr Sammarthanus relates at large how he was engaged in that cauſe, and all that paſſed in it.

‡ Mr Peter Verſoris, ſays he, at the end of that letter, pag. 675, a great Advocate pleaded againſt me for the Jeſuits, being aſſiſted by the Memoirs which Caigord the Jeſuit furniſhed him, who was a native of Auvergne, one of the fineſt ſollicitors the Palace ever ſaw, and as ſuch I have heard him commended by the late Cardinal of Lorrain.

Mornac made an encomium upon him in his Feriæ forenſes (b), I ſhall ſpeak of his iſſue [D].

(b) Ibid. pag. 752.

[D] I ſhall ſpeak of his iſſue.] He married Margaret Coignet, by whom he had two ſons and two daughters, FREDERIC, JAMES, CATHERINE, and MARY. The latter was wife of Francis de Vertamont, Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, and died in Auguſt 1625. Catherine was married the 5th of September 1580, to Antony Rancher Seigneur de la Foucaudiere, Counſellor in the Parliament, Maſter of the Requeſts, and afterwards Preſident in the Parliament of Paris.

FREDERIC DE VERSORIS, Counſellor in the Parliament, February 19, 1601, left among other children FRANCIS FREDERIC Lord of Fontenai le Vicomte, (who left only one daughter) and LEWIS Lord of Marſilli, Lieutenant of the guards, who left only two daughters. They died without iſſue. The youngeſt was married the 10th of September 1689, to her ſecond couſin, and died on the 6th of November 1691.

JAMES DE VERSORIS, the other ſon of our Advocate, was Lord of Coulommiers, Counſellor and Secretary to the King, and Father of PETER DE VERSORIS, Lord of Coulommiers, Beauvoir, and Malmuſſe, the King's Steward in ordinary. This Peter de Verſoris left five children, three daughters who are Nuns, and two ſons, Charles and Peter, CHARLES DE VERSORIS, Lord and Patron of Agi and Beauvoir, was married firſt to his ſecond couſin, daughter of LEWIS DE VERSORIS, Lieutenant of the guards; and afterwards on the third of March 1695, to Genevieve Bourgoin, by whom he has no children. PETER DE VERSORIS, Lord of Beauvoir, married Mademoiſelle Tonnelier at Orleans the 22d of February 1700 (7).

(7) Taken from a manuſcript Memoir.

VESPASIAN (TITUS FLAVIUS) ſon of an honeſt Publican [A], and grandſon of a collector, who had been captain of a company of one hundred men in Pompey's party (a), and who having eſcaped from the battle of Pharſalia, roſe to the higheſt dignity on earth, being created Emperor of Rome, in the year of Chriſt 69. He was born in a village of the country of the Sabini, near Reate (b), on the 17th of November, in the year of Rome 761 (c). He was brought up in the country by Tertulla his grandmother by his father's ſide, and preſerved ſo great a reſpect for her memory, that at great ſolemnities he always drank in her goblet (d). He paſſed gradually through all the dignities of the empire. He was made tribune of the ſoldiers in Thrace, on account of his ſervices. Crete and the province of Cyrene fell to his lot when he was Quæſtor. He was refuſed the office of Ædile the firſt time he ſtood for it. He obtained it afterwards, but was the laſt of the ſix Ædiles, and even could not arrive at that place without ſome difficulty. He was a more ſucceſsful candidate for the Prætorſhip; he obtained the firſt rank the very firſt time he ſtood for it. He made uſe of a great many arts to gain Caligula's favour, and ſtood very well with Narciſſus under the Emperor Claudius. By the intereſt of which favourite he was ſent into Germany at the head of a legion. He was afterwards ſent into Britain (e), where he fought the enemy thirty times, ſubdued two potent nations, above twenty towns, and the iſle of Wight. In

(a) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. i. See the remark [A] citat. (1).

(b) Id. ib. cap. ii.

(c) It is ninth year of Chriſt.

(d) Aviæ memoram tantopere dilexit, ut ſollennibus ac feſtis diebus pocillo quoque ejus argenteo potare perſeveraverit. Id. ib.

(e) Now called England.

[A] Son of an honeſt Publican.] That is to ſay, of a Publican who was a virtuous man, and behaved himſelf generouſly in his employ, and ſo juſtly withal, that the cities gave a public and laſting teſtimony of his probity. 'Hujus (1) filius cognomine 'Sabinus . . . . publicum quadrageſima in Aſia egit. 'Manebantque imagines à civitatibus ei poſitæ ſub 'hoc titulo, ΚΑΛΩ͂Σ ΤΕΛΩΝΗ΄ΣΑΝΤΙ. Poſtea 'fœnus apud Helvetios exercuit, ibique diem obiit, 'ſuperſtitibus uxore Veſpaſia Polla, & duobus ex ea 'liberis: quorum major Sabinus ad præfecturam ur'bis, minor Veſpaſianus ad principatum uſque pro'ceſſit. - - - - This man's ſon, ſirnamed Sabinus . . . . 'was a public tax-gatherer in Aſia, and had ſtatues 'raiſed to him by the cities with this inſcription, TO THE 'HONEST PUBLICAN. He was afterwards an 'uſurer, in Switzerland, where he died, leaving behind 'him his wife Veſpaſia Polla, and two children by her. 'The elder, Sabinus, came to be made Governor of the city, 'but the younger, Veſpaſian, was preferred to the dignity 'of Emperor.' Satirical men cannot here come in with their gloſs on this text, they cannot object that Veſpaſian's father was an honeſt Publican in the ſame ſenſe that one of thoſe who was crucified with JESUS CHRIST, is called the good Thief. The latter did not deſerve that character in ſenſu compoſito, as the Logicians ſpeak, but only in ſenſu diviſo. He was not good and a thief at the ſame time, but from a thief he became a good man. The ſame may be ſaid of Zacheus: He was not an honeſt man when he gathered the public impoſts: He became ſo by acts of reſtitution and repentance (2). This cannot be ſaid of our Emperor's father; for he united the character of an honeſt man with that of a Publican, ſo much decried in the Goſpel, and profane authors. Nay, the Satiriſts, who cannot deny this, would ſtretch things too far, if they ſhould make uſe of the application of this thought, theſe two words are very much ſurprized to find themſelves together, for in all likelihood they never met before. I have formerly touched on this (3), in obſerving that a great extent of learning is very rarely accompanied with a great modeſty. Nevertheleſs we meet with ſome examples in which they are united: Some Farmers of the revenues are alſo honeſt men, tho' it ought to be owned that from all antiquity theſe two qualities have been ſeparated. The opportunities they have of gaining, procures them riches, which are liberally expended on whatever luxury inſpires; but to defray theſe extravagant expences, new and more exorbitant extortions are neceſſary. Julian the Apoſtate knew very well that the Financiers love luxury. 'Evenerat iiſdem diebus, '(they are Ammianus Marcellinus's words) (4), ut ad 'demendum Imperatoris capillum tonſor venire præ'ceptus, introiret quidam ambitioſe veſtitus. Quo viſo 'Julianus obſtupuit: Ego, inquit, non Rationalem juſ'ſi, ſed tonſorem acciri. - - - - It happened much about 'the ſame time that a Barber being ſent for to ſhave 'Julian, there came in a man very finely dreſſed, at 'which the Emperor was aſtoniſhed: I gave orders, 'ſaid he, to call a Barber, and not a Receiver of the 'revenues.' This is the venom which poiſons the minds of thoſe concerned in the the management of the Treaſury. See ſeveral remarks againſt them in the firſt part of la Mothe le Vayer's Proſe Chagrine (5).

We may obſerve that Veſpaſian's maternal anceſtors were more illuſtrious than the paternal; for Veſpaſia Polla, his mother, was a Senator's ſiſter, and daughter of Veſpaſianus Pollio, who went through conſiderable offices in the army. 'Polla Nurſiæ honeſto genere 'orta, patrem habuit Veſpaſianum Pollionem, ter 'Tribunum militum, præfectumque caſtrorum, fra'tremque Senatorem prætoriæ dignitatis (6). - - - - - - 'Polla was born at Nurſia of a good family. Her fa'ther was Veſpaſianus Pollio, who had been three times 'a Tribune in the army, and Quarter-Maſter-General. 'Her brother was a Senator who had alſo enjoyed the 'Prætorian dignity.' Several monuments of this family were obſerved at a place called Veſpaſiæ, on the top of a mountain ſix miles from Nurſia, in the road to Spoleto, which diſcovered its ancient luſtre. Ubi

(1) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. i, That is of Titus Flavius Petro Municeps Reatinus bello civili Pompejanarum partium centurio . . . deinde . . . coactiones argentarias factitavit, Id. ib.

(2) See St Luke's Goſpel ch. xix.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1685, Art. 2, at the end.

(4) Ammian. Marcellinus, lib. xxii, cap. iv, pag. m. 300.

(5) Pag. 327, of Tom. ix, Edit. in 12mo. See alſo Tom. i, pag. 70, & ſeq.

(6) Sueton, ubi ſupra, cap. i.

In recompence of which he obtained the triumphal ornaments, two prieſthoods, and the conſulſhip. He lived in a ſort of retirement whilſt Agrippina continued in favour, who hated all Narciſſus's friends. Returning to public employments, he became Proconſul of Africa, which poſt he very honourably diſcharged [B], without enriching himſelf. He accompanied Nero in his travels through Greece; but not having the complaiſance to applaud that emperor's ſinging [C], he was utterly diſgraced, and concealed himſelf in an obſcure town. He did not believe himſelf ſafe there, he feared the fatal effects of Nero's rage, when he received the news that the government of a province, and the command of an army were beſtowed on him. No perſon was found ſo proper as he to reduce the Jewiſh nation, which had preſumed to revolt. This expedition in which Titus his ſon ſerved him as Lieutenant-General, gained him great glory, and opened his way to the throne. He began to hope for that exalted ſtation during the civil war betwixt Otho and Vitellius (f). Several preſages which promiſed him a moſt eminent fortune, were very powerful engagements to his reſolution of ſeizing the imperial authority; for beſides the impreſſion which they made upon himſelf, they ſupplied his friends with a good opportunity of animating him to this enterprize. Tacitus (g) and Suetonius (h) who have related the preſages, have not omitted the anſwer made him on mount Carmel. It was given by the true God, if we may believe the Carmelites, who build on the authority of theſe two hiſtorians, the chimerical antiquity of their order, and the pretended ſucceſſion of the diſciples of the prophet Elias continued to the beginning of their inſtitution [D].

Veſpaſian

(Veſpaſiis) Veſpaſiorum complura monumenta exſtant, magnum indicium ſplendoris familiæ & vetuſtatis (7). Now ſince Veſpaſian's elder brother took the ſirname of Sabinus, we muſt conclude that in that age, the younger brothers ſometimes took a ſirname borrowed from their mothers family, and terminated like thoſe which indicated adoption.

[B] He very honourably diſcharged the Proconſulſhip of Africa.] We have here a proof of what I ſaid above (8), that Suetonius was not prompted by a ſatirical genius to ſpeak ill of people. He here beſtows encomiums on Veſpaſian which are very contrary to the teſtimony of Tacitus; this ſhews that he had throughly examined what had been ſaid for and againſt Veſpaſian's conduct, and having found the ill reports concerning him falſe, he rejected them, in order to do that Proconſul the juſtice which was due to him. An Hiſtorian ill-natured and ſatirical does not act in that manner. 'Exin ſortitus Africam, integerrime, nec ſine magna dignatione adminiſtravit: 'Niſi quod Adrumeti ſeditione quadam, rapa in eum 'jacta ſunt. Rediit certe nihilo opulentior, ut qui prope 'labefactata jam fide, omnia prædia fratri obligarit (9). - - - Afterwards the province of Africa falling 'to his ſhare, he governed it with great integrity, and 'was greatly reſpected; excepting only that in a ſedition 'at Adrumetum he had turneps thrown at him. It is 'very certain that he came back no richer than he went; 'for his credit was ſo ſunk that he was under a neceſſity 'of mortgaging his whole eſtate to his brother.' You ſee that Suetonius doth not conceal the inſurrection of the inhabitants of Adrumetum, nor that they threw turneps at Veſpaſian. He is then ſo much the more to be credited in the elogies he beſtows upon him, and we may reaſonably believe that Tacitus was neither juſt nor exact enough, when he tells us only that Veſpaſian was decried, and drew on himſelf the public hatred during this Proconſulſhip. 'Integrum illic ac 'favorabilem Proconſulatum Vitellius; famoſum invi'ſumque Veſpaſianus egerat (10). - - - - - Vitellius be'haved in his Proconſulſhip there with integrity, and ſo 'as to be liked; but Veſpaſian in his was decried and 'hated.'

[C] Not having the complaiſance to applaud Nero's ſinging.] This Prince's paſſion for Muſic was a ridiculous extravagance. The principal cauſe of his travelling in Greece was his ardent deſire of ſignalizing himſelf in the Muſical diſputes in ſeveral cities of that country, and to bear away the prize (11). Suetonius relates upon this ſubject a great many circumſtances which are very ſurprizing (12). He ſaith amongſt other things that no perſon was allowed to retire from the theatre whilſt Nero was ſinging, and that ſome women were forced to be delivered there, and that the gates of the cities being ſhut, ſome perſons were ſo fatigued and tired with hearing and praiſing this Prince, that they ſecretly eſcaped over the walls, or feigned themſelves dead, that they might be carried out of the town under pretence of being buried. Cantante eo, ne neceſſaria quidem cauſa excedere theatro licitum erat. Itaque & enixæ quædam in ſpectaculis dicuntur, & multi tædio audiendi laudandique, clauſis oppidorum portis, aut furtim deſiluiſſe de muro, aut morte ſimulata funere elati (13). It is eaſy to conceive that Nero was extremely incenſed againſt Veſpaſian, who very often went out of the theatre, or fell aſleep whilſt his maſter was ſinging. Peregrinatione Achaica inter comites Neronis, cum cantante eo, aut diſcederet ſæpius, aut præſens obdormiſceret, graviſſimam contraxit offenſam: prohibituſque non contubernio modo, ſed etiam publica ſalutatione, ſeceſſit in parvam ac deviam civitatem, quoad latenti, etiamque extrema metuenti, provincia cum exercitu oblata eſt (14). Some will aſk why Suetonius ſaith here, that Veſpaſian frequently retired from the theatre? Hath he not elſewhere (15) affirmed that no perſon was permitted to go out of the theatre on any pretext whatſoever? I anſwer, that indeed he did not very well remember to render all the parts of his relations exactly conſiſtent; but to juſtify him in ſome ſort, we may ſuppoſe that the prohibition of leaving the theatre was a conſequence of the liberty of not ſtaying till the ſpectacle was ended, which ſeveral had taken. Veſpaſian, before the prohibition, was one of thoſe who laid the leaſt conſtraint upon himſelf; by which he began to diſpleaſe that Prince, and his diſgrace was compleated after the prohibition. He indeed obeyed, but fell aſleep on the theatre. I cannot think of a better way of reconciling theſe two places of Suetonius. It may perhaps be imagined that he confounded the times, I would ſay that inſtead of applying this to the year of the Muſical victories which Nero obtained at Rome, he placed it in the year of his victories amongſt the Greeks. We are informed by Tacitus that it was at Rome that Veſpaſian fell into diſgrace for ſleeping at the Muſical diſputes of the Emperor. 'Fere'bantque Veſpaſianum, tamquam ſomno conniveret, 'a Phœbo liberto increpitum, ægreque meliorum pre'cibus obtectum: mox imminentem perniciem majore 'fato effugiſſe (16). - - - - And they ſaid that Veſpaſian 'was reproved for ſleeping by the freed man Phœbus, 'and that he was with great difficulty ſaved through the 'interceſſion of the better ſort of people. It was ſoon 'after believed that he had eſcaped the preſent danger, 'being reſerved for a higher deſtiny.' Mr de Tillemont thinks that Veſpaſian twice committed this crime of ſleeping at Nero's Muſic; firſt at Rome, and afterwards in Greece (17). This is not very probable: a courtier who hath once run the riſque of his life, would take more care to avoid a relapſe, eſpecially, when it may be eaſily done.

[D] The anſwer made him on mount Carmel. . . : . . The Carmelites who build . . . . . the chimerical antiquity of their . . . . inſtitution.] Tacitus's words are: 'Eſt 'Judæam inter Syriamque Carmelus, ita vocant mon'tem, deumque: nec ſimulacrum deo, aut templum, '(ſic tradidere majores) ara tantum & reverentia. Illic 'ſacrificanti Veſpaſiano, cum ſpes occultas verſaret 'animo, Baſilides ſacerdos, inſpectis idemtidem extis, 'Quidquid eſt, inquit, Veſpaſiane quod paras, ſeu domum 'exſtruere, ſeu prolatare agros, ſive ampliare ſervitia,

'datur

(f) Taken from Suetonius, ubi ſupra, cap. ii, & ſeq.

(g) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. lxxviii.

(h) Sueton, in Veſpaſiano, cap. v.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) In the remark [D], of the article SUETONIUS.

(9) Sueton. ubi ſupra, cap. iv.

(10) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xcvii,

(11) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. xxii, See alſo Tacitus, Ann. lib. xvi, cap. iv, v.

(12) Suet. ibid. cap. xxiii, & ſeq.

(13) Id. ibid. cap. xxiii.

(14) Idem, in Veſpaſiano, cap. iv.

(15) See, above, citation (13).

(16) Tacit. Annal. lib. xvi, cap. v, ad ann. Romæ 818, Chriſti 65.

(17) Tillemont. Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. ii, p. m. 6.

Veſpaſian tho' animated by preſages, and the ſollicitations of his friends, heſitated for ſome time, and the concurrence of ſeveral fortuitous events (i), and the moſt preſſing reaſons of Mucianus (k) were wanting to change his uncertain thoughts into a fixed reſolution of declaring himſelf emperor. It is very probable that the lies, which were artfully ſpread about contributed very conſiderably to the ſucceſs of his enterprize [E]. He was the firſt who grew better, after he had aſcended the throne (l); and it would be unjuſt not to own that he remedied ſeveral evils, and did ſome very good actions. The deſire of amaſſing treaſures was his great vice, which he took no great care to hide; yet there is reaſon to believe that he contrived it ſo, that part of his extortions were imputed to his concubine datur tibi magna ſedes, ingentes termini, multum hominum. Has ambages & ſtatim exceperat fama, & tunc aperiebat, nec quidquam magis in ore vulgi; crebriores apud ipſum ſermones: quanto ſperantibus plura dicuntur (18). - - - Between Judea and Syria lies Carmel: that is the name which they give both to the mountain and to the god. The god has no temple nor image, (for ſuch is the religion of the country handed down from father to ſon) he has no more than an altar and reverence paid to him. While Veſpaſian was ſacrificing there, and revolving in his mind his ſecret hopes, the prieſt Baſilides, every now and then looking upon the entrails, ſpoke to him in this manner: Veſpaſian, whatever your deſigns be, whether to build a houſe, to extend your lands, or to increaſe the number of your ſlaves, a great ſeat is provided for you, large bounds, and a vaſt multitude of men. Fame preſently took up this dark oracle, and even then explained it; nor was any thing more talked of by the vulgar. To himſelf it was ſtill more frequently mentioned; for the more people hope the more they are entertained with the like diſcourſes.’ I thought I ought not to ſuppreſs the laſt words of this citation, for they contain an excellent inſtruction, or rather a lively image of the deceits and illuſions of ambition. The people diſcourſed of thoſe preſages, but thoſe who approached Veſpaſian talked more of them ſtill; for the more ſuch diſcourſes create any hopes, the more frequently are they repeated. I proceed now to Suetonius: ‘ Apud Judæam Carmeli Dei oraculum conſulentem, ita confirmavere ſortes, ut quidquid cogitaret volveretque animo, quantumlibet magnum, id eſſe proventurum pollicerentur (19). - - - - - When he conſulted the oracle of the god Carmel in Judea, he was encouraged by this anſwer, viz. that the meditation and purpoſe of his heart, however great it was, ſhould be accompliſhed.’ Thoſe who weigh the circumſtances of theſe two Hiſtorians words, and underſtand the religion which God delivered to the Jews, will without any difficulty be convinced, that the oracle conſulted by Veſpaſian upon that mountain, was a deity full as falſe as that at Delphi. Nevertheleſs the Carmelites maintain, that this was the oracle of the ſame God who was worſhipped at Jeruſalem. Hermenigildus à Sancto Paulo, a Spaniſh Monk, refuted this opinion, and ſhewed the Paganiſm of the god Carmelus mentioned by Tacitus and Suetonius: but Laurence Angelus Eſpin, a Carmelite, could not bear this truth; he publiſhed a tract at Saragoſſa in anſwer to it, with the pompous and inſulting title of Ruina Idoli Carmelitici quod ſomniavit Reverendiſſi. P. Fr. Hermenigildus à S. Paulo. This bold writer did not maintain his preſuming character; he was ſilenced by the Marquis of Agropoli, who printed a piece at Seville in the year 1678, in which he with a great deal of ſolidity and learning proves, that his good friend, Father Hermenigildus à S. Paulo, had the right ſide of the diſpute: the Carmelites reſolved to do him an ill turn for it, and to gratify their reſentment with the more addreſs, they proſecuted the Marquis for denying the pretended Haubert of Seville. ‘ Eodem aſtu contra Marchionem mihi conſentientem procedunt; eamdem quidem pretendentes cauſam, reapſe verò ſtomachantes quòd ſuum Laurentium Eſpin conatum Carmelo vindicare pro ætate Veſpaſiani decorem indebitum, fecerit obmuteſcere (20). - - - The ſame ſtratagem is employed againſt the Marquis, for thinking as I do. They do indeed pretend the ſame reaſon; but the truth is, they are angry with him for having put to ſilence their Advocate Laurence Eſpin, who claims an unjuſt honour for Carmel in the time of Veſpaſian.’ They brought him into the Inquiſition, as an accomplice of Papebroch, a French writer, and hired, ſaid they, to write againſt Spain. They pretended that he had betrayed Spain, and that his crime was downright treaſon. Neque ſcimus, inquiunt, utrum major ſit audacia quod homo Francus (qualem me fingunt) eo ſtylo utatur contra ſcriptores Hiſpanos, quam quod Agropolitanus Marchio homo mere laicus, ſcriptis ſuis ignorantia plenis, patriæ honorem prodat, favens auctori Franco, quem novit conductum ut ſcribat contra Hiſpaniam . . . . . quod grave Marchionis illius delictum eſt, perduellionis etiam crimine exaggeratum, adeoque facit eum ſacro Tribunali delatabilem, ſicut eum delatamus in præſentiarum, una cum Papebrochio, ut eorundem peccatorum complicem (21). This is what they did in the year 1691. By which we ſee that the moſt eminent characters are no ſecurity againſt Monkiſh perſecutions; for a man can ſcarce have more titles of honour than this Marquis: I can only give part of them, for I am ſtopped by an Et cætera from citing the whole. Gaſpar de Mendoza, Ibannes de Segovia & Peralta, Eques Ordinis de Alcantara, Marchio de Mondexar, Comes Tendiliæ, & utroque titulo ex Primatibus Hiſpaniæ; nec non Marchio de Valhermoſa & Agropoli, Dominus Provinciæ de Almoguera, Toparcha Oppidorum Corpæ, Meci, Fuentonobiliæ, Loranciæ, Aunionis, Vianæ, &c. Obſerve that his book was printed in Spaniſh at Seville, and tranſlated into Latin by Father Papebroch, a Jeſuit of Antwerp, and not a Frenchman as theſe accuſers moſt ignorantly pretend. This Latin tranſlation was printed at Antwerp in the year 1698. See the Utrecht Journaliſts (22).

(i) Id. ibid. cap. vi.

(k) You will find them in Tacitus ubi ſupra, cap. lxxvi, lxxvii.

(l) Ambigua de Veſpaſiano fama: ſoluſque omnium ante ſe principum in melius mutatus eſt. Tacit. ibid. lib. i, cap. l.

Beſides other reaſons which this Marquis uſes, he refutes the Carmelites by an argument drawn from the perſon of Veſpaſian; for he cites (23) ſeveral authors who are of opinion that this Emperor was the boar of the foreſt, of which David ſpoke by a prophetic ſpirit (24). He ſaith that he is called Cæſor piorum - - - the murderer of the ſaints in the Sibyl's verſes, and that he and his ſon Titus are the types of Antichriſt according to Malvenda. What probability then, concludes he, is there that the true God ſhould honour ſuch a man as he with his anſwers? He ſolidly refutes Marcellus Donatus (25), who was of that opinion.

[E] It is very probable, that the lies . . . contributed very conſiderably to the ſucceſs of his enterprize.] Copies of a letter from the Emperor Otho to Veſpaſian were diſperſed, by which the latter was conſtituted that Emperor's avenger, not to ſay that Otho therein expreſſed an ardent deſire that Veſpaſian would relieve the Republic. A report was alſo induſtriouſly ſpread that Vitellius had reſolved to remove the German legions to Syria, and thoſe of Syria to Germany. Plurimum cœptis contulerunt, jactatum exemplar epiſtolæ, veræ ſive falſæ, defuncti Othonis ad Veſpaſianum, extrema obteſtatione ultionem mandantis, & ut Reip. ſubveniret, optantis, ſimul rumor diſſipatus, deſtinaſſe Vitellium victorem permutare hiberna legionum, & Germanicas transferre in Orientem ad ſecuriorem mollioremque militiam (26). Theſe two particulars which doubtleſs were forged by the enemies of Vitellius, very much conduced to Veſpaſian's intereſt. The pretended letter of Otho paſſed for a ſort of laſt-will, which afforded Veſpaſian a lawful pretence. The Syrian legions charmed with their pleaſant quarters in ſo agreeable a climate, and forming to themſelves a terrible idea of the German ice and ſnow, were eaſily gained to the Emperor's party, who would prevent the change of their winter quarters. The Syrians alſo uſed to theſe legions, had been very ſorry to part with them for others ordered thither from a barbarous country (27). This encouraged them to favour Veſpaſian. This is the fate of revolutions: they require the aſſiſtance of a thouſand

(18) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. lxxviii.

(19) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. v.

(20) Dan. Papebrochius, Præf. ad Examen Divinitatis quam in Carmelo Veſpaſianus conſuluit.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) In the months of September and October 1698, pag. 730, & ſeq.

(23) Exam. Divinitatis, Art. xxv.

(24) Pſalm. lxxix, ver. 15.

(25) Marc. Donatus, Schol. in Hiſtor. Roman.

(26) Sueton. ubi ſupra, cap. vi.

(27) See Tacitus, ubi ſupra, cap. lxxix.

concubine Cænis [F]. This was a poor way of clearing himſelf; for even thoſe who believed that he knew not that ſhe ſold all places, would have accounted this ignorance as a moſt ſhameful fault. He was the firſt who had a tax on urine (m). I have ſaid ſomething elſewhere (n) concerning ſome miraculous cures of which he paſſed for the author. He died on the 24th of June, in the year 79, after a reign of ten years wanting ſix days, aged a little above ſixty nine years. It ought not to be forgotten that he behaved with great moderation towards thoſe who had offended him (o), and beſtowed many preſents and many favours on ingenious men, and thoſe who cultivated the liberal arts (p). He never was aſhamed of the meanneſs of his firſt condition, but ridiculed the vain efforts of ſome Genealogiſts who would make him to be deſcended from one of Hercules's companions [G]. He was too fond of raillery, which he carried even to a great degree of buffoonry, and made no ſcruple of uſing the moſt obſcene expreſſions. He very frequently thouſand forged writings and falſe alarms to affect the minds of the people. Without that, two in a thouſand will never ſucceed.

[F] He contrived it ſo that part of his extortions were imputed to his concubine Cænis.] Xiphilin in abridging Dion Caſſius left out ſeveral things that were doubtleſs of great importance: but if I miſtake not, he hath not done ſo in thoſe facts which concern this concubine: I am apt to think he hath kept the whole. His abridgment acquaints us when ſhe died (28). We there find that Veſpaſian loved her tenderly, and was indebted to her for the great power he acquired, and the vaſt treaſures he amaſſed. She ſold all the offices in the law, in the army, and thoſe which related to religion, beſides the very deciſions of Veſpaſian himſelf. Under that Emperor no body loſt his life for being rich; but many ſaved it with the help of their purſes. Cænis received all thoſe ſums, and he was ſuſpected, not without reaſon, to be privy to it. The Hiſtorian offers two reaſons which obliged him to mention this woman: firſt, ſhe was very faithful; and in the ſecond place, ſhe had a very extraordinary memory: Ἐμνημόνευσα δὲ αὐτῆς ὅτι τε πιστοτάτη ἦν καὶ ὅτι μνήμης ἄειστα ἐπεφύκει. Cujus propterea mentionem feci quod maxima fide & excellenti memoria fuit (29): For proof of which, he quotes the anſwer which ſhe returned to Antonia, her miſtreſs (30), who had obliged her to write ſome ſecret paſſage relating to Sejanus, to be communicated to Tiberius, and who had ordered it to be immediately blotted out, to prevent all inconveniencies from the diſcovery, It is in vain, replied ſhe, that you give me that order, for this, and all other things which you ſpeak of to me, are ſo firmly fixed in my memory, that they cannot be blotted out (31). I admire this in her, ſaith the Hiſtorian. Τοῦτο τε οὖν αὐτῆς ἐθαύμασα. Id igitur in ea admiratus ſum (32). It muſt be owned that ſuch an anſwer deſerved a place in this author; but it muſt at the ſame time be allowed that it was not pertinent. It could only have been juſt, if Antonia had deſired that all ideas of this letter might be blotted out. But this was not what ſhe deſired, her intention was only to prevent all external evidences of her ſecret, and that no diſcovery ſhould be confirmed by proofs: ſhe did not diſtruſt Cænis, nor was ſhe apprehenſive of accuſations purely verbal, and deſtitute of the ſtrong ſupports of written teſtimonies. To what purpoſe then was it to ſay, that blotting out the letter was no effectual way to prevent the inconvenience againſt which Antonia's precaution was levelled? Cænis's happy memory did not give Antonia any uneaſineſs, when ſhe knew the writing was not in being. Obſerve, that Cænis was made free by this lady, and was her Secretary. Veſpaſian kept her in his houſe before he married, ſent her away when he married, and took her again after the death of his wife, and treated her almoſt like a wife. Poſt uxoris exceſſum, Cænidem Antoniæ libertam, & a manu dilectam quondam ſibi, revocavit in contubernium: habuitque etiam Imperator pene juſtæ uxoris loco (33). After her death he took ſeveral concubines (34), which ſhewed that he thought no other ſufficient to ſupply her place, and that he had recourſe to ſeveral to compenſate the loſs he ſuffered in this one miſtreſs. It is obſerved as an evidence of Domitian's pride or incivility, that Cænis at her return from a journey offering to kiſs him according to cuſtom, he preſented her his hand to kiſs (35).

[G] He ridiculed the vain efforts of ſome Genealogiſts, who would make him to be deſcended from one of Hercules's companions.] Moſt of theſe people are prodigiouſly impudent (36); and when a favourite or miniſter gives them the leaſt encouragement, they preſent him with whatever pedigree he pleaſes. A Superintendant of the Finances needs only chooſe, and if he is diſpoſed liberally to reward thoſe genealogy makers, he ſhall deſcend, if he pleaſe, from the ancient Trojans.

> Tunc licet à Pico numeres genus, altaque ſi te > Nomina delectant, omnem Titanida pugnam
> Inter majores ipſumque Promethea ponas:
> De quocunque voles proavum tibi ſumito libro (37).

> Then trace your birth from Picus, if you pleaſe:
> If he's too modern, and your pride aſpire
> To ſeek the author of your being higher,
> Chuſe any Titan who the gods withſtood,
> To be the founder of your antient blood,
> Prometheus, and that race before the flood,
> Or any other ſtory you can find
> From Heralds, or in Poets, to your mind.
>
> DRYDEN.

‘Pegnafiel Contreras of Granada, ... not content to particularize .... one hundred and eighteen ſucceſſions from Adam to Philip III, hath deduced one hundred and twenty-one from the ſame original to the Duke of Lerma, on whoſe account this fine piece was written. To accompliſh this, the author, as others have done, rakes up the ruins of old Troy, where he finds (even before its deſtruction) two brothers Illus and Aſaracus, from the firſt of whom he makes the King of Spain to be deſcended, and from the other his Excellency; who by this means being a very diſtant relation to his Catholic Majeſty, he hath obliged him with a much nearer affinity by his maternal line, which he hath alſo drawn. And becauſe it would not be proper to leave a Duke ſo highly deſcended without ſome ſovereignties in his family, he makes Æneas one of his anceſtors. ..... A little after Æneas he crowds in Brutus, who is ſaid to have given his name to Great Britain (38).’ The number of cheats and bubbles was not leſs in former times than at preſent. If Veſpaſian had pleaſed, the Genealogical ſtem of the houſe of Flavia had been ſo drawn, that the greateſt names in old Rome had infallibly been inſerted in the male or female line. He would have ſeen in it,

> .... Stanteis in curribus Æmilianos,
> Et Curios jam dimidios, humeroſque minorem
> Corvinum, & Galbam auriculis naſoque carentem?
> ....
> Fumoſos equitum cum dictatore magiſtros (39).

> The brave Æmilii, as in triumph plac'd,
> The virtuous Curii, half by time defac'd;
> Corvinus, with a mouldring noſe that bears
> Injurious ſcars, the ſad effects of years,
> And Galba grinning without noſe or ears.
> ....
> Old Captains and Dictators of their race.
>
> DRYDEN.

He

(m) Sueton. ibid. cap. xxiii.

(n) In the Nouvelles de la Republique, des Lettres, June 1686, Art. i, p. 630.

(o) Sueton. ibid. cap. xiii, & ſeq.

(p) Id. ibid. cap. xviii.

(28) Xiphilin. Veſpaſiano, pag. m. 221.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Mother of the Emperor Claudius. See the remark [C], of the article ANTONIA, the elder.

(31) Xiphil. ubi ſupra.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. iii.

(34) Id. ibid. cap. xxi.

(35) Cænidi patris concubinæ ex Iſtria reverſæ oſculumque ut aſſuerat offerenti manum præbuit. Idem, in Domit. cap. xii.

(36) Compare, above, remark [C], of the article PINET.

(37) Juven. Sat. VIII, ver. 131.

(38) La Mothe le Vayer, Diſcours de l'Hiſt. Tom. ii, pag. 160, 161.

(39) Juvenal. Sat. VIII, ver. 3.

MVSEVM BRITANNICVM

frequently made uſe of this turn of thought to elude the juſt reproaches to which his avarice and the rigour of his exactions expoſed him [H].

He would therein have found Murranus who was killed in Æneas's time, from whom the moſt ancient Latin kings were deſcended.

> Murranum hic, atavos & avorum antiqua ſonantem
> Nomina, per regeſque, actum genus omnem Latinos, > Præcipitem ſcopulo, atque ingentis turbine ſaxi
> Excutit (40).

> Murranus, boaſting of his blood, that ſprings
> From a long royal race of Latian kings,
> Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown,
> Cruſh'd with the weight of an unwieldy ſtone.
> DRYDEN.

Some laboured to prove that the founders of the city of Reate, and a certain hero whoſe monument was in a ſtreet of Rome, and who had accompanied Hercules, were alſo the founders of the family of Veſpaſian; but this Emperor was the firſt who laughed at their endeavours, he never concealed the meanneſs of his extraction, but frequently ſpoke of it himſelf. Mediocritatem priſtinam neque diſſimulavit umquam, ac frequenter etiam præ ſe tulit. Quin & conantes quoſdam originem Flavii generis ad conditores Reatinos, comitemque Herculis, cujus monumentum exſtat via Salaria, referre, irriſit ultro (41). It is not ſtrange that ſuch a Genealogical labour ſhould be undertaken to flatter an Emperor, ſince more than this was done for a perſon who was only Quæſtor to Auguſtus. I ſpeak of one Quintus Vitellius, to whom it was proved by a book written expreſsly to that end (42), that his anceſtors had reigned over all Latium, and that they owed their original to Faunus King of the Aborigines, and to Vitellia, who had been worſhipped in ſeveral places as a goddeſs. Notwithſtanding which, according to ſeveral other authors, the Vitellii ſprung from a Freedman, or even from a Cobler (43). It is incredible how many families boaſted of an elder date than the famous ſiege of Troy. The Glabrio's pretended to be deſcended from Æneas (44). The pious Paula ſo celebrated in St Jerom's works, gave out that ſhe iſſued from Agamemnon; and that Genealogy was mentioned in her epitaph written by St Jerom:

> Scipio quam genuit, Pauli fudere parentes
> Gracchorum Soboles, Agamemnonis inclyta proles
> Hoc jacet in tumulo (45).

> Here lies intomb'd within this place
> A lady of great Scipio's race;
> She from the Pauli and the Gracchi ſprings,
> And from old Agamemnon, King of Kings.

Synesius, Biſhop of Cyrene in the beginning of the Vth century, ſaid he was deſcended from Hercules, and maintained that the archives of Cyrene contained ſufficient proofs of this extraction (46). The obſervation of theſe things is not uſeleſs; for it ſhews, that our age doth not go beyond the moſt venerable antiquity in this ſort of chimeras (47). Our age affords us an example which runs parallel with that of Veſpaſian. Read Naudé's words: 'Cardinal Mazarin, ſaith he (48), above five years ago in the preſence of ſeveral perſons of honour and probity, from whom I have it, ridiculed a certain flatterer, who would trace the original of the family and arms of Mazarini, from the old Roman Conſuls T. Geganius Macerinus, M. Geganius Macerinus II, Proculus Geganius Macerinus, M. Geganius Macerinus III, which the antient chronicle of Haloander, Panvinius in his Faſti, and the Roman Hiſtorians mention, in the years à Regiſugio XVIII. & ab urbe condita CCCVII. CCCXIV. & CCCXVII: And that almoſt at the ſame time he threatned a certain Prieſt of Avignon named Thomas Bonnet, to ſend him to the Baſtille, if, contrary to the ſtrict charge which had been ſeveral times repeated to him, he publiſhed a Genealogy or Hiſtory di Caſa Mazirini, becauſe he ſaid wonderful things of it without any proof, and without ſhewing by ſome authentic records the affinity of many illuſtrious families he ſpoke of.'

[H] He was too fond of raillery . . . made no ſcruple of uſing the moſt obſcene expreſſions . . . to elude the reproaches to which . . . his exactions expoſed him.] Being accuſtomed to this in his private condition, it would have been very difficult for him to have abſtained from it on the throne, for the itch of jeſting is the moſt incurable that can poſſibly infect any body. However, it is infinitely below the character of a great monarch to debaſe himſelf by low jokes as Veſpaſian did. 'Super cœnam autem, & ſemper alias comiſſimus, multa joco tranſigebat. Erat enim dicacitatis plurimæ, & ſic ſcurrilis ac ſordidæ, ut ne prætextatis quidem verbis abſtineret. Et tamen nonnulla ejus facetiſſima exſtant, in quibus & hoc: Menſtrium Florum, conſularem, admonitus ab eo plauſtra potius quam ploſtra dicenda, die poſtero Flaurum ſalutavit. Expugnatus autem à quadam, quaſi amore ſui deperiret, cum productæ pro concubitu ſeſtertia quadraginta donaſſet: admonente diſpenſatore quemadmodum ſummam rationibus vellet referri, Veſpaſiano, inquit, adamato (49). . . . . Maxime tamen dicacitatem in deformibus lucris affectabat, ut invidiam aliqua cavillatione dilueret, transferretque ad ſales (50). - - - - At ſupper, and indeed at all other times, he was very free in his converſation, and delighted much in jokes. For he was above meaſure fond of raillery, and that too of ſuch a low and ſcurrilous kind, that he did not even ſcruple to make uſe of obſcene words. Nevertheleſs, ſome humorous ſayings of his are ſtill preſerved, and among the reſt this: Being once at a time admoniſhed by Menſtrius Florus, a conſular perſon, that he ſhould rather ſay plauſtra than ploſtra, the next day he ſaluted him by the name of Flaurus. At another time having yielded to a lady, who pretended to be deſperately in love with him, after he had gratified her paſſion, and made her a preſent of forty ſeſtertia, his ſteward aſking him how he would have that ſum placed in his accounts; Set it down, ſaid he, to the dearly-beloved Veſpaſian. . . . Above all, he affected to be witty on thoſe occaſions when he made profits out of low and ſordid things; and in order to avoid the ſhame of ſuch gains, he turned the matter into a jeſt.' Did he believe theſe railleries would make people inſenſible of the oppreſſion of his exorbitant exactions?

(40) Virgil. Æneid. lib. xii, ver. 529.

(41) Sueton. ubi ſupra, cap. xii.

(42) Sueton. in Vitellio, cap. i.

(43) Id. ibid. cap. ii.

(44) Herodian. lib. ii, cap. iii, pag. m. 70.

(45) Hieronym. Epiſt. ad Euſtochium Virginem, pag. m. 514.

(46) See Balzac's Diſſertations at the end of the Socrate Chrétien, pag. 63, 64.

(47) See la Bruyere's Characters in the chapter intituled de quelques uſages, pag. m. 599. See alſo, remark [H], of the article BZOVIUS.

(48) Naudé Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 26, 27. That book was written in 1649.

(49) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. xxii.

(50) Id. ibid. cap. xxiii.

VIGERIUS (MARK)

VIGERIUS (MARK) Cardinal of the title of St Mary on the other ſide the Tyber, was of Savona. He was taken from a monaſtery of Franciſcans, and created Cardinal by Julius II. He was afterwards made Biſhop of Præneſte, and Archprieſt of the Vatican church. He had taught Theology at Padua and Rome. He died on the 18th of June 1516, aged ſeventy years, and was buried without an epitaph at St Mary's beyond the Tyber (a). He wrote ſeveral books, one of which was to prove that JESUS CHRIST's tunic ought to give place to Longinus's ſpear [A].

[A] He wrote ſeveral books, one of which was to prove that JESUS CHRIST's tunic ought to give place to Longinus's ſpear.] The occaſion of this work is ſingular. Bajazet, Emperor of the Turks, having two very precious reliques, viz. the ſeamleſs coat of our Saviour, and the ſpear which pierced his heart, preſented the latter to the Pope, and kept the former for himſelf (1). On this occaſion a great diſpute aroſe in Italy, whether the preſent made to the Pope was better than that which the Grand Seignior reſerved for himſelf. They carefully examined whether a Turkiſh Prince had a good taſte in point of reliques. Our Vigerius was ordered to make it appear, that the Sultan was no nice judge in things of this this kind, ſince the ſeamleſs tunic ought to give the precedence to the lance. In effect, the ſpear penetrated to the heart, and was tinctured with the very vital blood ; but the tunic only touched the external parts. Bartholinus mentions this diſpute. Inſedit hæc opinio, ſaith he (2), Marco Vigerio Epiſcopo Præneſtino & Cardinali Senogallienſi in Controverſia quam juſſu æqualium ſuorum de præſtantia & dignitate lanceæ Longini Pontifici Romano à Turcarum Imperatore miſſæ, præ tunica inconſutili, quam ipſe Bajazetes ſibi reſervarat, olim ipſe conſcripſit, poſt à Simone Begnio Modruſienſi Epiſcopo per prælum Aſcenſianum typis divulgatum. Tractatu quarto fol. 10. primas lanceæ defert, quia non extrema ſolum, ut tunica, ſed ſanctiſſimi corporis medium attigit & nobiliſſima ; vel forte loca cordis ; & ipſum attigit cor ; ad quæ in morte Chriſti omnis vigor vitalis humoris, in exhauſto corpore reliqui, ut ad arcem muniendam, & ad proprium domicilium ſe contulerat : qua forte de cauſa ſanguis defluxit & aqua per lanceam. Poſtea paucis interjectis: Ferrum autem aqua perfuſum eſt ; quam de fonte intimi cordis eduxit, & de micanti mucrone rubens & ſanguinolentum ſpiculum regio ſacerdotalique ſanguine cruentatum extitit.

(a) Taken from the Athenæum Romanum, of the Jeſuit Auguſtin Oldoini, pag. 481.

(1) See the article of INNOCENT VIII, remark [F].

Calvin had not heard of this preſent of Bajazet, for he takes no notice of it in that place where he obſerves that the iron point of that lance was actually in four different places, if we believe the Papiſts (3). He did not forget that the Turks boaſt of having the tunic. His words are (4), ‘ Concerning the ſeamleſs garment for which lots were caſt, becauſe it was thought very proper to excite the devotion of the ignorant, there are ſeveral of them. For at Argentueil near Paris, there is one ; and another at Triers. And if the Bull of St Salvador in Spain ſpeaks truth, the Chriſtians, by their inconſiderate zeal, have done worſe than the Infidel ſoldiers. For theſe not daring to tear it in pieces, caſt lots for it : But the Chriſtians have divided it in order to adore it. Beſides, what anſwer will they make to the Turk, who laughs at their folly, and pretends it is in his poſſeſſion ? But we need not make them quarrel with the Turk ; let them end the debate amongſt themſelves. In the mean while we ſhall be excuſed from believing what is ſaid by the one as well as the other ſide, that we may not favour one party more than the other, without being well apprized of the matter. For that would be contrary to all reaſon.’

Oldoini mentions the following books of our Vigerius : Apologiam contra Piſanum Conciliabulum ſcripſit, & libellum unum decachordum Chriſtianum prænotatum, & alterum de ferro lanceæ, & Chriſti indumentis, eorumque dignitate (5). I omit the liſt of books not printed (6).

(2) Thomas Bartholinus, Diſſertat. de latere Chriſti, pag. 21, 22.

(3) Calvin. Inventaire des Reliques, p. m. 29.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 31, 32.

(5) Auguſt. Oldoinus, in Athenæo Romano, pag. 481.

(6) It is in Oldoini, ibid.

VIGILANTIUS, Rector of a pariſh in the dioceſe of Barcelona in Spain, was by nation a Gaul [A], and lived about the beginning of the Vth century. He compoſed ſome books, in which he diſcovered a zeal for religion ; but ſuffering himſelf to [A] He was by nation a Gaul.] Gennadius aſſerts it in expreſs terms (1) ; but he is thought to be miſtaken by ſome who ground their opinion on St Jerom, who gives Vigilantius the epithet of Calaguritanus. ‘ Fuit ipſe natione Hiſpanus, patriâ Calaguritanus, ut idem S. Hieronymus tradit, ex quo Gennadius redarguitur (2). - - - He was a Spaniard by nation, of the city of Catahorra, as St Jerom relates, by which Gennadius is proved to be in an error.’ But I ſhould rather chuſe to juſtify Gennadius from St Jerom's words ; for an author, who mentions ſeveral monſters, and ſaith particularly that Geryon was born in Spain ; triformem Geryonem Hiſpaniæ prodiderunt (3), - - - Spain produced Geryon, that monſter, with three ſhapes, and adds, that Gaul alone never had any monſters, and that it had always abounded with great and eloquent men, but that all of a ſudden Vigilantius aroſe, and fought againſt the Spirit of our Lord ; a writer, I ſay, who places his periods in this manner, would he have us believe that this Heretic was born in Spain, and not in Gaul ? It is certain that if a perſon deſigned to ſignify that Vigilantius was a Gaul and not a Spaniard, he would expreſs himſelf like St Jerom. Cacum deſcribit Virgilius, triformem Geryonem Hiſpaniæ prodiderunt. Sola Gallia monſtra non habuit, ſed viris ſemper fortiſſimis, & eloquentiſſimis abundavit. Exortus eſt ſubito Vigilantius, ſeu verius Dormitantius, qui immundo ſpiritu pugnet contra Chriſti ſpiritum (4). Another paſſage of St Jerom more expreſsly points out Vigilantius's country, and that ſo exactly, that no room is left to doubt that he makes him a native of the country which is at preſent called Cominge. ‘ Nimirum reſpondet generi ſuo (Vigilantius) ut qui de latronum & convenarum natus eſt ſemine : quos Cn. Pompeius, edomitâ Hiſpaniâ, & ad triumphum redire feſtinans de Pyrenæi jugis depoſuit, & in unum oppidum congregavit ; unde & convenarum urbs nomen accepit. Huc uſque latrocinetur contra eccleſiam Dei, & de Vectonibus, Arrebacis, Celtiberiſque deſcendens incurſet Galliarum Eccleſias, portetque nequaquam vexillum Chriſti, ſed inſigne Diaboli. Fecit hoc idem Pompeius, etiam in orientis partibus ; ut Cilicibus & Iſauris piratis, latronibuſque ſuperatis, ſui nominis inter Ciliciam & Iſauriam conderet civitatem. Sed hæc urbs hodie ſervat ſcita majorum, & nullus IN EA ORTUS eſt Dormitantius. Galliæ VERNACULUM HOSTEM ſuſtinent, & hominem moti capitis, atque Hippocratis vinculis alligandum, ſedentem cernunt in Eccleſia (5). - - - Vigilantius behaves in a manner quite ſuitable to his pedigree ; ſince he is deſcended from a mixed breed of robbers ; whom Cneius Pompey, having ſubdued Spain, and returning with all ſpeed to his triumph, brought down from the tops of the Pyrenean mountains, and placed them together in one city, which from thence took it's name (Comminges). Hitherto therefore has Vigilantius, like a robber, harraſſed the Church of GOD ; and deſcending from the Vectons, the Arrebaci, and the Celtiberi, made incurſions upon the Churches of Gaul, carrying with him not the ſtandard of Chriſt, but the enſign of the Devil. Pompey did the ſame thing in the Eaſt ; for when he had ſubdued the Cilician and Iſaurian pirates and robbers, he built a city between Cilicia and Iſauria, and called it after his own name. But the inhabitants of this city ſtill adhere to the maxims of their forefathers, and no Dormitantius, [that is a name derived from ſlumbering, as Vigilantius is from watching] has ever APPEARED AMONG THEM. But Gaul entertains a HOME-BRED ENEMY, and beholds ſitting in the church a man of a diſturbed brain, who deſerves to be bound with the fetters of Hippocrates.’ But it will be aſked why then does he uſe the epithet Calaguritanus, in ſuch a manner as diſcovers that he took that word in the ſame ſenſe as if he would have expreſſed Quintilian's country (6) ? For an anſwer to this difficulty, I refer you to the learned Mr de Marca, who, I believe, has abſolutely removed it in a diſſertation which I have not read, nor do any otherwiſe know than by the following words of the Abbot de la Roque : ‘ As it is no diſhonour for a man to be of a country which hath produced ill men, and an Hiſtorian is always obliged to ſpeak truth, Mr de Marca, in a diſcourſe which he wrote concerning the country of Vigilantius, which this monſter hath diſhonoured by his errors, corrects the blunder which almoſt all Hiſtorians have committed concerning this Heretic, by proving that his birth-place was not Calaguris, a city in Spain, but Calaguri, a village near the city of St Bertrand in the dioceſe of Cominge. This is what Baronius was ignorant of, and which they may certainly correct in Moreri's new Dictionary (7).’ I ſhall paſs over Hadrian Valeſius's obſervations againſt St Jerom, that learned Critic ſhews (8) that this Father contradicts himſelf, ſince the ſituation of the places will not allow that the ſame perſon ſhould be deſcended from the Vectons (9), the Arabaci, the Celtiberi, and thoſe robbers whom Pompey gathered into a body. Father Pagi promiſes to anſwer, in favour of St Jerom, the objections of Valeſius (10), and ſaith beforehand that inſtead of Vectonibus, it ought not to be read Veronibus (11), but Vaſconibus. This correction will not remove the difficulties as to the Arebacis Celtiberiſque. This is only by the way.

Obſerve that James Valdes, the Civilian, conjectures that the epithet Calaguritanus might be taken from ſome

(1) Vigilantius preſbyter natione Gallus. Gennadius, de Script. Eccleſ. cap. xxxv.

(2) Baronius, ad ann. 406, num. 40.

(3) Hieronym. Epiſt. adv. Vigilant. pag. m. 548.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 551.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 549.

(7) Journal des Sçavans, of the 31*ſt of March* 1681, pag. 120, Dutch edition, in the abſtract of Mr de Marca's Opuſcula, publiſhed the firſt time in 1681.

(8) Hadrian. Valeſius, Notit. Galliar. p. 157.

(9) Or Vettons.

(10) Pagi, letter to the Abbot Nicaiſe of the firſt of October, 1696. It was firſt printed in 4to, and then in the Nouvelles, de la Rép. des Lettres, for July 1699.

(11) It is Valeſius's conjecture, ubi ſupra.

to be ſeduced by the love of praiſe, and preſuming too much on his ſtrength, and having acquired more politeneſs of ſtile [B], than knowledge in the ſcripture, he explained ill one of the viſions of the Prophet Daniel, and vented ſome other trifles, which they placed in the catalogue of hereſies (a). St Jerom refuted him (b). This is what Gennadius ſaith of him ; from whence we may conjecture that he did not altogether approve the vehemence with which St Jerom wrote againſt Vigilantius ; for one would think, by what St Jerom ſays of that prieſt, that he was the moſt accurſed heretic that ever was [C]. The Proteſtants judge otherwiſe of it, they are perſuaded that Vigilantius very juſtly condemned vows of celibacy, the uſe of wax-candles at the ſepulchres of the martyrs, the honour paid to ſaints, prayers for the dead, and nocturnal aſſemblies for devotion, &c. Several diſorders were committed in thoſe aſſemblies, and at laſt it was ſome town in Gaul ; for he will not allow Vigilantius to be a Spaniard : ‘ Gallus, ſaith he (12), à Gennadio de ſcript. Eccleſ. dicitur, & quamvis Calagurritanus à B. Hieronymo nuncietur in princ. adverſus Vigilantium, & à Varonio 5. tom. anno 406. & Pampilonenſem dicat Mariana de reb. Hiſp. lib. 4. c. 20. tamen non Hiſpanum appellant, ſed potius videntur Gallum nunciare, cum tunc monſtra Galliæ naſci hæreticorum dixerint, & potuit eſſe Calagurritanum aliud oppidum Galliæ, vel ibi preſbyterum fuiſſe, ut Barcinonæ, non tamen natum. - - - Gennadius ſays that he was a Gaul; and tho' St Jerom and Baronius give him the epithet of Calaguritanus, and Mariana that of Pampilonenſis, yet they do not call him a Spaniard, but ſeem rather to ſay that he was a Gaul, by ſaying that Gaul did then produce monſters of Hereſy. Beſides, there may poſſibly have been another town in Gaul, which bore that name of Calaguris, or he may have been a Preſbyter there as he was at Barcelona, without being born in any of theſe cities.’ In another place he alledges St Jerom declaring that Spain never produced any Heretic beſides Priſcillian. Regio enim Hiſpana ut B. Hieronymus c. 17. in Eſaiam, inquit, monſtra hæreticorum non generavit & unum partum Priſcilliani ut abortivum & impium pia mater procul à ſe abdicavit, pariterque ablegavit (13).

[B] More politeneſs of ſtile.] For ſo with Mr du Pin (14) we may tranſlate the lingua politus of Gennadius. I obſerve this to the end that we may more clearly ſee the difference betwixt St Jerom and Gennadius. The former ſaith that Vigilantius wrote very ill : ‘ Miſeruntque libros per fratrem Siſinium quos inter crapulam ſtertens evomuit. . . . . Eſt quidem imperitus & verbis & ſcientia, & ſermone inconditus, ne vera quidem poteſt defendere (15). - - - - They ſent books by Siſinius, which he had ſpewed out in his drunken fits. . . . . He is a man truly ignorant both of ſtile and matter, and ſo diſagreeable in his diſcourſe that he could not even defend a good cauſe.’ Gennadius, who knew what character St Jerom had given him, yet doth not ſcruple to acknowledge the polite language of Vigilantius. He meant, doubtleſs, not that this Heretic ſpoke elegantly, and wrote barbarouſly, but that there appeared a politeneſs in his writings. He then judges quite otherwiſe of him than St Jerom, and ought more to be credited ; for when an adverſary refutes a man with that bitterneſs, which clearly appears in St Jerom, it is hardly poſſible for him to own that he writes well ; he chiefly aims to expoſe him, in all reſpects, to the readers contempt.

[C] One would think, by what St Jerom ſays of this Prieſt, that he was the moſt accurſed Heretic that ever was.] St Jerom calls him Samaritan and Jew, a filthy wretch, whoſe tongue ought to be cut out, and a furious monſter that ought to be bound. Ais, Vigilantium, qui κατ᾽ ἀντιφρασιν hoc vocatur nomine, nam Dormitantius rectiùs diceretur, os fœtidum rurſum aperire, & putorem ſpurciſſimum contra ſanctorum martyrum proferre reliquias ; & nos, qui eas ſuſpicimus, appellare cinerarios & idololatras, qui mortuorum hominum oſſa veneremur. O infelicem hominem, & omni lacrymarum fonte plangendum, qui hæc dicens, non ſe intelligat eſſe Samaritanum, & Judæum (16), ... O præcidendam linguam à medicis, immò inſanum curandum caput : ut qui loqui neſcit, diſcat aliquando reticere. Ego vidi hoc aliquando portentum, teſtimoniis ſcripturarum, quaſi vinculis Hippocratis, volui ligare furioſum : ſed abiit, exceſſit, evaſit, erupit, & inter Hadriæ fluctus, Cotiique regis alpes in nos declamando clamavit. Quidquid enim amens loquitur, vociferatio & clamor eſt appellandus (17). He calls Vigilantius's words a moſt filthy drunken vomit (18). He ſaith, in another place, that the conduct of his followers is not ſo much their own action, as that of the Devils which dwell in them. Quales nuper ſub Magiſtro cerebroſo in Gallia pullularunt, qui baſilicas martyrum declinantes, nos qui ibi orationes ex more celebramus, quaſi immundos fugiunt. Hoc autem non tam illi faciunt quam habitantes in eis dæmones, fortitudinem & flagella ſancti cineris fugientes (19). He ſaith ſo particularly of Vigilantius, Sentio, ſentio, infeliciſſime mortalium, quid doleas, quid timeas. Spiritus iſte immundus, qui hæc te cogit ſcribere, ſæpè hoc viliſſimo tortus eſt pulvere, immò hodiéque torquetur : & qui in te plagas diſſimulat, in ceteris confitetur (20). Obſerve that Vigilantius's dioceſan acquieſced in his doctrine : this St Jerom diſliked, and would have had this earthen veſſel broken with an iron rod. Miror ſanctum Epiſcopum, in cujus parochiâ eſſe preſbyter dicitur acquieſcere furori ejus, & non virgâ Apoſtolicâ, virgaque ferrea confringere vas inutile, & tradere in intertium carnis, ut ſpiritus ſalvus fiat (21). If theſe invectives are very exorbitant, I do not think that St Jerom's deſcription of Vigilantius's opinions is leſs ſo. I believe he was treated with the ſame injuſtice as the Proteſtants are treated. He diſapproved the religious honour paid to relics, and therefore he was accuſed of abhorring the memory and the dead bones of the martyrs, and avoiding their ſepulchres, as places filled with carrion. But who is ignorant of the difference betwixt hating an object, and refuſing to pay religious worſhip to it ? I cannot believe that Vigilantius's opinions concerning celibacy, were what they are repreſented. Undoubtedly he contented himſelf with aſſerting that marriage ought not to be forbidden to Eccleſiaſtics, and that they ought not to engage in vows of continence. To render this doctrine odious, it was given out that he condemned and deteſted celibacy, and looked on thoſe as incapable of the Prieſthood who had no wife. This falſe gloſs was yet further improved ; it was affirmed, that, according to Vigilantius, inconteſtable proofs of a conſummated and fruitful marriage, ought to be given to qualify a perſon for ordination, and that no man ought to preſent himſelf to be ordained without being attended by a wife big with child, or who carried one in her arms. There is no appearance that he either taught or cauſed to be practiſed ſuch fooleries as theſe. What judgment then would you have us form of the ſincerity of St Jerom, or of thoſe accuſers who informed him concerning this Heretic ? Conſider very well the words of that holy doctor. ‘ Proh nefas, Epiſcopos ſui ſceleris dicitur habere conſortes (Vigilantius) ; ſi tamen Epiſcopi nominandi ſunt, qui non ordinant diaconos, niſi priùs uxores duxerint, nulli cœlibi credentes pudicitiam, imò oſtendentes quàm ſanctè vivant, qui malè de omnibus ſuſpicantur. Et niſi prægnantes uxores viderint Clericorum, infanteſque de ulnis matrum vagientes, Chriſti ſacramenta non tribuunt (22). - - - O ſhame ! They ſay Vigilantius has Biſhops who are accomplices of his crime ; if, indeed, ſuch perſons deſerve the name of Biſhops, who refuſe to ordain Deacons, unleſs they be firſt married ; believing that no ſingle man can be chaſte, and plainly ſhewing what holy lives they themſelves lead who have ſuch a bad opinion of every body elſe. And unleſs a Clergyman can produce his wife big with child, or having one or two in her arms, theſe people will not give him the ſacraments of C H R I S T.’ He repeats the ſame thing at the end of his book. Tota nocte vigilabo, & ſociis illius, immò diſcipulis, vel magiſtris, qui niſi tumentes uteros viderint feminarum, maritos earum Chriſti miniſterio arbitrantur indignos (23). If theſe tales had been ſtretched a little farther, Vigilantius would have been accuſed of a diſcipline which revived the jus trium liberorum, -- the privilege of thoſe who had three children, in favour of the Eccleſiaſtics, I mean which allowed exemptions and privileges to the Clergy

---

(a) Expoſuit pravo ingenio ſecundum viſionem Danielis, & alia locutus eſt frivola quæ in catalogo hæreticorum neceſſario ponuntur. Gennadius, de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. cap. xxxv.

(b) Taken from Gennadius, ibid.

(12) Jacobus Valdeſius de Dignitate Hiſpaniæ, cap. ix, num. 17, pag. m. 204.

(13) Id. ibid. cap. xix, num. 72, pag. 398.

(14) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. iii, pag. 158, Dutch Edit.

(15) Hieron. adverſ. Vigilant. pag. m. 550.

(16) Hieron. Epiſt. ad Riparium, pag. m. 543.

(17) Ibid. pag. 545.

(18) Eructaret immundiſſimam crapulam. Ibid. Compare with this what is above in citat. (5).

(19) Idem. in Iſaiam, cap. lxxv. Apud Baron. ad ann. 406, num. 43.

(20) Idem, Epiſt. adv. Vigilant. pag. 558, 559.

interetum

(21) Idem, Epiſt. ad Riparium, pag. 545.

(22) Hieron. adv. Vigilant. pag. m. 549.

(23) Id. ib. pag. 564.

was thought neceſſary to do as Vigilantius adviſed [D]; to ſuppreſs thoſe aſſemblies, and to give another form to that ſort of devotion. The ardour which St Jerom ſhewed, was perhaps intermixed with ſome perſonal reſentment; for Vigilantius had traduced him as a favourer of Origen, and this was at the inſtigation of Ruffinus [E]. He had diſcovered ſeveral marks of eſteem for Vigilantius, whom Paulinus had recommended to him (c). This was when Vigilantius made a voyage to Jeruſalem. An earthquake which happened whilſt he was in the Holy Land, ſo much affrighted him, that he immediately run ſtark naked to a church for ſhelter [F]. Leaving this country he took a view of Egypt (d), and when he returned into the weſt, he ſowed his opinions amongſt the Gauls.

Clergy whoſe wives were fruitful. They would have aſſerted, that the laws of his diſcipline aſſigned the beſt biſhoprics and benefices not to the moſt virtuous and learned, but to thoſe who had moſt children. They would have ſaid that he ſubjected thoſe Clergymen to canonical penalties, who could not ſhew any heirs of their bodies. They would have maintained that even with regard to the laity, all the antient rules of Paganiſm were revived, which annexed a ſort of real damage and ſcandal to celibacy. They would have publiſhed a hundred more extravagancies of this nature.

[D] Several ſins were committed in thoſe aſſemblies, and at laſt it was found neceſſary to do as Vigilantius adviſed.] In thoſe times it was cuſtomary to paſs whole nights in the churches on occaſion of the celebration of certain feſtivals. The youth applied theſe opportunities to amorous ends, and ſeveral women were hereby debauched, which had not been poſſible if they had ſtaid at home. It is then certain that Vigilantius juſtly condemned thoſe nocturnal aſſemblies, which afforded ſo many tempting opportunities to ſin. See what I have ſaid in the remark [D] of the article THESMOPHORIA. St Jerom doth not deny that theſe meetings were attended with ſeveral diſorders, but he aſſerts that this ought not to interrupt the frequency of their celebration: he alledges that thoſe who perverted theſe opportunities to ſinful purpoſes, would without them find means to defile themſelves; that people are more careful to take hold of occaſions which very ſeldom offer themſelves; and that the Eaſter-eves were not exempt from this leudneſs, and conſequently ought to be aboliſhed, if his adverſary's reaſons were juſt. But that after all, tho' wicked men abuſe good things, it does not follow that the uſe of them ought to be aboliſhed. His words are: Error autem & culpa juvenum, viliſſimarumque mulierum, qui per noctem ſæpè deprehenditur, non eſt religioſis hominibus imputandus; quia & in vigiliis Paſchæ tale quid fieri plerumque convincitur: & tamen paucorum culpa non præjudicat religioni; qui & abſque vigiliis poſſunt errare vel in ſuis, vel in alienis domibus. Apoſtolorum fidem Judæ proditio non deſtruxit. Et noſtras ergo vigilias malæ aliorum vigiliæ non deſtruent: quin potiùs pudicitiæ vigilare cogantur, qui libidini dormiunt. Quod enim feciſſe bonum eſt, non poteſt malum eſſe, ſi frequenter fiat: aut, ſi aliqua culpa vitanda eſt, non ex eo, quod ſæpè, ſed ex eo, quod fit aliquando, culpabile eſt. Non vigilemus itaque diebus Paſchæ; ne expectata diu adulterorum deſideria compleantur; ne occaſionem peccandi uxor inveniat, ne maritali non poſſit recludi clave. Ardentius appetitur, quidquid eſt rarius (24). It would be very eaſy to ſhew the ſophiſtry in every one of St Jerom's arguments, but it is ſufficient for me to ſay that the event refuted him, and juſtified Vigilantius; for theſe nocturnal aſſemblies were at laſt aboliſhed, to put a ſtop to the impurities there committed (25). The reader may here remember the mandate which the Archbiſhop of Paris publiſhed in the year 1697, to remedy a like abuſe. Let us occaſionally obſerve that the aſſemblies of the Faithful in the churches of the martyrs were expoſed to another inconvenience; the Chriſtians brought with them wherewithal to make good chear, and made themſelves drunk. This abuſe prevailed ſtill in Africa in St Auguſtin's time (26); but that cuſtom had been then aboliſhed in ſeveral places: men are ſo corrupt that even the exerciſe of devotion itſelf is perverted to an occaſion of evil.

[E] Vigilantius had traduced him as a favourer of Origen, and this was at the inſtigation of Ruffinus.] The proofs of all this are to be found in Baronius: You will there ſee that Ruffinus being at Jeruſalem, inſtigated Vigilantius againſt St Jerom (27). You will there find that after Vigilantius's departure from Paleſtine, he traduced St Jerom in all places. ‘ Dimiſiſti Ægyptum & cunctas provincias reliquiſti in quibus ſectam tuam libera plerique fronte defendunt, & elegiſti me ad inſectandum qui omnia contra Eccleſiam dogmata reprehendo, & publica voce condemno (28). - - - - You have left Egypt and all the other provinces where your ſect is openly embraced by moſt people; and you have choſen to perſecute me, who diſapprove and publickly condemn all ſuch doctrines as are contrary to the tenets of the church.' You will there find that this ſect of Vigilantius has no relation to the particular opinions, which he did afterwards publiſh in Gaul, but to the calumnies he diſperſed againſt St Jerom, whom he accuſed of Origeniſm, to impute to him an inconſiſtent conduct (29), and a way of proceeding very common among zealots, who condemn in their neighbour what they are themſelves guilty of. You will there beſides find that this holy Father denies that he accuſed Vigilantius of Hereſy. ‘ Unde adverſus Ruffinum, illum in ſe concitantem, ipſemet Hieronymus hæc ait *: In Vigilantii nomine quid ſomnies, neſcio. Ubi enim eum ſcripſi hæreticâ apud Alexandriam communione maculatum: Da librum, profer epiſtolam; nuſquam omnino reperies; & inferiùs; Ego in Vigilantio tibi reſpondi. Eadem enim accuſabat, quæ tu poſtea & amicus laudas, & inimicus accuſas. Nimirùm quòd ille diceret ſanctum Hieronymum Origenis errores ſectari; nam ſubdit: Scio à quo illius contra me rabies concitata ſit, novi cuniculos tuos. Hæc Sanctus Hieronymus. Agebat enim id aſtutè Ruffinus, ut eſſet qui Origenis hæreſis accuſaret Hieronymum, qui ipſum Ruffinum & alios omnes Origeniſtas ejuſdem Origenis errorum inſimularet; ipſumque talionis pœnam ſubire cogeret, ut quem in Origeniſtas ipſe gladium exacuerat, in ſua ſe præcordia convertiſſe non ignoraret (30). - - - - - Wherefore St Jerom himſelf makes this anſwer to Ruffinus, who had ſtirred up Vigilantius againſt him. As touching Vigilantius, ſays he, I do not know what you dream of. For where did I write that he was ſtained with an Heretical communion at Alexandria: Shew the book, produce the letter; you will no where find any ſuch thing; and a little after, In anſwering Vigilantius I have anſwered you. For he accuſed me of the ſame things, which you afterwards praiſed as a friend, and now blame as an enemy. This relates to his ſaying, that St Jerom followed the errors of Origen; for he ſubjoins: I know by whom his rage has been ſtirred up againſt me, I am acquainted with your undermining arts. Thus St Jerom. For Ruffinus cunningly endeavoured to get St Jerom accuſed of Origin's Hereſy, becauſe he had charged Ruffinus and all the other followers of Origen with the ſame errors. He did this by way of retaliation, and to make him ſenſible that he had turned upon himſelf the ſword which he had whetted againſt others.' I have cited (31) a paſſage in which St Jerom complains, that Vigilantius had traduced him between the Adriatic ſea and the Alps. From all which let us conclude, that it was poſſible a perſonal reſentment might enflame the zeal which he ſhewed for the truth.

[F] He immediately run ſtark-naked into a church for ſhelter.] St Jerom reproaches him with this fear, and the diſcovery of his nakedneſs to the eyes of the faithful. ‘ In hac provincia cùm ſubitus terræ motus, noctis medio omnes de ſomno excitaſſet, tu prudentiſſimus & ſapientiſſimus mortalium, nudus orabas, & reſerebas nobis Adam & Evam de paradiſo. Et illi quidem apertis oculis erubuerunt, nudos ſe eſſe cernentes, & verenda texerunt arborum foliis; tu & tunicâ, & fide nudus, ſubitoque timore perterritus, & aliquid habens nocturnæ crapulæ, ſanctorum oculis obſcœnam partem corporis ingerebas, ut tuam

‘ indicares

(c) See the laſt remark.

(d) Hieron. Epiſt. lxxv.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 557, 558.

(25) See the article THESMOPHORIA, citat. (37).

(26) See the lxivth Epiſtle of St Auguſtin. He ſays, chap. xxvii, of the viiith book, de Civitate Dei, that the wiſeſt people did not carry their ſuppers to the churches of the Martyrs. See alſo the ſecond chapter of the ſixth book of his Confeſſions, and St Ambroſe, lib. de Helia & Jejunio, cap. xvii.

(27) Baronius, ad ann 406, num. 41, ex Hieronymi Apologia II.

(28) Hieronym. Epiſt. lxxv, apud Baron. ibid, num. 42.

(29) St Jerome very much inveighed againſt the Origeniſts.

* Hieron. Apolog. 2.

(30) Baronius, ubi ſupra.

(31) In the remark [C], citation (17).

Gauls. His ſect was of no very long continuance; the irruption of the barbarous nations quaſhed it; the irruption, I mean, which the Barbarians made not long after into that country, and of which the errors of this heretic were the cauſe, if we believe the Eccleſiaſtical Annaliſt [G]. I have only two faults to charge Mr Moreri with [H].

‘ indicares prudentiam (32). - - - - In that province when an earthquake had awaked every body at midnight, you, that you might prove yourſelf to be the wiſeſt of all men, were ſeen to pray ſtark-naked, and reſembled Adam and Eve in Paradiſe. But they, when their eyes were opened, bluſhed to ſee themſelves naked, and covered their ſhame with the leaves of a tree; whereas you, ſtripped of your cloaths and faith, ſtruck with a ſudden fear, and having not quite ſlept out your debauch over night, expoſed your obſcene parts to the eyes of the faithful, that you might thereby ſhew your prudence.’ Obſerve, that he continually, as well as here, accuſes him of being a drunkard.

[G] The errors of this Heretic were the cauſe, if we believe the Eccleſiaſtical Annaliſt.] I mean Baronius. He and an hundred other famous writers have made it a common place to aſſign Hereſies as the cauſe of the heavy ſtrokes of Divine Juſtice; I mean thoſe ſtrokes which indifferently fall upon the followers of error, and the oppoſers of it: for example, the misfortunes with which Gaul was oppreſſed, gave no more quarter to the orthodox than to the diſciples of Vigilantius. All parties pleaſe themſelves with this common-place, without remembring that the Pagans made uſe of it againſt the primitive Chriſtians (33). However we ſhall cite Baronius's words: they inform us that St Jerom's books did not ſilence the followers of Vigilantius: it was neceſſary that God ſhould make uſe of other means to repreſs this Hereſy. ‘ Porrò quod poſthac ſiluerit infamis hæreſis, nec amplius ad multa ſæcula audita fuerit: haud ſcias brevem illam Hieronymi ſcriptionem eſſe veritam, ut caput tollere amplius auſa non fuerit. Non enim ea eſt natura hæreticorum, ut victi cedere ſciant, & dent manus ratione convicti: ſed proſtrati licèt, pertinaciori audaciâ ſurgant, reſtituantque acriora certamina. Sed unde accidit ut ſileret? audi: * Terribilis Deus in conſiliis ſuper filios hominum, vocavit gentes ab extremis terræ: immiſitque in Gallias, in eamque potiſſimum partem graſſari ſivit, in qua hæreſis nefanda plantata eſt: adeo ut ſub barbarico gladio magis de vita tuenda contendere, quàm de dogmatibus licuerit diſputare. Creduntur autem è barbaris illi eſſe ſublati, quorum nulla umquam fuit poſteà vox audita. Ecce tibi quod ſoleant vehere ſecum, vel poſt ſe ducere hæreſes, clades nimirùm provinciarum; quod multis exemplis ſæpe omnibus ſæculis, & hoc ipſo infeliciùs contigit demonſtrari (34). - - - - If you ask how that infamous Hereſy came to be ſuppreſſed, and not to be heard of again for many ages, know that it was not the ſhort confutation of St Jerom which frightned it from lifting up its head any more. For ſuch is the nature of Heretics, that they will not yield when they are overcome, nor ſubmit to the conviction of reaſon; but after they are thrown down, they will riſe again with greater preſumption and obſtinacy, and renew a ſharper engagement. How then came it to be ſuppreſſed? The Lord who is a great God, and a great King above all gods, called in the nations from the extremities of the earth, and ſuffered them to ravage Gaul, chieſly that part of it where this abominable Hereſy had taken root, ſo that now it was more neceſſary for them to defend their lives from the ſword of the Barbarians, than to diſpute about the articles of Faith. It is believed that they were entirely deſtroyed by the Barbarians, ſo that their voice was never heard afterwards. Theſe are the uſual attendants or conſequences of Hereſies, viz. the ruin and devaſtation of provinces. Many examples are to be found of this in all ages, but in none more than in the preſent.’ Could not Vigilantius's friends aſſert, that the Gauls were thus afflicted, becauſe they did not embrace the truths which he declared to them? What anſwer could an adverſary make to them? He would be obliged to come to this theſis? I am in the right, and you are in the wrong. But will not every one make uſe of this language? Has not one as much right as another to beg the queſtion, if ſuch a thing be once allowed? Nothing is then more frivolous than Baronius's reflexions.

[H] I have only two faults to charge Mr Moreri with.] The firſt is, that he ſaith that St Paulinus entertained Vigilantius when ſick at Barcelona. He here miſtakes the place. For St Paulinus's words as cited by Baronius are (35): ‘ Vigilantius quoque noſter in Campania, & antequam ad nos veniret, & poſtquam pervenit vi febrium laboravit, & ægritudini noſtræ qui & ipſe ſociale membrum erat, ſalativo (36) dolore compaſſus eſt. - - - - Our friend Vigilantius had a fever in Campania, both before and after his coming to me. Thus did he ſympathize with me in my ſickneſs by a ſocial affliction.’ We do not find there, that St Paulinus entertained Vigilantius: we are only informed that they were both ſick at the ſame time. I am neverthel eſs willing to believe that St Paulinus received him with great reſpect and kindneſs. His goodneſs, civility, and piety, perſuade me to it; and beſides, he had a great eſteem for Vigilantius, and had been very intimate with him at Barcelona (37). He recommended him to St Jerom; and his letter proved effectual, as appears by theſe words of the anſwer, ‘ S. Vigilantium Preſbyterum qua aviditate ſuſceperim, melius eſt ut ipſius verbis quàm meis diſcas literis (38). - - - - It is better that you ſhould be informed by his own words, than by my letter of the fondneſs with which I received the Preſbyter Vigilantius.’ St Jerom gave credit to the teſtimonial in favour of Vigilantius, contained in the letter of recommendation. But ſome time after writing againſt him, he ſaid that he repented of the credit he had given to Paulinus's teſtimonial. We ſhall cite this paſſage ſomewhat at length: ‘ Credidi ſancti preſbyteri Paulini Epiſtolis, & illius ſuper nomine tuo non putavi errare judicium. Et licet ſtatim acceptâ epiſtolâ, ἀσυναρτητον ſermonem tuum intelligerem: tamen ruſticitatem & ſimplicitatem magis in te arbitrabar, quam vecordiam. Nec reprehendo ſanctum virum: maluit enim apud me diſſimulare quod noverat, quàm portitorem clientulum ſuis litteris accuſare. Sed memetipſum arguo, qui alterius potiùs acquievi quàm meo judicio; & oculis aliud cernentibus, aliud ſchedulæ credidi, quam videbam (39). - - - - I gave credit to the letter of the holy Preſbyter Paulinus, and had no notion of his being miſtaken in the character which he gave of you. And although immediately after the receipt of his letter I perceived the confuſion and incoherency of your diſcourſe, I nevertheleſs did not ſo much impute it to the badneſs of your heart as to a clowniſh ſimplicity. Neither did I find fault with the holy man for rather chuſing to paſs by what he knew than to accuſe his client the bearer. But I am angry with myſelf for having truſted leſs to my own judgment than to that of another, and for having believed a letter rather than my own eyes.’ Moreri's ſecond fault is ſaying that Vigilantius called the miracles wrought at the tombs of the holy martyrs, illuſions. This is calumniating Vigilantius, and I admire that Baronius hath advanced ſuch a calumny, ſince he needed only to conſider the words he cites of St Jerom, to be informed that it was falſe. ‘ Idem nebulo reſpuens ſanctorum reliquias addebat illud horrendum dictu, ſigna apud eas fieri ſolita, dæmonum eſſe præſtigias (40). - - - - That villain, rejecting the reliques of the ſaints, adds this horrible expreſſion, viz. that the miracles uſually wrought by them were diabolical illuſions.’ This is Baronius's enormous accuſation levelled at this Heretic, and ſee how he proves it, ‘ Niſi forte in morem Gentilium, impiorumque Porphyrii & Eunomii has præſtigias dæmonum eſſe confingas (41). - - - - Unleſs perhaps after the example of the Heathens, and of ſuch wicked fellows as Porphyrius and Eunomius, you pretend that they were diabolical illuſions.’ It is clear that theſe words of St Jerom ſhew that Vigilantius did not call the miracles wrought at the tombs of the martyrs, diabolical deluſions. St Jerom would not have expreſſed himſelf as he did, if he had found either in the book of his adverſary, or in the letters againſt him, what Baronius imputes to this pretended Hereſiarch. He would have refuted it as a poſitive opinion of Vigilantius, and not as a ſubterfuge to which he ſuppoſed he might have recourſe. When one anticipates an objection, when one ſpeaks thus to one's adverſary, perhaps you will alledge ſuch a thing, how do I know that you will not affirm as the Heathens did, &c. it is certain that the adverſary hath ſaid no ſuch thing. Obſerve, that Baronius's calumny is to be found in many authors. Lindanus had already advanced it. I cite him to ſhew his want of judgment. ‘ Porphyrius, Eunomius, Euſtathius, Vigilantius, aliique Hagiomaſtiges ſanctorum miracula ajebant eſſe dæmonum præſtigias (42). - - - - Porphyrius, Eunomius, Euſtathius, Vigilantius, and other defamers of holy things ſaid that the miracles of the ſaints were diabolical illuſions.’ Prateolus adopts this whole paſſage (43), as doth the Jeſuit Gaulterius (44) upon the authority of Prateolus. But what more ſurprizes me is, to ſee that Mr Godeau has aſſerted this calumny (45). Mr Moreri took it from him.

---

(32) Hieron. adverſ. Vigilant. pag. m. 559.

(33) See the article VERGERIUS, remark [E].

* Pſalm. xcv.

(34) Baronius, ubi ſupra, num. 52, pag. m. 330.

(35) Paulinus, Epiſt. i. ad Severum, apud Baron. ubi ſupra, num. 40, p. 324.

(36) In ſome manuſcripts it is ſocio.

(37) Baronius, ubi ſupra.

(38) Hieronym. Epiſt. xiii, apud Baron. ibid.

(39) Idem, Epiſt. lxxv, apud eumd. Baronium, ibid. num. 41, pag. 324, 325.

(40) Baronius, ibid. num. 50, pag. 329.

(41) Hieron. adv. Vigilant. apud Baron. ib.

(42) Lindanus, in Dubitantii Dialogo II, pag. m. 207.

(43) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. m. 512.

(44) In Tabula Chronograph. pag. m. 372.

(45) Godeau, Hiſtoire de l'Egliſe, ad ann. 406.

VILLAMARINI, (ISABELLA) wife of the prince of Salerno. See the remark B in the article CAPYCIUS.

VILLAREAL (EMANUEL FERNANDES) the Plagiary author of a book, which procured him a penſion from Cardinal Richelieu, was burnt at Liſbon for Judaiſm [A]. He had been Conſul for the Portugueſe nation at Roüen; and wrote a book againſt Caramuel whilſt he was in that poſt.

[A] The Plagiary author .... was burnt .... for Judaiſm.] All theſe particulars I learn from Mr Le Laboureur: he relates them immediately after an obſervation which he had made againſt the Genealogiſts, who publiſhed, that Cardinal Richelieu was deſcended from the marriage of Guyonne de Laval with Frances du Pleſſis. He proves it a falſity, and conſequently, adds he (1), the whole book ought to be ſuppreſſed, which was written in Spaniſh by a Portugueſe named Ville-Real, afterwards burnt for Judaiſm at Liſbon; a famous Plagiary, who copied it from du Cheſne, in order to make Cardinal Richelieu deſcend by the alliance of Laval, from the Kings of Caſtile and Portugal, for which ſervice he enjoyed a good penſion. I wonder that Don Nicolas Antonio ſaith nothing concerning the tragical death of this author; he only gives the titles of the two pieces mentioned in the text of this article, and obſerves that they were written whilſt the author was Conſul for the Portugueſe merchants at Roüen (2). The firſt of theſe books is intituled, El Politico Chriſtiano, ò Diſcorſo Politico de la Vida y Acciones del Cardinal de Richelieu (3): and the other, Anti-Caramuel (4), ò Defenſa del Manifeſto del Reino de Portugal. See the Anti's of Mr Baillet (5).

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 303.

(2) Nicol. Antonius, Bibl. Scriptor. Hiſp. Tom. i, pag. 267.

(3) It was tranſlated into French and printed at Paris in 1643, in 4to. Id. ibid.

(4) It was printed at Paris, in 1643. Id. ib.

(5) In Tom. vi, in the edition of the Jugemens des Sçavans, of Baillet, in 1725, Art. cxvii. §. i, in 4to.

VILLAVICENTIUS (LAWRENCE) a Monk of the order of St Auguſtin, and preacher to Philip II, King of Spain, was born at Xerez in Andaluſia. He continued a long time in the Low-Countries, and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Louvain, before he was called to the court, in order to be preacher to the King of Spain (a). In the year 1561 he made his laſt viſit of the province of the Lower Germany, of which he was Vicar-General (b). We have already ſpoken (c) of ſome of his writings, which coſt him only the trouble of ſtriking out of the works of other authors, what did not ſavour enough of Catholiciſm. We are not certain that he had even ſuch a ſhare as this, in all the other works attributed to him. He flouriſhed until the year 1581 (d).

(a) Andr. Schottus, Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 265.

(b) Elſſius, Encomiaſtic. Auguſtin. pag. 426.

(c) In the remark [C], of the article HYPERIUS.

(d) Elſſius, ubi ſupra.

VILLEGAIGNON (NICHOLAS DURAND DE) a Knight of Malta, a native of Provins in Brie (a), ſerved a long time in the gallies, and was in ſeveral naval expeditions, ſo that having beſides ſome learning [A], he rendered himſelf conſiderable as a perſon of merit, and was promoted to the vice-admiralty of Bretagne, in the reign of Henry II (b). He quarrelled with the governor of the caſtle of Breſt, and fearing the conſequences of this difference (c), he thought of an enterprize, which frequently ſerves for an epiſode in controverſial books, and which has not been forgot by Mr Maimbourg [B]. He reſolved to eſtabliſh a colony in Braſil, and knowing that Admiral de Colligni favoured the Reformed religion, he gave him to underſtand that his deſign was to advance the kingdom of God in that country, and procure a refuge a refuge

(a) Theod. de Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. livr. ii, pag. 158.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] Having beſides ſome learning.] ‘ This is pretty rare in perſons of his condition, he was very ‘ well verſed in polite literature, as appears by the ‘ fine deſcription he wrote in Latin of the unfortunate ‘ Algerine expedition, in which he was wounded, in ‘ the ſervice of Charles V who was then at peace ‘ with France (1).’ Mr Maimbourg adds in the margin, that this deſcription is inſerted in the ſecond tome of the hiſtorical pieces which Schardius hath collected. He might have told us that it was printed by itſelf at Straſbourg in the year 1542, in 8vo (2). His treatiſe de Bello Melitenſi & ejus eventu Francis impoſito, was printed at Paris by Robert Stephens in the year 1553, in 4to. La Croix du Maine ſaith that the ſame piece was printed in French, in the ſame place and year, by Charles Stephens (3). I ſhall ſay ſomething below concerning Villegaignon's controverſial works. John de Leri tells us: That he never heard a man talk better concerning religion, and a Chriſtian Reformation than he did then (4).

[B] Which has not been forgot by Mr Maimbourg.] What he ſays of it in the ſecond book of his Hiſtory of Calviniſm, hath been followed by the Continuator of Moreri. I might then have a very particular right to examine it, but I muſt own that the Continuator hath taken nothing which I deſire to contradict. I ſhall only obſerve, 1. That in the Dutch editions they have been in the wrong to change the date of 1557 into 1558, concerning the arrival of the Genevois at the iſle of Colligni. 2. That Moreri had no reaſon to ſay that Villegaignon did not return into the Romiſh communion till after he came back into France. But to come to Mr Maimbourg: his firſt falſity is ſaying that there was alſo a diviſion betwixt the Proteſtants, and even amongſt the miniſters themſelves (5); for, adds he, ſome would have the Lord's Supper adminiſtred in the Romiſh way, as Jeſus Chriſt had inſtituted it, with unleavened bread; and others affirmed that it ought to be celebrated in the Greek manner with leavened bread. The former were for retaining the ceremonies of the Catholic church, and the other rejecting them as ſuperſtitious. He cites the eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches, and that alone confounds him; for we find there that it was only Villegaignon and a Student of Sorbonne who raiſed the diſpute. ‘ A perſon named John Contat, a Student of Sorbonne, ſecretly aſpiring after I know not ‘ what epiſcopal dignity as fantaſtical as Villegaignon's ‘ kingdom, came on the day appointed for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and aſked where the ſacerdotal habits were, and began to diſpute concerning unleavened bread, which he ſaid was neceſſary, ‘ as well as to mix water with the wine, and other ‘ ſuch like objections he raiſed. Nevertheleſs the Sa-

‘ crament

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, livr. ii, pag. 100, Dutch Edit.

(2) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 909.

(3) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 342.

(4) Jean de Leri, Hiſt. d'un Voiage fait au Breſil. ch. vi, pag. m. 58.

(5) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 103.

a refuge for the faithful who were perſecuted in France. The Admiral with his accuſtomed prudence concealed this excellent motive from Henry II, and only repreſenting this enterprize on the ſide of the advantages it might bring to his kingdom, obtained two large ſhips well equipped for Villegaignon; beſides the ſum of ten thouſand livres (d). This knight embarked on the 15th of July 1555 (e), and in the month of November following arrived at the mouth of the river Ganabara, in the 23d degree of ſouth latitude (f). He endeavoured to ſettle his colony in the Continent, but ſeveral reaſons engaged him to retire into an iſle (g), which he called Colligni in honour of the Admiral (h). He appeared extraordinary zealous for the Reformed religion (i), for moſt of thoſe who followed him were Proteſtants, and were only induced to make this voyage by the hopes which he had given them of promoting the work of God, and procuring for them that liberty of conſcience which Henry II deprived them of. He wrote to the Church of Geneva by the returning ſhips, to deſire ſome miniſters and other perſons, who might ſucceſsfully labour in the inſtruction of the ſavages (k). His letter being read, they firſt of all gave thanks to God for the amplification of Chriſt's kingdom in ſuch a diſtant country, and afterwards choſe two miniſters, Peter Richier, and William Chartier, who with ſome other perſons proper for his intentions were ſent to him (l). They departed from Geneva on the 10th of September 1556 (m), and embarked at Honfleur on the 19th of November of the ſame year (n), and landed in the iſland of Colligni on the 10th of March 1557 (o). Richier preached the ſame day, and Villegaignon heard him with marks of an extraordinary zeal (p). Some days after, the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper was celebrated, and he was obſerved to communicate very devoutly, after he had recited two long prayers, ſo fervent that no miniſter could have dictated better (q). It was ſoon perceived that all this was meer oſtentation, and that he only deſired to act the controverſiſt; for he and one Cointa who had ſtudied in the Sorbonne, fell a diſputing concerning the Real Preſence. They maintained that though Tranſubſtantiation and Conſubſtantiation were abſurd doctrines, it was nevertheleſs true, that the body of JESUS CHRIST was included in the ſigns of the Euchariſt (r). It was agreed that this diſpute ſhould be referred to the deciſion of the German and French churches, and that Chartier the miniſter ſhould be ſent into Europe to conſult them (s). Villegaignon promiſed to ſubmit to their (d) Id. ibid. pag. 159.

(e) Id. ibid. but according to Leri's relation, pag. m. 3, it was in May.

(f) Jean de Leri, Hiſtoire d'un Voiage fait au Breſil, pag. 4.

(g) Idem, in the preface.

(h) Beza, ubi ſupra. Leri, ch. vii, pag. 88.

(i) Leri, ch. i, pag. 2, & ſeq.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 4.

(l) Ibid. p. 5.

(m) Ibid. p. 7.

(n) Ibid. p. 8.

(o) Ibid. ch. vi, pag. 55.

(p) See the article RICHER.

(q) You will find them entire in Leri, pag. 60, & ſeq.

(r) Id. ibid. pag. 67.

(s) Beza, ubi ſupra, p. 160.

‘ crament was adminiſtred according to the plain ordinance of Jeſus Chriſt, and as it is adminiſtred in the Reformed Churches of France: but the difference ſtill increaſed, and came to ſuch a pitch that as Richer was baptizing a child and condemning what ſupperſtition has added to the primitive inſtitution. Villegaignon openly gave the lye to the miniſter, proteſting that he would come no more to his ſermons, nor adhere to the Calviniſtical ſect, as he called it (6).’ The ſecond falſity is ſaying that the miniſter Richer aſſerted againſt the Calviniſts, that Jeſus Chriſt ought not to be either adored or prayed to, and that the Lord's Supper or Euchariſt, in what manner ſoever we there receive the body of Jeſus Chriſt, doth not at all conduce to the good of the communicants (7). I have elſewhere (8) mentioned the particular opinions imputed to this miniſter. It is eaſy to perceive that he only taught that Jeſus Chriſt's humanity, being a creature, ought neither to be adored nor prayed to; but this doth not ſignify that Jeſus Chriſt, both GOD and man, ought not to be adored, and prayed to (9). If Peter Richer had embraced the opinions which Mr Maimbourg charges on him, Calvin would have cauſed him to be ignominiouſly depoſed: nay I know not but that he would have been forced to undergo a more rigorous puniſhment; for he would have been looked upon as a wretched Anti-Trinitarian; but we know he was reſpected as a worthy miniſter of the goſpel after his return from Braſil (10). Obſerve that the Jeſuit Gaulterius doth not charge him with this monſtrous opinion concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper which Maimbourg ſpeaks of. The third falſity is his ſaying that continuing to preach his blaſphemies Villegaignon gave him the lie (11). The author whom he cites, ſaith expreſsly (12) that the lie which was given, only regarded the miniſter's condemnation of thoſe ſuperſtitions which the Papiſts have added to baptiſm (13).

The miniſter who anſwered Maimbourg, ſhould have cenſured this part of his Hiſtory of Calviniſm in the above manner; but inſtead of doing ſo, he hath amuſed himſelf with obſerving (14), 1. That Admiral de Colligni pitched upon Villegaignon in order to ſend him to prepare a retreat in America for the Proteſtants. 2. That Villegaignon promiſed to grant them liberty of conſcience. 3. That after having kept his word for ſome time, he hanged, drowned, and threw into the ſea all thoſe who would not follow his Apoſtacy. 4. That he confined the reſt to a moving priſon, which was an old rotten ſhip, without proviſions and arms, to which he ſent as many of the Reformed as he could ſtow there. The firſt of theſe four things is contradicted by Beza, and John de Leri, who aſſure us that Villegaignon was the firſt that made this overture to the Admiral. They alſo affirm that he promiſed to endeavour, to the utmoſt of his power, the advancement of the kingdom of GOD in that country, and that he publickly declared himſelf a good Proteſtant. This confutes the ſecond particular, which ſuppoſes Villegaignon to be a Catholic who promiſes to tolerate the Proteſtants. The third is a lie, which as juſtly at leaſt deſerves to be condemned as thoſe of Maimbourg; for it appears by John de Leri's relation, 1. That Villegaignon puniſhed with death only three Proteſtants, who returned into his iſland after the departure of the Genevois (15). 2. That he either durſt not or could not hinder the miniſters from preaching (16), nor uſe any authority with reſpect to the Genevois (17). 3. That if he was cruel or barbarous, it was either towards the ſavages or his domeſtics, or thoſe who violated his laws; religion had no hand in this (18). The fourth is no leſs falſe than the foregoing, ſince John de Leri owns (19), that he and the others who returned into France in this old ſhip, treated with the maſter thereof (20) for the expences of their paſſage, without Villegaignon's interpoſing in the leaſt, and that when they were out of his iſland and juriſdiction. Compare with this the remark [D] towards the end. Beſides, this adverſary of Maimbourg hath ill gloſſed this paſſage: he eaſily rid himſelf of all the Proteſtants, who would not follow his example. This is plainly enough to confeſs, ſaith he, that he was their cruel executioner. But we ſhall ſee hereafter (21) that John de Leri acknowledges, that during the time the Genevois ſtaid in the iſle of Colligni, no Frenchman was put to death, and that after their departure, Villegaignon cauſed only three Proteſtants to be put to death (22). Theſe were part of thoſe five, who after they had embarked with Richer, John de Leri, &c. choſe rather to return to Braſil than continue their voyage. But ſince Villegaignon ſpared the lives of the two others, it ſeems probable either that theſe three did not ſuffer death barely for their religion, or that the remaining two apoſtatized, which no author that I know of has mentioned. Let no body ſay that I ſet up for a defender of Villegaignon;

(6) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. livr. ii, pag. 160.

(7) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

(8) In the remark [C], of the article RICHER.

(9) See the paſſage I have quoted from Mr Saurin, in the remark [C], of the article RICHER.

(10) See the remark [A], of his article.

(11) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 104.

(12) Beza, ubi ſupra.

(13) That is, their mixing ſalt and oil with water. See John de Leri, ubi ſupra, pag. 73.

(14) Jurieu, Apolog. pour la Reformat. Tom, i, pag. 552.

(15) See the remark [E].

(16) Leri, ubi ſupra, pag. 82.

(17) See the remark [D].

(18) Leri, ibid. pag. 77, & ſeq. item pag. 85.

(19) Id. ibid. ch. vi, pag. 84, & ch. xxi, pag. 339.

(20) He was not a native of Bretagne, as Beza ſays, ubi ſupra, pag. 160, he was born at Havre de Grace.

(21) In the remark [H], at the end.

(22) See the remark [E].

their deciſion, and particularly to the opinion of John Calvin, for whom he pretended a great reſpect (t) [C]. He contrived new cavils, when the adminiſtration of the ſacrament came on the ſecond time, and at the expiration of ſome days, publickly declared that he had changed his opinion (u), and without expecting the anſwer which he had ſent Chartier the miniſter to France in queſt of, he declared that Calvin was a wicked heretic (x). From that time they gave the ſacrament by night unknown to him, and ſome told him that they would no longer depend on him (y). They were thoſe who had agreed at Geneva to follow the two miniſters. He was not ſtrong enough to force them to obey his orders, and therefore contented himſelf with commanding them to leave his iſland. They could with impunity have diſobeyed him, but they thought it more proper to return [D]. And accordingly they embarked on the 4th of January 1558 (z), and arrived at Port Blavet on the 26th of May following (aa). The horrible miſery and ſcarcity of proviſions which they underwent during this voyage is deſcribed by John de Leri, who, being one of them, publiſhed a relation of it. Villegaignon, who as ſome writers ſay, was the cauſe of this famine, was guilty of a much more villanous deſign againſt them, which they happily eſcaped [E]. He himſelf ſome time after returned into France, without providing for the defence of his fort Colligni (bb), which the Portugueze ſeized, and tranſported gnon; have not I related whatever John de Leri hath ſaid againſt him? But the laws of Hiſtory will by no means ſuffer me to be ſilent concerning falſities publiſhed againſt any perſon whatſoever.

For the reſt, if the ſubject were not too ſerious and melancholy, could one read without laughing, that a man cauſed ALL thoſe to be put to death who would not follow the example of his apoſtacy, and put the reſt on board of a veſſel? Who ſays all, excepts no body. To make ſenſe of theſe words, the reſt ſhould have followed his Apoſtacy, than which nothing is more falſe; as the ſequel of this author's diſcourſe ſufficiently proves. Hence we may conclude that this author wrote with a great deal of precipitation, and for the moſt part without knowing what he ſaid.

[C] Particularly to the opinion of John Calvin, for whom he pretended a great reſpect.] Calvin wrote a letter to him by the two miniſters who were ſent to him. Villegaignon anſwered him in Latin, and not only informed him at large of his condition in general, but particularly making uſe of Brazil ink he wrote to him with his own hand what follows. 'I add the advice which you have given me by your letters, uſing my utmoſt endeavours not to depart from it in the leaſt. For indeed I am fully perſuaded, that no way can be more holy, juſt, and perfect. Wherefore we have cauſed your letters to be read in the aſſembly of our council, and after that to be regiſtred, in order that if we ſhould ever turn out of the right way, we may be reclaimed by the reading of them (23).' John de Leri adds: Nicolas Carmeau who was the bearer of theſe letters ..... taking his leave of us told me, that Villegaignon had commanded him to ſay by word of mouth to Calvin, that he begged of him to believe that to perpetuate the memory of the advice he had given him, he would cauſe it to be engraven on copper (24). 'I have frequently heard him, ſays John de Leri (25), repeat theſe words: Mr Calvin is one of the moſt learned men ſince the time of the Apoſtles; nor have I read any Doctor, who, in my opinion, hath more purely explained the holy ſcripture.' Theodore Beza obſerves that Villegaignon cauſed thoſe letters which came from Geneva to be regiſtred in the rolls of his imaginary kingdom (26). He is miſtaken in the date of Villegaignon's anſwer, which he fixes on the laſt of February 1557, inſtead of the laſt of March (27); and ſince he had juſt told us, that the Genevois arrived on the 7th of March 1557, it was eaſy for him to ſee that the anſwer to the letters which they brought with them could not be dated on the laſt of February 1557. I only obſerve this in order to give a ſpecimen of the errors into which the greateſt authors and the beſt correctors ſometimes fall by reaſon of the many things they have to diſtract their attention. Thoſe of the lower rank are not ſo ſubject to them; nevertheleſs I am very much afraid that ſome ſuch will be found in this Dictionary.

[D] They could with impunity have diſobeyed him but they thought it more proper to return.] The Genevois having ſignified to him that ſince he rejected the goſpel, they were not willing to continue any longer in his ſervice, he cauſed the two goblets of meal of roots, which was daily diſtributed to them, to be withheld (28). They were very glad of this refuſal, becauſe it entirely rid them of any ſubjection to him. If he had been ſtrongeſt, and if part of his people, and even ſome of the chief, had not taken their part, he would have endeavoured without doubt to ſubdue them by force. He deſigned one day to put John de Leri and another in irons, under pretence that, notwithſtanding his order, they went out of the iſland without his leave. He pretended to be ignorant that his lieutenant had granted them liberty to make this voyage. They plainly declared that they would not ſuffer it, after which he grew milder (29). The chief of their reaſons was that they had intimated to him, that ſince he had broken his promiſe of maintaining the exerciſe of the Evangelical religion, they would no longer depend on him. ..... The chief of his people being of our religion, ſaith John de Leri (30), and conſequently diſſatiſfied with him on account of his Apoſtacy; if we had not been apprehenſive that the Admiral, who under the King's authority (as I ſaid in the beginning) had ſent him, and was as yet ignorant of his carriage, might have taken it ill, ſome of us would very fain have thrown him into the ſea, that his fleſh and brawny ſhoulders might have ſerved as food for the fiſhes. About the end of October, he told them that he would no longer bear with them, and commanded them to depart his iſland (31). It is indeed true, adds John de Leri (32), That if we had pleaſed we were able to have driven him out himſelf. But as well to deprive him of any juſt reaſon of complaint againſt us, as becauſe France and other nations, knowing that we came hither only to enjoy the free uſe of the goſpel, we would not caſt any ſcandal upon it, we choſe rather to obey Villegaignon, and depart without any farther conteſt.

From all this we may conclude, that a certain author whom I have already cenſured, was not very well informed, when he tells us that Villegaignon ſhut them up in a floating priſon, and that they preferred embarking in a ſorry veſſel on the moſt treacherous of the four elements, to ſtaying any longer expoſed to the fury of this mercileſs tyger, who was more faithleſs than the ſea (33).

[E] Villegaignon, who as ſome writers ſay, was the cauſe of this famine, was guilty of a much more villanous deſign againſt them which they happily eſcaped.] Theodore Beza aſſures us that he ſo managed it, that the maſter of the veſſel had not one fourth part of the proviſions neceſſary for his voyage, hoping by this means that they would die of want and hunger, before they arrived in France (34). Mr Jurieu affirms the ſame thing (35): but John de Leri ſays nothing of it; he was however as well acquainted with this affair as any perſon, and much better than any other not concerned in it, and he was not likely to ſpare Villegaignon. As for the other perfidiouſneſs, let us ſee how he relates it: 'Villegaignon not only ſent us our licence to depart, ſigned by himſelf; but alſo wrote to the maſter of the ſhip, to let him know that he ſhould make no difficulty of carrying us on his account: For, ſaid he, (fraudulently) as I was very glad of their arrival, hoping to have met with what I aimed at; in like manner ſince we cannot agree together, I am content that they return. So that under this fair pretext he had contrived a moſt villanous piece of treachery; for having given the maſter of the veſſel a little cheſt, covered with an oil-cloth in the ſea faſhion, and filled with letters to ſeveral perſons, tranſported the artillery to Liſbon. At his return he engaged in a vehement paper war againſt the Proteſtants. They on the other ſide wrote againſt him in ſuch a manner as did not much turn to his advantage [F]. He died in the month of December 1571 (cc), in a Malteſe Commandory, called Beauvais, and ſituated in the province of Gaſtinois, near St John de Nemours, and managed his own affairs ſo ill, as well during his ſickneſs as before, and had ſo little affection for his relations, that they reaped no advantage from his eſtate, neither in his life nor after his death (dd). Some of his adverſaries have owned that he did not defile himſelf with any of the female ſavages of America [G]: an elogy which ſeveral other governors in the like ſituation have no pretence to. I ſhall obſerve ſome faults in Thevet [H]. The

---

(t) Leri, ubi ſupra, pag. 68.

(u) Id. ibid. pag. 73.

(x) Id. ibid. pag. 76.

(y) Ibid. pag. 82.

(z) Beza, ubi ſupra, ch. xxi, pag. 341.

(aa) Ibid. ch. xxii, pag. 373.

(bb) Taffin, Etat de l'Egliſe, pag. m. 580, ad ann. 1558.

(23) Leri, ubi ſupra, ch. vi, pag. 68.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 69.

(25) Id. ib. pag. 68.

(26) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 159.

(27) Leri, ubi ſupra, p. 69.

(28) Ibid. p. 80.

(29) Ibid. pag. 81.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 82.

(31) Ib. p. 83.

(32) Ib. p. 84.

(33) Jurieu, ubi ſupra, p. 555.

(34) Beza, ubi ſupra, p. 160.

(35) Jurieu, ubi ſupra.

‘ perſons, he had amongſt them put in a formal proceſs or accuſation againſt us, and without our knowledge, recommended to the firſt Judge to whoſe hands it ſhould come in France, with direction to ſtop and burn us as Heretics, which he ſaid we were (36).’ The Divine providence turned this infamous treachery to the advantage of thoſe good men: for their leader being acquainted with ſeveral of the Juſticiary officers of Bretagne, who were favourably inclined to the religion which we profeſſed, gave them the cheſt which contained the letters and accuſation, who after they ſaw the contents of it were ſo far from treating us according to Villegaignon's deſire, that, on the contrary, they entertained us as well as they poſſibly could, and kindly offered to ſupply the wants of thoſe of our company who were neceſſitous, and lent money to our conductor, and ſeveral others (37). Here I ought to take notice of the three Proteſtant martyrs whom Villegaignon put to death. Five of the Genevois after the firſt danger of ſhipwreck choſe rather to return to Braſil in a bark which was given them, than to ſtay in the veſſel. With a great deal of difficulty they regained the coaſt of America, and Villegaignon cauſed three of them to be drowned on account of their religion (38). Some very credible eye-witneſſes of this fact, put in writing the confeſſion of theſe ſufferers, and the whole proceedings of Villegaignon (39). That piece was ſent by John de Leri the ſame year 1558, to John Creſpin a Printer, who inſerted it in his fifth book of Martyrs (40).

[F] He engaged . . . . . in a paper war . . . . againſt the Proteſtants. They on the other ſide wrote againſt him in ſuch a manner as did not much turn to his advantage.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas gives me the following catalogue: An anſwer to the Remonſtrances made to the Queen-mother, printed at Paris in the year 1561, in 4to. The controverted propoſitions betwixt the Chevalier de Villegaignon, and John Calvin, concerning the truth of the holy Euchariſt, Paris 1562, in 4to. The Chevalier de Villegaignon's anſwer to John Calvin's reſolution concerning the Sacraments, Paris 1562. An anſwer to the libels and calumnies publiſhed againſt him: at Paris, and afterwards at Lyons in the year 1561. De Cœnæ controverſiæ Phil. Melanchth. judicio: at Paris 1561 in 4to. Liber ad articulos Calvinianos: at Venice 1565. De conſecratione myſtici Sacramenti, & duplici Chriſti oblatione adverſus Vannium Lutherologiæ Profeſſorem: de Judaici Paſchatis implemento adverſus Calvinologos: de poculo ſanguinis Chriſti, & introitu in ſancta ſanctorum adverſus Bezam: at Paris 1569 (41). His adverſaries of the oppoſite religion, continues du Verdier, wrote defamatory libels againſt him, of which were La Suffiſance de Maiſtre Colas Durand. Alſo Eſpouſſette de ſes armoiries, and ſeveral others. See the article RICHER.

I have ſeen only three of his books, viz. Ad Articulos Calvinianæ, de Sacramento Euchariſtiæ, traditionis ab ejus miniſtris in Francia Antarctica evulgatæ Reſponſiones, per Nicolaum Villagagnonem Equitem Rhodium, ad Eccleſiam Chriſtianam: printed at Paris, by Andrew Wechel, 1560, in 4to. De cœnæ controverſiæ Philippi Melanchtonis judicio: printed at Paris, by the ſame Wechel, 1561, in 4to. The Chevalier de Villegaignon's Paraphraſe on Mr Calvin's Reſolution concerning the Sacraments: printed at Paris, by Wechel, in 1561, in 4to. All theſe three books are extraordinarily well printed.

[G] His adverſaries have owned, that he did not defile himſelf with any of the female ſavages.] ‘(42) Not to conceal any more what redounds to his praiſe than what tends to his diſcredit, I ſhall, by the way, inform you, that certain Normans, who eſcaped ſhipwreck, long before he came into that country, living very impiouſly, and committing all manner of leudneſs with the female ſavages, (by whom I knew ſome that had children four or five years old) in order to ſuppreſs this abuſe and prevent it for the future, among thoſe who lived in our iſland and fort, Villegaignon, with advice of his council, made a law, that no profeſſed Chriſtian ſhould co-habit with the female ſavages on pain of death. But if any of them were converted and baptized, the marrying of them was hereby freely permitted. . . . . (43). As this law was doubly founded on the word of GOD, it was alſo ſo well obſerved, that Villegaignon's people and ours religiouſly and ſtrictly abſtained from any ſuch pollution; and tho' ſince my return I heard that he was guilty of a leudneſs of that nature, I bear him witneſs that he was not ſuſpected to be ſo whilſt I was there. And further, he ſo ſtrictly obſerved this ordinance, that it was not without the moſt preſſing inſtances of ſeveral of his chief favourites, that he ſo far mitigated the puniſhment of an interpreter, who had committed this crime with a female ſavage whom he had formerly debauched, as only to puniſh him with the chain, and condemn him to ſlavery; for Villegaignon would have had him hanged. And, as far as I know of him, he was very ſtrict in this particular, as well with regard to himſelf as others, and was really to be recommended for it.’ I have cited this long paſſage to have an occaſion of making two remarks. The firſt is, that we ought to be very cautious how we give credit to ill reports of men. How many are there who believe what hath been ſaid of Villegaignon's impurities, and nevertheleſs he is acquitted of them by the evidence of a perſon, who, very far from ſparing him, would have been fond of uttering all the diſadvantageous truths againſt him. My ſecond obſervation is, that there is no paſſion more incorrigible or brutal than that of uncleanneſs. All Chriſtians know that the law of GOD forbids their commerce with infidel women: and they are educated in principles which inſpire horror at the thoughts of ſuch a commerce. Human laws, which puniſh this crime, fortify the impreſſions of education. And yet to what degrees of impurity hath the laſciviouſneſs of the Chriſtians, who diſcovered the new world, tranſported them? Could the ſhocking deformity and barbarity of the ſavages, reſtrain men from this crime, prohibited, as it alſo is, by divine and human laws? Let us go no farther than John de Leri's relation. Are we not there informed that ſome Normans eſcaping a ſhipwreck, gave themſelves over to this vice, and obliged Villegaignon to make a law in order to puniſh this crime with death, which, nevertheleſs, was not ſufficient to curb the luſt of an interpreter. If we conſult other relations we ſhall find the ſame puniſhment was requiſite to hinder men from defiling themſelves with certain amphibious animals, which in ſome ſort reſemble women. A horrible depravation, an incorrigible paſſion, which hurries men on to the commiſſion of the ſin againſt nature, and beſtiality (44); and, perhaps, to a laſcivious commerce with dead bodies. Herodotus informs us (45), that after it was diſcovered in Egypt, that one of the embalmers of dead bodies, had defiled himſelf with a woman a little while after her death; they kept the corpſes of beautiful women three or four days before they truſted them in the hands of thoſe men. Τοῦτο δὲ ποιεῦσι οὕτω τοῦδε εἵνεκα, ἵνα μή σφι οἱ ταριχευταὶ μισγωνται τῇσι γυναιξί. λαμφθῆναι γάρ τινα φασὶ μισγόμενον νεκρῷ προσφάτῳ γυναικὸς κατεῖπαι δὲ τὸν ὁμότεχνον. Ea de cauſſa facientes, ne cum feminis iſti ſalinarii concumbant. Deprehenſum enim quemdam aiunt coëuntem cum recenti cadavere muliebri, delatumque ab ejuſdem artificii ſocio (46).

[H] I ſhall obſerve ſome faults in Thevet.] Let us firſt of all lay down this foundation. In the year

(cc) Saint Romuald Journal Chronol. Tom. i, pag. 442.

(dd) Leri, ubi ſupra, pag. penult.

(36) Leri, chap. xxi, pag. 340.

(37) Idem, ch. xxii, pag. 377.

(38) Idem, chap. xxi, pag. 346.

(39) Idem, chap. xxii, pag. 379.

(40) Ibid. pag. 380. See alſo Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 161.

(41) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 909.

(42) Jean de Leri, ch. vi, p. 71.

(43) Ibid. pag. 72.

(44) See the advice given by Æſop, in Phædrus, Fab. xlii, pag. m. 49.

(45) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. lxxxix.

(46) Id. ibid.

The addition which I have to make to this article is curious, as it concerns two exploits of Villegaignon in the year 1560, the one in war, and the other in controverſy, both which did him little honour [I]. I likewiſe add that a writer who deſpiſed him promiſed a thing, which, as far as I can learn, he has not performed [K]. It was to publiſh very ſoon memoirs of the life of Villegaignon, and of his principal relations (ee).

(ee) La Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, pag. 451.

1558, a book was printed, intituled, des Singularitez de l'Amerique, digeſted into order by Mr de la Porte, according to the Memoirs of Brother Andrew Thevet. He ſays there (47), that Thevet arrived at Cape de Frie on the 10th of November 1555, and four days after at the river of Ganabara, from whence he departed on the 31ſt of January following, in order to go for France. From which it follows that he tells an untruth, when he avers in the XXIſt book of his Coſmography, printed in 1575 (48), that the factiouſneſs of four miniſters of the new religion, the chief of which was called Richier, raiſed a ſedition, which brought ſome of the mutineers to capital puniſhment, that the reſt, and namely Richier, eſcaped, and that the ſavages, irritated by this tragedy, deſigned to put the remainder to death. He reckons himſelf amongſt thoſe who were in this danger: We narrowly eſcaped their revenging it on us, ſaith he. He tells, in another place (49), that he quitted the enterprize of converting the ſavages, as well becauſe he was not well verſed in their language, as on account that the Calviniſt miniſters undertook this charge, envying my deſign, ſays he. Theſe two paſſages ſhew that he pretends to have been there whilſt the Geneva miniſters were there. But it is a notorious falſity. For they did not arrive there till March 1557, and he left that place on the 31ſt of January 1556. He himſelf refutes thoſe who would have us believe that he made a ſecond voyage. Obſerve his own words: I very much wonder what excited Calvin to tax me in his Apology, printed at Geneva, with being one of the principal abetters of the death of thoſe ſaid miniſters whom the Sieur de Villegaignon cauſed to be thrown into the ſea, ſince that was done three years or thereabouts after my return into France, as appears by my book of the Rarities, &c. which is a ſufficient evidence in point of time, beſides ſeveral other of my writings. He confeſſes therefore that from the 31ſt of January 1556, to the time that Villegaignon cauſed ſome Heretics to be drowned, he was abſent from that country. Conſequently he was not there, during the ſtay of the Genevois, which was from March 1557, till towards the end of the year. His own words diſcover therefore that he was, and was not there. Not to take notice of his other falſities, it is not true that thoſe whom Villegaignon cauſed to be drowned were miniſters, nor that there were above two miniſters ſent from Geneva, or any other place. I ſhall only obſerve, the better to convict him of his impoſtures, that the ſedition he ſpeaks of preceded the arrival of Peter Richier, and that no miniſter before Richier had ſeen Villegaignon in his iſle of Colligni. The proof of all which is drawn from the letter which the ſaid Villegaignon wrote to Calvin on the 31ſt of March 1557: in which he declares (50) that Richier and his brethren found him reduced to that extremity, that he was obliged alternatively to perform the offices of magiſtrate and miniſter, which, adds he, put me in great anguiſh; for the example of King Uzziah was ſufficient to deter me from this practice. He there relates the conſpiracy formed againſt him, and how the authors of it were diſcovered and puniſhed.

(47) See John de Leri's Preface: he quotes the 1ſt, 24th, 25th, and 60th chapters of thoſe Singularitez.

(48) Thevet, Coſmographie Univerſelle, livr. xxi, fol. 909.

(49) Id. ibid. ch. viii, fol. 925.

(50) Villegaignon's letter to Calvin, apud John de Leri, in Præfat.

John de Leri (51) preſſed thoſe arguments againſt Thevet, and maintaintained that while the miniſters and their companions of Geneva continued at Colligni, there was neither any ſedition, nor conſpiracy, nor any Frenchman killed there. To confound times is a great fault, but to make uſe of theſe confuſions to calumniate the innocent is yet a much greater. Both which Thevet is guilty of.

(51) Leri in his preface.

[I] Two exploits in the year 1560 . . . . both which did him little honour.] I ſhall borrow this narrative from a Proteſtant Hiſtorian, who ſpeaking of the perſecutions exerciſed by the Houſe of Guiſe againſt the Proteſtants in the reign of Francis II, has the following words: 'Villegaignon . . . . believing that he 'had found a proper opportunity to be revenged on 'thoſe who had publiſhed an account of his cruelties 'committed in America under the reign of Henry, 'trumped up in the middle of this tumult, whilſt he 'accompanied the Grand Prior, brother to the aforeſaid Meſſieurs de Guiſe (52), a fantaſtical naval war, 'as if the matter had been to reſiſt a great and powerful army, and by ſuch means to render the river 'Loire of ſo little uſe, that the water thereof ſhould 'not even be ſufficient for drink to the enemy's horſes. 'This work, begun at a great expence, was found 'ſo ridiculous that it redounded wholly to their ſhame 'and confuſion. Villegaignon ſeeing how the matter 'was, that he might not continue idle, undertook a 'journey to Tours, to diſpute with Simon Broſſier, 'the Miniſter of Loudun, who had formerly been his 'ſchool-fellow, and was then a priſoner in the hands 'of the Archbiſhop of the family of Breſay, another 'apoſtate. To this purpoſe he had letters from the 'King and Cardinal: but he executed this ſcheme as 'ill as the former; ſo that not being able to explain 'his arguments by word of mouth, he reduced them 'into writing, particularly the diſpute upon the Lord's 'Supper. Broſſier anſwered him in ſuch a manner as 'gave full ſatisfaction to the learned. Among other 'things, he remonſtrated to him that he did not argue 'like a Sorbonniſt, much leſs like a Divine, but reſembled more the Academics, and ſuch people, who 'having no knowledge of GOD, diſpute about things 'unknown to men. That if he had a mind to follow 'the true method of diſputing by the Scriptures, (as 'all the antient Divines had done, and even ſeveral 'Heretics, however preſumptuous they were) he was 'ready to give him ſatisfaction, and yet that he might 'not go away without an anſwer, he confuted his 'whole doctrine by arguments taken from Scripture. 'Laſt of all, he prayed him to correct that vice in 'writing of which he was guilty, viz. of becoming 'perplexed and obſcure, that he might not ſeem to be 'at a nonplus, when he could alledge no ſolid reaſon 'for his opinion (53).'

(52) That is to ſay the Duke of Guiſe, and the Cardinal of Lorraine.

(53) La Planche, Hiſtoire de François II, pag. 229, 230.

[K] A writer, who deſpiſed him, promiſed a thing, which, as far I can learn, he has not performed.] His words are as follows: 'Nicolas Durand, born in Provence, and ſirnamed Villegangnon, was more famous 'by the writings of the Proteſtants than for any 'thing elſe. They writ ſeveral pieces, wherein they 'bitterly inveighed againſt him for the wrong he 'had done them in that part of America called Brazil. 'He has left ſome books which diſcover him to be a 'bad Divine, and a poor warrior; notwithſtanding 'he aſſumed the name of Knight of Malta. He writ 'a book on the expedition of the Emperor Charles V 'againſt Algier in Africa; and in another, which he 'dedicates to the ſame Prince, he vindicates the French 'from what was laid to their charge concerning the 'event of the Malteſe war. I ſhall ſhortly publiſh 'ſome Memoirs which I have of his life and of his 'principal relations (54).' La Popelinere, from whom I take this paſſage, is in the wrong to call him a native of Provence. The cauſe of this error might very well be, that ſome author having not regularly formed the letters of the word Provins, the Compoſitor to the preſs put down Provens, and the Corrector changed it into Provence. La Popliniere having juſt read that Villegaignon was of Provence, did thereupon ſtile him a native of that country.

(54) La Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, livr. viii, pag. 450, 451.

VILLENA, a Marquiſate on the confines of New Caſtile [A], and of the kingdoms of Murcia and Valencia, did belong to Don John Emanuel, the moſt potent lord

in

[A] Villena, a Marquiſate on the confines of New Caſtile.] Mr Baudrand ſaith that Villena, the chief place of the territory of that name, caput agri cognominis, is in the kingdom of Murcia (1): but having juſt now conſulted a map of Sanſon, printed in 1663, I there find Villena placed in New Caſtile. Mr du Puy,

in

(1) Baudr. Geograph. Tom. ii, pag. 383.

in Spain, next to the king (a) in the XIVth century. He had a daughter, who, in the year 1350, married Don Henry Count de Tranſtamara, natural ſon of Don Alfonſo XI, King of Caſtile (b). The Count becoming King of Caſtile by the depoſition of Don Pedro the Cruel, in the year 1366 (c), gave the Marquiſate of Villena to Don Alfonſo of Arragon, Count of Denia, and couſin to the King of Arragon (d). This new Marquis of Villena grew very great. King John I, being deſirous to make a Conſtable in his kingdom of Caſtile, as there was one in France, and another in Arragon, created that dignity in the year 1382, and conferred it on this Marquis (e). And by his laſt will, in caſe he ſhould die during the minority of his ſon, the government of the young King and of the kingdom, was intruſted to this Conſtable in conjunction with ſome other lords (f). He died in the year 1390, and his ſon Don Henry III, being ſcarce eleven years of age (g), guardians were to be choſen for him, and a council was requiſite to be appointed in order to govern the realm. Several difficulties aroſe from the King's will, on account of which it was not obſerved; nevertheleſs our Marquis of Villena was one of thoſe to whom the regency was intruſted (h). He was then in Arragon (i), and becauſe he adhered to the malecontents, and demanded the execution of the deceaſed King's teſtament, he was deprived of the office of Conſtable of Caſtile (k). He aſked it again of King Henry III, at Illeſca, in the year 1393, the firſt time he had the honour to congratulate him (l); and was promiſed it, provided he would accompany the King to Caſtile; but excuſing himſelf from this, he never recovered that dignity (m), but received alſo other ill treatments [B]. He was created Duke of Gandia by the King of Arragon in the year 1399 (n), and had two ſons (o), who married two aunts (p) of Don Henry III, King of Caſtile. One of the ſons was the father of a Marquis of VILLENA, who was a lover of learning, and paſſed for an egregious Magician [C]. This Marquiſate in the year 1445, was given to John Pacheco the favourite of Prince Henry, ſon of John II, King of Caſtile (q). The ſon of this Pacheco having endeavoured to make the kingdom of Caſtile devolve on the Portugueze by the marriage of the King of Portugal with the pretended daughter of King Henry IV, thereby expoſed himſelf to great

(a) Mayerne Turquet, Hiſt. d'Eſpagne, livr. xv, pag. 647.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 691.

(d) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. xvii, cap. vii, pag. m. 109.

(e) Idem, lib. xviii, cap. v, pag. 143.

(f) Mayerne Turquet, livr. xvii, pag. 765.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 764.

(h) Id. ibid. pag. 766.

(i) Mariana, ubi ſupra, lib. xviii, cap. xv, pag. 165.

(k) Mayerne Turquet, ubi ſupra, pag. 770.

(l) Id. ibid. pag. 785, 786.

(m) Mariana, lib. xix, cap. iv, pag. 180.

(n) Ibid. cap. ix, pag. 190. Note, that perhaps this paſſage of Mariana ought to be underſtood of the ſon, and not of the father.

(o) Idem, cap. viii, pag. 188.

(p) They were two natural daughters of Don Henry II.

(q) Mariana, lib. xxii, cap. iv, p. 294.

---

in his Hiſtory of the Favourites relates, that in the reign of John II, King of Caſtile, and while Alvaro de Luna was in great favour, the Prince Don Henry of Arragon, in the year 1420, married the Infanta Catherine ſiſter to that king, on whom was beſtowed the Marquiſate of Villena, which was erected into a Dutchy (2). I believe this erection became null, becauſe I find in the ſame Mr du Puy that Pacheco, the favourite of Don Henry, ſon of John the ſecond, was made Marquis of Villena about the year 1445 (3). Mariana, and other Hiſtorians, do not give this Pacheco, or his ſon, any other title than that of Marquis of Villena.

[B] He received alſo other ill treatments.] I ſhall ſet down the words of Mayerne Turquet. 'The Marquis 'having cleared himſelf to the king of whatſoever was 'alledged againſt him, and advanced ſeveral excuſes 'why he did not come to court, requeſted the reſtau'ration of his office of Conſtable of Caſtile, of which 'he had been deprived by his Majeſty's guardians, in 'order to make room for D. Pedro, Count of Tran'ſtamara, in prejudice of his honour and dignity: to 'which the King made a tender and gracious anſwer, aſ'ſuring him that he would take all juſt and equitable care 'of his affairs: after which he deſired him to go with 'him into Old Caſtile, from which the Marquis excuſed 'himſelf, alledging that he was not come thither with 'a proper equipage to ſerve his Majeſty as he deſired, 'but, if he pleaſed to enable him, he would very wil'lingly ſerve him. He then returned to his ſeat ſomewhat 'diſguſted at King Henry, who took no care of the 'reſtauration of his office of Conſtable of Caſtile, but 'ſome time afterwards, by advice of the Archbiſhop 'of Toledo, deprived him of the title of Marquis of 'Villena, by reaſon it ſeemed unſafe and diſadvan'tageous to the ſtate of Caſtile, that a Marquiſate bor'dering on a foreign realm, ſhould remain in the 'hands of a gentleman who was ſo engaged, and 'nearly allied to the king and kingdom of Arragon 'as the Marquis D. Alfonſo was (4).'

[C] He had two ſons who married . . . . one of them was . . . . father of the Marquis of VILLENA an egregious Magician.] One of the two ſons of the Marquis of Villena was called Alfonſo, and the other Peter. Their wives portions were paid to the Engliſh to ranſom their father, and in order to releaſe Alfonſo who was hoſtage on that account. This Alfonſo cauſed himſelf to be divorced, not being able to ſuffer the public leudneſs of his wife (5). His brother Peter was killed in a battle. The king, Don Henry, taking the wives of theſe brothers under his protection, and reſenting their refuſal of reſtoring their portions, ſeized all their lands except the caſtles of Villena and Almanſa, which being fortified both by their ſituation and an Arragoneſe garriſon, held out againſt him (6). Peter of Arragon, the Marquis of Villena's ſon, left a ſon known by the name of Henry de VILLENA, who applied himſelf much to learning, and wrote ſome very learned books, tho' in an unpoliſhed ſtile: Petrus ad Aliubarrotam ceciderat, ejus Henrici pater, cui à Villena cognomentum fuit, eruditionis tantum ſtudium, ut magica etiam ſacra, carminaque caluiſſe fama ſit. Extant ingenii monimenta: In quibus multa reconditaque eruditio eſt, elegantiæ parum quippe affectatæ, ſed horridæ, & cum Hiſpana lingua Latinam miſcentis (7). He died at Madrid in the year 1434, having born with conſtancy, even to his old age, the injuries of Fortune, ſuch as the loſs of his eſtate and dignity (8). It was believed that his too great zeal after knowledge, engaged him in the ſtudy of Magic: his books, by the king's order, were ſubmitted to the examination of Brother Lopez de Barrientos, a Dominican, who was preceptor to the Prince of Aſturias, and the greateſt part of them were burnt. This diſpleaſed ſeveral perſons who were of opinion, that a library which had been collected at ſuch a great expence, might, without any danger, have been preſerved for the uſe of the learned. The Dominican publiſhed a defence of his conduct alledging the King's pleaſure for his apology. Mariana relates this fact in beautiful expreſſions: Henricus Villena Madriti, ubi Rex erat, extinctus eſt, amiſſas opes, atque ampliſſimos honores ablatos, injuriamque fortunæ honeſtis ſolatiis ad extremam ſenectutem toleravit, tanto eruditionis ſtudio, ut ne à magicis quidem ſacris abſtinuiſſe feratur. Libri juſſu Regis Lupo Barriento Dominicano, Henricique Principis magiſtro examinandi ſunt traditi, quorum parte combuſta, multorum vituperationem incurrit, libros exiſtimantium magno comparatos, eruditorum uſibus ſine periculo noxaque ſervari debuiſſe. Regiam ille de ſcripto concepta defenſione, voluntatem excuſavit, cui repugnare fas non eſſet (9). Mayerne Turquet ſuppoſes that only the magical manuſcripts of the Marquis's own compoſure were burnt, and farther he ſays, that even all of them were not committed to the flames (10). But had he taken the trouble to examine Mariana, he would have been more exact, and would have informed

(2) Peter du Puy, Hiſtoire des Favoris, pag. m. 146. Du Chaintreau ſays the ſame thing in his Hiſtory of D. John II, King of Caſtile, pag. 19, of the Paris edition, 1640.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 229.

(4) Mayerne Turquet, Hiſt. d'Eſpagne, livr. xvii, pag. 786.

(5) Alfonſi conjugium diremptum ob male tectas uxoris libidines. Mariana, ubi infra.

(6) Taken from Mariana, lib. xix, cap, viii, pag. 188.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Mariana, lib. xx, cap. vi, pag. 221, ſays that to make way for his being made great maſter of the order of Calatrava he divorced his wife Mary Albornos, who was very rich, and yielded to king Don Henry the marquiſate of Villena and other lands, and that the Knights of the Order created another Great Maſter, who was confirmed by the Pope about the year 1413, after a conteſtation that laſted ſix years. Henricus, adds Mariana, in tantis litteris tantaque eruditione parum ſibi ſapuiſſe viſus eſt: repetitoque conjugio egenus vitæ reliquum exegit. - - Henry, notwithſtanding all his learning and knowledge, ſeems not to have judged very wiſely for himſelf; and having married a ſecond time, he paſſed the remainder of his days in poverty.

(9) Mariana, lib. xxi, cap. vii, pag. 264.

(10) A prince who made an ill uſe of his learning, applying himſelf to the deteſtable art of Magic, about which he wrote ſeveral tracts, which were moſt of them burnt by the King's order, and by virtue of the cenſure of Brother Lopez de Barrientos, who was then preceptor to Don Henry, Prince of Auſtrias. Mayerne Turquet, Hiſt. d'Eſpagne, livr. xix, p. 859, ad ann. 1434.

great troubles. His own vaſſals of the Marquiſate of Villena favoured the troops of Ferdinand, King of Arragon: the caſtle of Villena was taken, and by that means the Marquiſate was re-united to the crown in the year 1475, with a promiſe never to alienate it (r).

(r) Mayerne Turquet, livr. xxii, pag. 1019.

ed us that almoſt the whole library of this Lord was burnt. How abſurd is it to pretend that part of the magical books were ſpared? It is ſcarce poſſible to commit only one fault. This Hiſtorian having miſtaken the queſtion, hath improperly made uſe of a reſtrictive clauſe: and as he could not go on in his wrong poſition without being inconſiſtent with himſelf, he has committed a double error. There goes a pleaſant ſtory in Spain relating to this Marquis, of which I am informed by peruſing the relation of the differences betwixt Don John of Auſtria, and the Jeſuit Nitard. This Jeſuit publiſhed a manifeſto, to which an anſwer was made wherein the author feigns, 'That the Marquis of Villena accompanied by Don Pedro the Cruel, and the ghoſt of Pedro Hernandes, three perſons very well known, were come from the other world on purpoſe to refute him with the greater liberty (11).' I need not ſay any thing of the ſpeech aſcribed to Don Pedro: I ſhall only ſet down the beginning of what the ſecond actor ſays. 'The other old man taking up the diſcourſe told him, for my part, my Lord, I am the Marquis of Villena, who rendred myſelf famous in the world by Aſtrology, and the invention of the bottle, into which it is reported I cauſed myſelf to be put piece-meal, in order to diſcover the events of future ages through the glaſs, and what ſhould happen at this preſent time; and indeed it is ſo, for it was impoſſible that a man of my quality and humour ſhould forbear cauſing himſelf to be cut in pieces to ſee the preſent events, the ſubverſion of this monarchy by a private man...... It is true I cauſed myſelf to be cut to pieces, I cannot conceal it, to ſee a man born in Germany, where the laws are ſo different from ours, become the arbitrator of our faith. I cauſed myſelf to be cut to pieces, out of curioſity to ſee a Queen, who ſhould have governed Spain according to our laws, chooſe for her Director, &c (12).'

(11) A relation of the differences which happened in Spain betwixt Don John of Auſtria, and Cardinal Nitard, Tom. i, pag. 97, Dutch edition, 1677.

(12) Ib. p. 160.

VINAY (Alexander de), miniſter of the Reformed Church of Annonai, publiſhed a book in the year 1626 [A], and in the Epiſtle Dedicatory he obſerved that a famous prelate (a) about thirty years before had wrote that the town of Annonai was older in Hereſy than Geneva (b).

(a) Peter de Villars, Archbiſhop of Vienne, Tom. ii, of his Opuſc. Epiſt. Clem. VIII.

(b) Compare what is ſaid in the remark [D], of the article RICHER.

[A] He publiſhed a book in the year 1626.] It was printed at Geneva, contains 634 pages in 8vo, and is intituled, The acts of the conference held at Annonay, from the 10th of December 1625, to the 25th of February 1626, betwixt Alexander de Vinay miniſter of the goſpel, and John Francis Martinecourt, a Jeſuit, concerning the opinion of the Fathers, on the ſufficiency of the ſcripture, and on the Euchariſt: To which is added, a continuation of both articles, and a treatiſe of Purgatory by the ſaid Vinay. I could not find this Jeſuit in Alegambe's Bibliotheque, which makes me think that he gave no counter-relation of this diſpute. Yet it was cuſtomary for each party to publiſh the acts of theſe conferences, and to attribute the victory to his own ſide.

VIRET (Peter) a Proteſtant miniſter, was born at Orbe (a) a ſmall town in the canton of Berne in the year 1511. He ſtudied at Paris where he became acquainted with Farel, whoſe fellow-labourer he was afterwards in the eſtabliſhment of the Reformation in ſome towns of Switzerland (b). He went with him to Geneva in the year 1534, and ſtrenuouſly ſeconded him in whatever was requiſite for the abolition of Popery (c). The city of Lauſanne having embraced the Reformation in the year 1536, Peter Viret was called to exerciſe the miniſterial function there. He diſcharged it ſo well, that he acquired the love and eſteem of the inhabitants. This appeared by the difficulty they made of lending him to the Church of Geneva for ſix months, when the abſence of Calvin made that Church ardently deſire the preſence of Viret (d). To make this the more intelligible, I ought to mention that Calvin being reſolved to return to Geneva, from whence he had been baniſhed (e), could not come back at the deſired time, being engaged to go to the conferences at Ratiſbon (f). During this time Viret very ſucceſsfully ſerved the Church of Geneva (g). Calvin being re-united to his flock, paſſionately deſired Viret for his colleague (h), but had not that ſatisfaction. Viret was recalled to Lauſanne, where he admirably well diſcharged all the duties of his office, until the Proteſtants of France by their entreaties obtained him for the Church of Lyons (i) [A]. Which

(a) In the Païs de Vaud.

(b) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 120, 121.

(c) Spanhemius, in Geneva reſtituta, pag. 65.

(d) Leti, Hiſtoria Genevrina, Tom. iii, pag. 70.

(e) In the year 1538.

(f) In the year 1541.

(g) Leti, ubi ſupra, Tom. ii, pag. 70. See alſo Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1541.

(h) See the remark [E].

(i) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 121.

[A] The Proteſtants of France by their intreaties obtained him for the church of Lyons.] Melchior Adam hath here left a gap, which ought to be ſupplied. He did not know that Viret ſerved the church of Niſmes, and afterwards that of Montpellier, before he went to be miniſter of Lyons. Of all which we are informed by Viret himſelf in an Epiſtle Dedicatory, dated from Lyons the 7th of December 1563. He there acquaints us, That two years before that, he fell into a diſeaſe, which brought him ſo low, that he thought he had nothing to expect but the grave ..... that GOD had, as it were, plucked him by the hair of the head from amongſt the people, with whom he had paſſed the greateſt part of his life (1)...... I know very well, adds he, that my Lords, and alſo my brothers and companions, and the whole Church of which God had appointed me miniſter, would not eaſily have conſented to my departure, and ſent me away, if they had not ſeen and known the neceſſity which the Lord was pleaſed to put upon me, and choſen rather that I ſhould ſerve in another place for the edification of the Church as weak as I am, than make an unprofitable ſtay amongſt them, without being able to ſerve either one Church or the other, as I deſired to do...... This is the method by which the Lord drew me from that Church which I had reaſon to love, as if he had taken me by the hand, in order to lead me faint and trembling with weakneſs and half dead, and bring me to you (2), who are the firſt in Languedoc, with whom I reſided after my departure from Geneva.' He very much praiſes his good reception at Niſmes, though I looked, continues he, like a dry ſkeleton covered with ſkin, who had brought my bones to be buried there: inſomuch that even thoſe who were not of our religion, but very contrary to it, pitied me, crying out, wherefore doth this poor man come into this country? Doth he come for any thing elſe than to die in it? Nay, I have heard that the firſt time I aſcended the pulpit, ſeveral ſeeing me in that condition, feared that I ſhould faint before I had finiſhed the ſermon.

Here are ſome things which I cannot comprehend nor explain; and perhaps Viret did not deſire they ſhould be manifeſt. He ſaith that he could no longer ſerve his old Church, which was the only reaſon why his ſuperiors gave him leave to depart. That reaſon could

(1) Viret, Epiſtle Dedicatory of the firſt volume of his Inſtruction Chreſtienne.

(2) He directs his ſpeech to the Reformed church of Niſmes.

which he ſerved very faithfully in the midſt of a thouſand difficulties, it being in the time of civil-wars, and the Plague (k). He was obliged to quit Lyons when Charles IX, by an Edict explanatory of the peace concluded in March 1563, prohibited his Proteſtant ſubjects the having any miniſters born out of the realm (l). Viret then retired to Orange, from whence the Queen of Navarre ſent for him to Bern (m). He made a good uſe of his talents there till ſuch time as he died in the year 1571 [B]. He was a little man, and of a weak conſtitution (n), which was yet impaired by the blows he received from a Prieſt, and the poiſon which was put into his victuals [C]; but he had a great ſhare

(k) Id. ib.

(l) The true and compleat Hiſtory of the Troubles, book i, fol. 6, verſo, ad ann. 1564.

(m) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(n) Id. ibid.

could not be the ſtate to which his diſtemper had reduced him; for notwithſtanding that, he was able to ſerve the church of Niſmes. We might conjecture that this church was ſmaller than that of Lauſanne or Geneva, and that the ſame perſon who was not ſtrong enough to preach in a large church, might yet be able to perform that function to a ſmall auditory. But this conjecture is ſcarce ſatisfactory (3).

His Epiſtle Dedicatory to the ſecond tome of his Chriſtian Inſtruction, is a proof that he was afterwards miniſter of the church of Montpellier. This epiſtle is dated at Lyons the 12th of December 1563, and addreſſed to that church as a grateful acknowledgment of the favours he had received from them during the exerciſe of his miniſterial function there; and he takes notice of it as a happineſs that ſeveral of the Phyſicians and Surgeons of Montpellier were Proteſtants. Amongſt others, he mentions the Phyſic Profeſſors, Rondellet, Saporta, and their aſſociates, Joubert, Feynes, Trial; and Michael Herouart a famous Surgeon. I inſert this particular, becauſe it is unknown to ſeveral who are very well acquainted with the merit of thoſe illuſtrious Profeſſors.

In the eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches of France (4), we find a very excellent letter of Viret written from Niſmes on the 15th of January 1562 (5), to the miniſters of Languedoc aſſembled in the colloquy of Montpellier, in which he exhorts them to comply with the deſire of the court. By both the Epiſtles Dedicatory which I have cited, it appears that he was no trumpet of ſedition; but rather a man of a peaceable and moderate temper, who always diſſuaded the people from violence and popular commotions, to the utmoſt of his power. The ſame Hiſtory informs us (6), that he went to Montpellier to recover his health, and began the exerciſe of his miniſtry there, the edict of January having been publiſhed on the 7th of February 1562. Paſquier is certainly miſtaken when he ſaith that Viret preached at Paris towards the end of the year 1561 (7).

[B] He made a good uſe of his talents in Bern, till ſuch time as he died in the year 1571.] He taught at Orthez, as Melchior Adam obſerves (8). Some ſay he died there (9), but Moreri and ſeveral others affirm that he died at Pau: and very few authors there are who tell us, that he was for ſome time impriſoned in that country. D'Aubigné is the only one who informs me of it. He ſaith that the Governor of a town which the Proteſtants took by aſſault in 1569, was diſcharged from his impriſonment on promiſe that he ſhould ranſom Peter Viret a miniſter, who was priſoner in Bern (10). What is certainly to be depended on, is that this miniſter ended his days in the territories of the Queen of Navarre, and conſequently there is a falſity in the following words of Mr Ancillon. Viret . . . . . taught for ſome time at Ortez, from whence he returned to Lauſanne, where he publiſhed books enough to make up a ſmall library (11). Moſt of his works were publiſhed before he went into Bern, and therefore Mr Ancillon would be miſtaken, though he were in the right as to Viret's return to Lauſanne.

[C] By the blows which he received from a Prieſt, and the poiſon which was put into his victuals.] He was ſo violently beaten by a Prieſt, who treacherouſly attacked him, that he was left for dead on the ſpot (12). In the punning ages, they would have ſaid, that this Prieſt did not know how to form any other argument than thoſe in Ferio, and in Barbara. If he was unjuſt in having recourſe to ſuch means to prevent innovations, he was not leſs imprudent in giving over beating before he was ſure that the miniſter could never eſcape with life. On ſuch occaſions the maxim, ‘ Nunquam tentabis ut non perficias, - - - Nothing ‘ ought to be attempted which cannot be accompliſhed,’ ought to be well remembred. The ſame conſequences were drawn againſt the Church of Rome, from an unfiniſhed aſſaſſination, which would have been inferred from a compleated one. All thoſe who were capable of going by this rule, a cauſe muſt be very bad, whoſe defenders murder thoſe who attack it, drew the ſame concluſions from their miniſters being confuted by the blows of a cudgel or the fiſt. Wherefore the Prieſt who beat Viret, did as much miſchief to his cauſe by raiſing prejudices againſt it as if he had killed him; and by not killing him he left his cauſe expoſed to great dangers. For Viret armed with reſentment more vigorouſly endeavoured the deſtruction of Popery, and took very effectual meaſures to that purpoſe. He ſought out the abſurdities of their errors, and compiled in French, ſeveral diverting books filled with ralleries on that head. Books of this ſort are of all others the moſt dangerous that can be publiſhed (13); ſo that if we conſider it only on the ſide of intereſt, the Swiſs Prieſt would have done very well not to have reckoned Viret dead, without unqueſtionable proofs. The certificate of two Surgeons perhaps would not have been too much.

But to come to the poiſon. Some ſay, it was given to Viret by a ſervant of a Canon of Geneva (14); others charge this crime on a woman ſuborned for that end by the Canons. However it be, the life of this good miniſter was endangered by it, and it is ſaid that this ill action compleated the ruin of the Roman Catholic cauſe at Geneva. And indeed at a critical time when both parties were almoſt equally ſtrong, nothing could more contribute to turn the balance in favour of the Reformed. A people wavering in their opinions, and full of ſuſpicions, will ſcarce ever find fault with this argument, viz. if theſe people maintained the cauſe of GOD, they would never make uſe of infamous ways in order to deſtroy their adverſaries. The author whom I am going to quote, adds, that there was a current report, that the Prieſts had reſolved to cauſe all the Reformed to be killed at once by poiſoning the bread which they uſed at the Lord's Supper. I am fully perſuaded that a report of this nature, ſpread all over the city, whether it were true or falſe, might have a more forcible effect on the minds of a great many people, than a hundred demonſtrative reaſons.
‘ Cum præterea venefica quædam, è Breſſæ comitatu
‘ vicino oriunda, quæ nigros ſuccos verbi divini Mini‘ ſtris tollendis miſcuerat, P. Vireti lethali morbo in ‘ ſcelere deprehenſa, ſed ad id flagitii à Canonicis con‘ ductam, fateretur, mirum quantum omnium animi à ‘ nefandarum artium inſtitoribus fuerint averſi, præ-
‘ ſertim cùm in vulgus innoteſceret, à ſacrificulis
‘ deliberatum de inficiendis ſymbolis ſacris, Cænæ
‘ Dominicæ celebrandæ deſtinatis, quò Evangelici
‘ omnes facili operâ in ſacratiſſimo ſuæ Religionis
‘ actu, ad generum Cereris non ſiccâ morte vel de‘ ſcenderent, vel deducerentur. Cujus flagitii, quod
‘ ne Thetis quidem ipſa univerſis ſuis undis abluerit,
‘ ſola cogitatio ingenti horrore & indignatione omnium
‘ animos confudit. Experimentis id genus aliis com-
‘ pluribus compertum omnes Clericorum machinas ad
‘ ſubruendam Evangelii inſtaurati ſtructuram compa-
‘ ratas, occulta Dei directione in ſummum ejus incre-
‘ mentum ceſſiſſe (15). Moreover a certain Sorcereſs, born
‘ in the neighbouring county of Breſſe, had made up a ‘ poiſon, by which ſhe deſigned to cut off the Miniſters of ‘ the word of God: but when ſhe was detected in this ‘ crime by the dangerous diſeaſe with which the poiſon ‘ infected Peter Viret; and when ſhe confeſſed that the ‘ Canons had prompted and encouraged her to it, it can ‘ hardly be imagined how much the authors of theſe wicked
‘ arts were abhorred, eſpecially when it came to be known
‘ among the common people that the Prieſts intended to poi- ‘ ſon the holy ſymbols appointed for the celebration of the

(3) See, the remark [FF], of the article CALVIN.

(4) In the fifth book, pag. 886, & ſeq.

(5) It is 1557, in Beza's Hiſtory of the Reformed churches of France, which is an error of the preſs.

(6) Ibid. pag. 888.

(7) Paſquier's Letters, book iv, pag. 201.

(8) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. exter. pag. 121.

(9) Paulus Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 225.

(10) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſelle, Tom. i, lib. v, ch. xii, pag. m. 412, ad ann. 1569.

(11) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 217.

(12) Partim vulnera in agro Paterniacenſi à ſacrificulo ipſum per inſidias invadente inflicta uſque adeo gravia, ut jacentem pro mortuo reliquerit. Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(13) See, above, the remark [G], of the article SAINTE-ALDEGONDE.

(14) Fuit corpuſculo per ſe imbecillo: quod naturæ vitium vehementer auxerunt partim venenum ipſi à Genevenſis cujuſdam Canonici ſervo propinatum, partim vulnera, &c. Id. ibid. Theſe words and thoſe of the foregoing quotation, are taken from Beza, in Iconibus.

(15) Fridericus Spanhemius, in Geneva Reſtituta, pag. 74, 75.

ſhare of learning, accompanied with a charming eloquence. He publiſhed a vaſt number of books [D]. He was pretty well ſkilled in the knowledge of the Pagan authors. This appears by a book (o) he publiſhed at Geneva in the year 1560, intituled, Of True and Falſe Religion, concerning lawful and unlawful vows and oaths, and eſpecially the vows of ‘ ſacrament, and to deſtroy all the Proteſtants when engaged in the moſt ſacred act of their religion. The very thoughts of this vile and execrable deſign ſtruck the minds of all men with the greateſt horror and indignation. By ſeveral inſtances of this kind it appeared, that all the machinations deviſed by the Prieſts for the overthrow of the Church, did, by the ſecret direction of the Almighty G O D, greatly conduce to the increaſe and eſtabliſhment of it.’ The concluſion of this paſſage is very judicious; the ill conduct of the Romiſh Clergy hath been a very ſucceſsful inſtrument for the increaſe of the Proteſtants. The Church of Rome could not have been attacked at a more favourable opportunity: her clergy were very ignorant, and very vicious, and, on the contrary, thoſe who preached up a reformation, were moſt of them eloquent and learned, and more or leſs acquainted with the Hebrew and Greek tongues; by virtue of which they got the better of the Prieſts in almoſt all diſputes. The Prieſts were not able to hold up againſt diſputants, who threatened them with the original languages of Holy Writ, and who eaſily made it appear that the religious practices, to which the people were ſubjected, were not preſcribed by the Scripture. Two or three ſermons of theſe miniſters in ſome pariſhes, ſerved to convert half the inhabitants. And what ſhould hinder it? Would the Romaniſts have offered reaſon againſt reaſon? But was it poſſible for a Prieſt or an ignorant Monk to ſucceed againſt Viret, or Farel? Not in the leaſt. They were then obliged to have recourſe to violent meaſures, to poiſoning, aſſaſſination, and other deteſtable means, which fully confirmed that a cauſe which defended itſelf in this manner was not of GOD.

Mr Leti informs us, that the name of the woman who poiſoned Viret was Mary Navau; that ſhe was born at Bourg in Breſſe; that at the ſollicitation of ſome Eccleſiaſtics, who promiſed her a good reward, ſhe fled to Geneva on pretence of being perſecuted for her religion; and acting the devout part, ſhe very effectually inſinuated herſelf into the good opinion of Farel, Viret, and Saunier, the three Geneva Miniſters; by which means ſhe found an opportunity of poiſoning the diſh of ſoop when Farel's two colleagues dined with him; that Farel and Saunier diſliking this ſoop did not eat of it, as Viret did, who was very well pleaſed with it, and immediately found the effects of the poiſon; that this woman was impriſoned on ſuſpicion, and that without being put to the torture, ſhe accuſed a Canon, and having confeſſed the whole crime, was hanged on the twenty-ſecond of April 1535; and that the Canon, out of reſpect to his family, was only baniſhed (16).

[D] He publiſhed a vaſt number of books (17).] I have already ſaid that he expoſed the ridiculous abſurdities of the adverſe party, and put on an air of humour and raillery. He examined their Ritual and Ceremonial; in a word, he engaged the Church of Rome rather on the practices ſhe permits in her Prieſts and Monks, than on her deciſions in her œcumenical councils. This was attacking her weakeſt ſide, for in our days thoſe who laboured with the greateſt addreſs to defend her (18), have requeſted us to diſtinguiſh betwixt what the councils preſcribe as an article of faith, and what is not obligatory, or is perhaps an abuſe. I ſhall here cite a long paſſage of Verheiden. ‘Sic ut Eccleſia Lugdunenſis frequentiſſima, aliæque vicinarum regionum, ob egregiam operam quam præſtitit in proſeminando Dei Verbo, hunc virum maxime coluerint, ſcriptaque tempori tum ingeniis riſu Papiſmum excipientibus ſummâ voluptate perlegerint. Is autem Viretus erat, qui Myſticam illam Papiſtaram Theologiam cognitam habebat: quam variis libris explicans lectori riſum ſæpe movet, propter mira illa miracula & ridicula quæ continet. Ethnicam præterea Theologiam cùm ex prophanis Scriptoribus hauſiſſet, eandem cum Papiſtarum Sacris ita contulit, tamquam hæc Romana Sacra Parellela eſſent Veterumque Romanorum horrendâ Idololatriâ plenis reſponderent. Fortè inter ſinceriores Theologos nullus fuit, qui myſticum illud Romani Jovis Regnum ita aperuit & perluſtravit atque hic Viretus, quod vel uno illo Centone (ut alia multa mittam) de Theatrica Miſſæ Saltatione, ex veteribus Poëtis conſarcinato, probari poteſt: qui lectorem, præcipuè in Poëtis verſatum, novo genere voluptatis (ut apud Belgas decantatum illud Apiarium Romanum) perfundit & recreat (19). - - - - So that the church of Lyons, and others in the neighbourhood, had the greateſt veneration for this man, on account of his extraordinary diligence in propagating the word of GOD; and it was with the higheſt degree of pleaſure that they read his books, which were adapted to the humour of the times, people being then very much diſpoſed to laugh at Popery. Now Viret was a man who throughly underſtood the myſtical Divinity of the Papiſts, and in ſuch a height does he ſet it forth in the various books which he has written that he often moves the reader's laughter at the wonderful and ridiculous miracles contained in it. As he had likewiſe learned the Heathen Theology from prophane writers, he compared it with the Popiſh ceremonies in ſuch a manner as if thoſe were juſt parallel, and fully came up to the abominable idolatry of the antient Romans. Among all the true Divines, perhaps, no man has explained and revealed the myſtical kingdom of the Romiſh Jupiter ſo well as Viret; which might be very eaſily proved from that one poem of his, which he patched up and collected from the antient Poets (not to mention many more of his reflexions upon the theatrical ceremony of the maſs). This piece (like the Apiarium Romanum, ſo much talked of in Holland) will give a new pleaſure to the reader, eſpecially if he is much converſant with the Poets.’

For the reſt, we ought not to imagine that all this author's works are of the character I have mentioned, nor that amongſt thoſe which are, any of them are tainted with buffoonry. He always obſerved a wiſe moderation. Take notice, that he did not confine himſelf to ſuperſtitions only, a very fit ſubject for rallery, but very ſeriouſly, and, with all due gravity, attacked the unbelievers. To this purpoſe I ſhall cite a long paſſage in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the ſecond tome of his Chriſtian Inſtruction, where we are informed that the multitude of unbelievers determined him to turn his arms againſt Deiſm. ‘There are ſeveral who indeed profeſs to believe that there is ſome Deity or God, as the Turks and Jews do: but as for JESUS CHRIST, and all thoſe things which the doctrine of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles teſtifies concerning him, they take them for fables and dreams. . . . It is much more, or at leaſt as difficult to deal with theſe people as with the Turks. For they entertain ſome opinions concerning religion, which are more extravagant than thoſe of the Turks, or any other Infidels. I hear that ſome of this band call themſelves Deiſts, a new word in oppoſition to that of Atheiſts. For the word Atheiſt ſignifies one that is without GOD, ſo they would hereby ſignify, that they are not without GOD, becauſe they believe that there is one, whom they even acknowledge for creator of Heaven and Earth, as well as the Turks: but as for JESUS CHRIST, they do not know who he is, nor do they believe in him or his doctrine.’ Theſe Deiſts of whom we ſpeak, adds Viret, ridicule all ‘religion, ‘tho' they accommodate themſelves to the religion of thoſe with whom they are obliged to live, out of complaiſance or fear: ſome among them have a kind of notion of the immortality of the ſoul; others agree with the Epicureans on that as well as on the Divine providence with regard to mankind: they think he doth not intermeddle with human affairs, and that they are either governed by fortune, or by the prudence and folly of men, according as things happen. I am ſtruck with horror, when I think that there are ſuch monſters among thoſe who bear the name of Chriſtians. But my horror is redoubled, when I conſider that ſeveral of thoſe who make profeſſion of learning and human Philoſophy, and even are frequently eſteemed the moſt learned, moſt acute and ſubtil genius's, are not only infected with this execrable Atheiſm, but alſo profeſs it, teach it, and poiſon ſeveral perſons with this venom. Wherefore we live in a time when we

AT what time the Deiſts began to be talked of.

(o) It is a book in 8vo, of 864 pages.

(16) Taken from Leti's Hiſtoria Genevrina, Tom. ii, pag. 541, 542.

(17) You will find the catalogue of them, in Geſner's Epit. in Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 122, and in Verbeiden, ubi infra, pag. 120, 121.

(18) The Biſhop of Condom in his, Expoſition de la Doctrine Catholique.

(19) Verheiden, in Præſt. Theolog. Effigiebus, pag. 119, 120.

of perpetual continence, anathema, and execration, the ſacrifices of human victims, and excommunication in all Religions. Item, Of the Jewiſh, Pagan, Turkiſh, and Popiſh Monkery, and the corporal as well as ſpiritual ſacrifices to Moloch. His article in Moreri is confuſed, and falſe in ſeveral places [E].

I will mention a thing which I have read ſince the ſecond edition came out. It is that Viret employed the authority of the Papiſts to curb ſome dangerous ſects that were formed among the Proteſtants at Lyons. The author who tells me this draws a proof from it againſt Toleration, and in favour of the maxim Compelle intrare, - - - - Compel them to come in [F].

are in danger of having more difficulty in contending with theſe monſters, than with the ſuperſtitious and idolators, if GOD doth not, which I hope he will, prevent it. For amongſt the preſent differences in religion, ſeveral very much abuſe the liberty given them of chuſing which of the two contending religions they will adhere to. For ſeveral are of neither, and indeed live without any religion. And if thoſe who have no good opinion of any religion, would content themſelves to periſh alone in their error and Atheiſm, without infecting or corrupting others by their wicked diſcourſes and examples, and leading them into the ſame perdition with themſelves, this evil would not be ſo deplorable as it is. For this reaſon, in reviſing my Chriſtian Inſtruction, formerly printed, I have very much enlarged it, eſpecially on the head of the creation of the world, and the Divine providence towards all creatures, and particularly man, for two reaſons: Firſt, becauſe the Holy Ghoſt frequently in holy writ, propoſes this viſible world, as the great book of nature, and of true natural Theology, and all the creatures as preachers, and univerſal witneſſes of GOD their creator, and of his works and glory . . . . The other reaſon, which moved me to treat of theſe ſubjects ſo amply, is the preſent Atheiſm and it's profeſſors: of which I have already ſpoken (20).'

[E] His article in Moreri is confuſed and falſe in ſeveral places.] I. It is falſe that Viret and Farel joinedwith Calvin in order to preach up their new doctrines at Geneva, and drive out the Catholics in year 1535. Calvin did not go to Geneva till 1536. II. Moreri ſays, that when Calvin departed for the conference at Worms, Viret was called to preach at Geneva, whereby he gives us clearly to underſtand, that Calvin ſet out from Geneva. But that is falſe. He had been at Straſburgh two or three years, when he went to thoſe conferences. III. It is ridiculous to beſtow the title of preference on Viret's vocation, for the people of Geneva had recourſe to Viret only, becauſe they could not oblige Calvin to return home before the holding of the Conferences. This ſhews us that Moreri was perſuaded that Calvin went from Geneva at that time; for his meaning is, that this miniſter was very ſorry that he was deputed to the conferences, and that, during his abſence, Viret ſhould perform the miniſterial function. IV. It is very falſe that Calvin teſtified a diſpleaſure at the calling of Viret. V. It is very falſe that he managed it ſo well that they ſent back his competitor. VI. It is very falſe that the people of Lauſanne had much ado to receive Viret (21). Calvin was ſo far from being deſirous that his pretended competitor ſhould be ſent back to Lauſanne, that on the contrary he made preſſing efforts to retain him at Geneva. Melchior Adam, one of the authors whom Moreri cites, clearly teſtifies it (22). The ſame is atteſted by Theodorus Beza (23), and we have a litteral proof of this under Calvin's own hand, for thus he wrote to Farel: 'Quod bene vertat Deus, hic retentus ſum ut volebas: ſupereſt ut Viretum quoque mecum retineam, quem à me avelli nullo modo patiar. Tuæ quoque omniumque fratrum partes me hic adjuvare, niſi vultis me fruſtra excruciari, ac ſine commodo eſſe miſerrimum (24). - - - What you deſired is come to paſs, I am kept here: God grant it may be for ſome good end. It remains that I ſhould likewiſe keep Viret, whom I will by no means ſuffer to be taken from me. In bringing this about, it behoves you, and all the bretheren to aſſiſt me, unleſs you would have me to undergo a great deal of uneaſineſs and trouble to no manner of purpoſe nor advantage.' I ſhall, by the way, obſerve a miſtake of Mr Hoſman. He ſaith, that Viret being Miniſter at Lauſanne in the year 1535, was called to Geneva: than which nothing is more falſe. He was Miniſter at Geneva in the year 1534, and before he was at Lauſanne.

[F] He employed the authority of the Papiſts to curb ſome . . . . ſects . . . . The author who tells me this draws a proof from it . . . . in favour of the maxim . . . . Compel them to come in.] 'The firſt edict of pacification was no ſooner publiſhed in France than inſtantly there ſprung up a ſect of Arians at Lyons, which had been long hatched there, and in other places, by a German and an Italian, who were the heads of it. For this reaſon Mr Peter Viret, then a Miniſter of Lyons, was preſſed to have recourſe to Mr Buatier, great Vicar of the Archbiſhop of that city, in order to quench that growing fire, which threatened a great conflagration, if it ſhould be allowed time to gather ſtrength. And indeed, the Poſtellians, the Trinitarians, or Servetiſts, and others, even the Atheiſts and Deiſts, were ready to ſhew themſelves; all of them pretending that they ought to enjoy the benefit of the edict, which in general provided, that no man ſhould be moleſted for the ſake of his conſcience. It is likewiſe ſaid that all the forementioned ſectaries, and others, boaſted that their faith was grounded on texts or reaſons, as pertinently drawn from Scripture as any which the Calviniſts could alledge to prove their opinions: to ſuch a heighth of impudence does a preſumptuous aſſertion come when it invades the place of truth. Such was the extremity to which the deſire of liberty of conſcience had almoſt reduced us. Such was the prodigious confuſion in which religion was very near ſwallowed up; and in this manner was the different variety of opinions ready to extinguiſh the faith of ſeveral, and to raiſe doubts that could not be ſolved in the minds of believers. Theſe reaſons induced me to believe that we ought to be very humble in our opinions, and wholly ſubmit them to the determinations of the holy, apoſtolical, and Roman Catholic church (25). . . . . I ſay, that we ought to give up our ſenſes and our human underſtandings, in order to believe through faith what, by reaſon of our infirmity, we cannot otherwiſe comprehend. We ought alſo to obey our ſuperiors, according to the Scripture; without ſeeking to find them guilty of faults, which are not ſubject to our correction: . . . But if ſome men are ſo hard to work upon, that they will obſtinately perſiſt in deſpiſing and ſeparating themſelves from the true Church, in that caſe we ſhould follow the advice of the Prophet (26), who ſays; Coge eos intrare,- - - compel them to come in.' Compare with this what I have quoted from the ſame author in the article STELLINGI.

---

(20) Viret, Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond volume of his Chriſtian Inſtruction. It was printed in 1563.

(21) They could hardly be prevailed upon to ſend him to Geneva for half a year.

(22) Reverſus Calvinus omnem quidem movit lapidem ut ne Vireto ſpoliaretur, quo ſublato eccleſiam ſalvam retinere ſe poſſe negabat: ſed Viretus apud ſuos Lauſanenſes agere maluit. Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra. pag. 121. See alſo, pag. 73.

(23) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1541.

(24) Calvin. Epiſt. l. pag. m. 109, 110. That letter is dated on the 16th of September, 1543. but this date ſeems to be falſe; it ſhould be 1541, for it were an abſurd thing that Calvin writing to a miniſter of Neufchatel, ſhould tell him as a piece of news that he was returned to Geneva, two years after his arrival.

(25) Pierre de St Julien, Meſlanges Paradoxales, pag. 202, 203, 204, and ſpeaks in the following manner before, pag. 189, 190. 'A liberty of conſcience cannot be granted, but an infinite number of ſects (the greateſt part of them abominable) will ſtrait appear, and claim the ſame privilege: as it happened at Lyons, when it was provided by the edict of Pacification that no perſon ſhould be diſturbed for his conſcience ſake: inſtantly a German ſtarted up with a new tribe of Arians, a great deal worſe than the firſt. They thought to ſhelter themſelves under the ſame edict: for which reaſon the Vicar-General to the Archbiſhop of Lyons, and Mr Peter Viret, Superintendent of the pretended Calviniſtical church in that city, were obliged to unite their ſtrength, in order to give a check to theſe Arians, who made liberty of conſcience a cloak for their wickedneſs.'

(26) He ſhould have ſaid of Jeſus Chriſt in the Goſpel according to St Luke, ch. xiv, ver. 23.

VIRGIL, in Latin Publius Virgilius Maro, the moſt excellent of all the antient Roman Poets, flouriſhed in Auguſtus's time. He was born on the fifteenth of October, in the year of Rome 683, in a village (a) not far from Mantua. He ſpent his firſt years at Cremona (b); after which he made ſome ſtay at Milan, and then went to Naples, where he ſtudied with the greateſt diligence the Latin and Greek Literature, as he did afterwards the Mathematics and Phyſic. Some authors ſay, that he was far from being chaſte in his youth; others, on the contrary, aſſure us that he was ſo modeſt, ſo reſerved, and regular in his words and deportment, that the inhabitants of Naples gave him

---

(a) Called Andes. See Donatus, in Vita Virgilii.

(b) Initio ætatis, id eſt uſque ad ſeptimum annum, Cremonæ egit. Donatus, ibid. Du Verdièr Vau-Privas, Proſopogr. Tom. i, pag. 766, and ſeveral others ſay that he ſtudied at Cremona, when he was 17 years old.

him a ſirname, derived from Virginity [A]. This affords me matter for a long remark,

[A] A ſirname derived from Virginity.] The life of Virgil, aſcribed to Donatus, informs us, that he was very ſober, but that he was reported to be inclined to the unnatural ſin; that equitable perſons gave no credit to this rumour, and believed he had no other affection for youth, than what reſulted from his intention of inſtructing them (1); that his lying with Plotia Hieria was talked of, but that he frequently ſaid that he always refuſed the ſhare in that miſtreſs which Varius offered him. Vulgatum eſt conſueviſſe eum cum Plotia Hieria. Sed Aſconius Pedianus affirmat ipſum poſtea minoribus natu narrare ſolitum, & invitatum quidem ſe à vario ad communionem mulieris, verum ſe pertinaciſſime recuſaſſe (2). The following words are very remarkable, for they affirm, not as a report, but as a certain truth, that the inhabitants of Naples gave him the ſirname of Virginal, by reaſon of the purity of his words and manners. Cetera ſane vita & ore & animo tam probum fuiſſe CONSTAT, ut Neapoli Parthenias vulgo appellaretur. Here follows a manifeſt proof of his modeſty. He preferred living retired in the country, to reſiding at Rome, where he was admired. He ſeldom went thither, and ſo little affected appearing there, that when he obſerved that he was followed and ſhewed, he ran into the firſt houſe he found open. Si quando Romæ, quò rariſſime commeabat, viſeretur in publico, ſectantes demonſtranteſque ſe ſubterfugere ſolitum in proximum tectum (3). What is certain, is, that in his youth he wrote ſome laſcivious verſes. This is not to be doubted, ſince Pliny (4), who had likewiſe done ſo, juſtifies himſelf by many great examples, and namely by that of Virgil. ‘Nec vero moleſte fero hanc eſſe de moribus meis exiſtimationem, ut qui neſciunt talia doctiſſimos, graviſſimos, ſanctiſſimos homines ſcriptitaſſe, me ſcribere mirentur. Ab illis autem quibus notum eſt quos quantoſque auctores ſequar facile impetrari poſſe confido ut . . . . An ego verear . . . . ne me non ſatis deceat quod decuit M. Tullium, Caïum Calvum. . . . Neronem tranſeo, quamvis ſciam, non corrumpi in deterius, quæ aliquando etiam à malis; ſed honeſta manere, quæ ſæpius à bonis fiunt. Inter quos vel præcipue numerandus eſt P. Virgilius, Corn. Nepos, & prius Ennius, Acciuſque, non quidem hi Senatores, ſed ſanctitas morum non diſtat ordinibus (5). - - - - I am not concerned that ſuch people ſhould have a bad opinion of my morals, and wonder at my writing theſe things, who do not know that very learned, grave, and virtuous men have done ſo before me. But from ſuch as know what great examples I follow, I am confident that I ſhall obtain . . . . Have I any reaſon to be afraid . . . . leſt that ſhould not become me which became Cicero, Caius Calvus, ... I paſs by Nero, tho' I am ſenſible that things are not the worſe for being ſometimes practiſed even by bad men; but that ſuch things muſt be reckoned honeſt which are frequently practiſed by the good and virtuous. In this number we ought chiefly to reckon Virgil, Cornelius Nepos, and before their time Ennius and Accius. Theſe, indeed, were no ſenators: but an uprightneſs of manners is alike valuable in all ranks.’ The writer of this Poet's life makes him the author of the Priapeia, and ſome learned men (6) will have this piece, which is ſtill extant under this name, to be really Virgil's: but it is more reaſonable to believe that it is a collection of poems written by ſeveral authors. We have ſeen, above, that Auſonius alledges Virgil's example in his juſtification (7); but it is a little ſurprizing that he only mentions ſome paſſages of his Georgics, and Æneis; for thoſe places are but little to his purpoſe: ‘Quid etiam Partheniam dictum cauſa pudoris? qui octavo Æneïdos, quum deſcriberet coitum Veneris atque Vulcani, αἰσχροσεμνίαν decenter immiſcuit. Quid in tertio Georgicorum de ſummiſſis in gregem maritis, nonne obſcenam ſignificationem honeſta verborum tranſlatione velavit? Et ſi quid in noſtro joco aliquorum hominum ſeveritas veſtita condemnat, de Virgilio accerſitum ſciat (8). - - - What ſhall we ſay of Virgil, ſirnamed Parthenias, on account of his modeſty? Doth not he, in his eighth Æneis, deſcribe the conjugal embraces of Venus and Vulcan, with a kind decency and reſerve? And in the third book of his Georgics, where he talks of Maritis ſummiſſis in gregem, does not he couch an obſcene meaning under decent expreſſions? Wherefore if any man ſhall cenſure my jocoſe way of writing out of a pretended ſeverity, let him know that I have Virgil for my pattern.’ He had better have imitated Pliny the younger, who doubtleſs aimed at ſome particular ſmall poems, in which Virgil expreſſed himſelf too licentiouſly on wanton ſubjects. The paſſage of the Æneis which Auſonius points out, contains nothing too bold for thoſe times: thoſe who cenſured it deſerve rather the title of Cavillers than of Critics: and it is very obſervable, that part of thoſe who did not entirely approve it, beſtowed great elogies on the Poet, as Aulus Gellius informs us. ‘Annianus poëta & plerique cum eo ejuſdem Muſæ viri ſummis aſſiduiſque laudibus hos Virgilii verſus ferebant; quibus Volcanum & Venerem junctos mixtoſque jure conjugii, rem lege naturæ operiendam, verecunda quadam tralatione verborum quum oſtenderet demonſtraretque, protexit: ſic enim ſcripſit:

. . . . Ea verba locutus
Optatos dedit amplexus; placidumque petivit
Conjugis infuſus gremio per membra ſoporem.

Minus autem difficile eſſe arbitrabantur in iſtiuſmodi re dicenda verbis uti uno atque altero brevi tenuique eam ſigno demonſtrantibus. . . . . . Tot verò & tam evidentibus ac tamen non prætextatis, ſed puris honeſtiſque verbis venerandum illud concubii pudici ſecretum neminem quemquam alium dixiſſe (9). - - - The Poet Annianus, and ſeveral others with him, beſtow the greateſt praiſes on theſe verſes of Virgil, wherein he deſcribes Venus and Vulcan in the height of conjugal familiarity; a thing which the light of nature forbids to be expoſed, and which for that reaſon he vails under a modeſt and diſcreet metaphor, at the ſame time that he gives a ſtrong and lively repreſentation of it; for in this manner does he write:

Trembling he ſpoke, and eager of her charms,
He ſnatch'd the willing goddeſs to his arms;
'Till in her lap infus'd he lay poſſeſs'd
Of full deſire, and ſunk to pleaſing reſt.
DRYDEN.

They thought it leſs difficult in a thing of this kind to make uſe of one or two words which give a ſhort and ſlight hint of it. . . . . . But that no man beſides himſelf had ever told the venerable ſecrets of the marriage-bed in ſo many words, which were ſo clear, and at the ſame time ſo pure and chaſte without the leaſt mixture of obſcenity.’ Let us ſee how he hath cenſured a more rigid Critic. ‘Annæus Cornutus, homo ſanè pleraque alia non indoctus neque imprudens, in ſecundo tamen librorum, quos de figuris ſententiarum compoſuit, egregiam totius iſtius verecundiæ laudem inſulſa nimis & odioſa ſcrutatione violavit. Nam quum genus hoc figuræ probaſſet, & ſatis circumſpectè factos eſſe verſus dixiſſet; membra tamen, inquit, paulò incautiùs nominavit (10). - - - Annæus Cornutus, a man who in moſt other things wanted neither learning nor ſenſe, has nevertheleſs in his ſecond book on the figures of ſpeech, ſought to diminiſh the noble praiſe that is due to the modeſty of this paſſage, by an inſipid and odious ſcrutiny. For whereas he had approved this kind of figure, and owned that the verſes were wrote with great circumſpection, he adds notwithſtanding that the word membra was introduced ſomewhat too raſhly.’ To which may be added likewiſe the following, ‘Quod Annæus Cornutus verſus Virgilii, quibus Veneris & Vulcani concubitum pudice operteque dixit, reprehenſione ſpurca & odioſa inquinavit *. - - - That Annæus Cornutus has with an unclean and odious cenſure defiled that paſſage of Virgil, where he chaſtly and covertly deſcribes the conjugal familiarities of Venus and Vulcan.’ The gravity and modeſty which reign throughout the Æneis are indeed admirable. Was it poſſible for any body to have uſed fewer words than Virgil has done, on the cave where Æneas and Dido conſummated their marriage? His Bucolics are not ſo modeſt; he there relates very criminal paſſions, but that is no proof that he was tainted with them. The paſſion for boys was not leſs common in the Pagan remark, and an opportunity of refuting an obſervation, which we find in the Anti-Baillet

---

(1) Cibi vinique minimi: fama eſt eum libidinis pronioris in pueros fuiſſe. Sed boni ita eum pueros amaſſe putaverunt, ut Socrates Alcibiadem. Donatus, in Vita Virgilii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) That is, Pliny the younger.

(5) Plinius, Epiſt. iii, lib. v.

(6) Joannes Maria Catanæus is one of them. See his Commentary upon Pliny the younger, pag. 290.

(7) In the article VAYER, citation (25).

(8) Auſonius, in Centone nuptiali, ſub finem, pag. m. 519.

(9) Aulus Gellius, lib. ix, cap. x.

(10) Id. ibid.

* Id. ibid.

Pagan times than that for girls, ſo that a writer of Eclogues might make his ſhepherds talk according to this curſed faſhion, as we at preſent make the heroes and heroines of Romances ſpeak; that is to ſay, without its being a ſign that he related his own adventures, or approved the paſſions he mentioned. Our beſt French Romances have been compoſed for a long time by maids or married women. Would it be reaſonable to ſay that they write the Hiſtory of their own amours, or that they approve their heroines ſuffering themſelves to be ſo ſenſibly affected with the paſſion of love (11)? Is it not certain that they may write theſe books only to diſcover their wit, and their art of painting the paſſions, and repreſenting characters? We may ſuppoſe the ſame thing in favour of Virgil, ſince on other accounts we have reaſon to believe that he was endowed with a great ſhare of virtue. I own that there went ſeveral ſtories not much to his reputation; but thoſe who relate them repreſent them only as rumors (12), whilſt they aſſure us as a certain truth that his modeſty and probity were extraordinary. Beſides the ſtories already related, we are told (13) that Varus the tragic Poet married a very learned woman, who lay with Virgil, and to whom he gave a tragedy of his compoſure, which ſhe made her huſband believe was her own, and that Varus recited it as his own performance. It is farther added that Virgil obſcurely hints this adventure in three verſes of his third Eclogue:

An mihi cantando victus non redderet ille,
Quem mea carminibus meruiſſet fiſtula, caprum?
Si neſcis, meus ille caper fuit.

An honeſt man may freely take his own;
The goat was mine, by ſinging fairly won.
A ſolemn match was made, he loſt the prize:
Aſk Damon, aſk, if he the debt denies.

DRYDEN.

But Servius rejects this as a thing which no author had mentioned, and which was repugnant to the nature of paſtoral Poetry. Superfluam volunt eſſe allegoriam, dicentes rem nuſquam lectam de Virgilio. . . . . . Melius ſimpliciter accipimus: refutandæ enim ſunt allegoriæ in bucolico certamine: niſi, ut ſupra diximus, ex aliqua agrorum perditorum neceſſitate deſcendunt (14). And it plainly enough appears to be a vain imagination of ſome perverſe genius's, who hunt after allegories and myſteries every where, and are never pleaſed with any thing which is natural. The moſt forcible objection againſt Virgil would be to repreſent him as the author of ſome Priapeia. But that reaſon alone is of no great weight againſt his manners; for as there are men of honour and virtue, who read obſcene books without any ill deſign, ſo there are ſuch who may compoſe laſcivious verſes without corrupting their mind. It is reported that St Chryſoſtome frequently read Ariſtophanes, and it is certain that St Jerom often read Plautus. See the remark [B] in the article LONGUS, and the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Scioppius's notes in Priapeia. Will any one preſume to rank Joſeph Scaliger, Janus Douza, Daniel Heinſius, and the Preſident Mainard amongſt the debauchees, and urge as reaſons for it that the firſt wrote notes on the Priapeia and Catullus; that the ſecond very curiouſly commented on Petronius (15); that the third publiſhed ſome laſcivious verſes; and that the fourth wrote a Priapeia (16)? When we believe it impoſſible for another to touch upon ſuch things without being infected, we too plainly diſcover the weak efforts which we find ourſelves capable of making againſt the like objects. ‘In iis, quæ turpicula & laſciviuſcula ſunt, ille qui, ut ait Ariſtoteles, bonâ inſtitutione præmunitus eſt, offendere nequit. Adeò ut, molliculos iſtos, qui vel una tali & altera lectione verberantur, & ad nequitiam abducuntur, ſua ſibi culpa & in Venerem putredine, perire videas. Haud ſecus, ac ſi terribili objecta re timidus expaveſcat, fortis non adficiatur (17). - - - - As for thoſe things which are ſomewhat obſcene and laſcivious, the man who, as Ariſtotle ſays, is forearmed with a good education, cannot offend. So that theſe effeminate creatures who are ſtruck and hurried on to leudneſs by reading one or two things of this kind, periſh, as you ſee, through their own fault and laſcivious diſpoſition: juſt like a coward who is frightened out of his ſenſes at the ſight of a terrible object, while a brave man is not at all moved.’ This makes me remember a thought of Moliere. His Tartuffe, being juſt ready to hear a young woman ſpeak, pulls out a handkerchief, and ſays;

. . . . Ah! mon Dieu, je vous prie,
Avant que de parler, prenez-moy ce mouchoir.
. . . .
Couvrez ce ſein, que je ne ſaurois voir.
Par de pareils objets les ames ſont bleſſées,
Et cela fait venir de coupables penſées.

. . . . Let me beſeech you e'er you ſpeak,
Firſt take this handkerchief, and hide from me
That youthful boſom which I cannot ſee.
Such objects ſet the very ſoul on fire,
And raiſe in us a culpable deſire.

But obſerve the young woman's anſwer:

Vous êtes donc bien tendre à la tentation;
Et la chair, ſur vos ſens, fait grande impreſſion?
Certes, je ne ſai pas quelle chaleur vous monte:
Mais à convoiter, moy, je ne ſuis point ſi promte;
Et je vous verrois nû du haut juſques en bas,
Que toute voſtre peau ne me tenteroit pas (18).

Strongly your ſenſe obeys the carnal lure,
And you are eaſy to be tempted ſure.
The meaning of ſuch heat I cannot find,
To which myſelf ſo little am inclin'd:
For I could view your naked ſkin all o'er,
Yet ſtill remain untempted as before.

There may be ſome Poets, Caſuiſts, and Critics, hardened in the ſame manner againſt thoſe dangerous objects, which others cannot read with impunity. Lipſius proteſts that the reading of Petronius affected only his mind, and left no more traces in his heart, than a boat does on a river. ‘Vidiſtin' quidquam venuſtius, argutius (Petronio) poſt natas Muſas? Non ego: abeſſet tantùm nuda illa nequitia; quâ tamen nihil offendor. joci me delectant, urbanitas capit: cetera nec in animo nec in moribus meis magis labem relinquunt, quàm olim in flumine veſtigium, cymba. Ut vina appoſita vinoſum movent; invinium, ut antiqui loquebantur, non movent: ſic iſta animum jam antè improbum fortaſſe incitent; caſto & caſtigato non adhærent (19). - - - Have you ever ſeen any thing from the birth of the Muſes to this time more elegant and witty than Petronius? For my part I have not; excepting only his barefaced obſcenity, which nevertheleſs does not ſhock me. I am delighted with his humour, charmed with his politeneſs: and as for the other things they leave no more any ſtain upon my mind or manners than a boat leaves a trace upon a river long after it has paſſed. For as wine tranſports the drunkard when it is ſet before him, but does not at all affect the ſober man; ſo theſe things may poſſibly inflame a mind that was vitious before, but they make no durable impreſſion upon one that is chaſte and well-diſciplined.’ If this be true, I dare aver that he might have made verſes or proſe narratives according to the model of this Romance, and preſerved his mind pure and untainted. Be pleaſed to apply this, poſitis ponendis, to the poetical amuſements of Virgil, which ſerved as an apology for Pliny the younger.

I ought not to forget the Biſhop of Avranches's ingenious conjecture concerning the name of Parthenias given to Virgil. Having obſerved that this appellation was perhaps beſtowed on him, becauſe it was believed of him as well as of Homer, that he was born of a virgin, he adds, that it is more probable that the name of Virgilius was confounded with that of Virginius; that is, in effect to ſay that the inhabitants

---

(11) Note, that I do not pretend to deny that ſome of thoſe women who write romances have had amorous intrigues.

(12) See, above, the beginning of this remark.

(13) Ajunt hoc, Varus tragœdiarum ſcriptor habuit uxorem literatiſſimam, cum qua Virgilius adulterium ſolebat admittere: cui etiam dedit ſcriptam tragœdiam, quam illa marito dedit tanquam à ſe ſcriptam. Hanc recitavit pro ſua Varus: quam rem Virgilius dicit per allegoriam. Nam tragœdiæ præmium caper fuerat. Servius, in Virgil. Ecl. iii, ver. 20.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Douza præter quod Petronium in omni lingua Latina ut ſermone cultiſſimum, ſic rebus turpiſſimum illuſtravit, tum etiam verborum laſcivia ſuperare eumdem ſtuduit, & non infeliciter, ut opinor, adſecutus eſt. - - - Douza, beſides commenting upon Petronius, the moſt elegant writer in the Latin tongue as to his ſtyle, and the moſt obſcene as to his ſubjects, has likewiſe endeavoured to ſurpaſs him in wanton expreſſions, and in my opinion he has not ſucceeded ill. Scioppius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Priapeior. See alſo what he ſays in his notes upon the Prologue.

(16) Menagiana, p. 32, of the firſt Dutch edition.

(17) Scioppius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Priapeior. pag. 3.

(18) Moliere, in his Impoſteur, Act. iii, Scene ii, Tom. iii, of the Amſterdam edition 1725.

(19) Lipſius, Epiſtolic. Quæſtion. lib iii, Epiſt. ii, ad Petr. Pithœum.

bitants

Baillet [B]. Thoſe who tell us that his Eclogues were admired by Cicero, are miſtaken [C]. He was not envious of other mens glory, and diſcovered ſuch a large ſhare of good nature and bitants of Naples being neither acquainted with the Etymology, nor meaning of the word Virgilius, and very well knowing the import of Virginius, imagined that this Poet's name was Virginius, a word which anſwers to the Greek word Parthenias. Cur Virgilius Neapolitanis dictus ſit Parthenias, cauſam hanc eſſe ſuſpicari quis poſſit ; non quod virginali eſſet modeſtia, ut vulgo fertur, ſed quod virgine natum, perinde ut Homerum, credi voluerint. Probabile ſane hoc eſt ; ſed ne quid diſſimulem, longe eſt probabilius ac ſimillimum veri, ſic dictum eſſe à Græcis, pro eo quod Romana lingua appellatum eum putabant Virginium, non Virgilium, cum ignorarent nominis hujus ſignificationem & originem, à virgulis, hoc eſt, ramis ſeu ſurculis, petitam ; unde & virgeta Ciceronis dicuntur arborum ſeminaria ; prioris vero nominis vim notionemque probe callerent (20).

Mr Des Maizeaux (21) hath been pleaſed to communicate to me ſome obſervations on the article of Virgil, amongſt which there are ſome wherein he confutes this whole paſſage of Huetius, and gives a contrary account of the ſirname Parthenias. I had willingly made uſe of his conjectures, if I had not thought that I ought to ſtay for the new obſervations, which I know he hath ſent me, and I have not yet received.

[B] An opportunity of refuting an obſervation which we find in the Anti-Baillet.] Mr Menage pretends that there are numerous obſcenities in Virgil. 'His Eclogues, ſaith he (22), are full of unnatural love.

Novimus & qui te, tranſverſa tuentibus hircis, &c.
Formoſum Paſtor Corydon ardebat Alexin.

We know who did your buſineſs . . . .
And what the goats obſerv'd with leering eyes, &c.
Young Corydon, th' unhappy ſhepherd ſwain
The fair Alexis lov'd . . . .

DRYDEN.

'He loved this Alexis, as Apuleius informs us in the following paſſage of his apology : 'Quanto modeſtiùs tandem Mantuanus Poëta, qui itidem ut ego, puerum amici Pollionis Bucolico ludicro laudans, & abſtinens nominum, ſeſe quidem Corydonem, puerum verò Alexin vocat. - - - How much greater is the modeſty of Virgil, who writing in the ſtrain that I do, and praiſing his friend Pollio's minion in one of his paſtorals, forbears to mention their true names, but calls himſelf Corydon and the boy Alexis. But Apuleius miſtook when he ſaid that Alexis was Pollio's minion : he was Mecænas's darling, as we are informed from the fifty-ſixth epigram of the eighth book of Martial.' Mr Menage had no reaſon to infer from this paſſage of Apuleius that Virgil was in love with Alexis ; for, on the contrary, from thence I ſhall prove that he was not, and that ſo much of his Eclogue as relates to this particular was a meer piece of wit. Apuleius's accuſers beſides other crimes objected againſt him ſeveral amorous verſes on boys, whom he diſguiſed under feigned names. He replies (23) that it was cuſtomary with the Poets to alter the name of the beloved object : which he proves by ſeveral examples, and diſlikes the conduct of Lucilius, who did not make uſe of that diſguiſe (24). To this conduct he oppoſes Virgil's modeſty, who, ſays he, praiſing, as I have done, his friend's minion, made uſe of fictitious names, &c. If he had pretended that this Eclogue of Virgil expreſſed the real amorous ſentiments of its author, he had directly owned that he was guilty of the ſame crime, and inſtead of refuting his accuſers, would have acknowledged the juſtice of their accuſation. But nothing can be more abſurd than to ſuppoſe him guilty of this blunder. Let us then ſay that he declares that this Eclogue of Virgil was only a witty amuſement, in which his affections were not in the leaſt engaged. And it is what he ſays with reſpect to the Poems for which he was proſecuted. He is ſurprized that any perſon ſhould preſume to ſummon him before the Judges on this occaſion. Making verſes, ſays he, by way of diverſion, is no indication of manners. The guilty do not uſually boaſt of their crimes ; but thoſe who publiſh Amours, are not engaged in them, otherwiſe than by way of ſport ; they are only poetical fictions. 'Sed ſumme ego ineptus, qui hæc etiam in judicio ? an vos potius calumnioſi, qui etiam hæc in accuſatione ? quaſi ullum ſpecimen morum ſit, verſibus ludere. Catullum ita reſpondentem malevolis non legiſtis ?

Nam caſtum eſſe decet pium poetam
Ipſum, verſiculos nihil neceſſe eſt.

'Divus Hadrianus, cum Voconii amici ſui poëtæ tumulum verſibus muneraretur, ita ſcripſit :

Laſcivus verſu, mente pudicus eras.

'Quod nunquam ita dixiſſet, ſi forent lepidiora carmina argumentum impudicitiæ habenda. . . . . Cujus (Platonis) verſus, quos nunc percenſui, tanto ſanctiores ſunt quanto apertiores : tanto pudicius compoſiti, quanto ſimplicius profeſſi. Namque hæc & id genus omnia diſſimulare & occultare, peccantis : profiteri & promulgare, ludentis eſt. Quippe natura, vox innocentiæ, ſilentium maleficio diſtributa (25). - - - But is it not fooliſh in me to take notice of ſuch things before a court of judicature ? Or rather are not you ſlanderers for mentioning them in the indictment ? As if forſooth writing verſes for diverſion were any indication of one's morals. Have you not read the anſwer which Catullus made to his malicious detractors.

The Poet in his morals ſhould be chaſt,
But in his verſe he need not . . . . .

'The Emperor Hadrian, when he compoſed an epitaph for his friend Voconius the Poet, made uſe of this expreſſion ;

Chaſt in your mind, but wanton in your verſe.

'He never would have ſaid ſo, if merry and jocoſe verſes were to be looked upon as an argument of unchaſtity. . . . . Plato's verſes, which I have juſt mentioned, are ſo much the more virtuous and pure for their being extremely plain ; and the greater the ſimplicity is which they expreſs the more chaſt is the compoſition. For to hide and diſſemble things of this kind is the mark of an offender ; but to profeſs and publiſh them is an argument of a ſporting mind ; ſince nature in her diſtributions gives ſpeech to innocence and ſilence to villany.' Theſe maxims of Apuleius are diſputable, and it may reaſonably be ſaid, that he ought to have reſtrained them, and that they are very liable to exception ; but what I aſſert againſt the author of the Anti-Baillet, that Apuleius's words clearly ſignify that Virgil did not ſing his own amours, is beyond contradiction.

[C] Thoſe who tell us that his Eclogues were admired by Cicero, are miſtaken.] Donatus's words are (26) : 'Bucolica eo ſucceſſu edidit, ut in ſcena quoque per cantores crebra pronunciatione recitarentur. At cum Cicero quoſdam verſus audiiſſet, & ſtatim acri judicio intellexiſſet non communi vena editos, juſſit ab initio totam eclogam recitari : quam cum accurate pernotâſſet, in fine ait : Magnæ ſpes altera Romæ, quaſi ipſe linguæ Latinæ ſpes prima fuiſſet, & Maro futurus eſſet ſecunda. Quæ verba poſtea Æneïdi ipſe inſeruit. - - - His paſtorals were ſo well received by the public, that they were frequently ſung on the ſtage. Now when Cicero had heard ſome of the verſes, preſently diſcovering by his acute penetration, that the author was no ordinary genius, he ordered the whole Eclogue to be rehearſed from the beginning : which having ſtrictly attended to, he ſaid at the concluſion : The other hope of mighty Rome ; as if he himſelf were the firſt hope of the Latin tongue, and Virgil would be the ſecond. Theſe words were afterwards inſerted in the Æneis.' Here is an error in Chronology ; for it is certain that Virgil did not write his Eclogues, till after the Triumvirate of Octavius, Marc Antony, and Lepidus, during which, as it is well known, Cicero was cruelly maſſacred. I do

(20) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Alnetan. Quæſt. lib. ii, cap. 15. pag. 239, Edit. Lipſ. 1692.

(21) Of whom mention is made above, in the article RAMUS, at the end of the remark [O].

(22) Menage, Anti-Baillet, Part. i, Art. lxi.

(23) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. m. 279.

(24) C. Lucillium, quamquam ſit Iambicus, tamen improbarim, quod Gentium & Macedonem pueros directis nominibus carmine ſuo proſtituerit. d. ibid.

(25) Id. ibid, pag. 280.

(26) I ſay this without pretending to depart from the opinion of thoſe who deny that Donatus is the true author of Virgil's life that goes by his name.

and civility, that the other Poets, who continually envied one another, almoſt unanimouſly agreed in their great value and love for him [D]. Thoſe who ſay that a ſecret jealouſy was the reaſon that he never mentioned Homer, and preferred a leſs known Poet before him, are guilty of a great abſurdity [E]. He was none of thoſe authors who are eaſily do not claim this diſcovery as mine; Father Vavaſſeur long ſince refuted the compilers of Virgil's life on this head (27). He alſo refuted Servius, who tells us that the ſixth Eclogue being recited by the author himſelf was received with great applauſe, and afterwards ſung on the ſtage by the Courteſan Cytheris or Lycoris, and that Cicero one of the audience was ſurprized to a very great degree, and aſked who was the author of it, &c (28).

Claudius du Verdier took notice of this fault of Servius, in a book (29) which he publiſhed in the year 1586. Peter Ramus had before confuted the ſame error, which Father Vavaſſeur confutes. ‘Hoc Donatus ‘affirmat, ſed chronologia repugnat: quatuor enim ‘aut quinque annis antea jam Cicero triumvirali pro‘ſcriptione perierat. - - - This Donatus affirms, but it ‘is repugnant to Chronology: for Cicero had loſt his life ‘four or five years before that by the proſcription of the ‘Triumviri.’ Theſe are Peter Ramus's words in his life of Virgil, before his Lectiones on the Bucolics. To which words he very properly adds a paſſage of a dialogue aſcribed to Tacitus; which ſhews that all the people roſe up, at the recital of ſome verſes of our Virgil on the theatre, and that this excellent Poet being accidentally there was ſaluted and honoured like the Emperor himſelf: ‘Malo ſecurum & ſecretum ‘VIRGILII ſeceſſum, in quo tamen neque apud ‘divum Auguſtum gratia caruit, neque apud populum ‘Romanum notitia. Teſtes Auguſti epiſtolæ, teſtis ‘ipſe populus, qui auditis in theatro verſibus Virgilii, ‘ſurrexit univerſus, & forte præſentem ſpectantemque ‘Virgilium veneratus eſt, ſic quaſi Auguſtum (30). ‘- - - I prefer the private and ſafe retirement of Virgil, ‘in which notwithſtanding he neither wanted a ſhare ‘in the favour of Auguſtus, nor in the eſteem of the Ro‘man people. Witneſs the letters of Auguſtus, witneſs ‘the people themſelves, who having heard ſome verſes ‘of Virgil recited on the ſtage, roſe up, &c.’

[D] The other Poets ..... almoſt unanimouſly agreed in their great value and love for him.] This is a great elogy, which commands my admiration for Virgil more than the beauty of his works, or the excellency of his Muſe. He exceeded all the Poets, and yet they loved him. Certainly nothing can be more extraordinary than this; and if the author who relates it had not prepared the way by deſcribing Virgil's amiable character, he never could have prevailed on us to believe it. He repreſents him endowed with a great deal of goodneſs, he ſays that he was extreamly careful to cultivate the acquaintance of honeſt and learned men, and to acknowledge their merit, without either envying or blaming any perſon. All he had was at the ſervice of his friends: a fine thought in the writings of other men pleaſed him as much as if he had been the author of it; and he was never concerned at being robbed of the glory of his performances, or that another claimed them for his, and reaped the advantage of them. This is his picture drawn by Aſconius Pedianus. Refert etiam Pedianus (31) benignum, cultoremque omnium bonorum atque eruditorum fuiſſe, & uſque adeo invidiæ expertem, ut ſi quid erudite dictum inſpiceret alterius, non minus gauderet, ac ſi ſuum fuiſſet: neminem vituperare, laudare bonos: ea humanitate eſſe, ut, niſi perverſus maxime, quiſque illum non diligeret modo, ſed amaret. Nihil proprii habere videbatur. Ejus bibliotheca non minus aliis doctis patebat, ac ſibi: illudque Euripidis antiquum ſæpe uſurpabat, τὰ τῶν φίλων κοινά. hoc eſt, communia amicorum eſſe omnia. ..... Gloriæ vero adeo contemtor fuit: cum quidam verſus quoſdam ſibi adſcriberent, eaque re docti haberentur, non modo ægrè non ferebat, immo voluptuoſum id illi erat (32). Does not this prepare us to find a great probability in the following words of the ſame author: ‘Quare coævos ‘omnes Poëtas ita adjunctos habuit, ut cum inter ſe ‘plurimum invidia arderent, illum una omnes colerent? - - - For which reaſon he lived ſo well with ‘all his contemporary Poets, that whilſt they burnt with ‘envy at one another, they all unanimouſly agreed in ‘their great value and love for him.’ Perhaps it may be aſked why the text of this remark is not conform to thoſe Latin words; I having inſerted the exception almoſt, which is not in the Latin. To this I anſwer that I had juſt reaſon to make uſe of that limitation, ſince immediately after I find in my author, that the Poets Anſer and Cornificius were Virgil's enemies. It is he then who is to be blamed for having twice ſucceſſively ſaid omnes, - - - all, inſtead of fere omnes, - - - almoſt all. And he is the more blameable, ſince he could not but know that Virgil had more than two enemies. Bavius and Mævius hated him, ſo that here are four Poets againſt him.

Qui Bavium non odit amet tua carmina Mævi (33).

Who hates not living Bavius, let him be (Dead Mævius) damn'd to love thy works and thee.

DRYDEN.

An anonymous author is ſaid to have cenſured his Eclogues (34), and Carbilius Pictor his Æneis; beſides we are told that one Herennius collected his faults, and Perilius Fauſtinus his Plagiariſms (35). And it ought indeed to be owned that this great Poet was expoſed to the Criticiſms of his cotemporaries, ſince Aſconius Pedianus wrote a book in his defence (36). And if he had not been thus expoſed, it ought to be regiſtred amongſt the greateſt wonders that ever were; Urit enim fulgore ſuo qui, &c (37).

[E] Thoſe who ſay that a ſecret jealouſy was the reaſon that he never mentioned Homer ... are guilty of a great abſurdity.] Virgil ſuppoſes, in his deſcription of Æneas's deſcent into Hell, that the Sibyl deſirous to know where Anchiſes was, enquired of Muſæus, the moſt illuſtrious of all the Poets, and of all the choice men, who had an apartment in the retreat of the bleſſed.

Hîc manus, ob patriam pugnando vulnera paſſi;
Quique ſacerdotes caſti, dùm vita manebat,
Quique pii vates, & Phœbo digna locuti,
Inventas aut qui vitam excoluêre per artes,
Quique ſui memores alios fecêre merendo:
Omnibus his niveâ cinguntur tempora vittâ.
Quos circumfuſos ſic eſt effata Sibylla:
(Muſæm ante omnes: medium nam plurima turba Hunc habet, atque humeris exſtantem ſuſpicit altis.)
Dicite felices animæ, tuque optime vates,
Quæ regio Anchiſen, quis habet locus (38)?

Which Mr Dryden renders thus:

Here patriots live, who for their country's good,
In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
Prieſts of unblemiſh'd lives here make abode;
And Poets worthy their inſpiring God:
And ſearching wits of more mechanic parts,
Who grac'd their age with new invented arts.
Thoſe who to worth their bounty did extend;
And thoſe who knew that bounty to commend;
The heads of thoſe with holy fillets bound;
And all their temples were with garlands crown'd.
To theſe the Sibyl thus her ſpeech addreſs'd:
And firſt to him ſurrounded by the reſt;
Tow'ring his height, and ample was his breaſt;
Say happy ſouls, divine Muſæus ſay,
Where lives Anchiſes, and where lies our way
To find the Heroe .....

DRYDEN.

The French tranſlator of Virgil makes the following judicious remark: ‘Some Commentators aſk why Vir‘gil does Muſæus the honour to place him in the ‘Elyſian fields, and to addreſs the Sibyl's words to ‘him, rather than to Homer. I once ſaw a company ‘of very learned men, almoſt unanimouſly agree, that ‘Virgil ought indeed to have beſtowed this honour on ‘Homer, but that his jealouſy of him prevented it. ‘I did not at that time reflect on it, and yet nothing is

---

(27) Vavaſſor, de ludicra Dictione, pag. 172, & ſeq.

(28) Servius, in Eclogam, VI, ver. 11.

(29) Intituled in Auctores pene omnes, antiquos potiſſimum, cenſio.

(30) Tacit. de Orator. cap. xiii,

(31) In libro quem contra obtrectatores Virgilii ſcripſit. Donat. in Vita Virgilii.

(32) Donat. ubi ſupra.

(33) See Servius upon the ninetieth verſe of the third Eclogue.

(34) Prolatis Bucolicis innominatus quidam reſcripſit Antibucolica, duas modo eclogas, ſed inſulſiſſime παρῳδήσας. Donatus, ubi ſupra.

(35) Id. ibid.

(36) Id. ibid.

(37) Horat. Epiſt. i, lib. ii, ver. 13.

(38) Virgil. Æneïd. lib. vi, ver. 660.

eaſily pleaſed with their own productions; he poliſhed and reviſed his verſes with an extreme ſeverity [F]; and we are told that his Æneis, which we look upon as a finiſhed piece, was very ſhort of perfection in his opinion, and that he earneſtly deſired it might be burnt, becauſe he had not been able to put the laſt hand to it [G]. He deſigned to beſtow a retirement of three years in poliſhing it (c); after which he intended to apply the remainder of his life ſolely to Philoſophical ſtudies; but he died in the mean while at Brunduſium on the 22d of September 734 [H]. His corps purſuant to his order was tranſported to Naples (d). The Emperor was infinitely pleaſed with his poems

(c) Donatus, ubi ſupra.

(d) Id. ibid.

‘ is more ridiculous than this, and the anſwer to this objection is obvious; which is, that Virgil would have been guilty of a horrible fault in giving this commiſſion to Homer in Æneas's life-time, ſince he was not born till a long time after. Wherefore to anſwer the Sibyl, this wiſe Poet has choſen Muſæus who being Orpheus's diſciple was much antienter than Homer, for he lived about the time of the Trojan war itſelf. It is ſcarce credible that Scaliger the Father ſhould be ſo much miſtaken as he is, when he takes Muſæus, the author of the ſmall poem of Leander and Hero, who, as many learned men believe, was later than Virgil himſelf, for this antient Muſæus; and that he ſhould alledge, to ſhew how much this Poet was ſuperior to Homer, that it was for that reaſon that Virgil preferred him to Homer in the honour which he did him in the Elyſian fields, without ever thinking how impertinent it would have been to place Homer in hell before the death of Æneas, Ulyſſes, and ſo many heroes, whoſe adventures and exploits he ſung. If Homer had lived during the Trojan war, he had never choſen it for the ſubject of his poem; and he muſt have diſpatched his Iliad and Odyſſey very haſtily in ſeven years, in order to be ready to hold this dialogue with the Sibyl. But it is plainly proved that he did not live till long after; and as no reaſon obliged Virgil to be guilty of this error in Chronology, and it being impoſſible for him to be ignorant of it, he therefore avoided ſuch a groſs fault: which would be, in a word, to make Homer die before he was born. I believe, on the contrary, that if he could handſomely have mentioned him, he would very willingly have done him that honour, nothing appearing in his character, as I have obſerved in my Preface, unworthy of a generous mind (39).’

The learned Turnebus (40), who mentions this objection againſt Virgil, hath made no anſwer to it; whence it ought to be concluded, that the moſt learned men do not always think of what ſhould moſt naturally and neceſſarily occur to them when they are writing on a ſubject.

[F] He reviſed his verſes with an extreme ſeverity.] He ſpent three years on his Eclogues; ſeven on his Georgics, and eleven or twelve on his Æneis (41). In compoſing the ſecond of theſe three works, he dictated ſeveral of theſe verſes in the morning, and ſpent the reſt of the day in correcting them, that is to ſay, in reducing them to a ſmall number. He compared himſelf to a ſhe-bear, which licks her cubs into ſhape. Cum Georgica ſcriberet, traditur quotidie meditatos mane plurimos verſus dictare ſolitum, ac per totum diem retractando ad pauciſſimos redigere, non abſurde carmen ſe urſæ more parere dicentem, & lambendo demum effingere (42). Aulus Gellius informs us of the ſame thing. ‘ Amici familiareſque P. Vergilii in his, quæ de ingenio moribuſque ejus memoriæ tradiderunt, dicĕre eum ſolitum ferunt, parere ſe verſus more atque ritu urſino: namque, ut illa beſtia fetum ederet ineffigiatum informemque, lambendoque id poſteà, quod ita ediſſet, conformaret & fingeret; proinde ingenii quoque ſui partus recentes rudi eſſe facie & imperfecta: ſed deinceps tractando colendoque reddere iis ſe oris & vultus lineamenta. Hoc virum judicii ſubtiliſſimi ingenue atque vere dixiſſe res, inquit, judicium facit: nam, quæ reliquit perfecta expolitaque, quibuſque impoſuit cenſus atque delectus ſui ſupremam manum, omni poëticæ venuſtatis laude florent: ſed quæ procraſtinata ſunt ab eo ut poſt recenſerentur, & abſolvi, quoniam mors præverterat, nequiverunt, nequaquam poëtarum elegantiſſimi nomine atque judicio digna ſunt (43). - - - The friends and acquaintances of Virgil, among other things which they have delivered down to us concerning his genius and manners, take notice of an expreſſion which he frequently made uſe of, viz. that he brought forth verſes as a ſhe-bear brings forth her young; for as that beaſt is delivered of a ſhapeleſs cub, which ſhe afterwards reduces into a proper form by licking, ſo the productions of his mind at their firſt appearance had a rude and unfiniſhed aſpect; and that it was an after-poliſhing which gave them their true lineaments and features. Experience itſelf ſhews that there was a great deal of candour and truth in the confeſſion of this exquiſite judge; ſince thoſe things, to which he gave the finiſhing ſtroke, are ſet off and enriched with all the beauties of poetry; whereas thoſe that he left to be reviſed afterwards, and which he could not finiſh, becauſe death prevented him, are by no means worthy of the name and judgment of a man who is deſervedly eſteemed the moſt elegant of all Poets.’

[G] We are told . . . . that he earneſtly deſired his Æneis might be burnt, becauſe he had not been able to put the laſt hand to it.] This is affirmed in his life aſcribed to Donatus. See below remark [L] (44). This life contains a great many falſities, wherefore it would be very excuſable to call this a lie (45), if other authors had not mentioned it alſo; but ſince Pliny, Aulus Gellius, and Macrobius have ſaid it, we may ſafely allow the fact, without any danger of paſſing for too credulous. Pliny's words are: ‘ Divus Auguſtus carmina Virgilii cremari contra teſtamenti ejus verecundiam vetuit: majuſque ita vati teſtimonium contigit quam ſi ipſe ſua probaviſſet (46). - - - The Emperor Auguſtus forbade that the poems of Virgil ſhould be burnt, as he had out of modeſty ordered in his laſt will; which is a higher commendation to the Poet than if he himſelf had approved of his own works.’ Aulus Gellius immediately after the words, cited in the preceding remark, goes on thus: ‘ Itaque cum morbo oppreſſus adventare mortem videret; petivit oravitque à ſuis amiciſſimis impenſe, ut Æneïda, quam nondum ſatis elimaſſet, adolerent (47). - - - Therefore when the violence of his diſtemper increaſed, and he foreſaw that death was near, he earneſtly beſought his moſt intimate friends, that they would burn the Æneis, becauſe he had not ſufficiently poliſhed it.’ See Macrobius in the twenty-fourth chapter of the firſt book of his Saturnalia.

[H] He died . . . . at Brunduſium on the twenty-ſecond of September 734.] Father la Rue ſaith it was in the year 735, and that he was born in 684. I have followed their chronology, who have placed his birth in 683, and his death in 734. They agree with Father la Rue in the conſulſhips of Virgil's birth and death, but not in the years of thoſe conſulſhips. The like variations run through almoſt all parts of the antient Conſular Faſti. This diverſity is of no great conſequence here. They all make Virgil live the ſame number of years. The following variation is of another nature. Pliny ſeems to have placed his death in the year 740. ‘ Hæc, ſaith he (48), Virgilii vatis ætate incognita à cujus obitu XC aguntur anni. - - - Theſe things were unknown in the time of Virgil, who died ninety years ago.’ When Pliny wrote the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his work, Titus had been but ſix times Conſul; he therefore wrote it before the year 832, which was that of the ſeventh Conſulate of Titus (49); and it is very probable that he wrote it in 830, under the ſixth Conſulate of this ſon of Veſpaſian, and that having reviſed his work, he inſerted that date throughout. Now he reckons but ninety years from the death of Virgil, which therefore ſhould be placed in the year 740. Obſerve, that on ſuch occaſions, he generally aims at an exact ſupputation, not contenting himſelf with an even number. Notwithſtanding which I believe that in this place he made uſe of an even number, or rather that he compiled the fourteenth book of his Natural Hiſtory in the year 825 (50), when, in a litteral ſenſe, it was ninety years ſince Virgil's death. In reviſing his work he propoſed to reduce all the particular dates which he had uſed to that of his

(39) Segrais, remarks upon the ſixth book of the Æneis, p. 164, & ſeq. Amſterd. 1700.

(40) Turneb. Adverſar. lib. xxviii, cap. xxxvi, pag. m. 631, col. 1.

(41) Donat. ubi ſupra.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) Aulus Gellius, lib. xvii, cap. x, pag. m. 459.

(44) Number IV.

(45) Corradus does it. See Virgil's life written by Father la Rue, and prefixed to the Commentary, in uſum Delphini.

(46) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xxx, p. m. 53.

(47) Aulus Gellius, ubi ſupra.

(48) Plinius, lib. xiv, cap. 1, pag. m. 114.

(49) Others ſay it was the 831ſt. Thoſe, for example, who place the death of Virgil in the year 734.

(50) I ſuppoſe here that the year in which Virgil died, is not the 734th, as I have put it in the text of this article, but the year 735.

poems (e). Nothing is more ridiculous than the ſtories of his Magic, and the pretended wonders which he ſhewed the Neapolitans [I]. The verſions of, and the commentaries on, his reviſal, but probably forgot to alter the date of the fourteenth book, and left the number XC. Thoſe who have corrected their own writings will bear witneſs, that notwithſtanding all their attention ſeveral things have eſcaped them, which obſtruct the perfect uniformity of a large book (51).

But tho' we ſhould ſuppoſe that there were really but ninety years betwixt the death of Virgil and Titus's ſixth conſulate; and that thoſe who fix his death in the year of Rome 735, ought to ſtand corrected by this paſſage of Pliny, where it is determined to the year 740, we could not help diſcovering a groſs error in Triſtan's commentaries. This Antiquarian imagines (52) that at the time of Caius Cæſar's expedition againſt the Parthians, Virgil intimates that he finiſhed his Georgicks ; for it is our Caïus Cæſar, whom he certainly mentions in theſe verſes towards the end of the laſt book of that work,

> Hæc ſuper arvorum cultu, pecorumque canebam,
> Et ſuper arboribus : Cæſar dum magnus ad altum
> Fulminat Euphratem bello, victorque volentes
> Per populos dat jura, viamque affectat Olympo.

> Thus have I ſung of fields, and flocks, and trees,
> And of the waxen work of lab'ring bees ;
> While mighty Cæſar thundring from afar,
> Seeks on Euphrates banks the ſpoils of war :
> With conqu'ring arms aſſerts his country's cauſe,
> With arts of peace the willing people draws :
> On the glad earth the golden age renews,
> And his great father's path to Heav'n purſues.
> DRYDEN.

and not Auguſtus, as it hath been hitherto thought : for it ought to be conſidered, that Auguſtus was not in this war, but Caïus his nephew (53), and adopted ſon, who forced Phraates, King of the Parthians, to reſign Armenia to the Romans. If this author had been at the trouble of looking into chronological tables, he would have found that the conſulate under which Virgil's death is placed, is too far diſtant from the time of Caïus Cæſar's expedition, to countenance any ſuppoſition that this great Poet was compoſing his Georgics during the ſaid Caïus Cæſar's war with the Parthians. His expedition happened in, or about, the year of Rome 752. If after that Virgil had wrote his Æneis, he muſt then have lived at leaſt till the year 763. This doth not want a refutation. I ſhall only ſay that Father Noris alledges the common opinion concerning Virgil's dying in 735, againſt Triſtan (54).

[I] The ſtories of his Magic, and the pretended wonders which he ſhewed the Neapolitans.] I think it was in the year 1625, that a book was publiſhed under the title of, A new Judgment concerning what hath been ſaid and written for and againſt the book of the curious doctrine of the wits of this age. Virgil is there accuſed of having been a celebrated enchanter, and necromancer, as well as having performed innumerable wonders by the aſſiſtance of his Magic (55). This was tranſcribed verbatim from the book which the Sieur de Lancre publiſhed againſt the diſbelief of Sorcery. This induced Mr Naudé to write an apology for all thoſe great perſonages, who were falſely ſuſpected of Magic. He upbraids Bodin and de Lancre, who put Virgil into the number of Magicians, with the unreaſonableneſs of their copying this falſity from the moſt ſcandalous and dirty writings of certain authors, who were the very ſink and ſediment of the moſt barbarous writers (56) . . . . . This phœnix of Latin poetry, continues he, is not accuſed of that Magic and poetical fury, which, by the perfection of his works, charmed all the politeſt wits . . . . but of the ſuperſtitious and criminal Magic, of which this ornament of Parnaſſus would never have been ſuſpected, by a leſs degree of impudence than that unbounded one of theſe muſhrooms and fabuliſts, for which I cannot tell whether they or the two modern authors, and ſome others, quos fama obſcura recondit, are more blameable ; ſince thoſe laſt are ſo ridiculouſly credulous as to admit ſuch cheats as legal evidences of a calumny, which turns much more to their prejudice than to that of Virgil . . . . There is indeed reaſon to wonder at thoſe, who at preſent make uſe of the lies and fabulous inventions of ſeven or eight ſlaves to barbariſm, and the opinions of the populace, in order to draw this Poet's name in their catalogue of Magicians, and relate a thouſand ſtories, which, if true, would only cauſe him to be eſteemed one of the moſt expert that ever was in that art (57). After which he retracts what he had ſaid (58), that we were beholden for all thoſe fables to Helinandus the Monk. He took it on Geſner's authority, that this Monk flouriſhed in the year 1069 : but being convinced that he lived about the year 1209 (59), I am, adds he (60), obliged to confeſs ingenuouſly that I was miſtaken, and that the firſt author of all theſe idle fancies, was, in my opinion, that Gervaſius, who, as Theodoric à Niem † ſaith, was Chancellor to the Emperor Otho III (61), to whom he preſented his book, intituled, Ocia Imperatoris, which is really ſo ſtuffed with abſurdities and fables, as I remember to have already obſerved, that I can hardly perſuade myſelf that he was in his ſenſes when he wrote it. This author relates (62) ; ‘ That Virgil made a copper fly, which, for the ſpace of eight years, remained on one of the gates of Naples, to which he had fixed it, and prevented any fly entring the city ; where he alſo built ſhambles, in which fleſh never ſtank or putrified ; that on one of the gates of the ſaid city he placed two large ſtone ſtatues, one of which he called merry and beautiful, and the other melancholy and hideous ; that theſe ſtatues were of that virtue, that any perſon entring the town by the ſide where the firſt ſtood, was bleſſed with a happy ſucceſs in all his affairs, whilſt he who came in on the ſide of the gate where the other was fixed, found himſelf unfortunate, and that every thing croſſed his intention ; that he cauſed a braſs ſtatue with a trumpet in its mouth to be erected on a high mountain near the city of Naples, which ſounded ſo loud when the north wind blew, that the fire and ſmoak of Vulcan's forges, which are at preſent to be ſeen near Pozzuolo, were driven towards the ſea, without doing any damage to the inhabitants ; that it was he who cauſed the baths of Calatura di petra bagno & adjuto di l'homo, to be made, with the beautiful inſcriptions in gold letters, which were after broken and defaced by the Phyſicians of Salerno, who were diſpleaſed that by them the people were inſtructed what diſeaſe each bath would cure ; that he prevented any perſon being injured in the wonderful grotto cut out in mount Pauſilippo to ſerve as a way to Naples ; and laſtly that he made a public fire, at which every perſon was free to warm himſelf, near which he placed a braſs archer with his arrow fixed, and his bow bent, and this inſcription, whoever ſtrikes me, I let fly my arrow ; that it afterwards happened that a madman ſtruck the archer, who did not fail to ſhoot his arrow directly into the fire, which immediately went out.’ Let us now take a view of the tranſcribers and improvers of theſe ridiculous fables. ‘ All theſe abſurdities were firſt tranſcribed from this author by Helinandus a Monk of Freſmont, in his Univerſal Chronicle ‡, and afterwards by Alexander Neckam an Engliſh Benedictin Monk, who relates ſome of the fore-mentioned ſtories in his book of the nature and property of things ; beſides which, he adds, that Naples being afflicted with an infinite number of contagious horſe-leeches, was delivered from that plague inſtantly, upon Virgil's throwing a golden horſe-leech into a well ; and that he had encompaſſed his houſe and garden, in which it never rained, with an immoveable air, that ſerved inſtead of a wall, and that he there built a bridge of braſs, by means of which he tranſported himſelf whether he pleaſed ; that he alſo built a miraculous Belfry, which, though of ſtone, moved in juſt proportion to the vibrations of the incloſed bell ; that he made the ſtatues, called the Salvation of Rome, which were watched night and day by the Prieſts, becauſe as ſoon as any nation deſigned to revolt, and to take up arms againſt the Roman Empire, the ſtatue which by its mark repreſented that nation, and was adored by it, immediately moved itſelf, and thereby rung a ſmall bell which hung about its neck, and pointed with its finger to the rebellious

---

(e) See the remark [L], numb. IV.

(51) See, above, the remark [K], of the article Tacitus, towards the middle.

(52) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. i, pag. 137.

(53) Triſtan ſhould have ſaid his grand-ſon. He did not conſider that the word nepos ſpoken of Caius with reſpect to Auguſtus, does not ſignify nephew.

(54) Noris Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 249.

(55) See the preface to the Apologia des grans Hommes accuſez de Magie.

(56) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, ch. xxi, pag. 607, Paris 1625, in 8vo.

(57) Id. ibid. pag. 609.

(58) In the firſt chapter, pag. 27.

(59) He ſays, pag. 611, that he has read in the lives of the Virtuous Monks of Ciſteaux, that Vincentius Bellovacenſis, in his Speculum, makes him live in 1209.

(60) Naudé, ib. pag. 611.

† Lib. 2. de ſchiſmate, cap. 19, 20.

(61) It ſhould be Otho IV.

(62) Naudé, ib. & pag. ſeq.

‡ Lib. 16.

on, his works are numberleſs (d). Thoſe who have diſguiſed them in burleſque verſe [K], have

---

(d) See the liſt of them prefixed to the Commentary which the Abbot de Marolles added to his tranſlation of Virgil. Mr de Segrais, who died in 1701, had promiſed a tranſlation of the Georgics, which was expected with great impatience; as his performance upon the Æneis, had been very much eſteemed. It is a verſion in verſe with a very fine Preface, and very curious Notes. A ſecond edition of it, corrected by the author, and printed in Holland, came out in the year 1700.

‘ nation, ſo that its name might be ſeen written, which the Prieſt carried to the Emperor, who immediately prepared an army in order to ſubdue and reduce it to reaſon. This is likewiſe taken notice of by an anonymous author, who above one hundred and twenty years ago, collected the lives of the Philoſophers and Poets; for when he comes to Virgil, he poſitively tells us, ‡ Hic Philoſophia naturali præditus etiam Necromanticus fuit, & mira quadam arte hæc feciſſe narratur: - - - He was an adept in Natural Philoſophy, and likewiſe a Necromancer; for he is ſaid to have performed all theſe things by ſome wonderful art. After which, he recites the above-mentioned ſtories, which were afterwards copied verbatim from the Latin of this anonymous writer, by Symphorian Champier *, and Albert of Eib, who was ſo weak as to inſert them in the ſecond part of his Margarita Poëtica, under the title of ſentences and authorities excerpted from Diogenes Laërtius, and yet not content with this, hath enlarged them with the ſtory of a Roman Courtezan, who having hung up Virgil in a baſket in the middle of a tower; he in revenge ſo extinguiſhed all the fires in Rome, that it was impoſſible to light any of them, any otherwiſe than by kindling them at the privy parts of this female derider; and beſides the fire being ſo incommunicable, that no one could light at another's fire, every perſon was obliged to ſee and viſit her: and this fine ſtory was ſcarce publiſhed but one Gratian du Pont thought it worthy of being inſerted in his controverſies betwixt the female and male ſexes, printed at Toulouſe in the year 1534, as a very manifeſt proof of the malice and malignity of women: his verſes ſhall conclude this long deduction of follies.

‡ Cap. 103.

* Lib. de claris Medicinæ Scriptorib. tract. 2.

Que dirons nous du bon homme Virgile,
Que tu pendis ſi vray que l'Evangile,
Dans ta corbeille jadis en ta feneſtre,
Donc tant marry fut qu'eſtoit poſſible eſtre.
A luy qui eſtoit homme de grand honneur,
Ne fis tu pas un tres-grand deſhonneur?
Helas ſi feis, car c'eſtoit dedans Rome,
Que là pendu demeura le pauvre homme,
Par ta cautelle & ta deception,
Un jour qu'on fit groſſe proceſſion
Parmy la ville, donc dudit perſonnage,
Qui ne s'en rit ne fut eſtimé ſage (63).

(63) Naudé, ubi ſupra, ch. xxi, pag. 614, & ſeq.

What ſhall we ſay of Virgil, who
Was in a baſket ſlung by you,
And pendant from your window ſeen,
Which gave the honeſt man the ſpleen.
Did you not foul diſhonour fix
On this great Poet by your tricks?
Moſt certainly you did, ſince he Was by your fraud conſtrain'd to be A hanging ſpectacle in Rome
Unto the gazing vulgar, come
To ſee a huge proceſſion paſs,
Where he that laugh'd not was eſteem'd an aſs.

Naudé doth not trouble himſelf with refuting theſe fooleries, but takes ſome notice that in the life of Virgil, aſcribed to Tiberius Donatus, St Jerom's maſter, it is ſaid that this great Poet's father was firſt ſervant, and then ſon-in-law to a certain Magus (64). He anſwers, that according to Delrio and La Cerda, this life ſuch as we now have it, was not written by that antient Donatus. What we find there concerning Virgil's father, adds he (65), is ſufficient to ſhew that the piece is ſuppoſititious. This is a ſtrange blunder; for it is taking the word Magus, which the beſt Critics correct by Magius or Majus, for a Magician. The authority of Johannes Sariſberienſis, who mentions this brazen fly which drove all the flies out of Naples, does not ſeem of any great weight. Toſtatus †† who places Virgil amongſt the practiſers of Necromancy, is not a witneſs of any credit, ſince he grounds what he ſaith on the Monk Helinandus's Chronicle. But ſince the authors, continues Naudé (66), ‘ who have ſpoke of Virgil's Magic, are ſo numerous, that it is impoſſible to treat of them particularly one after another, without loſing a great deal of time, and admitting abundance of tautologies, I ought to imitate the Civilians, who take authorities per ſaturam, and making but one article of all the reſt, to ſhew, that though Le Loyer ⸸⸸ mentions his eccho ‡‡, Paracelſus his magical images and figures , Helmoldus his repreſentation of the city of Naples which he ſhut up in a glaſs bottle, Sibyllus † and the author of the book intituled, The image of the world, the head which he made in order to be informed of future events ⸸; Petrarch and Theodoric à Niem ‡ the Grotto at Naples which he cauſed to be cut out at the requeſt of Auguſtus; * Vigenere his alphabet; †† Trithemius his book of tables and calculations, to diſcover the genius of all perſons, and laſtly, thoſe who have viſited the Duke of Florence's cabinet, a mirrour ſaid to be that which this great Poet made uſe of in Catoptromancy: yet all theſe authorities are too modern, abſurd, or ill grounded, to turn the ſcale againſt the ſilence of all the authors who lived during the ſpace of a thouſand years, and who would be greatly to blame, not to have mentioned or obſerved any of all thoſe wonders, if there had really been any ſuch, ſince they have taken notice of a great many particulars of leſs moment.’ I paſs by ſome reaſons which he alledges, and what he obſerves as a fable, That all the Sodomites in the world died on the night of JESUS CHRIST's nativity, and that as the famous Civilian ⸸⸸ Salicetus aſſures us, Virgil was one of them (67). But I ought not to omit what follows. ‘ As for the preceding authorities, it ought not to be imagined that Petrarch, Theodoric à Niem, Vigenere, and Trithemius, were ſo fooliſh, as ſcandalouſly to proſtitute their credit and reputation to the cenſure of thoſe that are not eaſily impoſed on by ſuch fables; for it is certain that whatever they have ſaid, was in order to refute them, and give us to underſtand that they were not ſo eaſy and credulous as the other authors, whom I have cited, who can never atone for the fault which they have committed, in ſuffering themſelves to be miſled by the ſcandalous and weak influences of hear-ſays, ſtreet-ballads, and the vulgar opinion of the inhabitants of Naples, and the circumjacent places, who always aſcribed every thing to Virgil's Magic, which ſeemed ſomewhat extraordinary or ſurprizing, and for which they could not find another cauſe; as it is very eaſy to judge from the wonderful grotto hewn out of the mountain Pauſilippo near the city of Naples, which Strabo (who according to Athenæus, lived in the time of Scipio, and the taking of Carthage, or, according to Patricius, in Auguſtus's and Tiberius's time) mentions as very antient; notwithſtanding which, the peaſants thereabouts affirm, that it was hewn out by Virgil at the preſſing inſtances of Auguſtus, becauſe the top of the mountain under which it is cut, was ſo peſtered with ſerpents and dragons, that he muſt be a very bold man who ventured to croſs it (68).’ In fine, He inquires (69) into the firſt cauſe of this ſuſpicion, and believes he hath found it in the mathematical learning which Virgil acquired. ‘ This is what confirmed all the weak and credulous in this erroneous opinion, which they had already entertained of him by reaſon of his Pharmaceutria, - - the Sorcereſs, or eighth Eclogue, where, ſays Apuleius, he hath learnedly repreſented, Vittas molleis & verbenas pingues, & thura maſcula, & licia diſcolora, - - - The ſoft fillets, the fat vervains, the male incenſe, and threads of different colours, and whatever belongs to Magic; ſo that he could not avoid being ſuſpected of the practice of it, by thoſe who were hindered by their ignorance

(64) Ibid. pag. 621.

(65) Ibid. pag. 622.

†† Comment. in epiſt. D. Hieron. ad Paulinum.

(66) Naudé, ubi ſupra, pag. 626.

⸸⸸ Livr. 1. des ſpectres ch. 6.

‡‡ Tom. 1. oper. tract. de imaginibus cap. 11.

 Lib. 4. Hiſt. Slavor. cap. 19.

† Peregrin. quæſt. decade 3. c. 2. quæſtiunc. 3.

⸸ In itinerario.

‡ Lib. 2. de ſchiſmat. cap. 19.

* Pag. 330. of his chiffres.

†† Antipal. l. 1. cap. 3.

⸸⸸ Apud Emanuel. de Moura, lib. de Enſalm. ſect. iii. c. 4. numb. 12.

(67) Naudé, ubi ſupra, pag. 628, 629.

(68) Id. ibid. pag. 629.

(69) Ibid. pag. 631.

have raiſed the choler of ſome learned men; and it muſt be confeſſed that it is not altogether without reaſon. The commentary in uſum Delphini, by Father de la Rue, the Jeſuit, is a very good one. There is prefixed to it a life of this Poet, digeſted according to the order of the conſulſhips, and adorned with very judicious remarks. I ſhall cenſure ſome faults in Mr Moreri [L]. I have avoided mentioning a certain poplar, called Virgil's tree; which, according to the cuſtom of the country, was planted when his 'ignorance and the barbarity of their age, from knowing that it was tranſlated verbatim from Theocritus (70).'

Gaffarel endeavours to defend the authority of Gervaſius Tilberienſis, and to anſwer Naudæus (71); but his endeavours are very ridiculous.

[K] Thoſe who have diſguiſed them in burleſque verſe.] Scarron hath ſucceeded herein much better than all the reſt; but the majeſty of this Poem deſerves more reſpect than to be ſo daringly prophaned. Vavaſſor the Jeſuit complained of it, and obſerved that Italy firſt made way for this liberty: 'Vide, Balzaci, de iſtorum hominum conſiliis, & inſtituta ratione quid ſentiam, quidve primum venerit in mentem, cum perſonatos aliquot ejuſmodi, & ementitos Virgilios, neque enim hanc ab uno duntaxat contumeliam paſſus eſt, in manus ſumpſi. Mihi viſi ſunt, qui nobiliſſimum & clariſſimum poëtam fœditate interpretationis ſuæ turpârunt, eodem illum modo tractare voluiſſe, quo Didonem tractavit prius, adeoque vices innocentis & calamitoſæ reginæ ulciſci. Ut is enim Didonem Æneæ turpiter indigneque proſtituit, neque ullam rationem habuit vel temporis, cum ab Ænea Dido diſtaret ipſis trecentis annis; vel famæ & exiſtimationis publicæ, quod eadem omnes ætatis ſuæ feminas pudicitiæ laude anteiret: ita iſti nulla ingenuæ artis præſtantia, nulla principis poetæ dignitate deterriti ſunt, quo minus puram & caſtam poëſim, corruptam & adulteratam extruderent in publicum, diffamarent malis dictis ſuis, eique quantum poſſent, petulanter illuderent (72). . . . . Quamquam hic ego noſtris hominibus non habeo quid præcipue ſuccenſeam, cum nihil in iſto genere per ſe ac primi, ſed exemplo & imitatione peccarint. Sicut nec ipſi præter ceteros ſuccenſere mihi debent, ſi commune factum, & aliorum potius, quam Gallorum, reprehendo. Fecerunt videlicet flagitium antea & Joannes Baptiſta Lallius, cujus Æneis traveſtita mihi caſu nuper occurrit, & alii, ut audio, recentes Itali ſcriptores (73). - - - - Hear, Balzac, what my ſentiments are concerning the deſigns and proceedings of theſe men, and what my firſt reflexions were on ſeeing ſome falſe and counterfeit Virgils of this kind; for he has ſuffered the like indignity from more than one perſon. It appeared to me that they who had disfigured this noble and renowned Poet by their vile conſtructions, had reſolved to treat him in the ſame manner as he himſelf treated Dido, and thus to revenge the quarrel of that innocent and unfortunate Queen. For as Virgil proſtituted Dido to Æneas in a baſe and unworthy manner, without having the leaſt regard either to the diſtance of time betwixt them which was three hundred years, or to her fame and character in the world, which allowed her to have been the moſt virtuous woman of her age; ſo theſe men were neither deterred by the noble excellency of the art, nor by the dignity of the Prince of Poets, from corrupting and adulterating, and, in that manner, publiſhing to the world his pure and chaſte Poetry, from diſgracing him with their ſcandalous expreſſions, and from putting the higheſt affront upon him, which it was poſſible for them to do. . . . . Though I have no reaſon to be chiefly offended at my countrymen, ſince they were not the firſt to tranſgreſs, but were led into it by imitating the example of others. Neither have they any reaſon to be particularly angry with me, ſince I only find fault with a general offence, which concerns other nations more than it does them. The crime was committed before by John Baptiſta Lallius, whoſe Æneids burleſqued, I accidentally ſaw not long ago, and by ſome other late Italian authors, as I am informed.'

[L] I ſhall cenſure ſome faults in Mr Moreri.] I. His manner of placing his words in this ſentence, the two firſt works were written in favour of Mæcenas and Pollio, would make one believe, that his Bucolics were compoſed in favour of Mæcenas, and his Georgics in favour of Pollio. But he either deſigned, or ought to have ſaid the contrary. And if he had poſtponed Mæcenas to Pollio, he had yet been guilty of expreſſing himſelf wrong; for a perſon who ſhould ſay that Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics were written in favour of Pollio and Mæcenas, would ſpeak illogically (74), and contrary to the laws of our Grammar. This ſentence ſignifies that each of thoſe pieces was written for Pollio and Mæcenas. But that is falſe. In the Dutch editions this paſſage is altered thus: The two firſt works are full of the praiſes of Mæcenas and Pollio. But this doth not mend the two faults which I have noted, and introduces a third, ſince it is certain that Mæcenas is not praiſed in the Eclogues, and that he is mentioned in very few places of the Georgics, and always very ſuccinctly, and ſometimes without any praiſe. Nevertheleſs it might be ſaid, that this Poem was compoſed in his favour, becauſe it is dedicated to him; and it is to him that the author addreſſes himſelf in the firſt and laſt book, and in ſeveral other places. I do not deny but that Pollio is praiſed in the Eclogues; but as ſeveral others have a good ſhare in the commendations, what Donatus diſtributes amongſt four perſons (75), ſhould not have been beſtowed upon one; and I ſhould rather have ſaid, as he doth, that they were compoſed by the encouragement of Pollio (76). I ſaid in my firſt edition of this book, that Donatus making Virgil to be twelve years in compiling the Æneis, Mr Moreri ſhould not have ſaid eleven years: but at this time I renounce my former cenſure, for ſeveral editions have it annis undecim, and not annis duodecim as mine hath, which is the Virgil Variorum printed at Leyden in 1680 (77). II. Virgil did not die going to meet Auguſtus as he returned from his eaſtern journey. He went into Greece and Aſia in ſearch of a retirement, in order to be at leiſure to poliſh his Æneis; and in this journey, he met Auguſtus at Athens; Auguſtus, I ſay, who was returning from the eaſt. This determined him to return into Italy with the Emperor: but the diſeaſe which ſeized him in a journey, which out of curioſity he undertook to Megara, increaſing upon him in his paſſage, he arrived at Brunduſium in ſuch an ill ſtate of health that he died in a few days. Thus the ſtory is told in his life. III. Since according to Moreri, he was born in the year of Rome 684, and died in 735, he could not poſſibly live fifty-two years. This fault of Moreri is alſo in the life of Virgil. The day, and the conſulſhips of his birth and death are noted in it. Thoſe two intervals do not quite make up fifty-one years, and Donatus nevertheleſs ſuppoſes that Virgil went into Greece at the age of fifty-two years. IV. Theſe words: As he was dying, he ordered that his Æneis ſhould be burned, but Auguſtus preſerved that admirable Poem, and commanded Tucca and Varius to correct it, are very fallacious, and it is very neceſſary they ſhould be rectified. The fact is thus. Virgil finding that his diſtemper increaſed, earneſtly aſked for his manuſcripts in order to commit his Æneis to the flames; and becauſe no body was ſo complaiſant as to bring them, he ordered by his laſt-will, that they ſhould be burned as an imperfect work. Tucca and Varius repreſented to him, that Auguſtus would not permit it. Whereupon Virgil bequeathed his writings to them on condition that they ſhould add nothing to them, and ſhould, if they found any unfiniſhed verſes, leave them in the ſame condition. Cum gravari morbo ſeſe ſentiret, ſcrinia ſæpe & magna inſtantia petivit, crematurus Æneida: quibus negatis, teſtamento comburi juſſit, ut rem inemendatam imperfectamque. Verùm Tucca & Varius monuerunt, id Auguſtum non permiſſurum. Tunc eidem Vario, ac ſimul Tuccæ, ſcripta ſub ea conditione legavit, ne quid adderent quod à ſe editum non eſſet, & verſus etiam imperfectos, ſi qui erant, relinquerent (78). So that Auguſtus was no farther the cauſe of the preſerving of this Poem, than that the author deſiſted from his reſolution, being told, that this Prince would not ſuffer the execution of it. It redounds to the glory of

(70) Ibid.

(71) Gaffarel, Curioſitez inoüies, ch. vii, num. 13, pag. m. 169, & ſeq.

(72) Franc. Vavaſſor. De ludicra Dictione, pag. 180.

(73) Id. ibid. pag. 182.

(74) Logic teaches us that in all compounded and copulative propoſitions, all the attributes ought to agree with the ſubject. See the Art of Thinking, Part. ii, ch. ix, where they have nevertheleſs, forgot to ſet forth ſuch an example as this.

(75) Cum res Romanas inchoaſſet, offenſus, materia & nominum aſperitate, ad Bucolica tranſiit: maxime ut Aſinium Pollionem, Alphenum, Varium, & Cornelium Gallum celebraret; quia in diſtributione agrorum, qui poſt Phillippenſem victoriam veteranis, triumvirorum juſſu, trans Padum dividebantur, indemnem ſe præſtitiſſent. - - - When he had begun to treat of the Roman Hiſtory, he was ſo diſpleaſed with the ſubject and the harſhneſs of the names that he laid aſide that deſign, and took to writing Paſtorals; chiefly that he might have an opportunity of praiſing Aſinius Pollio, Alphenus, Varius, and Cornelius Gallus; becauſe in the diſtribution of the lands on the other ſide of the Po, which were ſhared among the Veteran ſoldiers by the command of the Triumviri, after the victory at Philipi, they had ſaved his lands. Donatus, ubi ſupra.

(76) Bucolica triennio Aſinii Pollionis ſuaſu perfecit. - - - He compleated his Paſtorals in the ſpace of three years, by the advice of Aſinius Pollio. Id. ib.

(77) Duodecim is to be found in ſeveral other editions.

(78) Donat. ubi ſupra.

his mother was delivered of him, and was obſerved to grow ſo faſt, that in a few years it equalled poplars much older. Such women as were with child or newly brought to bed made it an object of religion (f).

Among Caligula's follies, we may undoubtedly reckon his contempt and hatred of Virgil; whoſe writings and effigies he endeavoured to remove out of all libraries (g): he had the confidence to ſay that Virgil had neither wit nor learning (h). The Emperor Alexander Severus judged quite otherwiſe; he called him the Plato of the Poets, and placed his picture with that of Cicero in the Temple, in which he had placed Achilles and other great men (i). Cæcilius the Grammarian was the firſt who read lectures on the poems of Virgil, whoſe cotemporary he was (k).

(f) Acceſſit aliud præſagium: ſiquidem virga populea, more regionis in puerperiis eodem ſtatim loco depacta, ita brevi coaluit, ut multo ante ſatas populos adæquarit. Quæ arbor Virgilii ex eo dicta atque conſecrata eſt; ſumma gravidarum & fetarum religione, ſuſcipientium ibi & ſolventium vota. Donatus, ubi ſupra, initio.

(g) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxxiv. (h) Nullius ingenii minimæque doctrinæ. Id. ibid. (i) Lampridius, in Alex. Severo, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 936. (k) Sueton. de Illuſtr. Gramm. cap. xvi.

---

of this great monarch, that he diſcovered himſelf ſeriouſly intereſted in it, and that he obliged Varius to the punctual performance of the condition under which the manuſcript was left to him (79). What ſhall I ſay concerning thoſe verſes, which this Emperor wrote on Virgil's intention to burn this excellent piece? We have but a ſmall fragment of them (80). What ſhall I ſay farther of the ardour with which, during the moſt difficult expeditions, he deſired that this author would ſend him even the firſt lineaments of his Poem? 'Auguſtus cum tum forte expeditione Cantabrica abeſſet, & ſupplicibus atque minacibus per jocum literis efflagitaret, ut ſibi de Æneide, ut ipſius verba ſunt, vel prima carminis hypographa, vel quodlibet colon mitteret, negavit ſe facturum Virgilius: cui tamen multo poſt, perfecta demum materia, treis omnino libros recitavit: Secundum videlicet, quartum, & ſextum (81). - - - Auguſtus who at that time happened to be employed abroad in the expedition againſt the Cantabri, often begged of Virgil by his letters (which were ſometimes writ in ſupplicant and ſometimes in a threatning ſtile by way of joke) that he would ſend him, as his expreſſion was, the firſt lineaments of his Poem, or if it were no more than a line. Virgil refuſed to do this. But a good while after, when the work was finiſhed, he recited three whole books to him, viz. the ſecond, fourth, and ſixth.' I have elſewhere (82) ſpoken of the effect which the recital of his ſixth book produced. It was very great by reaſon of the beauty of the verſes, and of the art of reading which the author was perfect maſter of. Here are the words which inform us that he read his Georgics to Auguſtus: 'Georgica, reverſo ab Actiaca victoria Auguſto, atque reficiendarum virium cauſa Atellæ commoranti, per continuum quatriduum legit, ſuſcipiente Mæcenate legendi vicem, quoties interpellaretur ipſe vocis offenſione. Pronunciabat autem maxima cum ſuavitate, & lenociniis miris. Seneca tradidit, Julium Montanum poëtam ſolitum dicere, involaturum ſe quædam Virgilio, ſi vocem poſſet, & os, & hypocriſim: eoſdem enim verſus eo pronunciante, bene ſonare: ſine illo, inareſcere, quaſi mutos (83). - - - He was four days imployed in reading the Georgics to Auguſtus, after his return from the battle of Actium, while he remained at Atella for the recovery of his ſtrength. Mæcenas relieved him in the taſk of reading as often as his voice failed him. Now there was a very great ſweetneſs and wonderful charm in his pronunciation. Seneca relates that Julius Montanus the Poet was uſed to ſay that if he could violently ſeize upon any thing belonging to Virgil, it ſhould be his voice, his countenance, and his action: for that the ſame verſes which ſounded well by his pronunciation, did without that ſeem dry and inſipid.' It is impoſſible to do a greater ſervice to a piece of Poetry, than to read it well: it removes ſeveral faults (84), and no Poem is ſo good but an ill reader may ſpoil it. To this may be referred this epigram of Martial:

Quem recitas meus eſt, ô Fidentine, libellus;
Sed male cum recitas, incipit eſſe tuus (85).

The book thou read'ſt was, Fidentinus, mine,
But when thou read'ſt it ill, then mak'ſt it thine.

When an author reads his Play to the Actors to whom he is about to ſell it, woe be to him, if he doth not read it well. This is what Mr Chappuzeau obſerves in his French Theatre. Virgil was therefore very happy, having the talent both of making charming verſes, and of reading them well. Mr Corneille reſembled him but in one of theſe excellencies (86). I return to Moreri. His Vth fault is his ſaying that Auguſtus ordered, that whatever was ſuperfluous in the Æneis, ſhould be ſtruck out without adding any thing to it. Is this rightly to underſtand Donatus's ſummatim emendavit? To correct a book in ſome places, and with reſpect to ſome things, doth it ſignify only to ſtrike out of it what is ſuperfluous? May it not ſignify that ſome words are inſerted in the place of others? VI. Moreri's Virgil, a Roman, and a comic Poet, is a ſign that he was a blind tranſcriber. He had read in Voſſius, Trajani temporibus fuit Virgilius Romanus, Poëta Comicus (87), and miſtruſting nothing he imagined this to be the real name of this Poet; but if he had conſulted the originals, he would have found that Pliny, the younger, cited by Voſſius, ſpeaks of one Verginius or Virginius, and not of one Virgilius. Beſides, Romanus ought not to be tranſlated as an epithet denoting his country, but as the name of his family. Huetius hath obſerved this miſtake of Voſſius in Gyraldus, and Glandorpius: Hæc autem nomina duo ſæpe confundi indicat Virginii Romani Poetæ Comici Plinio in Epiſtolis memorati nomen, qui à Lilio Giraldo, Glandorpio, & Voſſio Virgilius appellatur (88). Mr Couſin miſtakes this paſſage of the Biſhop of Avranches. We ought not to be ſurprized, ſaith he (89), that theſe two names have been confounded, ſince ſeveral learned men of theſe laſt ages have called a certain comic Poet, Virginius Romanus, whom Pliny calls Virgilius Romanus in his Epiſtles. I cannot conclude without obſerving, that when Pliny the younger is commending Virginius Romanus, he informs us that the ſame diſeaſe was obſervable at Rome, which reigns amongſt our modern wits; for he declares that he was none of thoſe who deſpiſed the preſent time, and admired only the Antients. 'Sum ex iis, qui mirer antiquos: non tamen, ut quidam, temporum noſtrorum ingenia deſpicio. Neque enim quaſi laſſa & effœta natura, ut nihil jam laudabile pariat. Atque adeo nuper audii Verginium Romanum paucis legentem comœdiam, ad exemplar veteris comœdiæ ſcriptam, tam bene, ut eſſe quandoque poſſit exemplar (90). - - - I am one of thoſe who admire the antients, but without deſpiſing the moderns, as ſome people do. For nature is not ſo weary and worn out, but that ſhe can ſtill produce ſomething praiſe-worthy. As a proof of this I lately heard Verginius Romanus reading a Comedy to ſome few perſons, which is written after the manner of the Antients, and ſo well done that it might ſerve for a pattern.'

The paſſage above quoted (91) concerning the reading of the Georgics to Auguſtus, wants ſome correction. That Prince after the battle of Actium, in the year of Rome 724 returned into Italy, and met the Senate at Brunduſium, where he ſtaid twenty-ſeven days according to Suetonius, or thirty according to Dion Caſſius, and then went into Aſia, where he ſpent all the winter in making preparations for his expedition to Egypt. It is not then true, that at his return from the war of Actium, our Poet's Georgics were read to him at Atella (92). If he heard them read at this place, it was after the Egyptian war, and not when he returned to Italy, after the battle of Actium (93). I borrow this remark from Father la Rue. I could alledge another reaſon, which is, that Virgil obſerves at the end of his Georgics, that he compoſed this work during Auguſtus's Oriental war; but it may be objected againſt me, that this Poem having coſt Virgil ſeven years labour (94), nothing hinders but part of it might be read to Auguſtus before he went to attack his enemy on the banks of the Nile.

(79) Nihil igitur auctore Auguſto Varius addidit, quod & Maro præceperat, ſed ſummatim emendavit, ut qui verſus etiam imperfectos, ſi qui erant, reliquerit. Id. ibid.

(80) It is in the Life of Virgil.

(81) Id. ibid.

(82) In the firſt article OCTAVIA, remark [C].

(83) Donatus, ubi ſupra.

(84) See Pliny, Epiſt. xv, lib. iii.

(85) Martial. lib. i, Epig. xxxix.

(86) See the Menagiana, pag. 303, 304, of the firſt Dutch edition.

(87) Voſſius, de Poëtis, Latinis, pag. 51.

(88) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Alnet. Quæſt. lib. ii, cap. xv, pag. 239, Edit. Lipſ. 1692.

(89) Journal des Sçavans, Sept. 11, 1690, pag. 642, Dutch Edit.

(90) Plinius, Epiſt. xxi, lib. vi, pag. 319. Edit. Cellarii Lipſiæ 1693.

(91) Citat. (83).

(92) A town of Campania.

(93) Taken from Virgil's Life written by Father la Rue, and prefixed to Virgil, in uſum Delphini. Mr Des Maizeaux informed me that this Jeſuit had made that obſervation.

(94) Georgica ſeptennio Neapoli . . . . confecit. Donat. ubi ſupra.

VIRGIL.

VIRGIL, Biſhop of Saltzburg in the VIIIth century. Mr Moreri mentions him, but omits a particular which deſerves to be related. He hath ſaid nothing of the perſecutions which this prelate ſuffered for believing that there was ſuch a thing as Antipodes [A]. The Court of Rome is reproached on that head, which the flatterers of the Popes endeavour to elude as much as poſſible; but they cannot help our concluding from thence, the groſs ignorance of that age.

[A] He hath ſaid nothing of the perſecutions . . . . . for believing that there was ſuch a thing as Antipodes.] He had hardly divulged this doctrine, but he was accuſed of maintaining that there was another world, and other men under us, another ſun, and another moon. Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, immediately took fire at it, and charged his opinions with impiety. He cenſured Virgil publickly, and as the Pope's Legate cauſed him to be admoniſhed, that he ſhould no more corrupt the purity of the Chriſtian doctrine by ſuch idle fancies. Hoc ita acceptum eſt, quaſi Virgilius alium mundum, alios ſub terrâ homines, alium denique ſolem, atque aliam lunam eſſe aſſereret. Bonifacius hæc velut impia, & Philoſophiæ divinæ repugnantia refutat, Virgilium publicè, privatim arguit, ad recantandum has nænias provocat, efflagitatque jure ſuo ut Legatus Germaniæ, ne ille hujuſmodi deliramentis ſinceram & ſimplicem Chriſti ſapientiam polluat atque contaminet (1). Virgil incenſed at this affront, complained to Utilo Duke of Bavaria, by whom he was very much beloved, and irritated him againſt Boniface, who ſent his complaints to the Court of Rome, and wrote to the Pope in ſuch terms as rendred Virgil's faith ſuſpected. The Pope ſent ſome deputies to the Duke of Bavaria, and wrote to him, that if Virgil was a Prieſt, his intention was that he ſhould be degraded from his prieſthood, and ſent to Rome to give an account of his conduct. Ipſe (Zacharias Pontifex Maximus) Legatos cum mandatis & litteris ad Utilonem ire jubet, partes ſuas Bonifacio commendat. Virgilium Philoſophum (ſi Sacerdos ſit, inquit, neſcio) ab templo Dei & Eccleſiâ depellito, Sacerdotio in Concilio abdicato, ſi illam perverſam doctrinam fuerit confeſſus. . . . . . Inſuper regulo Boiorum denunciatum eſt, ut Virgilium Romam mittat, ubi Virgilius rationem reddat, ac à Pontifice Rom. examine comprobetur (2). This is all that we know of this affair; we do not find that it went any farther by the Annals: wherefore the raſh careleſſneſs of thoſe, who tell us that Pope Zachary excommunicated and depoſed a Biſhop (3) for preſuming to aſſert that the earth is round, and inhabited in all parts of its circumference, is inexcuſable. Kepler, a Roman Catholic author, is one of theſe: Fuit quidem Virgilius Epiſcopus Saliſburgenſis ab officio dejectus, quod antipodas eſſe, eſſet auſus aſſerere (4). Origanus, a Proteſtant, ſaith the ſame thing: Qui ſane Virgilium noſtrum communi calculo damnarunt, à ſacerdotio, templo & Eccleſia depulerunt (5). But though we do not find that the Pope's menaces were executed, that cannot hinder us from concluding that they are injurious to his memory, and much more ſo to that of Boniface. It is certain, that Zachary ordered that Virgil ſhould be ſent to him as a perſon accuſed of dangerous errors: Nos ſcribentes prædicto Duci (Utiloni) evocatorias de prænominato Virgilio mittimus litteras, ut nobis præſentatus & ſubtili indagatione requiſitus, ſi erroneus fuerit inventus, canonicis decretis condemnetur: qui enim ſeminant dolores, metunt eos. Theſe words are taken out of his letter to Boniface (6); in which are alſo theſe following. De perverſâ doctrinâ, quam contra Dominum & animam ſuam locutus eſt (quod ſcilicet alius mundus, & alii homines ſub terrâ ſint, aliuſque ſol & luna) ſi convictus fuerit ita confiteri, hunc, accito Concilio, ab Eccleſiâ pelle, Sacerdotii honore privatum. From hence it appears, that he ordered him to be excommunicated and degraded from his prieſthood, if by his confeſſion he was convicted of having taught that there was another world, and other men under the earth, another ſun and another moon. I am not ignorant that the doctrine for which he would have this Biſhop to be condemned, was not the bare hypotheſis of the Antipodes; for it doth not ſuppoſe any different ſtars from thoſe which appear in our horizon: but yet this doctrine of the Antipodes plainly appears to be one of thoſe, which he judged worthy of the moſt rigorous puniſhments of the Canon Law. Was not this a prodigious ignorance? was it not an enormous abuſe of the Power of the Keys? I am willing to believe that Boniface impoſed upon him, and that he falſely repreſented Virgil's opinions. They had for ſome time been embroiled in a quarrel in which the jealouſy of learning and authority had engaged them; which made Boniface take a wrong view of Virgil's opinions. And who knows whether he did not give a malicious turn to the fact, by annexing ſeveral conſequences, which he thought proper to excite fears (7)? Some will have it that he ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by falſe reports, and that he judged of Virgil's ſentiments, from whatever was ſaid of them by ignorant relaters, who could not comprehend them. This is the learned Velſerus's charitable conjecture. 'Quod quidam conjecere, ſays he (8), 'non abnuerim: Virgilium de terræ ſpecie acutiùs, 'quàm pro vulgi captu, diſputaſſe, globoſam eſſe, & 'vivere è contrariâ parte, qui adverſis veſtigiis contra 'noſtra veſtigia, quos antipodas vocemus. Hos perinde ac nos ſole & lunâ luſtrari. Ea ignoratione 'audientium perperâm accepta detortaque, longè alio 'ſenſu ad Bonifacium perlata, offenſionum præbuiſſe 'ſementem. - - - I cannot but approve the conjecture of 'ſome, viz. that Virgil treated of the figure of the earth 'in a manner that was too ſubtile for the comprehenſion 'of the vulgar, when he aſſerted that it was round, 'and that there were inhabitants on the other ſide of 'it directly oppoſite to us, to whom we give the name 'of Antipodes; and that theſe were viſited by the ſun 'and moon no leſs than we. This through the ignorance 'of the hearers being ill underſtood, and repreſented in a 'quite different light to Boniface, gave the firſt grounds 'of offence.' But this doth not at all excuſe this Archbiſhop: his ignorance, his precipitation, his temerity in accuſing the innocent at the court of Rome, are undeniable facts. Velſerus having found no traces of the conſequence of this affair, believes that Virgil ſo explained his opinions, that he ſhewed them to be reaſonable, and that he was reconciled with his accuſer (9). 'Diſceptationis exitum non comperio. 'Fit veriſimile, aut purgaſſe ſe Virgilium Pontifici, 'ſive coram, ſive per litteras: aut cognitis invidiorum 'utrimque fraudibus . . . . . ultrò, quod inter bonos 'ſolet, in gratiam eſſe reditum. Sanè Bonifacius toto 'deinde ſeptennio (10) ſuperfuit, neque iſtius tamen 'diſſenſionis prætereà veſtigium apparet. - - - I do not 'find what the iſſue of this debate was. It is probable 'either that Virgil cleared himſelf to the Pope by his 'letters or by word of mouth, or elſe that having diſ'covered the malignity of thoſe who fomented the diſcord '. . . . . they were like honeſt men reconciled to one 'another. Certain it is, that Boniface lived ſeven 'years longer, and that no footſtep of this quarrel ap'pears during all that time.' I deſire it may be obſerved, that Velſerus doth his utmoſt to ſalve the honour of the Pope and of thoſe two ſaints (11); however he dares not venture ſo far as to affirm that their reconciliation was compleated. He declares that he did not know the iſſue of this quarrel, but that he thought it probable that Virgil made his peace with Zachary and his accuſer. It is not unlikely, ſaith he, that the malignity of thoſe who fomented the diſcord by falſe reports, was detected. Conjectures are allowable in dubious caſes; therefore we have nothing to object againſt Velſerus: but it is unreaſonable to ſet up for a deciding man in ſuch things, and therefore we have reaſon to complain of an Hiſtorian of Savoy who avers that by the prudence of the Pope, and the wiſdom of Utilo, the authors of the calumny were diſcovered, and that thoſe holy men incapable of hatred, contracted a more ſtrict friendſhip than before (12). This Hiſtorian is not the only one who hath acted in this manner: a great many authors have done the ſame thing; they have converted the conjectures which they read, into affirmations; they are like thoſe prating News-mongers, who an hour after they have read in the Gazette, that preparations are making for ſome ſiege, or for the paſſage of a river, report that the place is inveſted, and the army is already encamped on the other ſide of the river. The Hiſtorians of the ignorant ages were perhaps bolder in this particular than thoſe of our times, and if that be true, how many lies are we obliged to believe? and how ſtrongly do they fortify hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm, which daily increaſes (13)?

---

(1) Aventinus, Annal. Boiorum, lib. iii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) It appears from Aventinus's Narrative, that he was not yet a Biſhop.

(4) Keplerus, Epiſt. ante lib. iv. Epitom.

(5) Origanus, Epiſt. ad Elect. Brandenb.

(6) See Baronius, Tom. ix, ad ann. 748.

(7) As his teaching that all men are not deſcended from Adam, that Chriſt did not die for all men, &c.

(8) Marcus Velſerus, lib. v, Rerum Boicarum.

(9) Idem, Velſerus, ibid.

(10) From this you may infer that this diſpute happened in the year 748, for the death of Boniface, is placed in the year 755.

(11) So Boniface and Virgil are ſtiled.

(12) Blanc, Hiſt. de Baviere, Tom. i, pag. 323.

(13) I have juſt now read two Diſſertations of Father Daniel, wherein moſt of the things that are related of the Kings of France before Clovis, are ſaid to be falſe.

VIRGIL, or VERGIL (POLYDORE) was born at Urbino in Italy in the XVth century. He did not want either parts or learning. I take his firſt book to be a collection of proverbs which he publiſhed in the year 1498: before which time none of the Moderns publiſhed any thing of that nature; wherefore he boaſted of having preceded Eraſmus, whom he reproached in a very unhandſome manner [A]. His ſecond work, which treats of the Inventors of Things, was publiſhed in the year 1499 [B]. He was ſent to England in the beginning of the XVIth century (a), to collect the Papal tribute, called Peter-Pence. He recommended himſelf ſo well there, and liked the country to ſuch a degree, that having obtained the dignity of Archdeacon of the cathedral church of Wells (b), he reſolved to paſs the remainder of his life in England, and quitted his office of collector of the Peter-Pence. He undertook a great taſk, in the performance of which he laboured ſeveral years. It was the Hiſtory of England. He dedicated it to Henry VIII, in the year 1533. This book is not much valued by the Engliſh [C]. He put his laſt hand to his treatiſe of Prodigies in the year 1526 [D]. He was no very rigid Papiſt

(a) See the remark [I].

(b) See the remark [E].

[A] He boaſted of having preceded Eraſmus, whom he reproached in a very unhandſome manner.] I find in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his treatiſe de Inventoribus Rerum, that he declares, that both with reſpect to that ſubject, as well as to the Proverbs, he had beaten the path for all other authors. Non inficior ...... quin poſſit quiſpiam de hac re, velut de proverbiis, quorum libellum proximo anno Guidoni Principi, Urbini Duci inſcripſimus, copioſius tradere. Verum quicunque hoc vel illud poſthac ingredietur iter, quia nos primi ſtadium cucurrimus, is fortaſſe noſtra veſtigia ſequi non gravabitur (1). If you read Eraſmus's epiſtles, you will there be informed that Polydore Virgil had ſaid ſeveral harſh things to him in the Preface to a new edition of his Proverbs: he accuſed him of vanity and envy (2); he called him a Plagiary (3), and took it very ill that his book was not mentioned in the Preface to Eraſmus's firſt edition. He charged him with attempting to rob him of his due honour. Ubinam eſt iſta veritas quam in præfatione ſcribis procul eminere? quaque fretus boni conſulis quod ego callidus diſſimulator conatus ſim in gloriæ tuæ poſſeſſionem irrepere (4)? Eraſmus juſtified himſelf very well in a letter he wrote to him in December 1521 (5). See alſo his twelfth letter of the firſt book, page 50. He did an action too glorious to be omitted, and ſo exemplary, that it ought to be propoſed to the imitation of all authors. The Bookſeller at Baſil deſigning to reprint Polydore Virgil's book, reſolved to ſuppreſs the Preface, becauſe it reflected on Eraſmus. But this great man would not conſent to it, but ordered him not to leave out any part of it, whatever the import of it was: Vel hinc colligas licet, quàm non fuerimus iniqui tuo libro. Frobenium, ut dictum eſt, abhorrentem ab editione perpuli. Præfationem tuam, quâ me ſuggillas, ad me miſerant, velut execrandam. Remiſi juſſique, ut bonâ fide, ſicut abs te fuerat deſcripta, excuderetur: deleverunt mentionem Lei, quam tu de illo ſanè quam honorificam facis. Juſſi ut reponerent. Utrum hæc ſunt faventis an non (6)? Two years after he adviſed the author himſelf to correct it, that there might be no appearance of any jealouſy betwixt them. Mihi videris conſulte facturus, ſi primam illam præfationem totam retexas. Primum faciet hoc ad operis commendationem ob novitatem. Deinde faciet ad opinionem utriuſque noſtrum, quod inſunt in illa priore quædam, quibus ego quidem non offendor, ſed tamen ſuſpitionem præbent eruditis alicujus inter nos æmulationis (7). In my edition of this treatiſe of Proverbs there is nothing againſt Eraſmus (8). This trifling quarrel did not break off their friendſhip. See Eraſmus's letter to him in the year 1526 (9). Obſerve that Polydore Virgil had formerly made him a preſent to buy a horſe (10). As alſo that he dedicated to him his tranſlation of a piece of St Chryſoſtom in the year 1528 (11).

[B] His ſecond work ... was publiſhed in 1499.] We ſhall here make uſe of a diſtinction which Voſſius has not uſed: he ſaith that this tract of Polydore Virgil contains eight books, which were firſt printed in the year 1499 (12). But this account is not exact. For the author publiſhed but three books at firſt, whereof the Epiſtle Dedicatory was dated in that year. He added five more in 1517, and dedicated them (13) to John Matthew Virgil, his brother, profeſſor of Philoſophy at Padua. So that Sir Thomas-Pope Blount is miſtaken when he ſaith that theſe eight books were printed at Straſburgh in 4to, in the year 1509 (14). Mr Moreri hath committed the ſame error as Voſſius.

[C] This book is not much eſteemed by the Engliſh.] Sir Henry Savil ſays of it; 'Polydorus, ut homo Italus, & in rebus noſtris Hoſpes, & (quod caput eſt) neque in Republicâ verſatus, nec magni alioqui, vel judicii, vel ingenii; pauca ex multis delibans, & falſa plerumque pro veris amplexus, Hiſtoriam nobis reliquit, cùm cætera mendoſam, tum exiliter ſanè, & jejune conſcriptam (15). - - - Polydore, as being an Italian, and a ſtranger to our affairs, and (which is the chief thing) being neither acquainted with public buſineſs, nor otherwiſe a man of any great parts or judgment, touches upon a few things among many, and, generally ſpeaking, embraces falſhoods for truths. By this means he hath left us a hiſtory which, beſides being faulty in every other reſpect, is written in a manner that is both dry and barren.' Another Engliſh writer calls him a malicious detracter: 'Nominis Britannici gloriam non ſolum obfuſcare, ſed etiam Britannos ipſos mendaciſſimis ſuis calumniis infamare totis viribus conatur (16). - - - He hath endeavoured, as much as poſſible, not only to diminiſh the glory of the Britiſh name, but alſo to defame the Britons themſelves by his lying reproaches.' But there is a complaint againſt him of a different nature: Paul Jovius obſerves that the French and Scots charged Polydore Virgil with flattering the Engliſh to an exceſſive degree, 'Conſcripſit Hiſtorias rerum Britannicarum, ea fide ut Scotis, & Gallis ſæpe reclamantibus, alieno potius arbitrio, quam ſuo intexuiſſe multa in gratiam gentis exiſtimetur, quòd in recenſendis minorum Ducum nominibus, tanquam gloriæ avidis plurimum indulſerit (17). - - - He wrote the Hiſtory of England with ſuch particularity, that the Scotch and French pretend, he has inſerted many things in favour of the Engliſh nation, more to pleaſe others than in compliance with his own judgment. They alledge, as a proof of this, the great pains he takes in reckoning up the names of inconſiderable captains, as if they had been very deſirous of glory.' John Leland hath cenſured ſeveral faults of Polydore Virgil, as Voſſius obſerves (18).

[D] His treatiſe of Prodigies.] It is compoſed of ſeveral dialogues, wherein he ſtrongly oppoſes the art of Divining. A ſmall part of the preface, dated at London 1526, runs thus: 'Cujus (Chriſti) ipſe quoque doctrina inſtructus confidenter veni in certamen cum ariolis, auguribus, haruſpicibus, vatibus, ſortilegis, quos partim divinis, partim naturalibus debilitatos imo atque adeo devictos rationibus, jacere cum ſuis peſtiferis artibus, videre jam licebit (19). - - - Armed with the doctrine of CHRIST, I have confidently entered the liſts with the ſooth-ſayers, wizards, and fortune-tellers; whom, together with their pernicious arts, you may now ſee weakened, or rather entirely deſtroyed, by reaſons partly natural and partly theological.' This is therefore a work of a very different nature from that of Julius Obſequens, which was enlarged by Lycoſthenes. We are told of an

---

(1) Polyd. Virgilius, Epiſt. Dedic. Libri de Inventor. Rerum. It is dated from Urbino, the fifth of Auguſt. 1499.

(2) Inclementius eſt etiam quod hujus argumenti primum apud Latinos tractati laudem ſic tibi vendicas, ut mihi coneris cenodoxias ſimul & livoris ſuſpicionem impingere. Eraſm. Epiſt. iii, lib. xvii, pag. 748. We ſhall ſee in the remark [L], the very words of Polydore Virgil.

(3) Priuſquam hac præfatione inſimulares ... livoris ſimul & plagii. Id. ibid. pag. 749.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) That which I have juſt now quoted.

(6) Eraſm. ubi ſupra.

(7) Idem, Epiſt. xlv, lib. xx, pag. 1007.

(8) It is of Baſil, 1541, in 8vo, from the fourth reviſal of the author.

(9) It is the xxvth of the xxiſt book.

(10) Idem, Epiſt. xxv, lib. xxi, pag. 1093.

(11) Idem opuſculum (Chryſoſtomi Monachum) in Anglia vertit Virgilius Polydorus ſatis feliciter, mihi dicatum. Excuſum eſt autem Lutetiæ. Idem, Epiſt. xiv, lib. xxv, pag. 1354.

(12) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latinis, pag. 678.

(13) That Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated at London the 5th of December 1517.

(14) Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. p. 452.

(15) Henricus Savilius, Præfat. ad Rerum Anglicar. Scriptores, apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. pag. 451.

(16) Humfred. Lhuyd. in Deſcript. Angliæ, apud Pope Blount, ibid. pag. 452.

(17) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. cxxxv, pag. 279.

(18) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 679.

(19) Polyd. Virgilius, Præfat. ad Franciſcum Mariam Urbini Ducem.

Papiſt in all particulars [E]; he was not at all diſguſted at England on account of the change of religion which was brought about in the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI. He did not deſire to leave that kingdom in the year 1550, on any other account than that his age required a warmer and more ſouthern climate. He obtained leave to depart, and was permitted to receive the revenue of his benefices during an edition at London, in 1526 (20): but Geſner knew nothing of it; for he mentions only that of Baſil, printed by Bebelius, in 1531. I have the Baſil edition in 1545, 8vo, per Mich. Iſingrinum. To it are prefixed three other tracts of Polydore Virgil (21); the Epiſtle Dedicatory, written by him, is dated at London in 1543, [E] He was no very rigid Papiſt in all particulars.] He approved the marriage of the Clergy, and condemned image-worſhip. I ſhall here cite at large what John Bale ſaith of him; it furniſhes me with a proof which I promiſed (22). 'Ob inſignem in omni bonarum literarum genere eruditionem, Wellenſis Eccleſiæ Archidiaconus (23) poſtmodum factus, priori officio Pontifici reſignato, conſtituit Romam non repetere, ſed deinceps in noſtrâ permanere Inſulâ. Et licet in pleriſque ſcriptis ſuis veræ Religioni ſuperſtitionem prætulerit, piè nihilominus Chriſtianorum Miniſtrorum conjugia defendebat, pièque ſtatuarum cultum damnabat, cum quibuſdam aliis Romanenſium Rabbinorum impoſturis. Quòd antiquitati Britannicæ in Anglorum Hiſtoriâ, quàm par eſt, iniquior ſit, ex veterum illius Gentis Chronicorum & Hiſtoriarum ignoratione provenit. Quòd prætereà Reges aliquot ab impietate pios, & alios è diverſo ab ipsâ æquitate iniquos etiam promulgaverit, communi ante agnitam veritatem per Dei verbum, errori ac cæcitati imputandum eſſe judico . . . . Erat certè Polydorus ob erudita illa de Rerum Inventoribus, Sacrorum Ritibus & Prodigiis Opuſcula, ab ipſis etiam piis ſuſpiciendus (24). - - - Being made Archdeacon of Wells, on account of his remarkable ſkill in all the different kinds of learning, he reſigned his former benefice to the Pope, and reſolved not to return any more to Rome, but to paſs the remainder of his life in our iſland. And tho' in moſt of his writings, he preferred ſuperſtition to the true religion, he nevertheleſs piouſly ſtood for the marriage of Chriſtian miniſters, and zealouſly condemned the worſhip of images, together with ſome other impoſitions of the Romiſh Rabbies. As to his being ſomewhat injurious to the antiquity of Britain, in his Hiſtory of England, it proceeded from his not knowing the antient chronicles and hiſtories of that nation. And as to his calling ſome kings pious from their impious conduct, and others again unjuſt from their equitable actions, I think it ſhould be imputed to the general error and blindneſs which prevailed before truth came to be diſcovered by the word GOD . . . Certain it is that Polydore deſerves to be admired even by good and religious men, for his learned works, de Rerum Inventoribus, Sacrorum Ritibus & Prodigiis.' The treatiſe de Inventoribus Rerum contains ſeveral things which the Inquiſition diſliked; wherefore it approved of no edition but that which Gregory XIII cauſed to be printed at Rome in the year 1576, which was purged of all thoſe paſſages which diſpleaſed the inquiſitors. And as for the other editions, they ordered the blotting out of ſeveral paſſages (25). The Spaniſh Index expreſsly commands the expunging of Polydore Virgil's reflexion on St Peter's not permitting the Centurion to kiſs his feet. And indeed it contains a very ſharp cenſure on the pride of the Eccleſiaſtics; the words are: 'Pater manſuetudinis plenus id fieri non eſt paſſus, qui elevans eum ſibi ad pedes jacentem, dixit: Surge, & ego ipſe homo ſum. O vocem memorabilem, atque ſalutarem, ſi bene multi hodie ſeſe quoque homines tantum eſſe perpenderent, qui propterea quòd ſacerdotio præditi ſint, planè ſe reliquorum mortalium, longè poſt hominum memoriam imperioſiſſimos dominos præbent, non communes patres, uti fieri deberet (26). - - - St Peter, full of meekneſs, would not ſuffer the Centurion to do it, but raiſing him up while he lay at his feet; Riſe, ſaid he, for I myſelf am a man. O how remarkable an expreſſion is this, and how full of wholſome morality, if it was now a-days duly attended to by thoſe who, forgetting that they are men, do, becauſe they are inveſted with the prieſtly office, behave like the moſt imperious of all maſters, and not like common fathers, as they ought to be.' But this author did not take the ſame liberty with reſpect to the Popes; for, on the contrary, he juſtifies and commends the cuſtom of kiſſing their feet. And yet ſome writers cite him as diſapproving it. 'Non poſſum, quin addam, quæ hac de re occurrunt apud Polydorum Virgilium, hominem Papiſtam, de Rerum Invent. lib. IV. cap. 13. Romani Pontifices, inquit, deoſculandos pedes exhibendi morem à Chriſto ſe accepiſſe contendunt. At Chriſtus non Magdalenæ oſculandos pedes obtulit; ſed ſponte peccata fatentem, & ſuam miſericordiam non ſolo amplexu genuum, ut ethnici, ſed etiam oſculo pedum implorantem, ejus conſolandæ causâ admiſit: hoc ipſum honoris genus alioquin non minus repudiaturus, etſi ſibi re verâ debitum, quam appellationem Magiſtri boni. Sic quoque Petrus Cornelium centurionem ad genua procidentem manu ſua ſublevavit, SURGE, inquit, HOMO SUM TIBI SIMILIS: tantum abfuit ut oſculandos pedes exhibuerit. Decipimur ſpecie recti, & ſæpe cum Caligula pedes protendimus, dum Chriſti humilitatem vel ſpernimus, vel fucato conſervandæ Apoſtolicæ autoritatis titulo exornare laboramus (27). - - - I cannot help adding what we find upon this ſubject in Polydore Virgil, tho' a Popiſh writer. He ſays, in his book de Rerum Invent. that the Popes pretend to derive from CHRIST the cuſtom of preſenting their feet to be kiſſed. But CHRIST, ſays he, did not offer his feet to Mary Magdalen in order that ſhe ſhould kiſs them; but while ſhe made a voluntary confeſſion of her ſins, and implored his mercy, not only by embracing his knees after the manner of the Heathens, but alſo by kiſſing his feet, he ſuffered it for her conſolation: in any other caſe he would have been no leſs for rejecting this kind of honour than he was for refuſing the title of Good Maſter. Thus alſo did Peter take up the Centurion, when he fell at his feet: Stand up, ſaid he, for I myſelf am a man: ſo far was he from offering him his feet to kiſs. We are cheated by the appearance of right, and we often ſtretch out our feet with Caligula, while we either deſpiſe the humility of CHRIST, or ſtudy to ſet it off with the ſpecious pretence of keeping up the Apoſtolical authority.' It is a Remonſtrant Miniſter who cites Polydore Virgil's words in this manner, and that too after having aſſured us in his preface, that excepting only twice or thrice, he hath always examined the paſſages which he cites. This paſſage of Polydore Virgil muſt then be one of the two or three which he has not examined, for there is an enormous difference betwixt what he really ſays, and what this miniſter aſcribes to him. Conſult Mr Crenius (28), who hath very ſmartly ſet forth this miſtake, and compared the two places together, that juſt now cited, and as it really is in Polydore Virgil in the Straſburgh edition, printed in 1606, in 8vo. I have conſulted my edition which is that of Lyons apud hæredes Seb. Gryphii 1558, in 8vo, and I find that the words exactly agree with thoſe alledged by Mr Crenius. I have alſo conſulted the French verſion of Polydore Virgil, publiſhed by Francis de Belleforeſt at Paris in 1582, and I find that he made uſe of an original which was exactly the ſame with my Latin one. I cannot therefore be ſufficiently ſurprized at the prodigious depravations which are crept into the quotations of this paſſage.

I ſhall quote an author who aſſures us that Polydore Virgil died in the year 1562, and that, in Lippomanus's judgment, the treatiſe de Inventoribus Rerum is a wretched book. 'Mors etiam Polydori Virgilii contigit Suaſſæ †, ubi natus erat. Multa ſcripſit, ſed non omnes docti ea exiſtimant. Imperitiſſimum vocat eum & vanitatis redarguit doctiſſimus Lindanus ‡, atque hominis hujus ſcripto, quod de rerum inventoribus finxit, nihil extare noſtrâ ætate in lucem editum, pluribus, quod ſcateat magis, aut futilibus perfluat conjecturis (29). - - - Polydore Virgil died at Urbino, where he was born. He wrote a great deal; but his writings are not all eſteemed by the learned. Lindanus calls him a moſt ignorant author, and accuſes

'him

---

(20) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 678.

(21) De Patientia & ejus fructu Libri ii; de Vita perfecta Liber I, de Veritate & Mendacio Lib. i.

(22) In the margin of the text of this article.

(23) Theſe words of Paul Jovius, ubi ſupra, Is ab Henrico Rege fortunis adauctus flamenque Londini creatus, are fallacious; they ſeem to imply that he was Canon of London.

(24) Joan. Balæus, de Scriptor. Britann. Centur. XIII, apud Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, pag. 451.

(25) See the Index librorum prohibit. & expurg. pag. 850, & ſeq. Edit. 1667, in folio.

(26) Polyd. Vergilius de Inventor. Rerum, lib. iv, cap. xiii, pag. m. 290.

(27) Anton. Borremanſ. Variar. Lect. pag. 267.

(28) Crenius Animadv. Philol. & Hiſt. Part. i, pag. 62, & ſeq.

† It is the town of Urbino in the Marca d'Ancona.

‡ Panop. Evang. ſer. c. 98.

(29) Petrus à Sancto Romualdo, in Continuatione Chronici Ademari, pag. 326.

during his abſence [F]. It is ſaid he died at Urbino (c) in the year 1555. He is accuſed of having burnt ſeveral manuſcripts in order to prevent the diſcovery of the faults of his hiſtory of England [G]. It was printed ſeveral times [H], which ſhews that the world was more eaſily impoſed on in that age than they are at preſent, or elſe more addicted to ſtudy; ſince an impreſſion of the beſt Hiſtorians in folio will hardly go off at this time.

Since the ſecond edition of this Dictionary, I have been informed of the following particulars. Polydore Virgil was ſo ſucceſsful in his firſt eſſay, which was his collection of proverbs, that there were three or four impreſſions of it in a very ſhort time. This good fortune encouraged him to ſet about a more difficult enterpriſe, which was to write a treatiſe upon the Inventors of Things. I have ſaid before that he publiſhed it in the year 1499. After that he was ſent into England by Pope Alexander VI, and being deſired by Henry VII to compoſe a hiſtory of that country, he ſet his hand to it in the year 1505 [I]. He himſelf gives an account of theſe things in an Epiſtle Dedicatory which he ‘ him likewiſe of vanity. He ſays, that in our time nothing has been publiſhed which abounds more in trifling conjectures than his treatiſe de Inventoribus Rerum.’ It is certain that he did not pleaſe the bigots.

[F] He did not deſire to leave that kingdom in the year 1550, on any other account than that of his age . . . . He obtained leave to depart.] This I take from the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England: ‘Polydore Virgil, after having lived almoſt forty years in England, aſked leave to go and end his days, a little nearer the ſun, he being very old. Which was granted him, on the ſecond of June, and in conſideration of the ſervices, which it was thought he had done to the public, by his hiſtory, he was allowed, during his abſcence, to hold the Archdeaconry of Wells and the Prebend of Nonninton (30).’ Mr de Larrey relates the ſame thing (31), but adds a marginal note, by which we are informed that Harmer (32) ſaith it was in 1551, that Polydore Virgil retired, and then he adds: ‘Perhaps ſome regard was had to his moderate behaviour, in the Reformation which Henry VIII began, and Edward had carried on. For as much an Italian as he was, he did not engage with any of the defenders of the ſee of Rome, but ſubſcribed the reſolutions which were taken in the aſſemblies of the Clergy in favour of the king's ſupremacy (33).’ As for the reſt, I ſhall ſhew hereafter (34) why it could not be ſaid, that in the year 1550, he had only lived near forty years in England.

[G] He is accuſed of having burnt ſeveral manuſcripts in order to prevent the diſcovery of the faults of his Hiſtory of England.] To this purpoſe read the following ſhort account: ‘Quem (Polydorum) ne aliquando intelligerentur errores, fama percrebuit, atque etiam cognitum & compertum certò eſt, tot hiſtorias noſtras vetuſtas & Manuſcriptas immani ſcelere igni commendaſſe, quot ne plauſtrum quidem poſſet capere atque ſuſtinere, arbitratus, ut credo, ſe ejus generis omnes ſolùm habuiſſe, aut veritus ſibi vitio dari, quòd ſecutus legem jampridem librorum veterum caſtigatoribus datam (ut ipſe de ſe ait in præfatione in Gildam) nonnulla reſecuerit, quæ Scriptores prodiderunt. Superſunt tamen Deo volente quamplurimi omnis generis, & illis Polydori multò pleniores & perfectiores (35). - - - It was reported, nay it was found to be certainly true that this Polydore, to prevent the diſcovery of his errors, had moſt ſcandalouſly burnt a greater number of our old hiſtories in manuſcript than would have filled and loaded a waggon. He imagined, I ſuppoſe, that he had got them all into his hands, or perhaps he was afraid of being cenſured, for that having followed the rule which the correctors of old books have long obſerved, (as he ſays of himſelf, in his Preface againſt Gilda) he had retrenched many things which he found in theſe authors. Nevertheleſs it has pleaſed GOD that there ſhould ſtill remain a great many books of all kinds, which are more full and perfect than thoſe of Polydore.’ La Popeliniere tells the ſame ſtory; which I ſhall give you in his own words without leaving out any of them, for if I ſhould leave out any, they would be ſuch as ought to be known. ‘Polydore Virgil, a native of Urbino in Italy, was ſent for, and appointed by Henry VIII (36), to ſet the Engliſh Hiſtory in a true light, which he digeſted into twenty-ſix books. They are more valuable, becauſe the Engliſh have ſcarce any ancient authors left to have recourſe to in caſe of doubts or ignorance with reſpect to any conſiderable event, (for after having finiſhed that work he cauſed all thoſe to be burnt which by the king's authority and the aſſiſtance of his friends he could poſſibly come at) than for the ſtile, truth, care, or judiciouſneſs of his performance. Our Frenchmen tell us the ſame thing of P. Æmilius, his neighbour and co-temporary, and of ſeveral others, who, greedy of equal fame with Plato and Ariſtotle, burnt, as they did, ſeveral books after having extracted the quinteſſence of them, in order to make up books, which they afterwards publiſhed under their own names (37).’

[H] It was printed ſeveral times.] I have already ſaid that the date of the Epiſtle Dedicatory is of the year 1533 (38). And I doubt not but the edition mentioned by Geſner, I mean that printed at Baſil by Bebelius, in 1534, in folio, is the firſt edition. The author reviſed his work, and corrected ſeveral places in the ſecond edition, which was in 1536. I make uſe of that of Baſil apud Mich. Iſingrinium, in 1556, in folio, which contains but twenty-ſix books. But I find in the epitome of Geſner (39), that this hiſtory in twenty-ſeven books ab auctore recogniti ad amuſſim expoſiti, was printed by Iſingrinius, and afterward by Thomas Guerin in folio, in 1570. I wiſh the year of Iſingrinius's edition had been mentioned, and I cannot believe that it contains twenty-ſeven books, ſince that which Thyſius publiſhed at Leyden in 1649 (40) contains no more than twenty-ſix; and doubtleſs Thyſius followed the beſt and moſt compleat of all the foregoing editions. However it be, the twenty-ſix books of this Hiſtory ended with the death of Henry VII. Therefore I cannot well underſtand the author who accuſes our Virgil of having falſified the relation of affairs concerning the reign of Henry VIII, in order to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Queen Mary, when it is certain that he left England before there was any probability that Mary would come to the crown. It is alſo certain that his Hiſtory, printed at Baſil (41) a year after his death, contains but twenty-ſix books, which reach no farther than the death of Henry VII. And therefore the following paſſage is ſomewhat obſcure to me. ‘Maxime erravit Polydorus in deſcribendis temporibus Henrici VIII. Nam præter quod linguæ noſtratis prorſus ignarus, plurima eorum temporum neſcire habuit neceſſe: plurima etiam, ut Mariæ Reginæ gratiam promptius demereri poſſet, ſcripſiſſe, non ſine cauſa perhibetur. Priorum verò temporum, eadem non eſt ſuſpicio (42). - - - Polydore has chiefly miſtaken in deſcribing the reign of Henry VIII. For beſides that, he was an entire ſtranger to our language, there were many particulars relating to thoſe times of which he muſt have been ignorant. It is likewiſe not without cauſe reported that he writ many things with a view to inſinuate himſelf into Queen Mary's favour. But in the preceding reigns there is no room for this ſuſpicion.’ Beſides it is probable that Polydore Virgil did not ſtay ſo long at London, being during that time employed in preparing his Hiſtory of England without learning Engliſh. At the worſt it was leſs difficult for him to be acquainted with the reign of Henry VIII, than with thoſe of the preceding kings. For what reaſon therefore do they ſuppoſe that he knew leſs of this reign than of the others?

[I] After that he was ſent into England by Pope Alexander VI, and being deſired by Henry VII to compoſe a hiſtory of that country, he ſet his hand to it in the year 1505.] All theſe facts are related, with divers particulars, in the following words. ‘Placuit is (Commentariolus

(c) Thevet, Elog. des Hommes illuſtres, Tom. vii, pag. 309, 310. See the remark [E], towards the end.

(30) Burnet, Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, Part. ii, book i, ad ann. 1550, pag. 374.

(31) De Larrey, Hiſt. d'Anglet. Tom. i, pag. 682, ad ann. 1550.

(32) In an Engliſh book againſt Dr Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation.

(33) De Larry, ibid. pag. 683.

(34) In the remark [I].

(35) Joh. Caius, de Antiquit. Cantab. lib. i, pag. 52, apud Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, pag. 451, 452.

(36) He was not ſent for out of Italy by Henry VIII, but the Pope ſent him into England to collect what went by the name of Peter-Pence.

(37) La Popeliniere, Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, livr. ix, pag. 485.

(38) In the month of Auguſt.

(39) Pag. 703.

(40) It is in 8vo.

(41) It is the edition of 1556.

(42) Whear, de Meth. leg. Hiſt. §. xxx, apud Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, pag. 451.

he writes to JOHN MATTHEW VERGIL, his brother [K]. He likewiſe ſays there that ANTONY VERGIL, his great grand-father, was very well verſed in Phyſic and Aſtrology, and had taught Philoſophy at Paris. For the reſt, as the reproachful things he ſaid of Eraſmus are contained in an Epiſtle Dedicatory which has been left out of moſt of the editions, I ſhall quote them below [L].

‘ riolus de Proverbiis) ſua præſertim novitate uſque adeo, delectavitque uſque adeo, ut brevi mox terque quaterque (ſicuti Poëta ait) fuerit formis excuſus. Hac levi aura (fateor ingenue) evectus, tum majus aggreſſus opus, de rerum inventoribus, negocium ſuſcepi, naviterque minus menſibus novem, confeci. Sic Polydorus ego primus apud Latinos, utriuſque rei argumentum attentavi, id quod in præfationibus unius & alterius operis affatim docuimus. Veni poſthæc miſſu Alexandri ſexti Romani pontificis in Britanniam quæ nunc Anglia eſt, ut quæſturam pontificiam apud Anglos gererem. Ubi ne bonum ocium tererem, rogatu Henrici ejus appellationis ſeptimi Regis præſtantiſſimi, res ejus populi geſtas ſcripſi, in hiſtoriæque ſtilum redegi. Quod hercle opus duodecim annos ſub literatoria incude laboratum, obſtante fato, nondum abſolvere licuit (43). - - - This little book of Proverbs was ſo well liked, particularly for the newneſs of the thing, that it preſently underwent three or four editions. I freely own that I was encouraged by this ſlight ſucceſs to undertake a work of a more difficult nature, I mean my treatiſe on the Inventors of Things, which I finiſhed, with great application, in leſs than nine months. Thus I Polydore was the firſt among the Latin writers, who ventured to write upon both theſe ſubjects, as I have ſhewed at large in my preface to each. I was afterwards ſent into England by Pope Alexander VI, to collect the Papal tribute in that country. That I might not be idle, I undertook, at the deſire of Henry VII, to write the Hiſtory of England. But though I have been twelve years employed about this work, I have not yet been able to finiſh it.’ This paſſage is found prefixed to his book de Inventoribus Rerum, printed at Baſil in the year 1521, in folio, and it is in this manner that the author ſpeaks to his brother. His letter is dated from London on the fifth of December 1517, and is to be ſeen at the beginning of the fourth book of the ſame treatiſe in ſeveral other editions; but the paſſage I have quoted is wanting, which is one of my reaſons for inſerting it here. It will likewiſe be the more acceptable, as it affords a proof, that if Polydore Virgil ſtaid in England till the year 1550, or 1551, he was there in all near fifty years (44).

[K] JOHN MATTHEW VERGIL, his brother.] He was a learned man both in Greek and Latin. He practiſed Phyſic in Ferrara, there taught Logic publickly, and after that was Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the univerſity of Padua (45). Before the age of thirty, he was a good Philoſopher, a good Phyſician, and a good Orator, and was beſides a man of the ſtricteſt probity. It is his brother who gives him this character in the Epiſtle Dedicatory which I have already mentioned: Tibi negocium damus & juvandi tuo labore ſtudioſos, & nomini familiæ noſtræ conſulendi, cui propè uni ſeculi noſtri contigit ante ſextum ætatis luſtrum, cum tanta morum probitate, eſſe philoſopho, medico, ac oratori perfecto. Ex qua doctrinarum ſcintilla, tota jam Italia lucem maximam maturiſſime erupturam auguratur (46). Theſe words are wanting in moſt of the editions.

[L] The reproachful things he ſaid of Eraſmus . . . I ſhall quote them below.] They are in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his treatiſe upon Proverbs, printed at Baſil for John Froben in the year 1521, in folio. This Epiſtle is inſcribed to a Secretary of Henry VIII, and dated at London on the fifth of June 1519. ‘ Ita Polydorus tuus apud Latinos primus hujuſce rei argumentum attentavit: & quicquid id laudis fuit, jam pridem citra cujuſcunque injuriam, jure ſibi optimo vindicavit. At poſt aliquot annos quàm ita de proverbiis commentariolum ædideram, ecce tibi, ſucceſſorem habui noſtrum Eraſmum, id quod ob ſingularem hominis doctrinam pergratum fuit, & ſi ille ceu ejuſmodi commentarioli noſtri minime ſciens, utrumque decus, inventæ ſcilicet rei atque auctæ ad ſe trahere eſt conatus, quem tamen vix potuit ignorare, ſi unquam ſuum ipſius Adagiorum opus Argentorati, quod eſt ſuæ Germaniæ oppidum, apud Matthiam Schurerium formulis excuſum vidit: vidit haut dubio procul, cum illud poſtmodum bis térve adauxerit. Quippe in ejus operis fronte Matthias atteſtatur ſe paulo ante noſtra adagia in apertum protuliſſe. Ipſi etiam eum cum aliquando apud nos pranderet per jocum, noſtri hujus inſtituti æmulatorem appellavimus. Ita ille rei ſuæ intentus nuper in noviſſima paræmiarum ſuarum editione, eſt palàm profeſſus, primum ſe apud Latinos id genus argumenti attentaſſe, ut cui tum non venit in mentem noſtri libelli imaginis. Etenim penè incredibile eſt Eraſmum tot titulis redundantem, velle cuiquam tam modicæ inventionis gloriolam invidere. Quanquam ſunt nonnulli ſagaciores, qui adfirment eum idcirco illud diſſimulaſſe, ut qui præter adagiorum multitudinem nihilo plus præſtiterat, ne videretur eſſe imitatus, atque ſic primas ferret partes. Ego tamen (quia veritas procul eminet) totum iſtud æqui bonique faciens, tantum apud te, qui utriuſque noſtrum es ex æquo amantiſſimus, teſtatum eſſe volui quo nihil ex eo offenſionis poſthac eſſem habiturus. Nam (ut Martialis ait) qui velit ingenio cedere, rarus erit. Cæterum ſum gaviſus (uti dixi) tali ſucceſſore (47). - - - Thus your Polydore was the firſt among the Latin authors who attempted to write upon this ſubject: and whatever praiſe was due from ſuch an undertaking, he has long ago ſecured it to himſelf, without wronging any man. But a few years after I had publiſhed my ſmall treatiſe on Proverbs, a ſucceſſor appeared: and who ſhould that be but our friend Eraſmus? This was very agreeable to me, on account of his ſingular learning, notwithſtanding that he claimed the honour both of the invention and improvements that were made upon it, as if he had known nothing at all of my treatiſe: which is neverthele ſſcarce poſſible, if he ever ſaw his own book of Proverbs, printed at Straſburg in Germany for Matthew Schurerius: and that he ſaw it is certain ſince he enlarged it twice or thrice afterwards. For in his advertiſement prefixed to that book, the ſaid Matthew declares, that he had publiſhed my Proverbs a little before. Likewiſe at a certain time when Eraſmus did me the favour to dine with me, I told him, by way of joke, that he was my rival in this undertaking. But he was ſo intent upon the affair, that when he publiſhed the laſt edition of his Proverbs not long ago, he openly pretended to be the firſt Latin writer who had treated on that ſubject. In all likelihood he had no thought nor remembrance of my little book at that time: for it is ſcarce credible that Eraſmus, who has ſo many things to value himſelf upon, would envy another perſon the ſmall glory of ſuch an ordinary invention: altho' ſome very judicious men affirm that he diſſembled his knowledge of it for this reaſon, leſt he ſhould ſeem to have imitated another, and not to have deſerved the firſt praiſe, as he was ſenſible that he had done nothing more than collected a multitude of Proverbs. But I (becauſe the truth is very well known) taking all this in good part, thought fit only to proteſt to you, who are alike a friend to us both, that it ſhall never give me any trouble for the time to come. For, as Martial ſays, The man who yields the prize of wit is rare. But, as I ſaid before, I was pleaſed with ſuch a worthy ſucceſſor.’ Compare with this what has been quoted in the remark [A].

(43) Polyd. Vergilius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Librorum de Inventoribus Rerum, ad Joan. Matthæum fratrem, Edit. Baſil. 1521 in folio.

(44) Correct therefore what has been quoted in the remark [F].

(45) Polyd. Virgilii, ubi ſupra.

(46) Id. ibid.

(47) Id. ibid. Epiſt. Libri Adagiorum ad Ricardum Pacæum.

VITELLIO, or VITELLO, author of a treatiſe of Optics, which is pretty much eſteemed, lived after the middle of the XIIIth century [A]. Some authors ſay that the author himſelf, as Frederic Riſnerus, who had read that treatiſe in manuſcript, informs us (1). Whence we ought to conclude that Tanſtetter (2) miſtook in placing Vitellio in the Xth century. Eraſmus Reinhold, Gauric, Peucer, Blancanus, Voſſius, &c. agree in placing him after the middle of the XIIIth.

[A] He lived after the middle of the XIIIth century.] This appears by his dedicating his book to Friar William de Morbeta, who wrote a treatiſe of Geomancy in the year 1269. This date was expreſſed by the that he was born in Germany, but others make him a Polander [B]. It is very probable that he compoſed his book in Italy [C]. The edition which Frederic Riſnerus procured in the year 1572, is incomparably better than that of Nuremberg in 1535. We ſhall ſee below the praiſes which he beſtowed on the labours of Vitellio [D]. Mr Konig knew of no other edition than that of Nuremberg, which he believed to be publiſhed by the author himſelf (a).

[B] Some authors ſay that he was born in Germany . . . . others make him a Polander.] The laſt opinion is the moſt eligible, for in the ſeventy-fourth theorem of the tenth book of Vitellio we find theſe words: In noſtra terra, ſcilicet Poloniæ habitabili, &c (3). - - - In our country, viz. Poland, &c. In the title of his book, the ſirname of filius Polonorum & Thuringorum, is given to him; which, according to Riſnerus (4) ſignifies, that his father was a Polander, or a Thuringian, or that his mother was a Thuringian, or a Polander. Regiomontanus, in his Preface to Alphragan expreſſes himſelf thus, Vitellio autem noſter Thuringus (5), which is intimating that Thuringia was Vitellio's country.

[C] It is very probable that he compoſed his book in Italy.] See the proofs of this fact which Riſnerus hath collected. ‘ Quædam ſunt in Opticis notæ Vitellonem in Italiam veniſſe, Italiæque bibliothecis ‘ adjutum fuiſſe. Etenim Vitello ipſe de ſe teſtis eſt ‘ lib. 10. theor. 42. ſe primum omnium in Italia ad ‘ Cubalum (qui locus eſt inter Paduam & Vincentiam) ‘ contemplatione aquæ tenuiſſimæ ac limpidiſſimæ ad ‘ Opticas artes incenſum atque inflammatum eſſe: harum enim formarum intuitu (ait) & mirabili tranſmutatione primùm nos amor hujus ſtudii allexit: & ‘ lib. 10. theor. 67. ubi ſcribit ex Iride, quàm in ‘ aqua è ſcopulo Viterbio proximo vehementius præcipitata ſæpenumero vidiſſet, pleraſque iridis affectiones & proprietates ſibi animadverſas & obſervatas ‘ eſſe: illud (inquit) nobis principium cogitationis ‘ fuit, ut præſenti negotio ſtudium applicaremus. At ‘ quòd Vitello in Italia, quòd Romæ tum cæteris liberalibus honeſtiſque ſtudiis, tum verò Opticis operam ‘ navarit, majus fortaſſe argumentum videatur, quod ‘ Guilielmo de Morbeta (qui tum Romani Pontificis ‘ pœnitentiarium, ut appellant, Romæ agebat) ſuaſore ‘ & hortatore, ut ipſe in procœmio teſtatur, optica ‘ primum conſcribenda ſuſceperit, eidemque abſoluta ‘ poſtea nuncuparit (6). - - - - There are ſome things in ‘ Vitellio's Optics, which ſeem to denote that he went ‘ to Italy, and was aſſiſted by the libraries of that country. For he ſays concerning himſelf, that he was firſt ‘ of all inflamed with a deſire of ſtudying Optics, by ſeeing at Cubalo in Italy (which is a place ſituate between Padua and Vicenza) ſome water that was extremely thin and clear; for, ſays he, by viewing the ‘ form of it, and the wonderful changes it underwent, I ‘ firſt conceived a ſtrong inclination for that ſtudy: and ‘ elſewhere in the ſame book he ſays, that he had obſerved and collected moſt of the properties of the rainbow, from that rainbow which he had often ſeen ‘ formed in the water falling impetuouſly down from a ‘ rock hard by Viterbe; that, ſays he, made me firſt ‘ think of purſuing the preſent ſtudy. As to Vitellio's having applied himſelf in Italy, and at Rome, to the ‘ liberal arts, and particularly to the ſtudy of Optics, ‘ what he himſelf ſays in his preface may perhaps ſeem ‘ a ſtronger proof of this. He there acquaints us that it ‘ was by the advice and earneſt exhortation of William ‘ de Morbeta (who was then the Pope's penitentiary at ‘ Rome) that he firſt undertook to write his Optics, and ‘ afterwards dedicated them to him, when they were ‘ finiſhed.’

[D] The praiſes which Riſnerus beſtowed on the labours of Vitellio.] The paſſage which I am about to tranſcribe informs us that Vitellio wrote other books beſides his Optics: ‘ Quid & quantum viribus ingenii ‘ perfecerit, præclara ejus monimenta ſempiterno teſtimonio erunt: non ſolùm in Phyſiologicis, quæ citat lib. 5. theor. 18. & lib. 10. theor. 80. in libris ‘ de ordine entium: de elementatis concluſionibus, qui ‘ nominantur in præfatione, & lib. 1. theor. 28. in ‘ libris de ſcientia motuum cœleſtium, quæ allegat ‘ lib. 10. theor. 53. ſed multò maximè in decem libris Opticis: quos ut ex Alhazeno imprimis, deinde è Græcorum authorum fontibus hauſerit, certè ‘ mirandis acceſſionibus amplificavit. Alhazeni, Euclidis, Ptolemæi axiomata, hypotheſes, theoremata ‘ omnia collegit; id laboris infiniti fuit. Sed ex Apollonio, Theodoſio, Menelao, Theone, Pappo, ‘ Proclo, & aliis firmamenta permultarum demonſtrationum ſingulari judicio repetivit: ſingulari ordine ‘ maximè naturali per ſua genera, ſpecieſque Opticam, Catoptricam, Meſopticam diſpoſuit, artemque ‘ totam mirabiliter abſolvit. Quid plura? Si artis ‘ opifex atque author habendus ſit, qui arti formam, ‘ animamque dedit: Vitello jure optimo Opticæ artis ‘ autor habeatur (7). - - - - What and how much he ‘ has been able to accompliſh by the ſtrength of his genius will appear by theſe eternal monuments which he ‘ has left behind him, not only in Phyſiological matters, ‘ but above all in his ten books of Optics, which as he ‘ took firſt from Alhazenus, and then from the Greek authors, ſo hath he enlarged them with wonderful additions of his own. He collected all the axioms, hypotheſes, and theorems of Alhazenus, Euclid, and Ptolomy; which was a work of infinite labour. He likewiſe, with great judgment, borrowed the grounds of ‘ many demonſtrations from Apollonius, Theodoſius, Menelaus, Theon, Pappus, Proclus, and others: he has ‘ ranged Optics, Catoptrics, and Miſoptics, in a ſingular ‘ and moſt natural method, according to the different kind ‘ and ſpecies of each. In ſhort, he has given an admirable ſyſtem of the whole art. What need is there for ‘ any more words? If the man who gives life and form ‘ to an art is to be looked upon as the author and finiſher ‘ of that art, then Vitellio ought juſtly to be eſteemed the ‘ author of Optics.’ It appears by this that Vitellio's glory was not that of invention, but that of digeſting borrowed matters.

(a) Vitellio Opticam edi curavit, Norimb. An. 1535. Konig. Bibl. pag, 850.

(1) Federicus Riſnerus, Præfat. in Vitellonis Opticam, pag. m. 163 Præfationis Epiſtol. & Orationum Petri Rami.

(2) In Epiſtolâ Opticis Vitellonis præpoſitâ.

(3) See Riſnerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 162.

(4) Ibid.

(5) See Riſnerus, ibid. pag. 163.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Riſnerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 164.

VIVIANI (VINCENTIO) a noble Florentine, diſciple of Galileo, and a great Mathematician, who in the year 1659 publiſhed a book in folio intituled, De maximis & minimis Geometrica Divinatio in quintum Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi. His opinions in point of religion were very bad; for he believed the neceſſity of all things, the nullity of evil, and the participation of the univerſal ſoul, as he owned to Mr Monconys (a).

Conſult the Italia regnante of Mr Leti, page 411 of the third part.

The firſt work he undertook was his Divination upon Ariſteus, the Cotemporary of Euclid, and author of five books of problems de locis ſolidis, the bare propoſitions of which were collected by Pappus of Alexandria. Theſe books are entirely loſt. Mr Viviani interrupting his ‘ Divination on Ariſteus, ſet himſelf to reſtore the fifth book of the Conic ‘ ſections of Apollonius (b). While he laboured at this, the famous Borelli . . . . . ‘ found in the library of the Great Duke of Tuſcany, an Arabian manuſcript with a Latin ‘ inſcription which ſignified that they were the eight books (c) of Apollonius's Conic ‘ ſections . . . . . He carried this manuſcript to Rome, to tranſlate it with the aſſiſtance ‘ of a famous profeſſor of the Eaſtern Languages (d). Mr Viviani being not willing to loſe

(a) Monconys, Voiage, Part. i, pag. 130, ad ann. 1646, Lyons, 1665.

(b) He had compoſed eight books on this ſubject. The propoſitions contained in them were collected by Pappus. But of theſe books there remained only the firſt four. Fontenelle, ubi infra, citat. (f).

(c) Nevertheleſs the eighth book was entirely wanting.

(d) See, the remark [B], of the article APOLLONIUS Pergeus, and the remark [D], of the article ECHELENSIS.

‘loſe the fruit of his labour demanded a certificate that he knew nothing at all of the Arabic tongue, and that he was an utter ſtranger to that manuſcript. He would not even ſuffer Borelli to write any thing to him which concerned his book. At laſt he finiſhed it, and it appeared that he had more than divined or conjectured, and that he was ſuperior to Apollonius himſelf. He was obliged to interrupt his labours for the ſervice of his prince in an affair of very great importance [A].’ He had a penſion given him by the King of France, and thereupon he reſolved to finiſh his Divination upon Ariſteus, which he propoſed to dedicate to that Prince. He was honoured by Ferdinand II, Great Duke of Tuſcany with the title of firſt Mathematician to his highneſs a title ſo much the more glorious for him as it had been conferred on Galileo. He gave the ſolution of three Geometrical problems, which had been propoſed to all the Mathematicians of Europe, and dedicated that piece to the memory of Mr Chapellain . . . . . under the title of Enodatio Problematum, &c. He himſelf propoſed the problem of the ſquarable arch, which Mr Leibniz and the Marquis de l'Hoſpital ſolved by the differential method. He was choſen in the year 1699 to fill a place among the eight foreigners who are fellows of the royal Academy of Sciences. This new favour re-animated his zeal; and he publiſhed three books of his Divination on Ariſteus (e) [B], which he dedicated to the King of France. He laid out the fortune he had acquired by the bounties of that Prince in building a houſe at Florence which for a private perſon may be called magnificent. There he gave an honourable place to the buſt of Galileo, to which he added ſeveral inſcriptions to the glory of that great Mathematician, ſtriving by all poſſible means to ſignalize his gratitude towards his illuſtrious maſter: and in this he may be ſaid to have followed the inclination of his heart, which was naturally full of goodneſs. He died in the month of September 1703, aged fourſcore and one years (f).

[A] He was obliged to interrupt his works for the ſervice of his Prince in an affair of very great importance.] ‘To prevent the inundations of the Tyber it was a long time . . . ſince they thought of diverting the courſe of one of thoſe rivers which fall into it, particularly the river Chiana (called by the Latins Clanis) as being that which contributes moſt towards theſe inundations. They were ready to execute this deſign under Tiberius, when the neighbouring colonies being heard upon that affair, the Florentines repreſented that by turning the courſe of that river into the Arno both their city and their country would be laid under water. Regard was had to theſe remonſtrances . . . and in order to put a ſtop to theſe floods they contented themſelves with building a wall, in which there was an opening, ſo calculated that it would receive no more than a certain quantity of water which could not do any damage. There are ſtill ſome traces of this work to be ſeen. Under Alexander VII, the conteſt was renewed between the Romans and the Florentines, touching the project that was in hand for diverting the courſe of the river Chiana. Deputies were appointed on each ſide. His Holineſs pitched upon Cardinal Carpegna with Mr Caſſini, and the Great Duke nominated Michelozi the Senator, with Mr Viviani. While theſe two gentlemen, Caſſini and Viviani, were jointly employed in the affair that was committed to them, they had an opportunity of making ſeveral obſervations upon Natural Hiſtory, and among other things upon the inſects which prick the oak, and thereby produce what goes under the name of a gall-nut. The plans which they drew up for preventing the floods, occaſioned by the ſudden overflowings of the Chiana, were not executed, as it generally happens in all thoſe things which are undertaken for the public ſervice (1).’

[B] He publiſhed three books of his Divination on Ariſteus.] This book was printed at Florence in the year 1701. It contains 128 pages, in folio, and is intituled, De locis ſolidis ſecunda Divinatio Geometrica in quinque Libros injuria temporum amiſſos Ariſtæi ſenioris Geometræ. This is a ſecond edition enlarged: the firſt edition was printed at Florence in the year 1673 (2).

(e) See the Mémoires de Trevoux, February 1703, pag. 142, of the Amſterdam edition.

(f) Taken from Mr de Fontenelle, in the Elogy of Mr Viviani, Extracts of which are to be found in the Mémoires de Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1007 & ſeq, of the edition of France.

(1) Taken from the Memoires de Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1010, 1011, in the Extracts of the elogy which Mr de Fontenelle made on Mr Viviani, before an aſſembly of the Royal Academy of Sciences, on the 11*th of April* 1704.

(2) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the 12*th of March* 1703, pag. 162, of the Paris edition, and the Memoires de Trevoux, Febr. 1703, pag. 142, of the Amſterdam edition.

ULEFELD, or ULFELD (JAMES)

ULEFELD, or ULFELD (JAMES) a Daniſh gentleman, and a ſenator of that kingdom, was ſent ambaſſador to the court of Muſcovy in the year 1578, by Frederic II, King of Denmark. He wrote a relation of his voyage, and gave it to a Bookſeller at Leyden to print, who ſo neglected it, that it fell into the hands of a Grocer, and would have undoubtedly ſerved to wrap up ſugar, &c. if Goldaſt had not bought it. He cauſed it to be printed at Francfort in the year 1608, with the title of Hodæporicum Ruthenicum Jacobi, Nobilis Dani, and in 1627, with the ſame title and the addition of Ulfeldii, after Jacobi [A]. This James Ulfeld publiſhed (a) a Daniſh tranſlation of David Chytræus's treatiſe of the four laſt things, Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell. He alſo wrote the hiſtory of ſome of the kings of Denmark, but it was never printed (b). Goldaſt acknowledges (c) that he was not very elegant, but he ſaith that he judged of things with great prudence.

[A] With the ſame title, and the addition of Ulfeldii after Jacobi.] He did not know the author's name, till after the firſt edition, when Claudius Chriſtopher Lyſchander, a Daniſh Divine, acquainted him that the author of this voyage to Muſcovy was of the noble family of Ulfeld; that he was very learned, rich, and a Senator of the kingdom; but that he fell into diſgrace for treating of ſome affairs without the King's conſent; that his two ſons MAGNUS and JAMES were in a flouriſhing condition, and that James, who was a Senator, was ambaſſador at the Hague in the year 1608 (1). I believe this is the ſame who was promoted to the dignity of Chancellor of Denmark, in the year 1610, and died on the twenty-fifth of June 1630 (2). I alſo believe that the Count Ulfeld, of whom I ſpeak in the following article, was the ſon of this Chancellor. Obſerve that the ſame Lyſchander in another letter (3) informs Goldaſt, that the two ſons of the author of the Hodæporicum Ruthenicum had ſeen the book. Whence I conclude that the author was not then alive.

Obſerve, that Mr Konig is much in the wrong concerning our James Ulfeld. He makes him the author of an embaſſy to Poland, written in the year 1627 (4). Here are no leſs than two miſtakes; for James was dead at the time of the publication of the firſt edition in 1608, and his book is not a relation of an embaſſy to Poland. But as he on one hand aſcribes a relation to him which he did not write, on the other he robs him of the Hodæporicum Ruthenicum, to beſtow it on an imaginary perſon called James Danus (5), I mean, that Mr Konig miſtakes Danus, a Dane, which here is

---

(a) At Cophenhagen, in the year 1591, and in the year 1593.

(b) Taken from Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Albertum Bartholin. de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 255, 256.

(c) In Epiſt. Dedicat. apud Mollerum, ibid. pag. 255.

(1) Taken from the ccxixth letter of the collection of Letters written to Goldaſt, and printed in the year 1688.

(2) See Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Alb. Barthol. de Script. Dan. pag. 255.

(3) It is the cclxth of the above mentioned collection.

(4) Konig. Bibl. pag. 851.

(5) Konig. ibid. pag. 235.

is a national epithet given to the writer of this Hodæporicum by Goldaſt, for the ſirname of an author. Mr Mollerus hath noted almoſt all theſe miſtakes of Mr Konig (6).

(6) Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 255.

ULEFELD, or ULFELD (Cornifids, or Corfits) grand-ſon to the foregoing (a), was one of the greateſt genius's of the XVIIth century; and if he had not tarniſhed his reputation by the want of fidelity to his ſovereign, he might juſtly have been reckoned amongſt the greateſt men. Chriſtian IV, King of Denmark, made him Viceroy of Norway, High-Steward of his realms, and heaped on him all the marks of kindneſs that a favourite could hope for (b) [A]. He choſe him for his ſon-in-law, by marrying him to Eleanor his natural daughter [B]. This ſon-in-law of the king was his Embaſſador-Extraordinary in France in the year 1647. Frederic III, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Chriſtian IV, could not bear the ſpirit and conduct of Count Ulefeld; he obſerved too much ambition in him, and it was ſcarce poſſible for the king to avoid reſenting the vigorous zeal of the Count for maintaining the privileges of the nobility at his acceſſion to the throne [C]. However that be, the High-Steward was ſent Embaſſador to Holland in the year 1649, in order to make a treaty there concerning the paſſage of the Sound (c); and his negotiation not happening to pleaſe at home, he grew diſguſted, and kept his chamber above ſix months on pretence of ſickneſs [D]. He was accuſed in the year 1651 of having attempted to poiſon the king (d) [E]; but the woman who accuſed

(a) Obſerve that I do not affirm it; I only believe it.

(b) Sorbiere's Relation of England, pag. 147.

(c) Sorbiere, ibid. pag. 149.

(d) Parival's Hiſt. du Siecle de Fer, Tom. i, pag. 490.

[A] Chriſtian IV . . . heaped on him all the marks of kindneſs that a favourite could hope for.] The Hiſtorical Novel which I ſhall hereafter cite, informs me that he became the favourite of Chriſtian IV, not only on account of his own merit, but likewiſe by the intereſt of his father, who was Great Chancellor, and governed the kingdom. This High-Chancellor was deſcended from one of the firſt and moſt ancient families of the realm, and the only one that was honoured with the dignity of Count by a grant from the Emperor. Cornifix Ulfeld was the tenth ſon: the manner how he came to be known by his father, who thought for a long time that he was loſt, is romantic. See the Hiſtorical Novel. I cannot tell whether it is poſſible to reconcile what has been juſt now ſaid concerning the dignity of Count, with a little Latin book (1) which ſays, that Cornifix Ulfeld, flying for refuge to Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, and having lent her great ſums of money, acquired her protection and favour, and the title of Count.

[B] . . . . And married him to Eleanor, his natural daughter.] 'The King after the death of the Queen 'fell in love with a beautiful lady, whoſe name was 'Chriſtina, of the antient family of Monch, and not 'being able to obtain any favour from her, married 'her with all the formalities requiſite to a lawful marriage, in the preſence of the court and Senate; but 'one clauſe of the contract was, that the children 'which ſhould proceed from this marriage ſhould 'not be Princes, but obliged to content themſelves 'with the quality of Counts of Sleſwic and Holſtein, of which dignity they ſhould bear the name 'and arms (2).' This Prince attempted to divorce her for certain things ſhe had done out of jealouſy: the cauſe lay before the Senate. Annibal Seeſted pleaded the King's cauſe; and the Count of Ulfeld pleaded for the Queen, and carried the cauſe (3). The Latin book which I have cited ſays that ſhe was actually divorced, and that the King afterwards grew in love with the bed-chamber lady (4) to his divorced Queen (5), and had a ſon and a daughter by her. The ſon called Ulricus Chriſtian Guldenleeuw bore arms under the King of Spain, and did wonders at Copenhagen when it was beſieged by the Swedes. The daughter was married to Claudius Alfeld, a gentleman of Holſtein. The ſame book informs us that the reaſon why the King hated his wife, and loved her bed-chamber lady, was becauſe ſhe diſcovered to him that the Queen deſigned to poiſon him: which was revenged on this accuſer after her death; for Count Ulefeld would not permit the celebration of her funeral, but ſent her out of town at night to be buried in the burying place of the poor. She ſurvived the King but few days, dying with melancholy (6), as it is reported.

[C] For maintaining the privileges of the nobility.] An author whom I have cited (7) ſaith, that the mildneſs of Chriſtian IV, 'and the charms of peace, made 'the nobility and the people neglect many privileges 'which they propoſed to re-eſtabliſh in full force, 'when' they elected Frederic III, and that then the High-Steward was obliged by his poſt . . . to ſtand up for the nobility of the kingdom; for he repreſented them, and had a negative voice in council: ſo that as nothing could paſs without his conſent, the ſtile of the placarts ran, and the ordinances were notified as made by the King and the High-Steward. He adds (8) as a conjecture, that beſides the intereſt, which Count Ulefeld 'had in ſupporting the privileges of that body, he 'alſo conſidered thoſe of his own family, and the 'enmity betwixt the children of the royal family, by 'reaſon of the inequality of their rank, and of the 'jealouſy which the late King's paſſion for the Counteſs Eleanor had ſown.' The author of the Hiſtorical Novel, notwithſtanding the part of a Panegyriſt and Apologiſt which he all along acts, ſtill owns, that the Count, at his wife's perſuaſion, had ſome thoughts of cauſing himſelf to be elected King after the death of Chriſtian IV, and that he made ſome attempts that way: but finding his meaſures broken, he dexterouſly turned the courſe of affairs, and promoted the election of Prince Frederic on ſuch conditions as allowed him to ſhare the authority with him, under pretext of preſerving the privileges of the nobility, of which, as High-Steward, he was chief.

[D] He kept his chamber above ſix months, on pretence of ſickneſs.] Sorbiere calls this a blunder; for at court, ſaith he (9), no man ought ever to quit an advantageous poſt, nor retire on any pretext whatſoever; he ought not to loſe the train of affairs, nor uſe people to go on without him, much leſs give them the advantage of his abſence. But his blaming this conduct, did not hinder him from taking his part ſo zealouſly, that his Daniſh Majeſty's Embaſſador complained of it at the court of France: the conſequence of which was that Sorbiere was baniſhed to Nantes. This author had formerly dedicated a book (10) to Count Ulefeld, for which he had doubtleſs received a good reward; which engaged him to inſert in his voyage an epiſode in juſtification of this Lord. He was not well informed of all the particulars of this cauſe; the detention of the Count in the iſland of Bornholm, and the liberty granted him to go and live in the iſle of Funen, were unknown to Sorbiere.

[E] He was accuſed of having attempted to poiſon the King.] The author of the Hiſtorical Novel, pretends that a woman, named Diana, was ſuborned to declare that the Count and Counteſs of Ulefeld had ſollicited her to poiſon the King, the Queen, and all the royal family; and that the Count ſo judiciouſly defended himſelf in full council, that Diana and Captain Weller, who had introduced her, were fully convicted of bearing falſe witneſs, and condemned, ſhe to be beheaded, and he to perpetual baniſhment; which ſentences were executed. If this relation be compared with that of a modern Hiſtorian (11), who tells us, That one Colonel Valter was alſo ſuſpected, who having defended his innocence, cauſed the ſaid Count Ulefelt to be ſummoned; but inſtead of appearing before his Majeſty, he privily retired with his wife, and went into Holland, and from thence afterwards into Sweden: If, I ſay, ſuch a compariſon be made, it will appear that the Hiſtorian gives a very indiſtinct account of the affair. He ſeems to affirm, that the Count and the Colonel

(1) It is intituled Machinationum Cornificii Ulefeldii ſuccincta Narratio.

(2) An Hiſtorical Novel, intituled Le Comte d'Ulfeld, Printed at Paris in 1677.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Her name was Wibicha.

(5) Fuit hæc Chriſtinæ cujus ſupra meminimus à cubiculis; quumque Regi revelaſſet ipſi à Domina ſua venenum parari, Rex illam, REPUDIATA Chriſtina ejus loco amavit.

(6) Ex Machinat. ſuccinctâ Narrat.

(7) Sorbiere, Relat. d'Angleterre, pag. m. 149.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 150.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 151.

(10) The French tranſlation of Hobbes's treatiſe de Cive, in 1649.

(11) Parival, Tom. i, p. 490.

accuſed him [F] not being able to make good her accuſation, was beheaded. That did not hinder his ſecretly retiring with his wife and children out of the kingdom, and going to Sweden, where he was extraordinary well received by Queen Chriſtina [G]. He diſcovered a great deal of zeal for the ſervice of Sweden, which would not have been criminal, if he had not endeavoured to ſerve it to the prejudice of his country. His counſels were wonderfully advantageous to Charles Guſtavus [H]; and it is inexpreſſible how effectually the politic intrigues which he carried on, advanced that prince's conqueſts in Denmark. He was one of his commiſſioners at the treaty of Rotſchild, as he would have been afterwards at Copenhagen, if the French Ambaſſador had not entreated that king to name another [I]. At laſt he fell into diſgrace with the Swedes [K]; who impriſoned him.

He

Colonel were both ſuſpected of the ſame crime; but that is not true. The Hiſtorical Novel doth not ſay that the Count firſt retired into Holland; it ſays that he would have gone into Poland, but that being informed at Dantzic that the King of Poland refuſed him his leave, he went into Sweden. The Latin book makes him firſt retire to Amſterdam, and afterwards to Sweden, and adds, that at Stralſund, he publiſhed an apology for his conduct; and that after the abdication of Chriſtina, he went to live in Pomerania.

[F] The woman who accuſed him.] Her name was Dina; ſhe was a beautiful woman, and by profeſſion a lady of pleaſure, for ſhe declared before the Judges, that ſhe had had a child by Count Ulefeld. The little Latin tract relates theſe particulars, not as Parival does, but in the following manner. Dina uſed to wait on the Count by means of a private ſtair-caſe, and lay with him unknown to the Counteſs. Early one morning the Counteſs entred her huſband's chamber, and ſhewed him a poiſon which Sperlingius, a Phyſician, had prepared. ‘In quam conſilio Ottonis Sperlingii, Med. D. in perniciem Regis Daniæ Friderici III, tentati veneficii ſuſpicionem Corfitz Ulfelt, Magiſter Palatii Regii quoque venit, de quo Relatio Hafnienſis Anno 1651, publicata videri poteſt, nec non ejuſdem (Ulfeldi) Apologia Relationi oppoſita, Annoque ſequenti 1652 Stralſundiæ in 12mo edita, cui cauſas ſubjungit quæ neceſſitatem ſibi impoſuerunt & adegerunt, ut ad tempus Dania excederet (12). - - - Which ſuſpicion, viz. of having attempted to poiſon Frederic III, King of Denmark, by the advice and aid of Otto Sperlingius, Doctor of Phyſic, did likewiſe fall upon Gorfitz Ulfeld, High-Steward: concerning which, ſee the account publiſhed at Copenhagen in the year 1651; as alſo the apology of the ſaid Ulfeld in anſwer to that relation. It was publiſhed in the following year, 1652, at Straelſundt, in 12*mo*; and to this apology he ſubjoins the reaſons which obliged him to leave Denmark for a time.’ They mutually concerted the means to give it to the King. Dina heard all this diſcourſe, being hid very cloſe in the bed, in order to avoid being ſurprized by the Counteſs. She imparted this ſtory to a Colonel (13), on whom ſhe beſtowed her favours. This Colonel made his court with it to the King, his maſter, who cauſed Dina to be brought before him, from whom he heard all the particulars. The Judges examined her, before whom ſhe owned the ſame thing, and particularly confeſſed that ſhe had a child by the Count; but when the thing came before the Council of ſtate, where the Count defended his own cauſe, Dina retracted all ſhe had ſaid, was declared guilty of calumny, and condemned to loſe her head; which was afterwards placed upon a pole without the city (14). It is highly probable that ſhe was ſuborned; for muſt not the Count have been exceſſively ſtupid, to have talked of ſuch a dangerous affair when he knew it was in the hearing of a whore? This is indeed the prerogative of ſovereigns: they give ſerious attention to the depoſitions of a whore, when their lives are concerned; and it is even true, that theſe ſort of creatures have ſometimes revealed conſpiracies (15). It is juſt that monarchs ſhould enjoy this prerogative, for the public good is preferable to the obſervation of formalities; and conſequently we ought not to be ſhocked at the ſight of twenty or thirty conſpirators cut into quarters on the evidence of their accomplices, tho' the accuſers loaded with riches and rewards, are ſometimes greater criminals than the accuſed, and have, by numerous artifices, engaged the latter in the conſpiracy. The whore, ſay ſome, ought to be puniſhed, but the bawd who informed againſt her ought to have ſome ſhare in her puniſhment. I anſwer, that this maxim ſhould not be extended to privileged caſes, ſuch as the puniſhing of ſtate crimes. ‘Salus Populi ſuprema Lex eſto. - - - Let the ſafety of the people be the ſupreme law.’

[G] He was extraordinarily well received by Queen Chriſtina.] To this purpoſe Mr de Wicquefort relates two remarkable ſtories. I ſhall content myſelf with mentioning one of them: it is an artifice by which that Queen ſo far impoſed on the Daniſh Ambaſſador, as to gain an opportunity for Ulefeld to ſay all that he could for his juſtification in his preſence (16): but the other ſtory I ſhall relate without curtailing it. The Daniſh ambaſſador, to prove that Ulefeld was unworthy of Chriſtina's protection, one day told that Queen that the High-Steward had converted to his own uſe the ſum of five and twenty thouſand crowns, which the King, his maſter, had ordered to be remitted to him, that he might therewith ſupply the King of England in his neceſſity. The Queen ſaid, that if the High-Steward aſſured her, that he had cauſed that ſum to be paid to the King of England, ſhe would believe it; and that if the latter denied it, ſhe would ſay he lied; and that if a dozen of ſuch kings as he ſhould affirm it, ſhe would ſay they all twelve lied. And ſince the King of Denmark would not re-eſtabliſh the High-Steward in the poſſeſſion of his eſtate, ſhe would give him ſo much that he ſhould not repent his loſs in Denmark. The Daniſh Ambaſſador boldly replied, that her Majeſty might, if ſhe pleaſed, give him the half of her realm without the King his maſter's ſaying any thing againſt it; but that would not hinder his taking Ulefeld for the moſt infamous and perfidious of all men. This happened in the year 1654 (17). Mr de Wicquefort doth not cite his author; but I find he took this from Mr Chanut's Memoirs, where theſe two ſtories are told with more circumſtances neceſſary to be known, than in Mr de Wicquefort's book. We are informed of ſeveral other particulars relating to Count Ulefeld in thoſe Memoirs (18).

[H] His counſels were wonderfully advantageous to Charles Guſtavus.] See pag. 98, 99. of the Chevalier de Terlon's Memoirs; ſee alſo pag. 151, where you will find theſe remarkable words. ‘Count Ulefeld, who knew the humour of the nation, adviſed the King of Sweden religiouſly to preſerve the people of Schonen in the privileges which they enjoyed under the King of Denmark. This was a good advice, and perhaps if it had been followed this ſecond war had been more ſucceſsful.’ Terlon had before told us, that the King of Sweden was very angry when he heard that theſe privileges were violated: ‘But that the diſpleaſure which he ſhewed did him no ſervice at Copenhagen, where it was only taken for a bait to induce them to ſurrender that city.’

[I] If the French Ambaſſador had not entreated that King to name another.] The relation of this ſtory, with a few more circumſtances, will not be diſagreeable. ‘The Marſhal and Duke of Grammont, and Mr de Lyonne, who were then at Francfort, your Majeſty's Ambaſſadors Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiaries for the election of the Emperor, wrote to me to diſſuade the King of Sweden from nominating Count Ulefeld for the negotiations of Copenhagen, as he had been for thoſe of Roſchild: to which this prince was pleaſed to conſent, when I ſpoke to him of it, and would not give the King of Denmark the uneaſineſs of ſeeing one of his diſaffected ſubjects treat for his enemies in the very city of his reſidence, and brave his ſovereign in his misfortune; what I ſaid to the King of Sweden engaged him to ſubſtitute the Sieur Coyet inſtead of the Count (19).’

[K] At laſt he fell into diſgrace with the Swedes.] Some authors report (20), That the Swedes, to rid themſelves of Count Ulefeld, whoſe great abilities they

(12) Paſchius de novis inventis, pag. 484.

(13) George Walther.

(14) Ex Machinat. ſuccincta Relat.

(15) Fulvia, for inſtance, who diſcovered that of Catiline, apud Salluſtium. See the article FULVIA, remark [D].

(16) De l'Ambaſſadeur & de ſes Fonctions, Tom. ii, pag. 141. See Chanut's Memoirs, Tom. iii, from pag. 342, to pag. 349, Dutch edition. The author of the Hiſtorical Novel, relates this quite otherwiſe, and to the Ambaſſador's confuſion.

(17) Wicquefort, ibid, pag. 171. See Chanut's Mémoirs, Tom. iii. from pag. 292, to pag. 295.

(18) See Tom. iii, pag. 74, 97, 98, 100, 240, 364.

(19) Mémoirs de Terlon, pag. 112.

(20) See Parival, Tom. iii, pag. 206, but it ſhould be pag. 210.

He would have recovered his liberty in a glorious manner, if he had not been ſo impatient, and given credit to ſome reports that the Swedes deſigned to bring him to his tryal (e). Theſe were falſe reports; for they had given their word to the French Ambaſſador that he ſhould be ſet at liberty. The Ambaſſador had written about it, becauſe the King of Denmark demanded that Count, as being included in the treaty (f). The impreſſions which this falſe report wrought on the mind of the priſoner, made him try ſeveral expedients to deceive his guards, in which he ſucceeded [L]; for he eſcaped out of the priſon of Malmoe, and went to Copenhagen, without having obtained the remiſſion of all that he had done againſt his prince. His Counteſs came thither ſome time after, when Frederic III, who had very cunningly diſſembled his deſign of ſecuring their perſons, cauſed them both to be arreſted, and ſent them to the iſle of Bornholm; but out of his clemency, he permitted them to live in the iſland of Funen, after the receipt of a letter which the Count wrote to him (g). In it he acknowledged his crimes, and only implored the mercy of his ſovereign, to whom for the future he promiſed abſolute ſubmiſſion. Some time after he was permitted to travel out of the kingdom; he went to the Spaw-waters (h), from thence to Paris incognito, and afterwards to Bruges, where he reſolved to winter with his family; but he was obliged ſecretly to quit that place. His ſon killed Colonel Wolf [M]: his wife, who retired to London, and quitted that city privately, was ſeized at feared, and withal not being able to recompenſe his good ſervices, accuſed him of treaſon, in order to ſeize his great riches. The author, who ſpeaks thus, had been ſaying that the Swedes had condemned this Count to a perpetual impriſonment; and therefore he muſt needs have been ignorant of his being included in the treaty of peace; ſee the text of this article. Now amongſt the things taken from him by the King of Sweden, we muſt not forget the library which formerly belonged to Sepheldt, a Daniſh Senator (21). The King of Sweden found it in the caſtle of Reinſtedt, of which this Senator, who was Count Ulefeld's mortal enemy, was governor, and preſented it to the Count, who at the entreaty of the Chevalier de Terlon, was willing to reſtore it to the Senator for ſix thouſand crows. The Senator would not give that ſum, tho' his library was valued at fifty thouſand crowns, on account of the great number of very rare manuſcripts and curioſities which it contained. On his refuſal, Count Ulefeld cauſed it to be removed to Schonen, and after his confinement it was ſeized by the King of Sweden and tranſported to Stockholm.

A LIBRARY ſeized upon.

[L] In which he ſucceeded.] The circumſtances of this fact being very ſingular, I ſhall be particular in the relation of it. 'Count Ulefeld was a man of 'great abilities, and very much conſidered in Den'mark, and he was very ſenſible of it, ſince he ven'tured to go to Copenhagen, without knowing before'hand whether his ſovereign would be pleaſed with 'it. The priſoner, from the day of his confinement, 'ſo naturally acted the mute, and ſeemed ſo inſenſible 'of all the injuries done him, that it was impoſſible 'to draw one word from him, when they queſtioned 'him in order to bring him to his trial; and the 'methods he took to deceive his guards, who were 'always near the bed in which he pretended to be 'ſick, are almoſt incredible. And yet he himſelf 'made the cloaths in which he eſcaped to Copenha'gen, which was his ruin; for if, purſuant to what 'I cauſed to be ſaid to him, he had relied on the 'goodneſs of the King of Sweden for his liberty, he 'had avoided the diſgrace which fell on him; and 'his eſtate in Sweden had not been confiſcated, as 'well as that which belonged to him in Denmark 'was afterwards (22).' The Hiſtorical Novel aſſures us; 1. That by the treaty of Rotſchild, the Count obtained a general amneſty, and was to be re-inſtated in his places and eſtate. 2. That the King of Sweden having granted him leave to defend himſelf publickly before the Senate at Malmoe, and his indiſpoſition not permitting him to appear, his Counteſs Eleonora pleaded for him ſo ſtrenuouſly, and with ſo much eloquence (23), that the Judges pronounced ſentence of abſolution. 3. That the King of Sweden confirmed this ſentence, and that Annibal Seeſted, the Count's ſecret enemy, made him afraid of a more cloſe confinement, and adviſed him to endeavour by all means to eſcape. I ought not to omit that according to the ſmall Latin book, the Count's diſgrace happened after the death of Charles Guſtavus. It was after that King's death that the Count, with ſome Senators of Malmoe, endeavoured to reſtore Schonen to the Danes. The ſame book alſo ſaith, that he feigned himſelf affected with a palſy in the tongue during his confinement. In cuſtodiam traditus eſt in qua quamdiu fuit, hemiplexiæ morbum & vitiatam loquelam raro patientiæ exemplo ſimulaſſe dicitur (24). This confirms what the Chevalier de Terlon relates, and what follows confirms another particular, of which he informs us. 'Jam 'in eo fuit (Ulefeldius) intercedente apud Regem Sueciæ 'Chriſtianiſſimi Regis legato, ſi unicum tantum octi'duum diutius in cuſtodia ſe continuiſſet, ut libertati 'reſtitueretur. Quin literæ quarum beneficio dimitten'dus eſſet à Regina matre Hedviga Eleonora filii tu'trice ac proceribus regni ſubſcriptæ eodem quo eva'ſerat momento, & hinc paulo ſerius allatæ circumfe'rebantur (25). - - - The affairs of Ulefeld were already 'at ſuch a paſs through the interceſſion of the French Am'baſſador with the King of Sweden, that if he had but 'ſtaid eight days longer in priſon, he would have been 'ſet at liberty. Nay the very letter upon which he was 'to be releaſed, was ſigned by the Queen-mother Hedviga 'Eleonora, as guardian to her ſon, and by the Peers of 'the realm, at the ſame hour in which he made his 'eſcape; ſo that it was but a little too late in coming.

I ſhall clear this up as much as poſſible by Mr Puffendorf's account of the affair. He informs us that the ſtratagem which Annibal Seeſted made uſe of to prevent the Count's re-eſtabliſhment in Sweden, and enjoyment of his eſtate, was to perſuade the King of Denmark, his maſter, who was ſending him into Sweden, to give him orders to recommend the Count's caſe to the Senators. He imagined that ſuch a thing would render him the more ſuſpected, becauſe he was accuſed of a traiterous plot in favour of the King of Denmark; ſo that no better means could have been thought of to make him appear guilty, than the interceſſion of that King. This ſtratagem of Seeſted fell to the ground. The Swedes took no notice of it, and as they were not willing to examine things rigorouſly after the war was ended, and after the King's death, they declared Ulefeld acquitted. Then his enemy had recourſe to another ſtratagem; he went to Count Brahe, and deſired that the Senate's ſentence of abſolution might not be publiſhed, but put into his hands in order to endear himſelf to his brother-in-law (26). But as ſoon as he had the ſentence in his poſſeſſion, he made the Chevalier de Terlon (27) and Mr Sidney (28) believe, that the Senate of Sweden had condemned Ulefeld, and entreated them to give him immediately notice of it, that he might think of ſome means to make his eſcape. The letters which they wrote to him produced the effect that Seeſted expected. The priſoner eſcaped and went to Copenhagen, where he loſt that liberty which he had juſt recovered (29). Mr Seeſted ſeems to me to have run a bold riſque; for if theſe two Ambaſſadors, whom he deceived, had mentioned what he told them, the Swediſh Senators would have known his malicious frauds, and made a noiſe about it: and conſequently he would have loſt his reputation. Obſerve, that it is impoſſible to reconcile the relations of the Chevalier de Terlon and Mr Puffendorf: one of them is certainly falſe.

[M] Colonel Wolf.] A modern Hiſtorian (30), whom I have already cited, ſaith, that Colonel Wolf being

---

(e) Mémoires du Chevalier de Terlon, pag. 301, Dutch edition. See the remark [K].

(f) Mémoires de Terlon, ibid.

(g) That letter is dated the 27th of October, 1661, and is to be found entire in Parival, Tom. iii, pag. 580.

(h) Sorbiere, ubi ſupra, pag. 153.

(21) Memoires du Chev. de Terlon. pag. 105, 106.

(22) Mémoires du Chevalier de Terlon, pag. 303. He had ſaid pag. 99, that the Count had a vaſt eſtate, a great intereſt with the nobility, and above all had an infinite deal of wit, and that he was one of the ableſt men in the kingdom.

(23) Her ſpeech may be ſeen in the Hiſtorical Novel.

(24) Machinat. ſuccinct. Narrat. pag. 28.

(25) Ibid. p. 30.

(26) Count Ulefeld.

(27) The French Ambaſſador.

(28) The Engliſh Ambaſſador.

(29) Taken from Puffendorf, in the life of Charles Guſtavus, lib. vi, num. 52. See the Acta Eruditorum, 1697, pag. 190.

(30) Parival, Tom. iii, pag. 584.

at Dover, and carried to Copenhagen, where they pretended to have diſcovered a horrible conſpiracy, which he had formed againſt his prince [N]. And accordingly ſentence paſſed againſt him at Copenhagen, on the twenty-fourth of July 1663, by which, as convicted of high treaſon, he was condemned to death. The ſentence was executed in effigie. They made a waxen figure repreſenting him, which was carried on a ſledge to the public place; where the executioner cut off his hand and his head, and divided the body into four quarters, which were carried to the four corners of the city (i). The Count received notice of this at Bruges, and departed the next day for Baſil [O], where he lived four or five months unknown, and almoſt always ſick (k). He left that place, being informed that ſearch was made after him in order to take him; and tho' very ill, at night he went into a ſmall bark on the Rhine, in order to go to Briſac; but had ſcarce advanced two leagues before the piercing cold killed him. He was ſixty years of age or thereabouts, and left three ſons, the eldeſt of whom turned Roman Catholic, and lived with the Queen of Sweden. The ſecond was a Knight of Malta; and the third, who was one of the handſomeſt and moſt learned gentlemen in Europe, lived in England. I have extracted the account of theſe laſt facts from an hiſtorical novel, intituled, Le Comte d'Ulfeld, printed at Paris in the year 1677, and dedicated to the Duke of Montauſier, by an author who calls himſelf Rouſſeau de la Valette. I might have extracted a thouſand curious things from it; but I was afraid of confounding hiſtory with romance [P]. I have nevertheleſs made uſe of that book in my remarks. For the reſt, this Count is frequently mentioned in Charles Ogier's travels [Q].

(i) Parival, Tom. iii.

(k) See the book cited at the end of this article.

The

being in a coach with his wife, Count Ulefeld's ſon came up to him, and ſaluted him very courteouſly, and ſtabbed him to the heart with a dagger at the inſtant that he was telling his wife, who it was that had accoſted them. The aſſaſſin was ſo fortunate as to eſcape. The Colonel being governor of the iſle of Bornholm, had not ſo ſtrictly guarded Count Ulefeld, but he found an opportunity to get away; but he was ſeized juſt as he was embarking, and cloſely confined to a priſon, very much below a man of his quality (31); and no compaſſionate regard was had to him, for fear he ſhould once more eſcape. This was the cauſe of the hatred which the Count and his family had conceived againſt the Colonel.

[N] A horrid conſpiracy . . . againſt his Prince.] It has been ſaid that the Elector of Brandenburg acquainted King Frederic III, that Count Ulefeld had wrote to him, That if he would lend him a vigorous aſſiſting hand, he would dethrone the King and his heirs, and cauſe the crown to devolve on his head. For, ſaid he, I have ſo many of the Clergy and Laity, who will declare on my ſide, that it will render this enterpriſe eaſy (32). The ſentence of death pronounced againſt him, mentions their having proofs of this; but this Elector is not therein named.

[O] Departed for Baſil.] According to the ſmall Latin tract, he there pretended to be governor to three Dutch gentlemen, and was not known till one of his ſons had a quarrel with a Captain of Zurich. He had his three ſons and a daughter with him. His lady was in priſon at Copenhagen. When he found himſelf diſcovered he embarked on the Rhine alone, and died in the boat in February 1664, not far from Newburg. The watermen carried him to a convent near that place, whither his ſons came with the utmoſt expedition, in order to ſave the jewels he had about him, and cauſed him to be buried under a tree in the middle of a field.

[P] Of confounding Hiſtory with Romance.] Though the author of the Hiſtorical Novel aſſures us, That all there is very true, and that he hath written nothing but what he had from the information of the moſt able and diſintereſted perſons of that country. I cannot help believing that there are ſome romantic embelliſhments in that work. The Counteſs Eleonora owned that the account of her life ſavoured very much of a romance (33): He who heard her ſay this, having related ſomething of that Hiſtory, adds, that this, with ſome epiſodes, might be a very fit ſubject for a romance (34). Doubtleſs, the author of the Hiſtorical Novel wrote according to that idea. I will not throughly examine the facts, which this author always turns to the advantage of his hero, and ſometimes ſo ſeverely againſt the perſon of King Frederic (35), that he, a thouſand times more than Sorbiere, deſerved the complaints of the Daniſh Embaſſador at the court of France: but I may probably be allowed to take for a romantic thought, that ſeverity ſufficient to make the boldeſt man tremble, with which the Count was looked on when he made his firſt declaration of love to the Counteſs Eleonora, to whom, ſaith the author, the name of love appeared ſo ſhocking, that ſhe formed a diſmal idea of it. I do not make the ſame judgment of the Count's exclamation, when, born down with misfortune, he cried out, O GOD! when wilt thou ceaſe to afflict me? Nature is too viſible here, this looks like a true Hiſtory, whilſt the other looks like invention only. The propoſal of an under-match, or of a diſhonourable love, might have occaſioned this terrible menacing ſeverity; but the Count, a perſon richly endowed with all the perfections of body and mind, and one of the beſt matches the Counteſs could ever hope for, courted her with a view to marriage. Whence then could proceed this thundering ſeverity which our author mentions but from a romantic humour? where, and where only, a declaration of love is followed by an immediate reſentment, which appears by our bluſhes (it is thus that Moliere makes a preciſe lady ſpeak) and which, for a time, baniſhes the lover from our preſence. But at laſt he finds means to pacify us, and inſenſibly enures us to the diſcourſe of his tender paſſion, and extorts from us the conſent which we have much ado to give (36).

[Q] The Count is frequently mentioned in Charles Ogier's travels.] Charles Ogier, the worthy brother of that great preacher Francis Ogier, travelled to Denmark and Sweden with the Count d'Avaux, Ambaſſador from Lewis XIII. They left Paris on the eleventh of July in 1634. The relation of this voyage is very curious, and well written. Among other things we find in it that Count Ulefeld being contracted to the daughter of the King, his maſter, and being afflicted with an ulcer in his thigh, made a very great ſcruple of approaching a lady of the blood-royal before he was cured. Wherefore he took a journey into France in order to put himſelf into the hands of an able Chirurgeon, to whom Mr d'Avaux recommended him. 'Ulfeldius crure laborabat inſanabiliter, ex ſententia ſcilicet omnium ſuæ nationis Medicorum, qui tamen anno poſtea, cùm ſe ex conſilio Legati noſtri Lutetiam contuliſſet, ab eximio Chirurgo P. Judæo ſanatus eſt. Alter mihi videbatur ille Philoctetes, adeo acutis interdum doloribus cruciabatur; alioquin, cùm per benigniorum temporum intervalla, vis mali paululum reſederat, innitebatur baculo. Cæterùm tanta hominis virtus ac dignitas fuit, ut dilectiſſimam illi Rex Daniæ Filiam Leonoram deſponderit: at ille tam eximiæ puellæ thalamis crus putridum inferre reveritus, antequam nuptiæ celebrarentur, operæ pretium duxit, ſi ſe laborioſæ curationis carnificinæ, ac periculis devoveret (37). - - - Ulfeld had an ulcer in his thigh, which was deemed incurable by all the Phyſicians of his country. Nevertheleſs as he went next year to Paris by the advice of our Ambaſſador, he was there cured by that excellent Chirurgeon P. Judæus. Such was the acuteneſs of the pains which he now and then ſuffered, that he ſeemed to me like another Philoctetes: at other ' times

---

(31) The Hiſtorical Novel gives a diſmal deſcription of the count's ill treatment, even before he had attempted to make his eſcape.

(32) Pariv. ubi ſupra.

(33) Relat. de Sorbiere, p. 146.

(34) Ibid. pag. 153.

(35) In the Memoirs of the Chevalier de Terlon, ſome encomiums are beſtowed upon that Prince, which are directly contrary to the ſlanders of the Hiſtorical Novel.

(36) Moliere, in his Précieuſes ridicules, Act. i, Sc. iv.

(37) Carol. Ogerius, in Intinere Danico, pag. 67, Edit. Pariſ. 1656, in 8vo.

The Counteſs, his widow, died on the ſixteenth of March 1698. She could make verſes, and ſhe has left a piece, which perhaps will be printed. It is the life of ſome illuſtrious women (l).

(k) Taken from Sebaſtian Kortholt, pag. 2. de Puellis Poetriis, Edit. 1700.

‘ times when the violence of the diſtemper abated, and he felt ſome intervals of eaſe, he uſed to walk about with the help of a ſtick. But ſo great was the virtue and merit of the man, that the King of Denmark contracted his well-beloved daughter Eleonora to him: nevertheleſs he was aſhamed to carry a ſore leg to ſuch a fine lady's bed, and for that reaſon before the marriage was celebrated, he thought proper to ſubmit himſelf to all the painful and dangerous operations of a difficult cure.’ This was very well done.

ULYSSES, one of the moſt celebrated Generals of the Grecian army at the ſiege of Troy. Dr Drelincourt (a) hath imparted to me ſo many excellent memoirs concerning this hero of the Odyſſey [A], that I am extremely ſorry I cannot here give them that extenſive place which they deſerve. And it being better to ſay nothing on great ſubjects, than to ſpeak of them by halves (b), I have deferred this article to another time, and am ſorry this learned man himſelf could not enrich the public with this excellent portraicture of Ulyſſes, as he hath already obliged the world with that of Achilles, of which we have ſeen three editions.

(a) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden.

(b) De Carthagine ſilere melius puto quam parum dicere. Salluſtius, de Bello Jugurthino.

[A] So many excellent Memoirs concerning this hero of the Odyſſey.] He hath collected whatever hath been ſaid for or againſt the Prince of Ithaca, and hath very methodically digeſted it. It is a mixture of erudition and criticiſms, which would ſurprize even thoſe who are beſt verſed in the antient Greek and Latin authors. Copiouſneſs and exactneſs, ſagacity and method, memory and judgment, ſhine ſo brightly in this work, that it is impoſſible to determine which of theſe excellencies appear in the greateſt luſtre.

ULM, in Latin Ulma, an Imperial city, and the capital of the Circle of Suabia, is ſituated upon the Danube, where it begins to be navigable for boats. That name was given to it becauſe of the vaſt number of elms which grow in its neighbourhood. It is a rich, populous, and trading city, regularly fortified, and embelliſhed with a great many fountains: it's ſtone bridge over the Danube is extremely beautiful . . . . . It was formerly no more than a market-town, which Charlemaign had given to the abbey of Reichenaw, and which Lotharius II afterwards entirely demoliſhed. But the inhabitants of the country ſettling there again, redeemed at laſt from the abbey of Reichenaw, by paying a very conſiderable ſum of money, their liberty and their independence, and cauſed themſelves to be matriculated among the Imperial cities (a) . . . . . . The Roman Catholics there are not very numerous, and have only two churches, the Proteſtants having taken poſſeſſion of all the reſt. The ſenate is compoſed of forty-one perſons, of whom the two elders, together with the five firſt, make the Privy-Council, into which the Roman Catholics are not admitted (b). The Elector of Bavaria ſurprized this town on the eighth of September 1702, by a ſtratagem that was admirably well executed (c). ‘ The citizens having put themſelves under arms, and being divided into eighteen companies of two hundred men each, marched on with their colours, and the very women of the city run there like ſo many prieſteſſes of Bacchus, making weapons of every thing that came in their way; but notwithſtanding all this’ the Bavarian troops ſtill maintained the poſts they had taken (d). The Imperialiſts under the command of General Thungen beſieged that place in the month of September 1704. The garriſon, after a ſhort and very feeble reſiſtance, capitulated on the eleventh of the ſaid month, and obtained terms that were in all reſpects favourable and glorious to them. The Dutch Gazeteers, deceived by the news-mongers of the Imperial cities, who generally upon all occaſions are very great liars, gave out that after the garriſon was come forth in an honourable manner, they were made priſoners of war, and that by way of repriſals for what had been done ſome weeks before by the Duke of Vendome to the garriſon of Verceil in Italy. The falſity of this piece of news came ſoon to be known; and in truth the two caſes were not parallel, ſince the garriſon of Verceil was treated, not contrary to the tenor of the capitulation as the ſame Gazeteers publiſhed, though they afterwards retracted it (e), but preciſely according to the articles of the capitulation as it was ſigned by both parties.

(a) Heiſs, Hiſtory of the Empire, Tom. ii, pag. m. 456.

(b) Id. ibid. See alſo the Mercure Galant, of September 1702, pag. 392, in the Extract of a letter from an officer in the army of the Elector of Bavaria.

(c) See the letter which is in the ſame volume of the Mercure Galant, pag. 395, & ſeq.

(d) Ibid. pag. 402.

(e) See the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for the month of Auguſt 1704, pag. 150, & ſeq, & pag. 163, & ſeq.

VOLKELIUS (JOHN) a Socinian Miniſter (a) born at Grimma in Miſnia, was one of the moſt learned men of that ſect. Some letters which Socinus wrote to him are publiſhed, the firſt of which is dated the third of April 1593 (b). He wrote one to him in the year 1596, upon Volkelius's intimating that he did not think Socinus had fully refuted Francis David's arguments (c). He publiſhed in the year 1613 an anſwer (d), and a reply (e), to Smiglecius; but his principal work is that De vera Religione, of which a great many copies were burnt at Amſterdam by order of the magiſtrates, on the twentieth of January 1642 [A]. I have ſomething to offer concerning this fact, which is not exactly repreſented

(a) Eccleſiæ Philippovienſis, poſt Smiglenſis Paſtor. Bibl. Antitrinit. p. 96.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Hoornbeek, Apparatu ad Controverſ. Socinian. pag. 65.

(d) Intituled, Nodi Gordii à Martino Smiglecio nexi Diſſolutio.

(e) Intituled Reſponſio ad vanam refutationem diſſolutionis Nodi Gordii.

[A] That de Vera Religione, of which a great number of copies were burnt . . . in 1642.] It was printed at Racovia in the year 1630, after the author's death. The ſect judging it proper that this book ſhould contain a complete ſyſtem of the Socinian doctrine, and finding it defective in ſome particulars, appointed Crellius to add as a ſupplement, a treatiſe of GOD and of the Divine Attributes. Crellius executed this commiſſion; what he wrote made the firſt part of the work, and is the firſt of the ſix books which compoſe it. Several are of opinion that Socinianiſm hath not produced any thing more dangerous than this volume, and for that reaſon doubtleſs it was, that being reprinted at Amſterdam it was thought very neceſſary represented in the book intitled La Religion des Hollandois.

neceſſary to uſe it with all the ſeverity of the law. The Scout of Amſterdam ſeized 450 copies which he found in the Bookſeller's hands; and prevailed with the Judges to confiſcate them, and fine the Bookſeller (1); eight days after which they were publickly burnt (2). Curcellæus having written this news to Ruarus on the eighth of February 1642, informed him on the twelfth of April following, that the new Schepens had annulled the ſentence of their predeceſſors (3), and ordered it to be taken out of the regiſters; inſomuch, that the Bookſeller who had not yet paid his fine, came off with the loſs of his books only. Notwithſtanding this, he was ſo terrified thereby, that it was thought he would not eaſily be induced to publiſh any book of that nature again (4). Curcellæus paſſionately deſired that ſome able perſon would write againſt theſe proceedings of the Schepens of Amſterdam. 'Utinam veſtrum aliquis præceps Scabinorum noſtrorum judicium vellet expendere, & iſtos librorum incendiarios peccati ſui coarguere. Si quem noveris ei rei idoneum, urge ut aggrediatur (5). - - - I wiſh that ſome one among you would ſtrictly examine the raſh judgment of our Schepens, and cenſure thoſe burners of books for the fault they have committed. If you know any perſon fit for that taſk, preſs him to undertake it.'

The two letters of this Remonſtrant miniſter, written openly and in confidence to Ruarus, ſhew the falſity of Mr Stoupp's conjecture. Read what follows, I cite it from the copy which Mr Des Maizeaux (6) has been pleaſed to ſend me, and not as it was in my firſt edition, where I inſerted this paſſage exactly as Mr Arnauld publiſhed it in the forty-ſixth page of the ſecond part of his Apology for the Catholics. He hath curtailed and altered ſeveral places, and yet makes uſe of the Italic character, without taking notice of any deficiency: this is not like an exact author. 'The Socinian books were very ſcarce till a few years paſt. Thoſe which were publiſhed, were printed in very diſtant places, and in ſmall numbers, ſo that they could not be got but at a very dear rate, and moſt of them were not to be come at on any terms. The States-General by their goodneſs and ſpecial favour, and a very particular tenderneſs of conſcience, remedied this inconveniency. To ſatisfy the Socinians, and thoſe who were willing to embrace their opinions, they gave leave that they ſhould print at Amſterdam, four of their principal authors, viz. Socinus, Crellius, Slichtingius, and Wolzogenius. This collection of Socinian writers in eight volumes in folio, is at preſent publickly ſold at Amſterdam for a hundred gilders. It is but a very few years ſince an inconſiderable part of theſe books would have coſt two hundred piſtoles, whereas all of them may be had at preſent for leſs than ten. It is indeed true that ſome time ſince a Socinian book was burnt at Amſterdam, doubtleſs (7) at the requeſt of Bleau himſelf who printed it. A few days after this execution he publickly expoſed the ſame book to ſale; and to recommend it to the buyer, and enhance the price, inſerted in the title page, that it was the ſame book which by order of the States, had been burnt by the hands of the common executioner (8).'

Several particulars of this paſſage deſerve to be cenſured. In the firſt place, Mr Stoupp ought to have known that the States-General do not meddle with the government of Amſterdam; it does not belong to them to permit or prohibit any thing to the Bookſellers in the province of Holland. II. It is not true either that the States-General, or the States of Holland, permitted the printing of Socinian books. The works of the four principal Divines, whereof Mr Stoupp ſpeaks, were privately printed; of which ſee the particulars in the Apology for the religion of the Dutch (9). III. It is utterly falſe that William Bleau ſollicited the burning of this Socinian book: Curcellæus's two letters clearly prove that the Sieurs Blaew were very ſorry for the burning of Volkelius's book; I ſhall borrow ſome freſh evidences of this truth, from the author who refuted Mr Stoupp. (10) 'It was not William, but John Bleau who printed it. But how impertinent it is to conjecture that this Bleau entreated the magiſtrates to burn this book? If only a dozen copies had been burnt, it might be ſaid, that your narrow ſuſpicious ſoul had ſome excuſable pretext for this malicious conjecture: but you ought to know that the officer who had orders to burn this book, ſeized Mr Bleau at a friend's houſe, where he then was, and cauſed him to be guarded by ſome of his men, whilſt he went directly to the ware-houſe, where he found all the copies, and cauſed them to be immediately burnt (11). Half a day was entirely ſpent only in throwing the books into the fire, till the flames had conſumed the whole number, which redounded to the great damage of Mr Bleau, beſides, he was fined two thouſand gilders (12). By this you may judge if it was Bleau who ſollicited the burning of this book, and whether he could have any great advantage by it.' IV. It is falſe, that a few days, or any time after this public execution, the ſame Bookſeller publickly ſold this book of Volkelius, and that he inſerted in the title, that it was the ſame book which had been condemned publickly to be burnt by the hands of the common executioner. The perſon that furniſhed Mr Stoupp with memoirs confounded the fact, and the whole foundation of this fable was; Volkelius's book was printed in Dutch at Rotterdam in the year 1649, and it was mentioned in the title that the Schepens had ordered it to be burnt in Holland in 1642 (13). The apologiſt for the religion of the Dutch obſerves that one Colom, and not the Sieurs Bleau, put this in the title; but that this tranſlation was likewiſe prohibited by the States (14). Mareſius obſerves, that this additional clauſe in the title was a bait which the ſecret emiſſaries of the Socinians laid, to promote the ſale of the book: Quantum præſidii in eo reponant clancularii teterrimæ Hæreſeos emiſſarii & promotores, palam fecerunt ante biennium, illo in Belgicum idioma tranſlato, & quò ad ejus lectionem magis invitarentur homines præpoſterè curioſi, quibus ſolemne niti in vetitum ſemper cupereque negata, præfixo hoc Elogio, quod opus illud eſſet, in Hollant by Schepen vonniſſe gedoempt, openbaerlijck geexecuteert, en met vyer verbrant anno 1642, in Januario (15). The Synods of Holland did not forget this addition to the title, in the remonſtrance which I have mentioned in another place (16): they complained that ſeveral books were tranſlated into Dutch; and in the laſt place they quoted Volkelius. 'Denique Crellius de Deo & ejus attributis & Volkelii quinque libri de vera religione: & ad irridendum zelum piorum judicum pro Deo, perverſoſque homines eo magis alliciendum, in frontiſpicio poſuerunt in Hollandia ſententia Scabinorum eum librum damnatum & publice combuſtum eſſe anno 1642, menſe Januario- - - Laſtly, Crellius's book de Deo & ejus Attributis, and Volkelius's five books de Vera Religione: and to ridicule the zeal of pious judges in the cauſe of GOD, and thereby to entice the more men of perverſe diſpoſitions, they took care to have it inſerted in the title page, that by the ſentence of the Schepen in Holland the ſaid book had been publickly condemned and burnt in the month of January in the year 1642.'

It is certain that this book of Volkelius was never printed by itſelf in Latin, after the burning it in the year 1642. But it was printed entire in the Hydra Socinianiſmi expugnata, publiſhed at Groningen by Samuel Mareſius (17). This orthodox profeſſor intending to refute the Socinian ſyſtem, was reſolved to leave no room to ſuſpect that he had weakened his adverſary's arguments. Therefore he publiſhed them at large without any omiſſion, and ſubjoined his refutation in the ſame pages. By this means his readers had a fair opportunity of comparing Hereſy and Orthodoxy, without there being any room left to complain that Hereſy was not there expreſſed in full force and vigour. It muſt be owned this is the moſt frank and ingenuous way of anſwering an adverſary. It ſhews that the author relies on the goodneſs of his cauſe, and the ſtrength of his pen: it prevents all ſuſpicions of artifice; and we indeed have reaſon to be ſuſpicious on this head in many thouſands of caſes; for it happens but too often that an author unfairly repreſents the arguments which he deſigns to confute. He makes as if he had not perceived what he thinks he is not able to refute; and when he cannot avoid mentioning ſome particulars, he omits ſome eſſential terms. In a word, ſuppoſe as long as you pleaſe that a controverſiſt acts fairly, you will never be able to perſuade the world, that looſe paſſages which he cites out of the piece he refutes, are an impartial repreſen-

(1) In 1200 Gilders.

(2) Steph. Curcellæus Epiſtola ad Ruarum. It is the lxxxvith of the firſt century of Ruarus's letters, p. 407.

(3) See the lxxxviith letter of the firſt century of Ruarus's letters, pag. 408, 409.

(4) Ita illo conſternati caſu (Cæſii, that is, the Sieurs Blaew) ut non facile poſthac ejuſmodi ſint libros excuſuri. Idem, pag. 409.

(5) Ibid. pag. 408.

(6) Of whom mention is made above, in citat. (21), of the article VIRGIL. See alſo the Nouvel. de la Rep. des Lettres, for Auguſt 1701, pag. 151, & ſeq.

(7) The Italian tranſlator of Mr Stoupp's book has committed here a great fault by ſuppreſſing the words, which import that the author had only a ſuſpicion. A forza di ſuppliche, ſays he, dello ſteſſo Guiglielmo Bleau.

(8) Stoupp, Religion des Hollandois, letter iv, dated the 13th of May 1673.

(9) Jean Brun, Apologie pour la Religion des Hollandois, pag. 216, & ſeq.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 218.

(11) Curcellæus ſays there was an interval of eight days.

(12) Curcellæus ſays only 1200.

(13) Bibl. Antitrinit. pag. 96.

(14) Jean Brun, ubi ſupra, pag. 219.

(15) Samuel Mareſius, Præfat. Hydræ Socinianiſmi expugnatæ, Tom. i, printed at Groningen in 1651.

(16) In the article SOCINUS (FAUSTUS) remark [L].

(17) The firſt Tome was publiſhed in 1651, the ſecond, in 1654, and the third, which is the laſt, in 1662.

tation of the ſtrength of the work, which commonly conſiſts in the connexion of it's parts. Wherefore Mareſius took the moſt proper meaſures in the world by inſerting in his anſwer the whole book which was burned. He ſilenced the heretical boaſters, and deprived them for the pretext of reproaching the true Church with mean ſhifts, or inſulting the orthodox, as men who not daring to look their enemies in the face, and knowing themſelves unable to make head againſt them, implored the aſſiſtance of the ſecular power, to burn by a ſentence of the magiſtrates a book whoſe objections they could not overthrow. Some ſatirical wits have ventured to ſay, that this Profeſſor took this method only in compliance to the Bookſeller, who poſitively inſiſted upon it, from an opinion that the text of Volkelius would make any refutation whatſoever ſell. This is a malicious falſity. And it is infinitely more reaſonable to acquieſce in the reaſons which the author himſelf alledges. 'Mihi autem, ſaith he (18), vitio verti non debet quod textum integrum libri nefarii curarim recudendum. Cum enim ſupprimi per hominum curioſitatem & malitiam nequeat, nec in eo voti ſui compos extiterit Ampliſſ. Magiſtratus Amſtellodamenſis, malui illum integrum ſiſtere Lectori, ne crederer ſuffurari velle victoriam, quod nolebat Alexander, & datâ operâ delumbare atque extenuare Adverſarii mei argumenta; Ubi Lector ipſam Beſtiam ſua verba reſonantem audierit, (ut hîc adhibeam dictum Æſchinis de oratione Demoſthenis in ſe habita, relatum Hieronymo Epiſt. ad Paul. de lib. Divino cap. 2.) & ſimul noſtras ad illam cenſuras & Annotationes ἀλεξικάκȣς expenderit, faciliùs de totius Cauſæ natura & merito judicabit. Oppoſita ſibi mutuò appoſita magis eluceſcunt. Et ſicut vinum dulcius eſt quod prope mandragoras creſcit, & ſuavius olent lilia & roſæ quæ juxta cæpas & allia carpuntur, ſic ex hac antitheſi plus accedet ſuaveolentiæ illi veritatis Cauſæ quam ſuſcepi propugnandam. Ita vident Lectores nihil nos metuere nobis ab iſtorum hominum ſtrophis & cavillationibus, quandoquidem eas integras, omnibuſque ſuis veſtitas coloribus, proponimus & expendimus, confiſi bonitati noſtræ cauſæ, & quod eorum Sententias prodidiſſe ſuperaſſe eſt, ut loquitur Hieronymus ad Cteſiph. - - - It ought not to be charged upon me as a fault that I have taken care to publiſh the entire text of a wicked book. For as it could not be ſuppreſſed, by reaſon of the curioſity or malice of mankind, and ſince the magiſtrates of Amſterdam could not ſucceed in that deſign, I rather choſe to preſent it entire to the reader; that it might not ſeem as if I deſired to ſteal a victory (which Alexander ſcorned to do), or took pains to weaken and extenuate my adverſary's arguments. But when the reader ſhall hear the beaſt himſelf bellowing out his own words, (if I may be allowed to apply here what Æſchines ſaid touching a ſpeech which Demoſthenes had pronounced againſt him, as the thing is related by St Jerom) and ſhall at the ſame time weigh the cenſures that we paſs upon him and our wholſome remarks, he will be the better able to judge of the merit and nature of the whole cauſe. Oppoſite things are the more clearly diſcerned for being ſet by one another. For as that wine is ſweeter which grows near mandrakes, and as thoſe lilies and roſes have a more fragrant ſmell which are gathered in the neighbourhood of of onions and garlick, ſo this oppoſition will give an additional flavour to the cauſe of truth, which I have undertaken to defend. Thus the reader will perceive that we are not in the leaſt afraid of the quirks and and cavils of thoſe men, ſince we repreſent and conſider them entire and dreſſed in their own colours; truſting to the goodneſs of our cauſe, and for that, as St Jerom ſays to Cteſiphon, in order to confute their opinions, it is ſufficient to ſhew them as they are.' He adds, that he herein imitated Francis Junius (19), Sibrandus Lubbertus (20), Paul Tarnovius (21), John Junius (22), Alſtedius (23), and Biſterfeldius, ſon-in-law to Alſteidus (24). He repreſents in his Preface to the ſecond tome, that he would not be ſorry if the magiſtrates ſhould make uſe of an anſwer different from his, that is, burn the Socinian ſyſtem. And as he praiſes the pious zeal of the Engliſh, who condemned the Catechiſm of this ſect to the flames (25); ſo he complains of the toleration which Cromwell allowed theſe Heretics. He bewails with tears of blood the confuſion of England, which was become their metropolis (26), and that a Catechiſm, containing all their blaſphemies, was ſuffered to be printed at London. 'Modò enim ex Anglia allatus eſt Anglicâ linguâ conſcriptus Catechiſmus duplex, major & minor, Londini publice excuſus hoc anno 1654, apud Ja. Cottrel pro Rich. Moone, ad inſigne ſeptem ſtellarum, in Cœmeterio Paulino, authore Johanne Beddle, ſive Biddello, Magiſtro Artium Oxonienſi, editus, uti præ ſe fert, in eorum gratiam qui merè Chriſtiani nullique ſectæ addicti eſſe volunt, (quamvis nequeant ſe tales profiteri, quin eo ipſo ſectam ſpecialem ab aliis omnibus diſcretam conſtituant,) & omnes Socinianiſmi impietates ac blaſphemias continet, eructat, propugnat (27). - - - There are juſt come from England two Catechiſms, viz. a larger and a ſmaller one, written in the Engliſh language, and publickly printed at London this very year 1654, by James Cotterel for Richard Moone, at the ſeven Stars in Paul's Church-yard. The author is one John Biddle, a Maſter of Arts, of the univerſity of Oxford. He pretends that they are compoſed for their ſakes, who would be mere Chriſtians, and not of this or that ſect (although they cannot profeſs themſelves to be ſuch, without ſetting up a particular ſect of their own, diſtinct from all others). Theſe Catechiſms contain, propagate, and defend, all the impieties and blaſphemies of the Socinians. Having anſwered Volkelius's book paragraph by paragraph, he might have laughed at thoſe ſectaries, if they had alledged againſt him the reflexions which Arnobius made on the requeſt of the idolaters, that the Senate would prohibit ſome books of Cicero (28), in which the vanity of their falſe gods was demonſtrated. Refute them, ſaith Arnobius, if they contain any impieties, for to forbid the reading of them, is not to maintain the cauſe of the gods, but to be afraid of the evidence of truth. Cum ſciam eſſe non paucos qui averſentur & fugiant libros de hoc ejus, (Ciceronis) nec in aurim velint admittere lectionem opinionum ſuarum præſumpta vincentem? cumque alios audiam muſſitare indignanter, & dicere: oportere ſtatui per Senatum, aboleantur ut hæc ſcripta, quibus Chriſtiana relligio comprobetur, & vetuſtatis opprimatur actoritas? Quinimo ſi fiditis exploratum vos dicere quicquam de Diis veſtris, erroris convincite Ciceronem, temeraria & impia dictitare refellitote, redarguite, comprobate. Nam intercipere ſcripta, & publicatam velle ſubmergere lectionem, non eſt Deos defendere, ſed veritatis teſtificationem timere. (29). It is certain that Socinus took advantage of his adverſaries forbidding the reading of his writings (30).

It muſt not be forgot that the Engliſh complained of Mareſius's accuſing their nation, of favouring Socianiſm, and of their country's becoming it's metropolis. Read the following paſſage of John Owen, Doctor of Divinity and Vice-Chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford: 'Ille (Mareſius) univerſam gentem noſtram, ejuſque Gubernatores Socinianiſmi accuſat, & qui viri mos eſt, horrendos clamores excitat, affirmans hæreſin ibi ſedem Metropoliticam fixiſſe, &c. De temeritate hujus cenſuræ & de ſtupenda ejus ignorantia in ſtatu rerum apud nos geſtarum, quas tamen referre, judicare, & condemnare præſumit, ſcripſi ad ipſum epiſtolam (31). - - - This Mareſius accuſes our whole nation, and thoſe who govern it, of Socianiniſm, and, as the manner of the man is, he raiſes a horid clamour, affirming that Hereſy has fixed her metropolitan ſee here. But I have written a letter, wherein I repreſent to him the raſhneſs of this cenſure, and his ſtupid ignorance of our affairs, which he nevertheleſs preſumes to relate, judge of, and condemn.' Mr Daillé made uſe of this complaint of Dr Owen, when he writ againſt Mareſius. Mareſius anſwered, that he never received this doctor's letter, and that he was very well pleaſed to hear that things were not in that ſtate in England that they had been (32). This he tells us in a Preface written in April 1658. But it is to be obſerved, that the Preface to the ſecond tome of the Anti-Volkelius is dated the 12th of Auguſt 1654.

(18) Mareſius, Præfat. Vol. i. Hydræ Socinianiſmi expugnatæ, fol. * 2.

(19) In his Defenſio Catholica.

(20) In the refutation of Fauſtus Socinus's book De Chriſto Servatore.

(21) In the refutation of the ſame Socinus's book contra Bellarminum & Wiekium.

(22) In the refutation of the ſame Socinus's Prælectiones.

(23) In the refutation of the Cathechiſm of Racovia.

(24) In the refutation of Crellius's book de uno Deo & patre.

(25) Quem (Catechiſmum Rakovienſem) olim Anglia ex ſanct, & pio zelo publice cremavit, Mareſ. Præf. Tom. ii. The word olim makes me think, that he does not mean the act of the parliament, which condemned that book to be burnt in 1653, See Micrelius's continuation, pag. 929.

(26) Sociniana peſtis . . . videtur nunc in vicina Anglia ſedem ſibi metropolitanam fixiſſe. Mareſius. Præf. Tom. ii, Hydræ Socinianiſmi.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Doubtleſs Cicero's books de Natura Deorum.

(29) Arnobius, lib. iii, pag. m. 103.

(30) See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1685, Art. ix.

(31) Joan. Owenus in Vindiciis Evangel. contra Socin. Anglice. Præfat. pag. 4. apud Dallæum in Vindiciis Apologiæ, pag. 434.

(32) Mareſius in Prolegom. Epicriſis Theologicæ.

VOLSIUS (PAUL) Abbot of the monaſtery of Haugſhofen (a), of the order of the Benedictins near Schleſtad in Alſatia, lived in the XVIth century. He had a great deal of merit, and was highly praiſed by Eraſmus (b) who dedicated to him in the year 1518 the new edition of his Enchiridion Militis Chriſtiani. At length he accompliſhed his his deſign of throwing aſide the Monkiſh habit, and renouncing Popery (c). He embraced the ſect of the Anabaptiſts; but being converted by Calvin about the year 1539, he was Miniſter of the Church of Straſburg to the day of his death (d).

(a) Eraſmus expreſſes this word in Latin by Hugonis Curia, - - Hugh's Court.

(b) See the xxxvth letter of the firſt book of Eraſmus, pag. m. 81.

(c) See the xxxiiid letter of xiith book of Eraſmus, and the xliiid of the xviiith.

(d) Beza, Preface to the Commentary of Calvin upon Joſhua, pag. m. 11.

VORSTIUS (CONRAD) was born at Cologn on the nineteenth of July 1569. His father who was a Dyer, had not yet left the Church of Rome; wherefore he cauſed him to be baptized at his pariſh church. Soon after he privately joined with the Proteſtant Church, to which he brought over his wife. They had ten children, and deſigned this Conrad for a ſcholar. He learned Grammar, and a little Rhetoric at the village of Bedberdyk, where he ſtaid five years, after which he went to Duſſeldorp in the year 1583, where he continued his ſchool ſtudies, till 1586. He ſpent the following year at Cologn in Saint Laurence's College, where he learned ſeveral things. Two reaſons prevented his taking the degree of Bachelor of Philoſophy [A], and interrupted his ſtudies. The poverty of the family induced them to breed him a merchant. He ſpent two years in learning what might be uſeful to him in trade, as Arithmetic, the French and Italian languages. Afterwards he returned to his ſtudies, and was ſent to Herborn in the year 1589. Where Piſcator had read Divinity three years. Vorſtius ſtudied under him with great ſucceſs, and applied himſelf to the inſtruction of ſome children of quality. With ſome of theſe he went to Heidelberg in March 1593, where he was created Doctor of Divinity in July 1594. A year after he went to viſit the academies of Swiſſerland [B], and that of Geneva. He read Theological lectures in the latter, at the inſtigation of Theodore Beza, and acquitted himſelf ſo well that he was offered a profeſſor's chair there; which he would not accept, ſome reaſons inducing him to return home, for he was offered to be Divinity Profeſſor at Steinfurt (a). The letter of invitation was delivered to him at Geneva in February 1596. He accepted that preferment, and diſcharged the functions of it in a manner which made him very famous, and courted by other academies [C]. In the year 1605, beſides his profeſſorſhip, he was made Miniſter of Steinfurt: and as if thoſe two places had not been ſufficient to employ him, he had other preferments beſtowed on him, whereby, as it was but reaſonable, his ſalary was increaſed (b). He was invited to Leyden to ſucceed Arminius in the year 1610, and after a year's conſideration

(a) At that time the Count of Bentheim founded an illuſtrious ſchool in that town.

(b) Aliis quoque muneribus à generoſo Dn. Comite (Bentheimenſi) auctus eſt. Cum duobus enim Conſiliariis & Miniſtro aulico cognitioni ac judiciis cauſarum & quæſtionum matrimonialium præfectus eſt; tum examini novitiorum Miniſtrorum, denique Synodis & viſitationibus Eccleſiarum. In quorum onerum ſolatium extraordinarium ei ſtipendium conſtitutum. - - - He had likewiſe other places conferred upon him by the generous Count of Bentheim. For he together with two counſellors and a court-miniſter was appointed to preſide at the trial and deciſion of matrimonial cauſes and diſputes, and at the examination of young clergymen, and laſtly, in ſynods, and at the viſitation of churches. And as a recompence for theſe painful imployments, he was allowed an extraordinary ſalary. Marcus Gualter. ubi infra, citat. (c).

[A] Two reaſons prevented his taking the degree of Batchelor of Philoſophy.] One was, that he would not betray his conſcience, by ſwearing that he would ſubmit to the deciſions of the Council of Trent, the other was, that they deſigned to withdraw him from his ſtudies in order to breed him a Merchant, by reaſon of the ill poſture of the affairs of his family. Inſtabat tempus promotionis ejuſdem ad Baccalaureatum, & magiſterium philoſophiæ, ſed quæ fieri non poterat niſi pro more ſolemniter juraret in decreta Concilii Tridentini: itaque honorem illum licet ejus potiri poſſet & forte vellet, tamen cum & conſcientiæ propter illud juramentum obſtaret, & jam parentum res magis ac magis inclinarent, repudiavit, & deliberatum eſt de ſtudiis ipſius abrumpendis, ipſoque mercaturæ addicendo (1).

[B] He went to viſit the academies of Swiſſerland.] He twice maintained public theſes at Baſil (2); 1. De Sacramentis. 2. De Cauſis ſalutis. He was preparing a third diſputation againſt Socinus, de Chriſto Servatore; but haſtening his journey he did not finiſh this piece. He left the original with Grynæus, and received it back again when he returned by Baſil. The firſt work aſcribed to him is a collection of theſe ſort of theſes containing above twenty, defended at ſeveral times, beginning with the year 1594. He places firſt in this collection, his theſis de Sancta Trinitate, hoc eſt, de Deo Patre, Filio, & Spiritu ſancto, and the theſis de Perſona & Officio Chriſti; which he ſome time after made uſe of as an apology againſt thoſe who accuſed him of ſocinianiſing in theſe two points; for to ſtop the mouth of calumniators, he reprinted theſe two theſes apart in 1612. Quas poſtmodum Apologiæ vicem eſſe voluit, cum maligne quidam Tribunitii ſtentores ipſum traducere inciperent, quaſi hæretice de duobus illis capitibus ſentientem aut docentem. Ideoque anno 1612 denuo & ſeorſim excudi curavit, ad os calumniæ obturandum (3). We ſhall find by the following remarks that he was ſoon ſuſpected of that Hereſy.

[C] He diſcharged his functions in a manner which made him courted by other Academies.] Mr du Pleſſis Mornai, and the Church of Samur, wrote to him in July 1602, and deſired him to accept the Theological profeſſor's chair in the Academy which they had newly erected in that place. Vorſtius gave no poſitive anſwer: but the Count of Bentheim being reſolved at any rate to keep him, anſwered Mr du Pleſſis, and the affair ſtopped there. In the year 1606, Maurice Landgrave of Heſſe offered Voſtius the place of Divinity profeſſor at Marpurg (4); and after having ſeveral times written to him, he ſent a coach and a trumpet for him, that the Profeſſor might make his journey in a manner that ſhould be both convenient and honourable. Miſſo præter diverſas literas ſingularis honoris cauſa tubicine & rheda qua illuc veheretur (5). The Count of Bentheim would not give leave for his departure; Vorſtius's relations deſired him not to remove; ſo that this invitation proved as ineffectual as that of Saulmur. If the call to Leyden had ſucceeded no better, it is very probable that Vorſtius had died with an orthodox character; for it ought to be obſerved that the ſuſpicions raiſed againſt him before the year 1599, were ſufficiently quaſhed by his conduct in the Palatinate. And, in effect, Mr du Pleſſis Mornai would not have deſired to have him at Saumur, if he had not been throughly convinced of his innocence: nor could he be ignorant of what was done at Heidelberg. The Count of Bentheim being informed that his Divine was ſuſpected, deſired to have that affair cleared up; and therefore he ordered Vorſtius to go immediately and purge himſelf of that accuſation at the univerſity which had created him doctor, and convince them of his orthodoxy. Vorſtius accordingly went to Heidelberg, where he gave an account of his faith, and returned home perfectly juſtified (6). The faculty of Divinity admitted him ad oſculum pacis, - - - to the kiſs of peace, and gave him teſſeram hoſpitalitatis, - - - - the token of hoſpitality, having told him that he was to blame for advancing certain aſſertions which favoured the Socinians, and having made him promiſe, that for the future he would abſtain from the uſe of any ſuſpicious expreſſions. He was alſo obliged to proteſt that he abhorred Socinus's opinions, and that he was very ſorry that the heat of youth had drawn him into expreſſions which ſeemed to favour that Heretic, and ſhock the doctrine of the Reformed Churches. Teſtetur etiam ſibi dolere quod impetu juvenili abreptus nonnulla ſcripſerit & ſparſerit quæ Socini erroribus favere, doctrinæque Eccleſiarum reformatarum, in quam juravit in ſua promotione ad Doctoratum, adverſari videbantur (7). This happened on the twenty-ſixth of September 1599. The inſtrument drawn up on that occaſion is to be found in the life of David Pareus: where you will find likewiſe the following relation, which will not be diſagreeable to thoſe who are fond of being acquainted with a great many particulars concerning conſideration he accepted that employment [D], and with his family removed to Leyden, carrying with him the moſt authentic teſtimonials of orthodoxy [E], and of a good as well as prudent conduct ; but he met with inſurmountable difficulties. The miniſters who maintained the old doctrine of Calvin in oppoſition to the Arminians, were perſuaded that if Vorſtius, who was not of their opinion, ſhould be profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, he would do an irreparable injury to their cauſe. Wherefore they warmly repreſented the

---

(1) Marcus Gualtherus in Oratione de vita & obitu Conradi Vorſtii.

(2) See Marcus Gualtherus, ibid. I cannot note the pages; for the Printer has not numbered them.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. I 3.

(4) Ibid. pag. E 3.

(5) Ib. verſo.

(6) See Vorſtius's letter to the Divines of Heidelberg, among thoſe of the Arminians, p. 46, of the edition in folio.

(7) Vide David. Parei Vitam, pag. m. 59.

concerning the lives of learned men. ‘ Non ita pridem ſupremos in S. Theologia honores, ſive Doctoratum Facultas Theologica contulerat Viro Clariſſimo Domino CONRADO VORSTIO Colonienſi, qui poſtea à D. PAREO ob ſingularem eruditionem, diſputandi acumen, & docendi σαφήνειαν, commendatus fuit ad Profeſſionem Theologicam in nova Schola Steinfurtenſi, Illuſtri & Generoſo Comiti D. ARNOLDO, Comiti in Bentheim, &c. In qua cum aliquandiu Orthodoxam doctrinam cum magna laude propoſuiſſet, abreptus tandem ingenii ἀγχινοία, aut καινοτομία docendi, animum applicuit ad lectionem nefarii libri FAUSTI SOCINI de Servatore: immo & authoris amicitiam affectavit ac coluit. Hinc cothurnos corrumpendi receptam doctrinam, de lytro & ſatisfactione JESU-CHRISTI, ſubdole excogitavit, quos & Diſputationibus tam publicis quam privatis in Schola habitis λάθρα tanquam ὕπουλον venenum nonnunquam inſperſit, ac juventutem non parum turbavit. Sed fraus diu latere non potuit ſagaciores Theologos, qui fermentum illud odorati, magno conatu & zelo hominem monuerunt, ut reſipiſceret : juxta illud : Retundat me juſtus : benignitas erit : & corripiat me : unguentum erit præſtantiſſimum. Quin & ipſe Generoſus Dn. Comes, admonitus à viris gravibus, Doctorem ſuum ſerio hortatus fuit, ut in gratiam rediret cum Eccleſiis & fratribus, quos ſua καινοδοξία magno totius Eccleſiæ ſcandalo non ceſſaret offendere : nec ante ad munus docendi in ſua ſchola rediret, quàm Teſtimonium Ὀρθοδοξίας auferret, ab iis præſertim, qui publicam docendi facultatem in Academiis ei fuiſſent largiti (8). - - - - Not long before the faculty of Divinity had conferred the higheſt honours, viz. the degree of Doctor on the famous CONRAD VORSTIUS of Cologn. He was afterwards on account of his ſingular erudition, acuteneſs in diſputing, and perſpicuity in teaching, recommended by DAVID PAREUS to that noble Lord ARNOLD Count of Bentheim, in order that he ſhould make him Profeſſor of Divinity in the illuſtrious ſchool newly erected at Steinfurt. For ſome time that he taught there he was in high reputation for his orthodoxy, but at laſt being hurried away by the ſubtlety of his genius, or by a deſire of teaching a new doctrine, he fell a reading that impious book of FAUSTUS SOCINUS de Servatore: nay he did more, for he courted and cultivated the author's friendſhip. From that time he cunningly bethought himſelf of the means to corrupt the received doctrine concerning the propitiatory ſatiſfaction of JESUS CHRIST, and both in his private and public diſputations he did now and then mix the hidden poiſon, and not a little corrupt the youthly ſtudents. This fraud could not long eſcape the notice of judicious Divines, who diſcovering the leaven did with great zeal and earneſtneſs admoniſh him to repent : according to that ſaying; Let the righteous man ſmite me ; it ſhall be a kindneſs : let him reprove me ; it ſhall be as a moſt precious ointment. Nay the noble Count abovementioned, being informed of it by ſome conſiderable perſons, did ſeriouſly adviſe his Divine to return into favour with the churches and his brethren, whom he did not ceaſe to offend with his new opinions to the great ſcandal of the whole church. He likewiſe exhorted him not to reſume his office of teaching till ſuch time as he had obtained a teſtimonial of orthodoxy, particularly from thoſe perſons who had conferred on him the privilege of teaching publickly in academies.’

[D] After one year's conſideration he accepted that employment.] Nothing was wanting in this invitation : it had been approved by the States of Holland, and by Prince Maurice, who alſo ordered the deputies, one of which was his own miniſter, to preſs Vorſtius to the utmoſt, to come and ſerve the univerſity of Leyden. Adeo quidem benigne, ut illuſtriſſ. Princeps reverendum virum D. Joannem Wtenbogardum (it was his miniſter) una cum viro clariſſ. Dn. Nicolao Zeyſtio Syndico Leydenſi, cum mandatis mitteret, ut hortaretur quantum poſſet Dominum Vorſtium, ne petitionem ac vocationem hanc Ordinum & Curatorum fruſtraneam eſſe vellet (9). But I believe without the earneſt and preſſing ſollicitations of the Arminians, Vorſtius had never embarked in that boiſterous ſea. He was beloved and honoured at Steinfurt, he there enjoyed a perfect eaſe, and had a very great reputation, and as the ſtate of the controverſies betwixt Arminius and Gomarus then was, he doubtleſs foreſaw the many oppoſitions which he was like to meet with in Holland. They tempted him, if I am not miſtaken, with the glory of ſupporting a party, which the death of Arminius had weakened. To this were added the motives drawn from conſcience : it was repreſented to him that he would one day be obliged to anſwer for the ill uſe of his talents, if the love of eaſe made him loſe ſuch a favourable opportunity of eſtabliſhing the truth where it had already taken root. However that be, it was his ill ſtars made him leave the county of Bentheim, and remove to Holland, where being toſſed betwixt a thouſand ſhoals and rocks, he at laſt was miſerably ſhipwracked, and loſt both his reputation and fortune, being branded with diſhonour both by the ſecular and eccleſiaſtical tribunals. This was a good argument againſt Arminianiſm ; this was what would oblige one to acknowledge the fatality of events. His panegyriſt affords me this thought. ‘ Vir optimus, ſaith he (10), jam litium Theologicarum quæ in Belgio inter Eccleſiaſticos exortæ erant, gnarus & ob eas non temere tam duram provinciam capiendam ratus, non quidem prorſus quod offerebatur repudiavit, ſed toto nihilominus pene anno aſſenſum ſuſpendit. Idque eo magis quod tenſo ac tenaci quodam germaniſſimæ benevolentiæ vinculo alligatus à ſuis ægerrime avelli poſſet, certatim contra adnitentibus omnibus ut decus illud ſcholæ novellæ retineretur : ſed currebant jam propinqua viri FATA, quæ ipſum quoque communi & immeritæ cladi involvendum DESTINAVERANT.’ If Vorſtius had continued quiet at Steinfurt, the errors of his treatiſe de Deo had not ſignified much, and he had eaſily recovered that falſe ſtep : but the queſtion being whither he ſhould teach Theology at Leyden or not, that is, whether one growing party ſhould ſupplant the other, nothing was pardoned in him ; his treatiſe de Deo grew worſe than the Alcoran. This parallel is not of my invention ; I find it in the author juſt now cited. ‘ Reipſa comperimus, ſaith he (11), vehementius & acerbius librum iſtum oppugnaſſe quam unquam quiſquam Chriſtianorum Mahumedis Alcoranum, aut recutitorum Talmudica deliria invaſit. Neque unquam Lucianus, Porphyrius, Julianus, Libanius aut quiſquis ſimili in Chriſtianos maledicentia fuit, tam crude & barbare exceptus à veteribus ſcriptoribus, qui tamen etiam habebant acetum in pectore, atque hic Noſter ab infrunitis adverſariis ſuis male multatus ob ſerium & ſolidum illud ſcriptum. - - - In effect, we found that this book was more violently attacked than ever the Alcoran of Mahomet, or the nonſenſical notions in the Jewiſh Talmud had been by any Chriſtian. Nor were Lucian, Porphyry, Julian, Libanius, and the like ſcurrilous writers againſt Chriſtianity, ſo cruelly and barbarouſly handled by the Fathers, who by the by did not want their own ſhare of gall, as this Vorſtius has been ill treated by his injudicious adverſaries, on account of that grave and ſolid performance.’ We ſhall ſee in the remark [C] the prejudice which the Arminians did their cauſe by calling in Vorſtius.

[E] The moſt authentic teſtimonials of orthodoxy.] In his Hiſtory we have the teſtimonial which the Counts of Bentheim gave him, and that with which the illuſtrious ſchool of Steinfurt preſented him. I ſhall only cite a very ſmall part of the elogies which thoſe teſtimonials beſtow upon him (12). ‘ Poſt exceſſum nominati pientiſſimi Domini parentis noſtri hactenus fidelem ipſius operam, vitam irreprehenſibilem, Chriſtianam & puram doctrinam atque inſtitutionem, & inde conſecutam propagationem & ædificationem Eccleſiæ & Scholæ reipſa experti ſumus. - - - After the

(8) Philipp. Pareus, in Vita David. Parei, pag. m. 55, 56.

(9) Gualther. ubi ſupra, fol. E 3 verſo.

(10) Idem, pag. ſequenti.

(11) Ibid. fol. M 2.

(12) Ibid. fol. F.

the danger; they accuſed him of an infinite number of Hereſies; they ſtrengthened themſelves with the concurrence of foreign univerſities, from which they obtained evidences againſt his doctrine; they alarmed the religious zeal of King James [F], and engaged him to recommend to the Republic of Holland the excluſion of ſuch a Heretic. There were ſeveral proceedings againſt him [G], which grew to ſuch a warmth, that Vorſtius was obliged proviſionally to renounce the exerciſe of his employment, and leave Leyden, in ‘ deceaſe of our moſt religious father abovementioned, we ‘ have hitherto had experience of this man's faithful la‘ bour, blameleſs life, and pure and Chriſtian doctrine; ‘ the conſequence of which has been the propagation and ‘ edification of the Church and illuſtrious ſchool.’ This is taken from the teſtimonials of the Counts; as the following is from that of the illuſtrious ſchool. ‘ Pub‘ lice & ſancte teſtamur .... Conradum Vorſtium .... ‘ ita ſe probaſſe ut .... in hac Republica inculpatum ‘ ſanctumque curſum ſexdecim circiter annorum conti‘ nuorum cum in Eccleſia docendo, tum in ſchola ſa‘ cras literas interpretando, publice privatimque diſ‘ putando, juventutem in orthodoxa religione eru‘ diendo ita peregiſſe, ut pietate erga Deum, probi‘ tate & delectione erga proximum nihil prius, nihil‘ que antiquius habuerit. Et ut paucis multa compre‘ hendamus, vitam Deo piiſque omnibus placentem, ‘ orthodoxo Theologo & Profeſſore dignam egerit. ‘ ---- We ſolemnly and religiouſly teſtify, that Conrad ‘ Vorſtius ſpent about ſixteen years among us in ſuch a ‘ holy and blameleſs manner, whether we conſider his ‘ teaching in the church, or his explaining the ſcripture in ‘ the illuſtrious ſchool, or his public and private diſputes, ‘ or his inſtructing the youth in the orthodox religion, ‘ that he appeared to have had nothing more at heart ‘ than piety towards GOD, probity, and love towards ‘ his neighbour. And, to ſum up many things in a few ‘ words, he has led a life acceptable to GOD and good ‘ men, and ſuch as became an orthodox Divine and ‘ Profeſſor.’ He obtained the like teſtimonials from the council of the city, and from the Conſiſtory, which the Hiſtorian doth not produce; but contents himſelf for brevity's ſake with ſaying that they contain the ſame thing in ſubſtance. Adderem hic totidem præterea alia, unum Senatus oppidani, alterum Conſiſtorii (uti nunc vocant) Steinfurtenſis, niſi & plane idem prioribus iſtis dicerent, & mihi brevitatis ſtudium aurem velleret. It ought to be obſerved that Vorſtius obtained all theſe teſtimonials after the printing of his tract de Deo, which raiſed ſuch a cry in Holland againſt his impieties, blaſphemies, and Atheiſm. ‘ Ab his Theo‘ nibus prope nihil aliud audire cogeretur quam in‘ numeras & uno libro non dicendas calumnias, dic‘ teria, convicia, ſcommata, punctiones, nempe de ‘ ejus impietate, blaſphemiis, mendaciis, perjurio, de ‘ ſtupore, inſcitia, & præcipue de hæreſibus (ſi DEO ‘ placet) Pelagianis, Arianis, Socinianis, Serveti, En‘ jedini, Oſtorodi, Papiſticis, & ..... Turcicis, Ju‘ daicis, Paganis, Atheis (13). ---- From theſe ſlan‘ derers he was forced to hear innumerable calumnies, ‘ and ſuch as a ſingle book could not contain, invectives, ‘ reproaches, taunts, and revilings, concerning his im‘ piety, blaſphemies, lies, perjury, ſtupidity, ignorance, ‘ and particularly his hereſies forſooth of Pelagius, Arian, ‘ Socinus, Servetus, Enjedinus, Oſtorodus, and of the ‘ Papiſts, ... Turks, Jews, Pagans, and Atheiſts.’ I ſay once more, that if he had contented himſelf with the academy of Steinfurt for his whole life, it is highly probable that he had died with the reputation of an orthodox Divine.

[F] They alarmed the religious zeal of King James.] Theſe were the wars that fitted him: He intereſted himſelf more vigorouſly in this war, than in that of the King of Bohemia, his ſon-in-law, and courageouſly cauſed Vorſtius's book to be burnt. I mean that de Deo; of which ſeveral copies were ſacrificed to the flames in London, Oxford, and Cambridge. The King was hunting when the book was brought to him: and he run through it ſo diligently, that in the ſpace of an hour he diſpatched away a catalogue of hereſies, which he had found in that piece, to his Reſident at the Hague; and ordered him to notify to the States, how much he deteſted thoſe hereſies, and thoſe who would tolerate them. The States anſwered, that if Vorſtius was guilty of the errors charged on him they would not keep him. This anſwer was not ſatisfactory to his Britiſh Majeſty. He wrote a letter dated the ſixth of October 1611, to the States, earneſtly exhorting them to baniſh that man, though at the ſame time he ſhould deny the errors laid to his charge; for if he owned, and was convicted of them, his Majeſty did not doubt in the leaſt, but that he ought to be burnt (14). He declares, that if vigorous attempts are not made in order to extirpate this growing Atheiſm, he will publickly proteſt againſt thoſe abominations, and ſeparate himſelf from the union of ſuch falſe and heretical churches, and as defender of the Faith, he will exhort all other Reformed Churches to take a general reſolution, in order to extinguiſh, and ſend back to hell thoſe abominable hereſies lately ſprung up, and particularly he will forbid any of his ſubjects to frequent ſuch an infectious place as the univerſity of Leyden. Vorſtius was inſtalled at Leyden before the letter of King James was delivered to the States. Wherefore the Engliſh Envoy, when he preſented it, made a very vehement ſpeech againſt his inſtallation, and threatned the United-Provinces with the enmity of the King, his maſter, if they tolerated Vorſtius. He was anſwered, that this Profeſſor had received orders to deſiſt from the exerciſe of his function, till he had anſwered the accuſations againſt him: and that this affair would be examined before the States of Holland in February next. The Ambaſſador very little ſatisfied with this anſwer, made another ſpeech to proteſt againſt thoſe proceedings, and threatned the States not only with the enmity, but alſo with the pen of King James (15). He was anſwered as before, and told that the States were certain that his Majeſty would be content with the proceedings of the States of Holland. Notwithſtanding this anſwer that Prince publiſhed a book, in which he gave the world an account of his conduct, and the reaſons of it, and very zealouſly argued againſt Vorſtius; Vorſtius publiſhed a ſhort anſwer to the extracts which that monarch had communicated to the States out of the book de Deo. This he dedicated to the States, on the fifteenth of December 1611. It is written with all due deference and reſpect to King James.

SPONDANUS's error.

All theſe dates ſerve to convict Spondanus of an error, who relates under the year 1610 (16), that King James incenſed at the protection which the States-General granted Vorſtius, whoſe books he had cauſed to be burned, threatned that if they did not baniſh him, he would expoſe them all the world over as ſupporters of apoſtates, and convert his alliance with them into immortal hatred; and that the States ſurprized at theſe menaces, though with great regret, permitted Vorſtius to depart. Spondanus adds, that Vorſtius was honoured like an apoſtle in the ſeveral places where he lived, after the States had ſent him away. This author is not guilty of meer anachroniſms; for after the States of Holland had diſmiſſed Vorſtius, he concealed himſelf and was expoſed to a thouſand dangers and ignominies (17).

[G] There were ſeveral proceedings againſt him.] Mark Gualtherus has maimed his narration here; he has omitted ſome facts, which ought to have been an eſſential part in the hiſtory of his heroe. He ought to have told us that the Gomariſts having oppoſed the invitation of Vorſtius, the States of Holland ordered them to produce their reaſons for it. Accordingly there were ſix Contra-remonſtrant Miniſters, who in the famous conference of the Hague (18) propoſed their grievances againſt Vorſtius on the twenty-ninth of April 1611. They accuſed him of ſeveral Socinian doctrines, and maintained that his book de Deo, ſavoured more of an Atheiſt than of a Divine. The States ordered them to make good their accuſations againſt Vorſtius to his face in their preſence, and Vorſtius to defend his own cauſe. This was done in preſence of ſix Miniſters whom each party had deputed, and of the Curators of the univerſity of Leyden: and after Vorſtius had been heard, the States determined that there was no reaſon why his call to the Profeſſorſhip ſhould not take place in it's full extent (19). So that though the Contra-remonſtrant Miniſters rejected his

(13) Ibid. fol. M 3.

(14) But if this wretched Vorſtius ſhould deny or uſe any equivocation about the blaſphemous points of Hereſy and Atheiſm which he has already publiſhed, it might perhaps move you to ſpare his perſon, and not to burn him, tho' no Heretic did ever deſerve it more than he, which we leave to your Chriſtian prudence. But on account of any vindication or denial of his to ſuffer him to live and dogmatize among you, is ſo abominable a thing that we are ſure it will never enter into the thoughts of any of you. King James's Letter in the Mercure Franç. Tom. ii, pag. 460, Edit. of Cologn.

(15) He will make it appear by the manifeſto's he intends to publiſh how much he abhors and deteſts the Atheiſm and Hereſies of Vorſtius, and all thoſe who maintain them. In the Mercure François, ibid. pag. 468.

(16) Num. 121

(17) See the remark [K].

(18) Compoſed of ſix Calviniſts, and as many Arminian miniſters.

(19) See the book intituled, Pacificatorium diſſecti Belgii, per Salomonem Theodotum, pag. 61, & ſeq.

in order to expect elſewhere a definitive ſentence concerning this diſpute. He retired to Tergou about May 1612, where he lived quiet [H] till the year 1619, when he was forced to leave Holland: for the Synod of Dort having declared him unworthy of the Profeſſor's chair [I], the States of the Province deprived him of that employment, and condemned him to a perpetual baniſhment. I do not certainly know where he went; but anſwers, Vorſtius had triumphed, if an unhappy accident had not come in the way: this is the ſecond thing the Hiſtorian ought to have related. Some of Vorſtius's diſciples publiſhed, in Frieſland, a ſmall tract de officio Chriſtiani hominis, containing ſeveral Antitrinitarian doctrines. This tract was publickly burnt: Some of thoſe who cauſed it to be printed were diſcovered, and ſome letters were found upon them which were publiſhed, containing a great many encomiums on Vorſtius, and ſeveral ſuſpicious things relating to ſeveral other Divines. Thoſe who publiſhed theſe letters added a warning to all Reformed Churches to give them an alarm. They canvaſſed all Vorſtius's books, what he had dictated, and his manuſcripts, in order to find matter to charge him with. The States of Frieſland informed thoſe of Holland and the Curators of the univerſity of Leyden of all this. It was therefore neceſſary that Vorſtius ſhould ſolemnly clear himſelf, and declare, that though he had wrote ſometimes to the Poliſh Socinians, he was very far from being of their opinion; and that whatever he did was only to inform himſelf better of their opinions, and that he did the ſame thing with reſpect to the Jeſuits, to whom he never ſcrupled to write. He delivered the profeſſion of his faith ſigned by himſelf, concerning the myſtery of the Trinity, and the divinity of CHRIST; and on the twenty-ſecond of May 1612, he pronounced an apologetical oration before the States of Holland (20). We ſhall ſee, below, that all this engaged him to publiſh ſeveral books.

[H] He lived quiet at Tergou.] This appears by the teſtimonial of the magiſtrates of that city, dated on the 20th of July 1619, which certifies, that for the ſpace of ſeven years and three months that he lived there, he behaved himſelf like an honeſt and good man (21). His Hiſtorian producing this certificate, obſerves, that the magiſtrates who gave it, were of the modern eſtabliſhment, that is, very averſe to the Arminians. Let us here obſerve two faults of which Paul Freherus is guilty. He ſaith (22), that Vorſtius being removed to Holland, and finding the troubles there increaſe every day, gave over acting as Profeſſor, and retired to Steinſurt, till the magiſtrates decided the difference. This is his firſt error; for Tergou, and not Steinfurt, was the place of retreat which he choſe. Freherus adds, that becauſe Vorſtius ſucceeded Arminius, he had great diſputes with Gomarus. This is another miſtake; for it implies, that beſides, and after the differences which obliged Vorſtius to retire, he had ſome particular quarrels with Gomarus. But this is falſe in two reſpects: for he had no difference with Gomarus, who retired into Zeland, becauſe he would not have him for his colleague (23); and if there had been any diſputes betwixt them, they muſt doubtleſs have been the ſame which forced him to retire to Tergou.

[I] The Synod of Dort having declared him unworthy of the Profeſſor's chair.] His Hiſtorian odiouſly exaggerates this circumſtance; he tells us, that they condemned Vorſtius without any regard to his petition to be heard, before he was ſentenced. And there is ſo much rancour and ill language in this part of his hiſtory, that I am not willing to ſoil my paper with it; and ſhall cite only what is a meer narrative, or what is ſo cloſely connected with it, that to omit it would make all the reſt obſcure. And if I cite any diſagreeable expreſſions, they ſhall be thoſe which have the leaſt harſhneſs. ‘Procurante . . . Bogermanno effectum eſt ut Vorſtius abſens inaudituſque condemnatus & profeſſoris titulo ac honore indignus declaratus ſit . . . . ut cujus doctrina in Eccleſiis & Scholis reformatis nequaquam toleranda, ſed cum deteſtatione penitus eliminanda atque extirpanda eſſet. Non obſtante quod tam ſerio rogatu per literas ambierit ut Synodus ipſum audire, errorum ac hæreſum (quas clamabant) legitimè ac liquidè ex verbo Dei convincere, & Chriſtiana lenitate rectiora docere vellet. Cujus equidem judicii ac ſententiæ damnatoriæ, quam nihil aliud quàm craſſa invidia conflavit, & Vorſtii ad cœtum iſtum epiſtolæ ſatis ſeriæ & prolixæ, ſi vel minimam adhuc honeſti ſanguinis guttam habent, ſacro ſancti ſcilicet Concilii illius togatos patres æternum pudere debet. Maxime cum tam probas colloquii conditiones, itemque alia pro veritate adverſus hæreticos præſtanda offerret. Sed viri hujus linguam ac legitimam cum eo diſputationem pejus iſti lucifugæ formidabant, quam ſullo ululam. - - - - At the ſollicitation . . . of Bogermannus, Vorſtius being abſent and unheard was condemned, and declared unworthy of the title and dignity of Profeſſor . . . as a man whoſe doctrine was by no means to be tolerated in the Reformed churches and ſchools, but deſerved to be rooted up and caſt out with abhorrence. This was done to him notwithſtanding his having earneſtly begged in his letters that the Synod would hear him, convict him of thoſe errors and hereſies, which they raiſed ſuch a clamour about, fairly and clearly from the word of GOD, and ſet him right with ſuch meekneſs as became Chriſtians. If they have the leaſt ſpark of honeſty left, the reverend Fathers of that moſt holy Council ought ever to bluſh when they reflect upon their judgment and ſentence of condemnation, proceeding from nothing elſe but rank envy, and upon the long and ſerious epiſtles which Vorſtius ſent to their aſſembly: eſpecially ſince he offered ſuch reaſonable conditions for a conference, and to come into other meaſures that were neceſſary for the ſupport of truth againſt Heretics. But theſe ſons of darkneſs feared this man's tongue, and the having a fair diſpute with him, more than an owl dreads the light.’ Thus Vorſtius's friends accounted it a glorious thing for him that the Synod would not hear his defence: they pretended that the Synod was terribly afraid of his great ability, of the force of his eloquence, and of the weight of his reaſons; in ſhort, that they feared to be overcome in a diſpute. But now let us ſee what this Hiſtorian ſaith concerning the ſentence of the States of the Province. ‘Poſt hunc ſacri fulminis fragorem, alia Vorſtium & immitior tempeſtas, quod neceſſum erat, excepit. Mox enim à promulgata Flaminum ſententia in ſuffragium eunt Senatus populi Belgarum, & de capite innoxii Vorſtii ſtatuunt in hunc modum. Juxta ſententiam venerandæ Synodi Dordracenæ Vorſtius functionibus ſuis in Academia Leydenſi movetur, ſalariumque ſuum deinceps ibidem ei procedere vetatur. Præterea Hollandia & Weſtfriſia ei interdicitur, illaque intra ſex ſeptimanas excedere jubetur, & in eam non redire ſub pœna arbitraria illi, ut perturbatori publicæ pacis, irroganda. Scilicet quia judicatum eſſet ejus in iſto tractu commorationem Reip. damnoſam eſſe. - - - After the violent crack of this ſacred thunderbolt, another and a more ſevere ſtorm muſt neceſſarily fall upon Vorſtius. For immediately after the ſentence of the worthy Clergy was publiſhed, the States of Holland came to a reſolution, and paſſed judgment upon the innocent Vorſtius in the following manner: According to the ſentence of the venerable Synod of Dort, Vorſtius is removed from his office in the univerſity of Leyden, and thenceforward deprived of his ſalary. He is likewiſe baniſhed out of Holland and Weſt-Frieſland, and ordered to depart from the former within ſix weeks, and not to return to it under the penalty of undergoing, as a diſturber of the public peace, what puniſhment ſhall be thought proper to be inflicted upon him; and that becauſe his further ſtay in this country is judged detrimental to the Commonwealth.’

Some perſons having told me, that I ought to cite the expreſs terms of the ſynodical condemnation of Vorſtius, I ſhall here inſert part of it. ‘The High and Mighty States-General, having by their noble and honourable Deputies, enjoined this Synod to declare ſummarily their opinion concerning the Theology or Doctrine contained in the writings of Conrad Vorſtius, Doctor of Divinity; and likewiſe whether it may be ſafely taught, to the edification and advantage of the Reformed Churches, or whether the toleration of it can conſiſt with true piety: this venerable Synod, after having, in the fear of GOD, well and duly conſidered and examined all things, hath, and doth unanimouſly by theſe preſents

(20) Ex eodem Pacificatorio Belgii diſſecti, pag. 64, & ſeq.

(21) Seſe in omni converſatione & actionibus geſſerit honeſte, probe, modeſte, & ad exemplum, nec; aicquam nos aliud quod ad mores & vitam ejus attinet obſervaverimus vel audiverimus. Apud Marcum Gualtherum.

(22) Theatr. Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 363.

(23) See the Life of Gomarus among thoſe of the Profeſſors of Groningen, pag. 77.

but he continued concealed for the ſpace of two years, and his life was more than once in danger [K], there being ſeveral perſons who, tranſported by a furious zeal, thought that a man of his character ought not to be ſuffered to live. At laſt a Duke of Holſtein having received the ſcattered remnants of the Arminians, and aſſigned them a place in his dominions, in order to build a town, Vorſtius found ſome ſecurity and repoſe: for he retired into that country in June 1622. But he fell ſick ſhortly after, and died at Tonningen on the twenty-ninth of September following. He diſcovered very ſignal marks of a pious reſignation to the Divine will in his laſt moments; and we are told that he was always very devout, and very fervent in prayer (c) [L]. His corps was carried to Friderichſtadt, ‘ preſents declare, that the ſaid Conrad Vorſtius, in his laſt writings, namely in that concerning God and his Attributes, beſides defending the errors of the five articles of the Remonſtrants, which are rejected by this Synod, hath partly called in queſtion not only one or two articles of the Chriſtian and Reformed religion, but alſo doubts of ſeveral of the principal of them, for example, the following; that of the Trinity (24) . . . . and that he partly affirms and lays down ſeveral aſſertions, which are wholly and diametrically oppoſite to the truth which God hath revealed to us in the Holy Scriptures, and to the confeſſions of all the Reformed Churches. . . . . Beſides, in ſeveral places he has dangerouſly enervated and weakened the chief and ſtrongeſt arguments, which the venerable Fathers, as well as the modern Divines of the Reformed Church, have juſtly drawn from the word of God, and made uſe of to eſtabliſh and maintain the orthodox doctrine, eſpecially of the eternal Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, without either producing or ſubſtituting any others in their room to prove more powerfully, and ſupport the doctrine which he oppoſes. That he induſtriouſly advances, and to the utmoſt of his power urges ſeveral ſophiſms, and vain arguments, which intangle and obſcure truth, without ever endeavouring to reſolve them, but leaves them as they are, that they may the more eaſily be fixed in the minds of the readers; whence clearly appears his ſubtile deſign of preparing the way, and clandeſtinely opening a gate, in order to inſtil the wicked and impious Hereſies of Socinus and others; and conſequently to ſeduce and deceive the world, under the ſpecious pretext of a ſearch after truth. That in vain, and to no effect, he has hitherto diſguiſed and varniſhed his opinions, with ſeveral impertinent diſtinctions, frivolous excuſes, miſerable ſubterfuges, deceitful and fraudulent diſſimulations and gloſſes. Wherefore the prepoſterous and inordinate liberty which he makes uſe of to diſpute and queſtion the moſt important articles of the Chriſtian religion; and the wavering, dubious, and uncertain way of inſtruction which he practiſes, are very dangerous and pernicious to the Church, and by no means fitting and agreeable to ſuch ſacred and ſublime ſubjects, and conſequently unworthy of an orthodox Profeſſor (25) . . . . And declares the ſaid Conrad Vorſtius . . . . . utterly unworthy of the employment and title of Profeſſor or Doctor in the Reformed Churches. Finally, this ſynodical aſſembly ſeriouſly and earneſtly petitions the High and Mighty States-General, that, by virtue of their ſovereign authority, they would be pleaſed to remove from the Reformed Churches, that ſcandalous and common ſtumbling-block, and to take care for the future, that the Churches of the Low-Countries may not be polluted and defiled with ſuch pernicious principles, hereſies, and blaſphemies, and to that end uſe all neceſſary prudence and caution entirely to ſuppreſs all the writings of the ſaid Vorſtius, and of thoſe who are tainted with the ſame leaven (26).’ Vorſtius wrote a very well turned anſwer to this ſynodical ſentence: It is printed at large in the book which I cite (27).

[K] His life was more than once in danger.] Several perſons made it their buſineſs to find out his lodgings, in order to diſcover them to his enemies. Wherefore he was frequently forced to change his habitation, and to be continually provided with a ladder at his window, in caſe they ſhould attempt to break open his door; and ſometimes that precaution proved inſufficient to ſecure him, by reaſon that the houſe was wholly ſurrounded with armed men; which frighted ſeveral people from harbouring him. I will not warrant the truth of all this: but I relate it from Gualtherus's words, which are: Utut quietem & ſecuritatem aliquam in iſto ſuo latibulo ſperaret, tamen fieri non potuit quin ſingulis pene diebus & noctibus centenis mortibus enecaretur, cum turpiſſimi proditores (genus * hominum publico exitio repertum) jugem operam darent uti virum latitantem inveſtigare, extrahere, in manus perſecutorum tradere, & nefario indicii præmio exhilarari poſſent. Quoties iſtic domum mutaſſe, quoties noctes in ſomnes ex metu jamjam irruentium duxiſſe, quoties ſcalas feneſtris foris applicatas ad ſubitum effugium habuiſſe putatis? Quoties in extrema conſternatione arbitramini conſtitutum fuiſſe, cum non raro omnes eum domibus ſuis recipere negarent periculi timore? Cum Thraſones martii & anticam & poſticam cum ſclopetis oneratis obſervarent ædium quibus tegi putaretur? In tantis anguſtiis biennium circiter aſſumpſit (28). It was then that he had much reaſon to wiſh for the epitaph, which a Poet that was one of his friends, ſuppoſed that he deſired ſeveral years before.

At vos poſteritas tumulo hæc inſcribite verba,
  Poſthuma fortunæ ſigna futura meæ.
Nulla Reformata mihi pars dilectior unquam,
  Nulla Reformata pars minus æqua mihi (29).

The Proteſtants above all ſects I lov'd,
No ſect to me leſs equitable prov'd.
This epitaph let after-ages ſee
Inſcrib'd upon my tomb, for it ſhall be
A ſign to them, when I ſhall be no more,
Of what my fortune was . . . . .

We may make a remarkable obſervation on the ill effects of a religious zeal, viz. It takes away all remorſe of crimes, and diſables a man from making uſe of the ſole way of obtaining pardon of God for his ſins, which is only to be expected by repentance. Thoſe who deſigned to beat, rob, or aſſaſſinate Vorſtius, to throw him into a dungeon, or load him with invectives, thought they did a very good action, and an acceptable ſervice to God: they were not therefore touched with any remorſe, and thereby induced to apply to the Divine Mercy; and conſequently died in their impenitence. This is a precipice which ought to be fully conſidered by every one who makes it his buſineſs to inflame the minds of the populace againſt erroneous Divines.

[L] And very fervent in prayer.] His Panegyriſt ſays very ſurprizing things concerning his patience, in the midſt of the invectives, which were ſhowered on his head. ‘ Poſſem, auditores, ad ſingulas iſtas patientiæ ſeu ſpecies ſeu proprietates viva exempla proferre, maximè ad devoratas cum patientia nulli linguæ dicenda oſorum, zelotarum, hoſtium inſolentias, dicteria, ſcommata, convicia, calumnias quas à prima vigore ἀκμῇ ſacri furoris Corybantum in Belgio ab aliquot annis libenter & bono ex aſſuetudine ſtomacho concoxit, propter conſcientiam & cœleſtem veritatem, tam à devotis illis religioſi ordinis capitibus, quàm à promiſcua populi fece, & quibuſdam thraſonibus qui ſe Martis pullos & Bellonæ filios, feſtivo, Hercules, elogio ornare ſolent, poſſem, inquam, hujus rei viva & vera & admiranda exempla vobis referre, niſi me tempus, &c (30). - - - I could, my hearers, alledge lively examples to illuſtrate all the different kinds and qualities of his patience, particularly as to his bearing, with unſpeakable temper, the inſolence of his

‘ bigotted

(c) Taken from the Oration de Vita & obitu Conradi Vorſtii, pronounced at Frederichſtadt by Mark Gualtherus, and printed in 1624, in 4*to*.

(24) Acts of the ſynod of Dort, Seſſion clii, pag. 588, tranſlated by Richard John de Nerée, printed at Leyden, 1624, in 4to.

(25) Ibid. pag. 589.

(26) Ibid. pag. 590.

(27) Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ præſtantium ac eruditorum Virorum, pag. 588. & ſeq. Edit. 1684. It is the ſame book which I call ſometimes barely the Letters of the Arminians.

* Tacit.

(28) Gualtherus, ubi ſupra, p. N.

(29) Theſe four verſes are the concluſion of an Epigram containing eight Diſtichs at the end of an Elogy upon Vorſtius, in the book intituled, Illuſtrium Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ Ordinum alma Academia Leidenſis, printed at Leyden in the year 1614. The ſix foregoing verſes are:

Nunc fratrum in me verſa cohors, & prodiga zeli
  Æmula civili prælia Marte gerit.
Nec calamo ſtant bella virum: depoſcitur ipſis
  Victima, & inſontis ſupplicium fidei.
Sed mediis erecta malis mens conſcia recti,
  Freta Deo, nulli ſuccubat invidiæ.

My brethren now my perſecutors are,
And zealouſly promote a civil war;
Nor yet contented with a paper ſtrife,
They for my guiltleſs faith, demand my life.
But he, that his own innocency knows,
Still reſts untroubled in the midſt of woes,
In God his pious confidence doth place,
And neither yields to envy nor diſgrace.

(30) Gualtherus, ubi ſupra.

Friderichstadt, the new city of the Arminians, where he had an honourable burial. He had publiſhed ſeveral books [M], as well againſt the Roman Catholics as againſt his Proteſtant adverſaries. The diſputes raiſed againſt him, were doubtleſs intermixed with a great deal of paſſion; but after all, thoſe who ſuſpected him to be ſtrongly inclined to Socinianiſm, were not much in the wrong [N]; and perhaps he had made a public profeſſion of that doctrine, if he had not followed the maxim which the Roman Catholics alledge ‘ biggotted enemies, their reproaches, taunts, railings, and calumnies, which, proceeding from the freſh and holy fury of the mad Prieſts in Holland, he has, for ſome years, been accuſtomed to digeſt, for the ſake of truth and a good conſcience; being treated in this manner not only by theſe devout ringleaders of the Clergy, but alſo by the promiſcuous rabble, and by certain bullies, who are uſed with a mighty pretty ſort of vanity, forſooth, to ſtile themſelves the ſons of Mars and Bellona: I ſay, I could alledge lively, true, and wonderful examples of all this, if it were not that the time, &c.’ He adds, that he was often found on his knees in the exerciſe of prayer. Quam multos eſſe eos putatis qui illum inter precandum humi in genua abjectum, & in conclavi alicubi ſolum de improviſo non ſemel oppreſſerunt? There is no Chriſtian virtue, in which he is not repreſented to excel; but above all we are told he made a pious end: to which purpoſe conſult not only our Gualtherus, but alſo a letter which the author of Vorſtius's funeral oration (31), wrote to one of his friends, which is amongſt thoſe of the Arminians, pag. 684, of the edition in folio.

[M] He had publiſhed ſeveral books.] Of theſe I have already mentioned two, one of which is a collection of ſeveral Theological theſes, and the other the famous and pernicious tract, de Deo, ſeu diſputationes decem de natura & attributis Dei, diverſo tempore Steinfurti publicè habitæ (32). Before this book appeared, he publiſhed his Idea ſeu brevis Synopſis totius ſacræ Theologiæ: A book of prayers in the German language: his diſputations de cauſis deſerendi Romani Papatus: his Index Errorum Eccleſiæ Romanæ, ſubjecto cuique capiti Antidoto: his German treatiſe of Indulgences: his Teſſaradecas Anti-Piſtoriana, ſeu Reſponſi ad Librum Johannis Piſtorii de quatuordecim articulis in Religione controverſis: his Apology pro Eccleſiis orthodoxis contra Jeſuitas, and his Antapodixes de tribus primis fidei articulis, ſive contrariæ Demonſtrationes tres quibus totidem Jeſuiticæ Apodixes à B, D. adverſus Apologiam emiſſæ confutantur. In the year 1610 came out his Anti-Bellarminus contractus, ſeu brevis Refutatio quatuor tomorum Bellarmini. His other works were written after his removal to Holland, and relate to the Arminian diſputes, or rather to his book de Deo. Many writers appeared againſt him, whom he oppoſed, as well as he could for ſome time: but he was at laſt forced to give way to number, and he grew weary of continually repeating the ſame things. The Frieſlanders were his moſt violent enemies, as Bogerman, Miniſter of Leeuwarden, and Sibrandus Lubbertus, Divinity Profeſſor at Franeker. Againſt the latter he wrote Catalogus Errorum Sibrandi: Paræneſis ad Sibrandum: & Scholia alexicaca ad Commentarios Sibrandi. I do not mention his Exegeſis Apologetica pro Tractatu de eodem, which he publiſhed in 1611; nor his Prodromus adverſus criminationes quorundam fratrum; nor the Plenius Reſponſum ad eaſdem illas criminationes: but I ſhall ſay ſomething of his diſpute with Piſcator. It contains, 1. Paraſceve ad amicam Collationem cum Joanne Piſcatore, ſuper notis hujus ad loca quædam ex illius Tractatu de Deo & Exegeſi apologetica pridem excerpta. 2. Amica Collatio cum eodem Piſcatore. 3. Amica Duplicatio una cum Appendice ſive Paralipomenis ad tripartitam Reſponſionem apologeticam Piſcatoris. 4. Examen Tractatus Piſcatoris de divina Prædeſtinatione. He did not make any anſwer to Sopingius a Frieſland Miniſter, nor to Brokerus, a Miniſter in North-Holland; but he took other meaſures with Matthew Slade, an Engliſhman, who fell upon him with a terrible fury. He printed an anſwer to him at Tergou, in the year 1615. This Slade was Rector of the public ſchool at Amſterdam, and took pen in hand in defence of his ſovereign the King of England, who deſired the States to baniſh Vorſtius. It was impoſſible for any book to be written more angrily, one only excepted, which indeed was more outragious, and publiſhed by another of that Prince's ſubjects; I mean George Egliſem, a Scotch Phyſician who lived at the Hague, and wrote Criſis & Hypocriſis Vorſtiani Reſponſi, where, in a juridical manner, he accuſed him to the States of Atheiſm, Paganiſm, Judaiſm, Turciſm, Hereſy, Schiſm, and Ignorance (33). He ſent him ſeveral challenges to appear and defend himſelf; and addreſſing himſelf to the States, he tells them that he requeſts and expects a ſtrict examination to be made, and that either Vorſtius or his accuſers ſhould be puniſhed (34). This was to come cloſe to the point, and nothing can be more juſt, than ſuch an alternative: and neverthelеſs nothing is more rare than to ſee calumniators on the ſcore of Hereſy and impiety, brought to condign puniſhment. It is thought ſufficient to abſolve the innocent, and inſtead of puniſhing the accuſer according to Lex Talionis, he is ſometimes thanked for his great zeal, or at moſt admoniſhed that he ought not to have gone ſo faſt. However, this Phyſician made very fair propoſals, but he was ſure that he ran no riſk, how abſurd and contradictory ſoever his accuſation might be found: for King James's menaces to the Republic of the United-Provinces, if they protected Vorſtius, entirely rid his accuſers of all manner of fear. It is not therefore ſurprizing that Vorſtius ſuffered the challenges of this Scotchman to fall to the ground; he might eaſily have confounded him in three words. It had been ſufficient for him to have barely ſaid, You accuſe me of Atheiſm; but according to your own words my doctrine is Judaical, Mahometan, and Heretical; and the light itſelf is not more clear, than it is that the Jews, Mahometans, and Heretics, are not Atheiſts; whence it plainly follows, by the expreſs terms of your accuſation, that I am innocent of Atheiſm; and if you make good your charge of Hereſy, I ought to be deprived of the profeſſor's chair, but the Lex Talionis directs that you ſhould be put to death. But the Scotchman would have laughed at an anſwer of this nature, and without being aſhamed of his calumnies, have relied on his impunity, and conſequently would have fully triumphed if they had only convicted his adverſary of Hereſy. There are ſeveral poſthumous works of Vorſtius, ſome commentaries on the ſcripture, &c. See the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (35).

[N] Thoſe who ſuſpected him to be very ſtrongly inclined to Socinianiſm were not much in the wrong.] The Socinians offered him a profeſſorſhip of Divinity in the year 1601, and deputed Jerom Moſcorovius to treat with him on that affair (36). This I own is no convincing proof of his Socinianiſm, and his apology on this point may be ſeen in a letter to Uyttenbogard (37). But what can be alledged againſt Sandius, who aſſures us (38), that having for ſome time been in doubt whether he ſhould rank Vorſtius among the Unitarians, he was no longer in ſuſpence after he had ſeen the confeſſion ſigned by Vorſtius on his death-bed: ‘ In qua, ſaith he, haud obſcure prodit quæ ejus de Deo ac Chriſto Domino fuerit ſententia. - - - - In which he plainly enough diſcovers his opinion concerning GOD and the Lord CHRIST.’ He adds, that when Vorſtius publiſhed the treatiſe of Fauſtus Socinus de Auctoritate Sacræ Scripturæ, he prefixed to it a preface of his own, and he aſcribes to him the book intituled Compendiolum Doctrinæ Socinianorum, which Cloppenburg refuted, and aſcribed to Oſtorodus and Voidovius. But none of theſe evidences are of any force except his own confeſſion of faith, written and ſigned by himſelf on his death-bed.

It muſt indeed be owned that a writing of this nature very ſtrongly confirms the ſuſpicions which had ſo long prevailed concerning him: but yet this doth not deprive us of the liberty of conjecturing, that the oppoſitions and diſgraces which he ſuffered, might compleat what a too inquiſitive and innovating genius had began. I mean, that perhaps the accuſing him of being a Socinian, and treating him ill on that account, made him turn one in good earneſt; and that he would have been cured of theſe particular whims, if he had found an honourable repoſe in the Reformed Church.

(31) This Oration was made in Dutch by John Grevius. See the Letters of the Arminians, pag. 684.

(32) Printed at Steinfurt, in 1610.

(33) See the Pacificatorium Belgii diſſecti, p. 72.

(34) Super his aliiſque ita Ordines affatur: Rigidiſſimum examen rurſus expeto & expecto. Aut enim Vorſtius à me aliiſque pene omnibus Atheïſmi accuſatus plectendus eſt, aut accuſatores tum pœnam temere litigantium, tum calumniatorum mulctam paſſuri, aut perenni dedecore afficiendi. See the ſame book pag. 73.

(35) Pag. 98, 99. See alſo the remark [P], of the article SOCINUS (FAUSTUS.)

(36) Sandius, in Biblioth. Antitrinitar. pag. 98. Says that the Poliſh brethren reſolved in the year 1600. in Synodo Lublinenſi, vocare Vorſtium ad gymnaſium Luclavicianum regendum.

(37) It is the DCXXIIId, in the folio edition of the letters of the Arminians, pag. 927.

(38) Bibl. Antitrinitar. p. 98.

alledge againſt the Reformers; viz. That when we are convinced the Church wants reforming, we ought to continue in the communion of it, the more ſucceſsfully to eradicate its errors. He very much prejudiced the Arminian party (d) [O]. The Engliſh deputies at the Synod of Dort were the principal promoters of the proſcription of this profeſſor [P]. Their Church. For nothing in the world ſo naturally diſguſts a man againſt orthodoxy, as being perſecuted by orthodox men. And I am of opinion that what but too commonly happens in caſes of friendſhip and fidelity, is alſo very frequent in the caſe of Hereſy. We teach people to be falſe when we ſuſpect them to be ſo. ‘ Fidelem ſi putaveris facies. Nam multi fallere docuerunt dum timent falli, & aliis jus peccandi ſuſpicando fecerunt (39). - - - Eſteem a man faithful and you ſhall make him ſo. For many have taught others to deceive while they were afraid of being deceived, and have given them a right to tranſgreſs by ſuſpecting them.’ A jealous huſband often draws on himſelf the diſgrace which he might have prevented by a conduct free from ſuſpicion. And thus it fares with clamorous people, who when any difficulties are propoſed to them, or any perſon happens to differ from the common opinion, cannot ſee it without raiſing virulent ſuſpicions againſt that perſon, and endeavouring to render him ſuſpected by the whole world; and thus they are the cauſe of his becoming what indeed he never was. Several cauſes produce this change: it would be more advantageous and leſs ſcandalous not to proceed to a rupture. Yet there are ſome junctures wherein clamours againſt ſuſpected perſons prove very ſerviceable to a cauſe. It is when under the ſpecious diſguiſe of friendſhip, and aſſiſted by a great reputation, they endeavour to pervert every body. How difficult is it to lay down good rules, when the very ſame conduct proves ſometimes pernicious, and ſometimes advantageous!

[O] He very much prejudiced the Arminian party.] The obtaining of Vorſtius to ſucceed Arminius in the Profeſſor's chair, at Leyden, was believed to be a maſter-ſtroke of that party, and yet, on the contrary, nothing redounded more to the advantage of the enemies of the Remonſtrants. Vorſtius gave them ſuch a handle by his new way of dogmatizing on the Divine Attributes, and made it ſo eaſy to raiſe public ſuſpicions againſt him, that his adverſaries were not at much trouble to render him odious. After this it was not difficult for perſons who wanted neither zeal, nor tongues, nor pens, to caſt on the whole Arminian party, all the odium raiſed againſt the new Profeſſor; for that end, they had no more to do but urge the preſſing inſtances made by Arminius's friends to get this man to Leyden. Thus Divine Providence is daily pleaſed to confound human prudence: what we toil at the moſt indefatigably, as the moſt ſubſtantial of all our hopes, moſt frequently proves our ruin. We ought to obſerve, that when Arminius's friends caſt their eyes on the Profeſſor of Steinfurt, they believed him entirely clear of the Socinian Hereſy (40): but was it eaſy to convince prepoſſeſſed perſons, or to hinder the very ſame people from urging the contrary? I am of opinion that what I have ſeveral times heard repeated is probable enough; to wit, that Arminius and the Divines of his opinion would have done a great ſervice to their cauſe, if they had kept a profound ſilence. Their five articles are of an inſinuating nature; and the Calviniſts as well as the Lutherans would inſenſibly have grown Arminians, if nature only had been left to work. The antient Church was not of St Auguſtin's opinion. That Father was the occaſion of its embracing that doctrine, which is at preſent called Calviniſm; but it inſenſibly returned to its priſtine ſtate. And if the doctrine of Predeſtination and its conſequences are vigorouſly maintained by thoſe of the Reformed party, it is becauſe diſputes have occaſioned two factions, and a ſchiſm which is yet in being. The Church of England, which looked upon her ſelf as a ſeparate body, and diſingaged from that wherein this ſchiſm was formed, was not prepoſſeſſed with the flaming zeal raiſed by this diſpute in the minds of the Contra-remonſtrants; whence it is that by ſlow degrees they have inclined to mitigated hypotheſes, which are very different from Calviniſm: the ſame would have happened in Holland, if Arminius had not formed a party. This is what I have frequently heard from very judicious men; I do not pretend to examine whether they are in the right or not.

I ſhall only obſerve, that it would be a great miſtake to aſſert that the Arminian diſputes have not raiſed ſeveral troubles among the Engliſh Divines; for the time hath been, when thoſe who were ſuſpected to be of that ſide ſuffered perſecution in that kingdom (41). Mr Des Maizeaux (42) has communicated to me ſeveral curious particulars on this head, which he has extracted from ſome Engliſh books, and perhaps I ſhall publiſh them in the Supplement to this Dictionary. We ought not then to imagine that the Church of England hath been exempt from conteſts on the ſubject of Grace; no, ſhe hath had her ſhare in that controverſy, and even before the Synod of Dort. But two things muſt indeed be owned, one of which is, that before that time the Engliſh Divines enjoyed a greater liberty of rejecting Calvin's hypotheſis concerning Predeſtination, and the extinction of Free-will, than thoſe of other countries: the other is, that ſince the re-eſtabliſhment of Epiſcopacy, under Charles II, the controverſies on theſe points have made little noiſe in Great Britain; nor were there any great quarrels concerning them, and it is to the favourable opportunity which this calm afforded, that the growing and ſpreading of Arminius's hypotheſis is to be aſcribed. Thoſe who reliſhed his opinions, did not diſturb others, and this ſort of moderation leſſened their zeal for the Synod of Dort. The following citation will confirm the former of theſe obſervations, and inform us what was ſaid at Oxford on a ſolemn occaſion, by a Profeſſor of Divinity in the preſence of a numerous aſſembly: ‘ Quæ ſit in Anglia Calvini auctoritas, dicam. Anno 1608 Menſe Julio, in publicis comitiis, ut vocant, quæ quotannis ſemel in florentiſſimi iſtius regni Academiis, quibus neſcio an in toto terrarum orbe poſſint eſſe antiquiores, & Collegiorum numero, amplitudine, & ſtructuræ magnificentiâ præſtantiores, habentur, ac tum ſolennis in omnibus facultatibus promotio celebratur, quæ res ibi maximè viſu digna eſt: Oxoniæ, Doctor Olandus, Theologus, & Promotor tum deſignatus, hoc de Calvino judicium teſtimoniumque ex altâ cathedrâ, in mille hominum præſentia, proferebat: Calvinus vir fuit doctus, ſed non ſcripſit in omnibus Catholicè: item paulo poſt: Calvini ſententia de Deo peccati authore neque defendi, neque excuſari poteſt: quia ille apertè Catholicorum nudam permiſſionem deridet, & efficacis Dei voluntatis cum peccato concurſum introducit (43). - - - - I ſhall ſhew what authority Calvin has in England. In the month of July 1608, at a public aſſembly, which is held once every year in the univerſities of this flouriſhing kingdom, (and I know not whether any other univerſities in the world can be ſaid to ſurpaſs theſe, either for their antiquity, or for the number, largeneſs, and ſtately ſtructure of their colleges) on which occaſion there is a ſolemn promotion made in all the Faculties, which is a thing that greatly deſerves to be ſeen. Dr Holland, an Oxford Divine, who at that time was named to the office of Proctor, pronounced the following cenſure upon Calvin from the chair in the preſence of a thouſand hearers. Calvin was a learned man, but he did not in all his writings preſerve the ſpirit of an orthodox Catholic: and a little after: Calvin's notion of GOD, as being the author of ſin, is neither to be defended nor excuſed; becauſe he openly derides the bare permiſſion of the Catholics, and introduces the effectual will of GOD as concurring with ſin.’

[P] The Engliſh deputies at the Synod of Dort, were the principal promoters of the proſcription of Vorſtius.] Here are ſome particulars on this ſubject. A report being ſpread that this Profeſſor would be ſummoned to appear before the Synod, one of the Engliſh deputies immediately wrote to King James's Ambaſſador at the Hague, and earneſtly preſſed him to make uſe of his intereſt with the Prince of Orange, and Count William, that this proceeding might not retard the proſcription of Vorſtius. He ſuggeſted to him the expedient that was to be made uſe of to that purpoſe, (d) See his letter to Pareus, among thoſe of the Arminians, pag. 302, Edit. in folio.

(39) Seneca, Epiſt. iii.

(40) This appears from the letter which Uyttenbogard wrote to him on the 24th of June 1611. See the clxivth letter of the Arminians in the edition of 1684.

(41) See, above, the remark [D], of the article FORBES (WILLIAM).

(42) Of whom mention is made above, in the article RAMUS, near the end of the remark [O], and in the article VIRGIL, citat. (21).

(43) Petrus Cudſemius de deſperata Calvini Cauſa, pag. 125, 126.

Their maſter's glory and the reputation of his learning were concerned in it.

poſe, which was to adviſe thoſe two Princes not to ſuffer the Synod to engage in the diſcuſſion of any points with that Divine, or receive any explications of his opinions from him. This would have occaſioned the loſs of too much time. The Engliſh Deputy wiſhes that the aſſembly would declare that all the members of it had read Vorſtius's book, and condemned it, and that nothing remained for him but to retract his opinions, and aſk pardon of God and his Church there aſſembled. He alſo farther adviſed, that in caſe Vorſtius retracted, and aſked ſuch a pardon, he ſhould be acknowledged for a brother; but otherwiſe the Synodical aſſembly ſhould puniſh him at pleaſure. This Deputy alſo wiſhes that the Synod would publickly excommunicate Vorſtius; and all theſe particulars he recommended to King James's Ambaſſador. Having but imperfectly expreſſed the contents of the letter, I ſhall ſubjoin the expreſs words of the book which ſerves me for an original. Spargitur hic rumor de Vorſtio citando, & Feſtus Hommius heſterna veſpera mihi dixit, ſe ea de re tecum fuiſſe loquutum. Si citatur, tua apud Principem Arauſionenſem & Comitem Gulielmum gratia nobis in ejus cauſa opus erit, alioqui non minus diu, quam Remonſtrantes, Synodum detineret. Spero te, Vir Illuſtris, illis hoc conſilium daturum; ſi Vorſtius tempus petit tradendi apologiam ac elucidationem de duris loquendi modis in ipſius libro de Deo, ac velit rationibus convinci, ſuorumque argumentorum confutatione, quod brevi fieri non poterit, ne Synodus de iis rebus cum illo loquatur: ſed ut plane dicat, omnes, qui ſunt in Synodo, legiſſe ipſius librum, ac multa in eo inveniſſe, quæ proxime ad blaſphemiam accedunt, & ſine dubio Eccleſiam Reformatam valde offendunt: explicationem rerum, quas nemo in quæſtionem vocat, non eſſe ſatisfactionem: itaque ſe omnino cupere, ut illas retractet & palinodiam canat, Deumque veniam roget, & Eccleſiam Dei ibi congregatam, cui eo libro ſcandalum dederat. Si hoc facit, eum noſtrum fecimus; ſin minus, Synodus hominem pro libitu caſtiget. Velim eum aliis in exemplum palam à Synodo excommunicari. Harum aliarumque rerum curam tibi potiſſimum committimus, ut rite dirigantur (44). The preſident of the Synod having aſked the Engliſh Deputies whether they approved that Vorſtius ſhould be cited to appear in the aſſembly, and what the King of England's pleaſure was in that point; they anſwered that they muſt conſult his Ambaſſador, and that they thought it would look very ill to condemn a man without hearing him: they added that, to avoid delays, Vorſtius ought not to be permitted to defend himſelf, or explain his blaſphemous propoſitions; and that he ought not to be anſwered any otherwiſe than by yes or no, nor aſked any queſtion but whether he was ready to abjure (45). Afterwards when the opinions were aſked concerning the ſentence to be paſſed upon Vorſtius, they declared him unworthy of the name and office of an orthodox Profeſſor, deſired that his book de Deo ſhould be burnt, and read the decree which condemned that work to the flames in England. Se itaque non modo ipſum Vorſtium Orthodoxi Profeſſoris munere ac nomine indignum judicare, ſed etiam perſuadere, ne hujuſmodi ejus libri in bibliopoliis proſtare permittantur: Denique rogare, ut in exemplum, & in ſancti, Dei cauſa, zeli teſtimonium, Vorſtii de Deo tractatus ſummi Magiſtratus juſſu, aut Synodi decreto eadem munito, palam ſolenniterque flammis abſumatur: ſimulque hujuſmodi infamis holocauſti ſpecimen, à Britannis coram Synodo legitur authenticum, Procancellarii Cantabrigienſis ſigillo munitum, decretum XXI Septembris CIↃ IↃ XI. Cujus vi, etiam Sereniſſimi Regis noſtri judicio præeunte, publice flammis ultricibus expurgatus eſt liber prædictus: ejuſdemque decreti Cantabrigienſis exemplar inter Synodi acta relatum (46). From this and ſeveral other places the continual correſpondence betwixt the Synod and the court plainly appears. The Arminians loudly complained of this ſympathy betwixt the two empires, the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, and of this concord betwixt the Royalty and the Prieſthood, againſt which they frequently ſay that as large a book might be written as that of Mr de Marca (47). But how can it be helped? Such is the condition of human affairs, that without the concurrence of the two powers, it is ſcarce poſſible to ſucceed in ſuch matters (48). This redounds to the advantage of a good cauſe in certain countries, and prejudices it in others. No help for it!

(44) G. Balcanquallus Epiſt. ad Dudleium Carletonum. It is the cccxliid among the Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ Printed at Amſterdam, in folio, in the year 1684, pag. 560.

(45) Non permittendum Vorſtio, ut vel defendat, vel explicet blaſphemas ſuas ſententias, ſed reſpondendum ipſi per ita vel non; rogandumque, an paratus ſit heterodoxias abjurare. Idem ad eundem, Epiſt. cccxlvii, ubi ſupra, pag. 566, col. 2.

(46) Idem ad eundem, Epiſt. cccl, ubi ſupra, pag. 575, col. 2.

(47) Mr de Marca wrote a book de Concordia Imperii & Sacerdotii.

(48) Alterius ſic Altera poſcit opem res & conjurat amice. Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 410.

V O R S T I U S (William-Henry) ſon to the foregoing, was miniſter of the Arminian congregation at Warmond in Holland. He wrote ſome books which have been printed (a) [A]. Mr Chevreau cites him on a very curious particular (b).

(a) Ex Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag. 143.

(b) In Tom. ii, of the Chevreana, pag. 106, of the Dutch edition.

[A] He wrote ſome books which have been printed.] The following account is given of them in the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum. Diſceptatio de Verbo vel Sermone Dei, cujus creberrima fit mentio apud Paraphraſtas Chaldæos, Jonathan, Onkelos, & Thargum Hieroſolymitanum. Irenopoli apud hæredes Jacobi Laringhii, 1643, 8vo. Idem Belgicè. a. 1649, 4to. Tranſtulit & Notis illuſtravit Maimonidis conſtitutiones de Fundamentis Legis. Editæ eæ ſunt Amſtel. apud Blavios, a. 1638, 4to. Item Chronologiam ſacram profanam Rab. David Ganz. & Pirke ſeu capitula R. Elieſer. Edita hæc ſunt Lugd. Bat. 1644, 4to (1). I take the book intituled Bilibra veritatis, which was printed in 1700, to be written by our William Henry Vorſtius. In the Leipſic Journal (2) it is aſcribed to him, and it is obſerved that it was refuted by the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and more fully ſtill by Mr Edzard Profeſſor at Hamburgh. See the remark [A] of the article RITTANGELIUS, and Mr Bernard's Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (3).

(1) Bibl. Antitrin. pag. 143.

(2) Menſe Decemb. 1700, pag. 542.

(3) For the month of Auguſt 1699, pag. 214, and for September 1699, pag. 359. See the Journal de Trevoux, for the month of March 1702, pag. 33, of the edition of Trevoux, where it is ſaid that the ivth letter of Mr Nye is againſt the Bilibra of William Vorſtius.

V O S S I U S. The learned men of this name, afford me ſuch an ample field of matter, that the few ſheets which I have left, will not allow me room to digeſt it. Wherefore I refer it to another time, together with the memoir communicated to me, which contains a confutation of what is ſaid againſt Iſaac Voſſius in Moreri's Dictionary.

U R C E U S (Antony Codrus) one of the moſt learned, and moſt unfortunate men of the XVth century, was an Italian [A]. He was ſo ſenſibly afflicted with the loſs of his manuſcripts, that he not only uttered execrable blaſphemies, but alſo like a ſavage retired to the woods, and all human ſociety became inſupportable to him [B]. It is reported that in [A] He was an Italian.] Of Ravenna, if we may believe Pierius Valerianus (1); but Geſner (2) citing Bartholomew of Bologna, ſays he was born in the year 1446, at Herberia a little town in the territory of Reggio, ſeven miles diſtant from Modena.

[B] He uttered execrable blaſphemies . . . . . he retired . . . . . and all human ſociety became inſupportable to him.] He loſt what he had prepared for the Preſs in the following manner. He lived at Forli, in an apartment of the palace. His chamber was ſo dark as to require a candle at noon-day. And happening to go out and leave it burning, his papers took fire, and his library was reduced to aſhes. As ſoon as he heard this ill news he run in a diſtracted manner to the palace, and ſtopping at his chamber door cried out, Jesus Christ, What great crime have I been guilty

(1) I ſhall cite his words in the remark [D].

(2) Geſner, in Biblioth. fol. 55, verſo.

in his laſt moments he acknowledged his ſin, and devoutly implored the mercy of God [C]. Some ſay that he was killed by aſſaſſins [D]. His works, printed at Baſil in 1540, conſiſt of orations, letters, and poems. His life is to be ſeen there written by Bartholomew Blanchinus of Bologna. He had entertained doubts concerning the immortality of the ſoul [E].

According to Leander Albertus (a), he died at Bologna, when he was ſeventy years of age, and was buried there in the cloyſter di Santo Salvatore in the tomb which he had cauſed to be prepared for himſelf with this ſhort epitaph, Codrus eram ; - - - I was Codrus. Now ſince he was born in the year 1446 (b), we muſt conclude that he died in the year 1516.

(a) Leand. Albert. Deſcritt. d'Italia, fol. m. 364, verſo.

(b) See the remark [A].

guilty of? Which of your followers have I ever offended, that you treat me ſo cruelly? Mind well what I am going to ſay, I ſpeak deliberately and with a compoſed mind. If by chance I addreſs myſelf to you when at the point of death, do not hear me, for I have reſolved to paſs my eternity in hell. Quodnam ego tantum ſcelus concepi Chriſte, quem ego tuorum unquam læſi, ut ita inexpiabili in me odio debaccheris? Audi ea (pergebat ad quoddam converſus ſimulachrum) quæ Tibi mentis compos & ex animo dicam. Si forte cum ad ultimum vitæ finem pervenero ſupplex accedam ad Te opem oratum, neve audias neve inter tuos accipias oro; cum infernis diis in æternum vitam agere decrevi (3). Thoſe who heard theſe blaſphemies endeavoured to comfort him, but in vain: he left the town and run to a foreſt. Adeo inſuper ira & indignatio hominem oppreſſerat, ut extra portam urbis egreſſus, amentiæ frenos non ante impoſuerit, quam in vaſtum ſeſe nemus proripuiſſet, ingentique cum moleſtia ibi totos dies tranſegiſſet (4).

(3) Spizelius, in Felice Literato, pag. 12. He cites Barthol. Bononienſis in Vita Codri.

(4) Idem, Spizelius, ibid. pag. 13.

[C] It is reported . . . . . that he devoutly implored the mercy of GOD.] The author whom I cite mentions our Urcæus's prayer. ‘ Ultima tandem aliquando appropinquante horâ miſer ille oculis ac manibus ad cœlum ſublatis; Qui cœlum incolis, (exclamavit) fer quæſo opem peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in ſinum confugio ſupplicem rejicere. Si unquam peccantem hominem voti reum feciſti, ſic mihi extrema oranti dextram ab alto porrigas oro (5). - - - This unhappy man when his laſt hour drew near, lifted up his eyes and his hands to heaven, crying out; O thou who dwelleſt in heaven, help a ſinner, I beſeech thee, and do not reject me while I thus fly in a ſupplicant manner to thy boſom. If ever thou didſt hear a miſerable ſinner, ſtretch out, I beſeech thee, thy right hand to me from on high, now that I am making my laſt prayer.’ After having uttered theſe words, he ſaw a tall man, with a torch in each hand, and trembling all over his body. Aſtoniſhed at this viſion he ſprung out of his bed, and aſked the apparition what he did there at ſuch an unſeaſonable hour, and conjured him not to do him any miſchief. ‘ Ad hunc modum ſe animamque ſuam Deo commendans, quendam conſpexit ingentis ſtaturæ virum, capite raſo, barba ad terram uſque promiſſa, ardentibus oculis, faces utraque geſtantem manu, ac toto corpore tremebundum, quo viſo in hæc à pavore dictata verba erupit: Quiſnam tu es, qui ſolus furiali habitu ea noctis parte, quâ mortales ſomno premuntur, deambulas, noli ad me qui DEI amicus ſum infeſtus accedere, effare quid quæras, quo ire pergas? Hæc cum dixiſſet, è ſtrato proſiluit, quaſi illum in ſe irruentem vitaturus (6). - - - Whilſt Urceus was in this manner recommending himſelf to GOD, he beheld a man of a huge ſtature, with his head ſhaven, his beard reaching down to the ground, his eyes flaming, holding a torch in either hand, and trembling all over his body. Upon the ſight of this apparition, he broke forth into the following expreſſions. Whoever thou art, who thus walkeſt alone in ſuch a dreadful ſhape, and at this midnight time when mortals are oppreſſed with ſleep, do not approach to hurt me who am the friend of God. Speak what thou wanteſt, and whether thou wouldſt go? Having ſaid this, he ſprung out of his bed, as if he would avoid the ſpectre which was ruſhing upon him.’ My author breaks off here; he did not know whether Urceus periſhed upon this occaſion or not (7)? This makes me ſuſpect that he as well as myſelf wanted the book of Bartholomew of Bologna, and only quoted ſeveral ſcraps of it which others had quoted before him; for it is not at all probable that our Codrus's hiſtorian ſhould leave his reader in ſuſpence concerning the conſequences of this accident. But be it as it will, Spizelius ſwayed by a charitable principle judges very favourably of the ſtate of this learned man's ſoul, in conſideration of his laſt exhortation to his diſciples. He recites it, and it ſpeaks a man who had a true ſenſe of the fear of God, and of the vanity of the world.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Utrum extremum hoc evaſerit periculum, & poſt tantam tempeſtatem in perpetuæ felicitatis portum ſit delatus, dicere non habemus, Id. ibid. p. 14.

[D] Some ſay that he was killed by aſſaſſins.] Pierius Valerianus who hath not forgot him in his catalogue of unfortunate learned men, expreſſes himſelf thus concerning him: ‘ Codrus autem Urceus Ravenas multæ, variæque doctrinæ vir, eruditiſſimis pleriſque ſcriptis, quæ nunc edita ſunt, omnibus innotuit. Is quoque ſanguinaria peremptus eſt morte, ab adverſæ factionis latronibus fœdiſſimè trucidatus (8). - - - Urceus Codrus was a man of great and various erudition, as appeared to all the world by his many learned performances which are now publiſhed. He too was killed in a baſe and bloody manner by the aſſaſſins of the contrary faction.’

(8) Pierius Valerianus de Litteratorum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 21, 22.

[E] He had entertained doubts concerning the immortality of the ſoul.] His friends aſked him what he thought of it, he replied that he did not know what would become of him after death, or whether the ſoul exiſts after this life or not. But he was not in doubt concerning the doctrines commonly aſſerted about hell, but poſitively affirmed that they were meer tales invented to terrify mankind. Spizelius mentions alſo this particular. ‘ Cum ejuſdem, ſaith he (9), de animæ mortalitate opinionis peſtilens ſidus olim infelicem illum Codrum Urceum [cujus tragœdiam ſupra memoravimus] afflaſſet, parum abfuit, quin & ipſe in atheiſmi voraginem fuerit præcipitatus. Rogantibus enim amicis, quid de immortalitate animæ ſentiret? neſcire ſe reſpondebat, quid poſt mortem de ſe futurum eſſet, viveretne animus, ſive anima, an interiret una cum corpore, quæque de inferis homines prædicarent, anilia quædam terriculamenta eſſe dicebat: hinc ipſi amariſſimo epigrammate poſt fata etiam fuit exprobratum, quod non rectè de Chriſto, inferis, animarumque immortalitate ſentiendo, latentis atheiſmi ſui haud obſcura documenta dediſſet. - - - The peſtilential influence of that ſame opinion concerning the mortality of the ſoul had infected the miſerable Codrus Urceus [whoſe tragical end we have mentioned above] to ſuch a degree that he wanted but little of falling into the gulf of Atheiſm. For when his friends aſked him what he thought of the immortality of the ſoul, he anſwered, &c. . . . . . This gave occaſion to a moſt bitter epigram being written upon him after his death, wherein it was reproachfully inſinuated, as if by his erroneous opinions concerning CHRIST, Hell, and the Immortality of the Soul, he had given manifeſt proofs of his lurking Atheiſm.’

(9) Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 174, 175. He cites Barth. Bononienſ. in Codri Urcei Vita.

URGULANIA, a Roman lady, favourite of the Empreſs Livia. Her intereſt with that Empreſs rendered her extremely inſolent, inſomuch that ſhe refuſed to appear before the Senate in order to give evidence (a): The Prætor waited on her to interrogate her, and a greater deference was paid to her than to the Veſtal Virgins [A], who were obliged

(a) Tacitus, Annal. lib. ii, cap. xxxiv.

[A] A greater deference was paid to her than to the Veſtal Virgins.] I ſhall quote Tacitus, ‘ Urgulaniæ potentia adeo nimia civitati erat, ut teſtis in cauſſa quadam quæ apud Senatum tractabatur, venire obliged to come to the bar, when they gave teſtimony. But Urgulania's great intereſt and haughty demeanor did not prevent Lucius Piſo's ſuing her for debt in the year of Rome 769, ſhe refuſed to appear, and retired to the Emperor's Palace. But Piſo could not be perſuaded to ſtop his proceedings by the remonſtrances of his relations, nor by all the complaints of Livia, that it was a violation of the reſpect due to her; and Tiberius would no farther interpoſe in this proceſs, than by promiſing his mother to ſollicit the judges in favour of Urgulania, ſo that the ſuit was no otherwiſe ended than by Livia's cauſing Piſo to be paid the ſum which Urgulania owed him. She was ſtill living in the year 777, when her grand-ſon Plautius Silvanus the Prætor was accuſed of the murther of his wife; for we find in Tacitus (b) that there being no hopes that the criminal ſhould eſcape condemnation, ſhe ſent him a dagger, which being unable to uſe, he cauſed his veins to be opened.

(b) Idem, lib. iv, cap. xxii.

'nire dedignaretur; miſſus eſt prætor qui domi interrogaret, cum Virgines Veſtales in foro & judicio audiri, quotiens teſtimonium dicerent, vetus mos fuerit (1). - - - The power of Urgulania was grown ſo exceſſive, that being ſummoned to appear as a witneſs in a cauſe depending before the ſenate, ſhe ſcornfully refuſed to come. Upon this a Prætor was ſent to examine her at home, whereas by an old cuſtom even the Veſtal Virgins were obliged to appear in the Forum, and in the courts of judicature, when they had any evidence to give in.' Mr du Boulai had no reaſon to take Urgulania for a Veſtal. The Veſtal Urgulania, ſays he, did a thing unprecedented by deſpiſing the ſummons of the ſenate, to give evidence in a cauſe depending before them; and that court was obliged to ſend the Prætor to her houſe to examine her. As Cornelius Tacitus (whoſe words are worth reciting) informs us lib. 2 (2). He afterwards cites the paſſage which I have quoted above: if he had read it with due attention, he would have been ſatisfied that Urgulania was no Veſtal; he would, I ſay, have been convinced of it without having any occaſion to conſult the other paſſage of Tacitus, which ſhews that ſhe was the grandmother of a Roman Prætor, who was accuſed of killing his ſecond wife. This ſuppoſes an old age worthy that Hiſtorian's obſervation, (for the very earlieſt time that a Veſtal Virgin was permitted to marry was at the age of thirty-ſeven) and doth not very well agree with Mr du Boulai's obſervation that few Veſtals married after thirty years obſervance of their vow, and thoſe that did proved very unhappy (3). A favourite, who had as great an intereſt as Urgulania, who ſhould have been married after having been a Veſtal, would have been an illuſtrious inſtance of good fortune. I can eaſily believe that this author never ſaw the paſſage of Tacitus any where elſe than in Tiraquellus's commentaries on Alexander ab Alexandro (4), where being ſeparated from the thread of the narration it may make one believe that Urgulania was a Veſtal Virgin.

(1) Tacit. Annal, lib. ii, cap. xxxiv.

URGULANIA, falſely taken for a Veſtal Virgin by du Boulai.

(2) Du Boulai, Threſor des Antiquitez Romaines, p. 316.

(3) Du Boulai, ibid. pag. 308.

(4) In Libr. V. Genial. Dier. cap. xii, pag. 109, Edit. Lugd. Batavor. 1673, where inſtead of Cornelius Tacitus, there is Cornel. Celſus.

URGULANILLA, grand-daughter of the preceding lady [A], was married to the Emperor Claudius before he became Emperor (a). He had two children by her [B], and divorced her becauſe ſhe had made herſelf infamous by her leudneſs, and was alſo ſuſpected of murther (b).

(a) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. xxvi.

(b) Ob libidinum probra & homicidii ſuſpicionem. Id. ibid.

[A] Grand-daughter of the preceding lady.] This is the opinion of Reineſius, a perſon who ſtudied the Roman families better than any man in the world. He ſaith that Urgulania, Livia's favourite, was the wife of Marcus Plautius, the ſon of Aulus Plautius, who was tribune of the people in the year of Rome 698. That Marcus Plautius Silvanus the ſon of Marcus Plautius and Urgulania was conſul in the year 752, and honoured with the triumphal ornaments in 762. That Plautius Silvanus the ſon of that conſul was Prætor of Rome in the year 777, and that he had a ſiſter who was our Urgulanilla, and two brothers, viz. Publius Plautius Pulcher, and Titus Plautius Silvanus Ælianus, who was conſul in 799, and afterwards again in Veſpaſian's time (1). There is yet extant a very long inſcription (2) expreſſing the offices and actions of this Titus Plautius, and particularly his conſulſhip in Veſpaſian's reign: notwithſtanding which Lipſius (3) has been ſo inadvertent as to apply this inſcription to that Plautius Silvanus who killed himſelf in the year of Rome 777, and was Urgulania's grandſon. It is obſervable that in my edition of Lipſius's Tacitus (4), the text hath it Urgulania, and it is Virgulania in the commentary, and the commentator obſerves that the ſirname Virgulanias was appropriated to the Plautian family, which he proves by an inſcription, and by Suetonius's authority, who, ſaith he, calls one of the Emperor Claudius's wives Plautia Virgulanilla. But all the authors who produce this inſcription, expreſs the name to be Urgulanius: whence then can it proceed that Lipſius alledges it to prove his Virgulanius? I believe I may venture to ſay that the Printers are entirely innocent of this blunder, and that Lipſius not perfectly remembring the word Urgulania thought that Tacitus ſaid Virgulania, and continued this firſt error throughout. He had done much better, not to have written proper names without book, but to have kept the original before his eyes. And if we who are authors would always be ſo prudent as to diſtruſt our memory, and only rely on an exact view, our writings would be more accurate.

Our Urgulanilla perhaps owed her name to its being a diminutive of that of Urgulania her grandmother.

[B] He had two children by her.] A ſon and a daughter. The ſon was named Druſus, and died before the age of fourteen, by a very odd accident: for throwing up a pear into the air in order to catch it in his mouth, it fell in and choaked him. He was contracted to one of Sejanus's daughters, notwithſtanding which the ſame Sejanus was reported to have cauſed him to be killed (5). So true it is that many more crimes are imputed to favourites than they are really guilty of. Suetonius rejects this impertinent accuſation (6). Claudia, the daughter of Claudius and Urgulanilla, was born before the expiration of five months after her mother's divorce: and the late huſband acknowledged her at firſt, but not long after his mind altered, and he cauſed her to be expoſed naked at her mother's door; on pretence that Boter his freed-man was the true father of this child. Mr Chevreau miſtook Suetonius's words, quamvis ante quintum menſem divortii natam, in believing they ſignified though ſhe was born five months before their divorce (7). He ſeems to intend a criticiſm on Reineſius, for ſaying that Plautia Urgulanilla, was Claudius's firſt wife (8), but indeed here is no room for cenſure; for Lepida and Medullina were only contracted, but not married to Claudius. Wherefore Mr Chevreau deſerves to be blamed for not obſerving Suetonius's diſtinction. He beſtows ſix wives on that Emperor, whereas Suetonius allows him but four, and two contracted ladies, quatuor uxores & duas ſponſas (9).

(1) Reineſius, Epiſt. xxvii ad Rupertum, pag. 106.

(2) It is to be found in Glandorp. Onom. pag. 683; and in Rijck in Tacitum, pag. 440.

(3) Lipſ. in Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, pag. m. 200.

(4) That of Geneva, 1619, in 8vo.

(5) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. xxvii.

(6) Quo magis miror fuiſſe qui traderent fraude à Sejano necatum. Id. ibid.

(7) Chevreau, Hiſt. du Monde, Tom. ii, pag. 170, Dutch Edit. 1687, & pag. 202, 203, Dutch Edit. 1698.

(8) Reineſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 109.

(9) Sueton. ubi ſupra, cap. xxvi.

URRACA.

URRACA, daughter and heireſs of Alfonſo VI King of Leon and Caſtile was firſt married to Raymund of Burgundy whoſe widow ſhe became in the year 1100 (a). She was afterwards married to Don Alfonſo King of Arragon and Navarre in the year 1106 (b). This marriage proved the cauſe of the re-union of almoſt all the Chriſtian kingdoms of Spain under one ſovereign; for after the death (c) of Don Alfonſo VI, King of Leon, Caſtile, and Toledo, &c. theſe realms fell into the hands of Don Alfonſo King of Arragon and Navarre; they devolved on him I ſay by virtue of his marrying Urraca. The Lords of Caſtile had been againſt that marriage; wherefore the King did not go to claim his Queen's ſucceſſion, without a good number of troops in order to reduce the Caſtilians to reaſon in caſe of neceſſity (d). The preparatives for his journey and other things retarded his taking poſſeſſion; but in the interim he increaſed the ſplendor and magnificence of his court, and connived at the ſcandalous conduct of Urraca [A]. He went along with her to Caſtile, and met with no manner of reſiſtance (e); nevertheleſs he acted like a man who very well knew how to provide againſt all events [B], and was ſoon obliged to remedy the ill effects of his Queen's ambition, who would have ruined a great lord as a puniſhment for having given the title of King of Caſtile to her huſband (f). She grew ſo diſſolute that he was forced to confine her to the fortreſs of Caſtellar; from whence ſhe finding ways to eſcape, retired into Caſtile, and endeavoured to annul her marriage. The Archbiſhop of Toledo, and ſeveral other prelates aſſiſted her in that attempt, for which they were ſeverely puniſhed by the King. The great Lords and the States of Caſtile oppoſed this divorce, and by ſubmiſſive means brought Urraca to the King her huſband in Arragon, who graciouſly received her; but as ſhe continued her vicious courſe of life, and daily more and more forgot her own honour and the honour of her houſe, he at laſt cauſed her to be conveyed to Soria, and baniſhed her for ever from his company (g). It was then that her adherents applied more vigorouſly than ever to diſſolve the marriage. She alledged not only the common excuſe on the like occaſions, that ſhe was married againſt her conſent, but that her near relation to Don Alfonſo rendered her marriage with him unlawful (h). Application was made to the Pope, who committed this affair to Don Diego Gelmirio, Biſhop of Compoſtella (i). It terminated in a diſſolution of the marriage. Some Hiſtorians praiſe Alfonſo for that having put away Urraca, he at the ſame time renounced all authority over the kingdom of Caſtile; but they plainly contradict themſelves [C], by relating ſeveral facts, which make it appear that he did his utmoſt to keep that authority.

[A] He increaſed the ſplendor and magnificence of his court, and connived at the ſcandalous conduct of Urraca.] Both theſe things were natural conſequences of the inheritance which this Princeſs brought with her. Two or three kingdoms left her by her father were very well worth the concealing a reſentment at her ill deportment. Mariana's words plainly ſignify that the tide of Urraca's leudneſs run very high. 'Præterea varia Aragonii regni negotia diſtinebant (Alfonſum) ne novam & ampliſſimam cerneret hæreditatem. Cuncta tamen ad novi imperii decorem compoſita, dilatæ voluptates, diſſimulatæ Reginæ libidines: quæ non ſine ſugillatione majeſtatis nimium in levitatem atque turpitudinem incubuerat (1). - - - Beſides various affairs relating to the kingdom of Arragon hindered Alfonſo from taking poſſeſſion of this new and ample inheritance. Nevertheleſs every thing was ordered in ſuch a manner as became the dignity of a new kingdom. Alfonſo poſtponed his pleaſures, and winked at the unchaſtity of his Queen, who to the ſhame of Majeſty ſhewed too great an inclination for levity and leudneſs.'

[B] He acted like a man who very well knew how to provide againſt all events.] 'As ſoon as ever he had ſet foot in Caſtile he began to conſider what might happen, if his Queen ſhould die without iſſue by him; wherefore he put the principal places and ſtrongeſt forts into the hands of Navarreſe and Arragonian Governors and Captains, to the end that if he ſhould be obliged to quit the kingdoms of Caſtile, Leon, Toledo, and their dependencies, he might in ſome meaſure keep thoſe people in awe, and evacuate them on honourable and advantageous terms: this practice ſomewhat diſguſted the Caſtilian Lords. He alſo knew his wife Urraca to be proud, ungrateful, inconſtant, and libidinous; wherefore like a conſiderate man he fortified himſelf againſt whatever events time might produce. This woman, on a trivial occaſion, conceived a moſt inveterate hatred againſt the Count D. Pedro Anſures, Lord of Valladolid, who had educated her, as well as preſerved and protected her dominions after the death of her father; it was only becauſe in the letters he wrote to the King her huſband, and to her, deſiring them to come and take poſſeſſion of their heritage, he gave her huſband the title of King of Caſtile. For this reaſon ſhe undertook to deprive him of his eſtate at Valladolid and other places; but the King immediately re-eſtabliſhed him, and the better to ſecure him from the rage of this woman, he ſent him to Arragon, with Donna Elo his wife, intruſting to them the government of the young Count of Urgel his nephew (2).'

[C] Some Hiſtorians praiſe Alfonſo for that having put away Urraca, he at the ſame time renounced .... but they plainly contradict themſelves.] Theſe two contradictory aſſertions follow one another in the Hiſtory of Mayerne. Don Alfonſo, ſaith he (3), 'baniſhed Urraca for ever from his converſation: notwithſtanding which he retained ſeveral ſtrong places in Caſtile, without being much deſirous of the government or adminiſtration of that kingdom. It is certain that this King's ſpirit was very great, and he plainly ſhewed that he put a higher value on virtue and honour, than on worldly goods, by giving up ſuch ample territories as thoſe of Caſtile, Leon, Toledo, and others which Urraca brought him.' This Hiſtorian in the ſame page begins to relate Don Alfonſo's reſentment againſt thoſe who had reſtored to Urraca the towns and fortreſſes which he had in Caſtile. This reſentment we find in the ſame Hiſtory to be one of the motives, which engaged him to make war againſt the Caſtilians. It appears from Mayerne's words, that Urraca's leudneſs is aſſigned as another cauſe of the war: 'From that time Donna Urraca continued her immoralities; for re-aſſuming her former deſign of a divorce, ſhe obtained it by the authority of Pope Paſchal..... So that finding herſelf without any check, and no reſtraint laid upon her luſt, ſhe looſely indulged it to an exorbitant degree. She gave up herſelf to a familiar and unchaſt converſation with Count Gomez de Candeſpina, who formerly pretended to be her huſband, and had by her a ſon, of whom ſhe was delivered clandeſtinely, whence he was named Don Fernando Hurtado, or a clandeſtine child; from whom the houſe of the Hurtado's, an illuſtrious family in Spain is ſaid to be deſcended. Though ſome doubt the truth of this, yet it is certain that the Count Don Gomez, in a ſhort time had the ſole government of the kingdom, and entirely diſpoſed of the affairs of war and peace at his arbitrary will and pleaſure, and enjoyed the

---

(a) Mayerne Turquet, Hiſt. d'Eſpagne, livr. viii, pag. m. 331.

(b) Mariana de Rebus Hiſp. lib. x, cap. vii, pag. m. 418.

(c) In the year 1108.

(d) Mariana, ubi ſupra, cap. viii, pag. 419.

(e) Mayerne, ubi ſupra, lib. ix, pag. 335.

(f) See the remark [B].

(g) Taken from Mayerne, ubi ſupra, pag. 340.

(h) Id. ibid.

(i) Id. ibid. pag. 341.

(1) Mariana de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. x, cap. viii, pag. m. 419.

(2) Mayerne Turquet, Hiſt. d'Eſpagne, livr. ix, pag. 336.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 340.

authority. He fought battles to maintain it, and his enemies were obliged to force him to reſtore the places which he detained (k), even after the Caſtilians had elected Alphonſus Raymund of Burgundy, Urraca's ſon by her firſt huſband, for their king in the year 1322 (l). They made this choice when they found that the Queen continued to give up her ſelf to the moſt ſcandalous amours, and alſo countenanced the tyrannical government of her favourite (m). Her own ſon was obliged to declare war againſt her, and to beſiege her in the Caſtle of Leon; out of which difficulties ſhe no otherwiſe extricated herſelf than by a promiſe to renounce her dominions, and reduce her ſelf to a private life with a penſion ſuitable to her dignity (n). The year of her death is not certainly known; ſome ſay that ſhe died about the year 1125 (o), in child-bed lying-in of a baſtard; others tell us that her death was the puniſhment of a ſacrilegious crime [D]. She had a ſiſter who might very well have diſputed with her the pre-eminence in leudneſs [E], and brought a load

‘ the ſame privacies with the Queen, as if he had ‘ really been her huſband; notwithſtanding which ‘ Don Pedro de Lara another gallant . . . . . ſo far inſinuated himſelf into the Queen's favour, that he ‘ ſoon became one of her darling minions, of whom ‘ Count Gomez proved very jealous. The diſſolute ‘ and laſcivious deportment of Donna Urraca, was ſo ‘ univerſally and publickly known, that King Alſonſo ‘ excited by a juſt indignation, as well on that account as by reaſon of the above-mentioned divorce, ‘ reſolved to enter Caſtile with a great army, and put ‘ all to fire and ſword that he met in his way, being ‘ irritated as well by the leudneſs of the Queen as ‘ by the baſe puſillanimity of the Caſtilians, who ‘ tamely obeyed her: he bore them a grudge, becauſe ‘ they had reſtored to her the places which he had ‘ intruſted to their keeping. The Queen's two amorous darlings Don Gomez and Don Pedro took the ‘ field againſt him with the forces of Caſtile and Leon, ‘ and meeting the royal army, compoſed of Navarreſe and Arragonians, they came to a cloſe engagement near Candeſpina, not far from Sepulveda. ‘ Don Pedro who led the van was firſt attacked (4),’ and immediately fled and retired to the Queen at Burgos, carrying the news of the defeat which he was not at leiſure to ſee (5). Don Gomez her other paramour was killed in the field of battle. The victorious Alſonſo penetrated as far as Galicia, making a mercileſs ſlaughter and devaſtation wherever his army paſſed (6). He obtained a ſecond victory betwixt the towns of Leon and Aſtorga, and forced Alfonſo Raimund, Urraca's ſon, to ſave himſelf by flight into Portugal. The Queen being depoſed, the King her ſon reſolved to recover the Caſtilian fortreſſes, which his father-in-law Don Alſonſo King of Navarre kept from him (7). Accordingly he raiſed a great army: Alfonſo did the like, and entred the kingdom of Caſtile, when the Prelates of both kingdoms foreſeeing the great calamities which were inevitable, if theſe two potent Princes ſhould once make war, earneſtly endeavoured to negotiate a peace betwixt them; and their attempts were ſo ſucceſsful as to engage the new King of Caſtile, to addreſs himſelf by way of requeſt to the King of Navarre and Aragon, in order to obtain his cities and caſtles (8). By this means he obtained part of his demands; but Alfonſo would not reſtore the countries ſituated betwixt Villorado and Calaorra, nor the provinces of Guipuſcoa and Alava: &c. Pretending that they ought to be re-united to Navarre, and that they were uſurped by Don Alfonſo VI King of Caſtile.

Does it become an Hiſtorian who relates all theſe particulars to aſſert that Urraca's huſband would not detain the patrimony of the wife he had divorced? Does not a man confute himſelf when he writes in this manner? What follows is another error of the like nature. An author whom I here cite, blames Don Alfonſo for divorcing Urraca, ‘ and by that ‘ means depriving himſelf of the poſſeſſion of three ‘ kingdoms. For though the hiſtory of Spain praiſes ‘ him for having preferred his honour to thoſe three ‘ great realms, I cannot help thinking that if on ‘ one ſide this be taken for a generous action, on ‘ the other it muſt paſs for very weak and impolitic, ‘ as was that of Lewis VII King of France, who lived ‘ at the ſame time, and who by divorcing his wife ‘ Eleonora, ſowed the ſeeds of a perpetual war in his ‘ kingdom (9).’ This compariſon betwixt Don Alfonſo and Lewis VII is not juſt; for the French King entirely diſpoſſeſſed himſelf of the territories of his divorced Queen, and exactly followed Marcus Aurelius's maxims (10): but Don Alfonſo did not at all follow the ſame rule, and is on that account cenſured by one of the beſt Spaniſh Hiſtorians (11): ‘ Alfonſus Aragonius eo nuncio (12) perculſus repudio facto, ‘ Reginam Soria dimittit, in cujus urbis arce cuſtodiæ ‘ rurſus mancipata erat: imperandi tamen dulcedine ‘ illectus, dotalem ditionem non deponit. Id iniquum ‘ eſſe omnibus videbatur. - - - Struck with that news, ‘ Alſonſo King of Arragon, divorced his Queen, and ſent ‘ her away from Soria, the caſtle of which town had ‘ been a ſecond priſon to her. Nevertheleſs he was ſo ‘ charmed with the ſweets of empire that he would not ‘ reſign the dominions which ſhe brought him. This to ‘ every body ſeemed an unjuſt action.’

[D] Some ſay that ſhe died . . . . . in child-bed lying-in of a baſtard; others tell us that her death was the puniſhment of a ſacrilegious crime.] ‘ She took up ‘ her reſidence in St Vincent's church, being very ‘ ſtrictly guarded: notwithſtanding which it is reported that ſhe one day went to the church, dedicated to St Iſidore of Leon, in order to ſeize the ‘ treaſures, which her father and grand-father had ‘ given to that place, and that as ſhe was carrying ‘ off her prey, being juſt going out, and having advanced one foot out of the church, her intrails burſt ‘ out: a juſt puniſhment for the adulteries of which ‘ ſhe had been guilty, and the murders which they ‘ occaſioned, to the injury and diſhonour of the royal ‘ families, and all the Chriſtian part of Spain, as well ‘ as for her ſacrilege. Others ſay that ſhe died in ‘ the caſtle of Saldania in the delivery of a clandeſtine ‘ child (13).’ Mariana mentions both theſe opinions, and owns that this Queen will be the eternal ignominy of Spain: Pudicitiam ſane dum vixit haud ſatis honeſte habuit. in Saldaniæ arce ex partu extinctam ferunt. æternum Hiſpaniæ dedecus. alii Legione affirmant, cum theſauros D. Iſidori expilaſſet, quos auferre neſas erat, in ipſo templi limine ruptis viſceribus, manifeſta numinis vindicta expiraſſe (14).

[E] She had a ſiſter who might have diſputed with her the pre-eminence in leudneſs.] It was Thereſa the baſtard daughter of Don Alfonſo VI, who married her to a French lord in acknowledgment of the ſervices he had done him in his wars againſt the Moors. This lord according to ſome writers was Henry of Lorrain, but others call him Henry of Burgundy. And the latter are divided whether he was deſcended from the Dukes or the Earls of Burgundy. Some ſay that (15) he was ſon to Henry Duke of Burgundy, and grand-ſon to Robert of France, the firſt of that name Duke of Burgundy, and that he was conſequently a Prince of the royal blood of France; and others ſay that he was (16) the Earl of Burgundy's ſon, and brother to Pope Calixtus II. However it was, this valiant lord rendered himſelf ſo conſiderable, that Don Alfonſo VI King of Caſtile marrying him to his daughter Thereſa, gave him thoſe parts of Portugal which he had conquered from the Moors, with the title of Hereditary Count, for him and his legitimate ſucceſſors, proceeding from this marriage and alſo promiſed to add to thoſe lordſhips the conqueſts which he ſhould for the future make on the Moors, with the ſame ſucceſſive and hereditary right . . . . on condition that he and his heirs ſhould acknowledge the Kings of Leon for their ſovereign lords, and hold the ſaid lands of them in fealty and homage (17). Thereſa was a widow in the year 1112, and mother of three children, one ſon and two daughters (18). Soon after ſhe married for her ſecond huſband . . . . . Bermund Paez de Tranſtamara (19), and after ſhe had lived ſome time with him, ſhe left him, excited thereto by a prevailing luſt, or ſome other damnable

---

(k) See the remark [C].

(l) Mayerne, ubi ſupra, pag. 342.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Id. ibid. pag. 344.

(o) Septimo decimo circiter anno à morte patris. Mariana, ubi ſupra, cap. viii, pag. 425. But ch. xiv, p. 433. he affirms that ſhe died in the year 1126.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 341.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 344.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 345.

(9) Campion, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. i, pag. 129, 130. Edit. of Roüen 1657.

(10) See, above, the remark [A], of the article LEWIS VII.

(11) Mariana, ubi ſupra, pag. 421.

(12) Viz. that Alphonſus Raymund, ſon of Urraca had been crowned at Compoſtella.

(13) Mayerne, ubi ſupra, pag. 347. Campion, ubi ſupra, pag. 136, 137, has tranſcribed this almoſt word for word.

(14) Mariana, ubi ſupra, pag. 423.

(15) See Father Anſelme, Hiſt. de la Maiſon Roiale, pag. 454, 483, 484, and the citations (34), (35), in this remark.

(16) See Louïs Gollut's Memoires Hiſtoriques de la Franche Comté, pag. 305, 306.

(17) Mayerne, ubi ſupra, lib. viii, pag. 322.

(18) Idem, lib. ix, pag. 339.

(19) Id. ibid.

load of evils on Portugal. After this, I am ſurprized that the name of Urraca ſhould ever be given to the Infanta's of Caſtile, and I do not wonder that the French Ambaſſadors, who were ſent to bring into France one of the daughters of Don Alfonſo IX, whom he had promiſed to their maſter, choſe the leſs beautiful, whoſe name was Blanche, and could not bear the very mention of her ſiſter, becauſe named Urraca (p). They undoubtedly looked on that name as damnable occaſion (20), and married Don Fernando Paez de Tranſtamara, brother to the huſband ſhe left. On the other ſide, Don Bermund being thus left, as if he deſigned to emulate his counteſs's inceſt, married her eldeſt daughter Donna Thereſa Henriquez, ſiſter to Don Alfonſo Henriquez. Theſe ſcandalous inter-marriages were contracted between Chriſtians, in the infant houſe of Portugal . . . . . . But the young Earl Alfonſo Henriquez being extremely afflicted at theſe exorbitances, and beſides finding himſelf deſpiſed, rejected, and diſgraced, and that the adulterous and inceſtuous Don Fernand aſſumed the title of Count of Portugal, on account of his wife, he raiſed an army againſt him (21) . . . . . Purſuing him as a tyrant and inceſtuous adulterer ; and their forces engaged near Guymaranes, where Alfonſo was beaten, by his falling too raſhly on the enemy . . . . . . Having afterwards recruited, and rallied their forces, they fought a ſecond battle, which proved more ſucceſful to Don Alfonſo : for Don Fernando's army was utterly routed, he and the Counteſs, Don Alfonſo's mother, were taken and confined to a ſtrong priſon : . . . . . And this was the fruit which theſe two leud ſiſters, daughters of King Alfonſo VI, reaped in reward of their luſt, and almoſt at the ſame time (22). Thereſa was treated very ſeverely by Count Alfonſo Henriquez her ſon. ‘ She found a way to diſcover her ſufferings to Don Alfonſo Raimund King of Caſtile, her nephew, and deſired him to eſpouſe her cauſe, and deliver her from her harſh confinement, in reward of which ſhe offered to ſettle the county of Portugal on him. King Alfonſo deſirous to re-unite that country to his territories, came in perſon with an army, in order to deliver this lady, perfectly forgetting that the Earl had aſſiſted him in his wars, againſt his mother Donna Urraca, Queen of Caſtile and Leon (23) ; but he was beaten and wounded in the foot.’ After he was cured, he re-entered Portugal, and beſieged the city of Guimaranes, in which Count Alfonſo Henriquez had ſhut himſelf up. ‘ This ſiege proved very tedious, and if the attacks were briſk on one ſide, the defence was brave on the other ; inſomuch that they were grown weary of it, when Egas Nunnez came out of the town, having firſt obtained a ſafe conduct, and made propoſals of peace which was concluded on condition that the Count of Portugal ſhould be obliged to come into Alfonſo's kingdom and take an oath of allegiance to him as his ſovereign. Thus the king drew off his army, and marched back to Toledo, without remembring his aunt's intereſt, on whoſe account he undertook the expedition, either being ſtruck with horror at her deteſtable courſe of life, or having perhaps engaged in this enterpriſe by ambition only (24).’

---

(p) La Mothe le Vayer, letter xxxiii, pag. 265, of Vol. x. He quotes Ant. Herrera, Tom. ii, lib. xv, cap. xvi. See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 32.

(20) Campion, ubi ſupra, pag. 134, expreſſes it thus : who (Bermund Paës) not ſatisfying her according to her mind, that mad and leud woman left him to marry his brother Ferdinando Paës de Tranſtamara.

(21) Mayerne, ubi ſupra.

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 343.

(23) Id. ibid. pag. 347.

(24) Campion, ubi ſupra, pag. 135, 136.

This might be the ſubject of many reflexions ; but I ſhall offer only a few. The firſt is,

I. That moſt authors who write lives, chuſe for their ſubjects only illuſtrious perſons ; and if ſome of them intermix ill men with the good, it is becauſe they are reſolved to give a perfect hiſtory of an entire order or claſs of men. I know no author who has attempted to write the lives of great criminals only. There is no want of encomiums on illuſtrious women ; libraries ſwarm with them ; but I queſtion whether there ever yet appeared a particular collection of thoſe women who were a ſcandal to their ſex and country. It is a copious ſubject which deſerves an author's pains, and it might be handled in Plutarch's manner : I mean, that as this famous writer choſe the moſt illuſtrious Romans and the moſt illuſtrious Grecians in order to parallel them ; in like manner the queens and princeſſes of different nations might be compared together. I have mentioned in another place (25), the compariſon which the Engliſh made betwixt Mary Stuart Queen of Scots, and Joan Queen of Naples. Many ſuch parallels might eaſily be made. Our Urraca might be compared to the heireſs of Guienne, or Margaret de Valois, wiſe of Henry IV. But the moſt exact parallel that could be found for her, would be that of her ſiſter Thereſa. They were both very leud ; the tyranny which both their paramours exerciſed, was owing to them, as well as a thouſand civil and foreign hoſtilities thereby occaſioned, and they were both degraded and poiſoned by their own ſons.

(25) In the remark [K], of the article NAPLES, (JOAN I, Queen of).

II. This confirms what I have already ſaid of the diſorders which thoſe countries are expoſed to, where the Salique Law doth not take place, and concerning the pernicious conſequences of the leud inclinations of a female ſovereign (26). Urraca could not bear that her ſubjects ſhould acknowledge her huſband's authority : that ſhe had her gallants was obvious to the whole world : the huſband was obliged to put a ſtop to this inordinate licentiouſneſs ; this he could not do without making room for factions, and this occaſioned a war. The Caſtilians diſguſted at him and their Urraca's gallant, turned to the riſing-ſun, and ſtirred up the ſon to dethrone his own mother ; and he readily complied with their inclination. This ſhews of what importance it is for a Queen to avoid at leaſt all public impurities ; for if ſhe once grows ſhameleſs, no bounds can reſtrain her. She will place her affection on deſpicable objects ; ſhe will not have any regard to merit in her choice, nor value any thing beſides the beauty and vigour of a young giddy-headed fellow, who will abuſe her credit, and occaſion a hundred pretexts for a civil war ; and beſides, become ſo inſolent as to uſe his miſtreſs ill, and render his aſſaſſination neceſſary (27). She will not conſider the regular example which ſhe owes to her children, when a premature or untimely ſucceſſion may raiſe them to the throne. In one word, it is a chain of ignominy and confuſion.

(26) See, remark [G], of the article NAPLES, (JOAN II, Queen of).

(27) See the remark [X], of the article ELIZABETH.

III. It is an aggravation of Urraca's crimes, that ſhe not only took no care to ſave appearances, but alſo that ſhe was married to an illuſtrious Monarch. He was ſir-named El Bataillador, - - - - the Battle-Fighter (28), becauſe he had fought twenty-nine battles, and been victorious in all of them, two only excepted. He was King of Arragon and Navarre, by a right independant of Urraca, which rendered his condition equal to that of this Queen. Notwithſtanding all this he did not eſcape the matrimonial diſgrace. So true it is that the perſonal bravery of a huſband is not ſufficient to avert that ſtorm (29).

(28) Gollut, Mémoires de la Franche-Comté, pag. 341.

(29) See, above, the remark [B], of the article BAUTRU (WILLIAM).

IV. Laſtly, I obſerve that Don Alfonſo Raimund, King of Caſtile, who had dethroned his mother Urraca, and kept her in priſon, did nevertheleſs engage in a war in favour of his aunt the Counteſs of Portugal, who was treated in the ſame manner by Don Alfonſo Henriquez her ſon. This aunt promiſed the King of Caſtile to declare him her heir to the prejudice of her ſon. ‘ Doloris illa impatientia Alfonſum Caſtellæ Regem eo nomine ſeptimum, ut propinquæ, miſeræ & captivæ matri opem ferat, per litteras obteſtatur adverſus impios filii conatus. Navatæ operæ mercedem, Portugaliæ principatum pollicetur Alfonſo filio, pro eo ac par erat, abdicato. Annuit ille ſive ambitione dominandi corruptus, ſive materteræ calamitatem miſeratus : validoque exercitu conflato in Portugaliæ fines irruit (30). - - - - - Being not able to bear her grief, ſhe wrote a letter to Alfonſo VII King of Caſtile, beſeeching him that he would ſuccour his miſerable relation, and deliver a captive mother from the wicked attempts of her own ſon. She promiſed him as a reward the principality of Portugal, by excluding, her ſon Alfonſo as he deſerved. The King of Caſtile conſented to it, either from an ambitious deſire of extending his dominions, or out of pity to his aunt's diſtreſs : and having raiſed a great army he invaded Portugal.’ This was ſufficient to invite him into Portugal with ſword in hand, and it is very probable, that amongſt other pretexts, he urged that of his aunt being diſpoſſeſſed and oppreſſed by an unnatural ſon : for where are the men who are aſhamed to condemn in another what they do themſelves ? Don Alfonſo Henriquez might very juſtly have vindicated himſelf by an argument as a ſcandalous and moſt unſavory one, after the vicious life of the Queen who is the ſubject of this article.

(30) Mariana, ubi ſupra, pag. 433.

ment ad hominem, and returned an anſwer like that, which it is ſuppoſed Lamech's wives returned to Adam (31).

Obſerve, that Mr Lequien de la Neufville doth not ſay any thing poſitive of this Tereſa's amours. His words do not in the leaſt hinder her being thought a chaſt lady; for this looſe and general expreſſion ſhe thought of nothing but dying more holily than ſhe had lived (32), does not denote any gallantry. The conduct of a woman may be very oppoſite to holineſs, without being ſtained with any laſcivious crimes. He poſitively aſſures us, that Alfonſo, King of Caſtile, took the field . . . . . . on pretence of delivering that Princeſs (33). He places himſelf among thoſe who did not believe her to be a baſtard (34), and ſaith that Theodorus Godefroy evidently proves, that Don Henry her huſband, was great-grandſon to Robert the devout, King of France (35). Father Anſelme, who eſpouſes the ſame opinion, refers us to Godefroy's tract concerning the original of the Kings of Portugal, printed in the year 1624. I have not this edition, but if it affords no ſtronger proofs than that printed in 1612, which I have juſt now examined, I dare venture to ſay, that learned Hiſtoriographer doth not evidently prove this genealogical aſſertion.

(31) See the article LAMECH, remark [E].

(32) Lequien de la Neufville, Hiſt. Générale de Portugal, Tom. i, pag. 84, Edit. of Paris, 700.

(33) Id. ibid. pag. 81.

(34) Ibid. pag. 71.

(35) Ibid. pag. 70.

URSINUS (a) (ZACHARY) one of the moſt celebrated Reformed Divines of the XVIth century, was born at Breſlaw, the capital city of Sileſia, on the eighteenth of July (b) 1534. He had already made a conſiderable progreſs for his age, when he was ſent to Wittemberg in the year 1550 [A]. There he ſtudied ſeven years; and his father not being rich, he was aſſiſted by public and private gratuities, and he had alſo recourſe to tutorſhip. He ſo cloſely followed his ſtudies, that at Wittemberg he acquired a great knowledge, as well in Poetry [B] and the languages, as in Philoſophy and Divinity. Melanchthon, the ornament of that univerſity, conceived a very particular eſteem and affection for him. Urſinus accompanied him in the year 1557, to the conference of Worms, from whence he went to Geneva, and afterwards to Paris, where he ſtayed ſome time in order to learn French, and perfect himſelf in the Hebrew under the learned John Mercerus. He had ſcarce returned to Melanchthon at Wittemberg, when he received letters from the magiſtrates of Breſlaw in September 1558, containing an offer of the Maſterſhip of their ſchool. He accepted it, and ſo worthily acquitted himſelf in that poſt, that he might have continued in it as long as he pleaſed, if it had not been for the perſecution which the miniſters raiſed againſt him, as ſoon as they diſcovered that he was not a perfect Lutheran. In effect, when he explained Melanchthon's book De examine ordinandorum ad Miniſterium, he treated the ſubject de Cæna Domini in ſuch a manner, that he gave occaſion to the Demagogues (ſo the author of his life calls them (c)) to term him Sacramentarian. He juſtified himſelf by writing down his ſentiments concerning Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper: but this attempt for the reſtoration of peace proving ineffectual, Urſinus who hated quarrels of this ſort, choſe rather to go away than to be embroiled in them; accordingly he obtained an honourable diſmiſſion of the magiſtrates, and it being impoſſible for him to retire to his dear maſter Melanchthon, who had been lately dead in April 1560, he went to Zurich, where Martyr, Bullinger, Simler, Geſner, and ſeveral other great men received him with the greateſt kindneſs. He was ſoon drawn from thence by the univerſity of Heidelberg, which then wanted a learned man. He reached that city in September 1561, and was ſettled in the Collegium Sapientiæ, to inſtruct the ſtudents who had their education there. He alſo attempted to preach [C], but finding himſelf ſcarce fit for the exerciſe of that function, he quitted all thoughts of it. The want of that talent, was fully made up by his

(a) This name is a tranſlation of the German word Bear, which was the name of his family, and is the ſame as the Latin word Urſus.

(b) Freherus ſays the 29th of June, tho' he follows the ſame author as I do. Bucholcer ſays alſo the 29th of June.

(c) Ibi ſtatim Urſinus Sacramentarius à Demagogis proclamatus, & adverſarios expertus eſt quos prius amicos & fautores habuerat. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 531.

[A] He was ſent to Wittemberg in the year 1550,] Melchior Adam is guilty of two contradictions in the ſame page (1). The firſt is, that Urſinus was ſent to the univerſity of Wittemberg at the age of ſixteen; the ſecond, that he entred Wittemberg on the firſt of May 1552. One of theſe particulars muſt neceſſarily be falſe, ſince the ſame author informs us, that Urſinus was born on the eighteenth of July in 1534. I reject the ſecond, tho' the author hath not expreſſed the year 1552 in numbers, but in words at length. Ingreſſus eſt Wittembergam anno quinquageſimo ſecundo, Kalendis Maii. The reaſon why I reject it, is becauſe he tells us alſo in the ſame page, that Urſinus having ſtudied above two years at Wittemberg, left it on account of the Plague, and went firſt to Torga whither Melanchthon was then retired, and afterwards to Breſlaw, carrying with him an advantageous teſtimonial from Melanchthon. Melchior Adam cites at large this teſtimonial dated on St James's day in the year 1552. He alſo mentions another, wherein the ſame Melanchthon on the firſt of October 1557, poſitively ſaith that Urſinus had been about ſeven years at Wittemberg. I have therefore reaſon to place his going thither in the year 1550, and to have more regard to the evidences that Melchior Adam hath furniſhed me with againſt himſelf than to his own text. We may very well infer from hence, that he did not much examine what he compiled. He hath confounded Urſinus's ſecond journey with the firſt; and Freherus, without either examining or rectifying any thing, barely ſaith that Urſinus went to Wittemberg in 1552. He cites the epitaph wrong, the year LXXXII is inſerted inſtead of LXXXIII, and the XIth of March inſtead of the VIth. At this rate how can one rely upon the printed copies of inſcriptions?

[B] He acquired a great knowledge . . . . in Poetry.] Urſinus, in his younger years, muſt needs have diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that particular; for I obſerve, that Melanchthon in his two teſtimonials, ſeems chiefly to value him on that head; and to confirm the praiſes which he beſtows on him in the firſt, he calls in as an evidence his Greek and Latin verſes that were publiſhed. Cùm extent Latina & Græca Carmina Zachariæ Urſini Uratiſlavienſis eruditè ſcripta, prudentes & docti viri lectis illis ſuo judicio probabunt ingenium, ſtudia, & voluntatem ejus, &c (2). Urſinus was then but eighteen years of age. He publiſhed, in 1560, a collection of epigrams, which he dedicated to John Friſius, in whoſe houſe he lodged at Zurich.

[C] He alſo attempted to preach.] Thuanus was miſinformed when he ſaid that the Proteſtants of the dioceſe of Cologn, aſſembled in the year 1582, to hear Zachary Urſinus, a preacher whom Prince John Caſimir had ſent them (3). Urſinus gave over preaching after a few eſſays, with which he himſelf was not pleaſed. Nor did he ſtir from Neuſtadt after he was eſtabliſhed there: beſides which, he was ſo broken and infirm in 1582, that he was by no means capable of exerciſing that function. It was John Stibelius who

(1) It is 529th of the volume containing the Lives of the German Divines.

(2) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. German. pag. 540.

(3) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. lxxvi.

his qualifications for a profeſſor; for he had a lively genius, a rich ſtock of knowledge, and a happy dexterity in clearing up matters. Wherefore keeping the preferment he had already, he was, beſides, made Profeſſor of the Common-places. In order to this the ſtatutes of the univerſity rendred it neceſſary for him to commence Doctor of Divinity; which he did ſolemnly on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt in the year 1562, and continued in the diſcharge of this poſt till 1568. He compoſed the Chatechiſm of the Palatinate, and by order of the Elector Palatine Frederic III, wrote an apology for it againſt the clamours which Flacius Illyricus, Heſhuſius, and ſome other rigid Lutherans publiſhed in 1563, on account of that work. The Elector finding himſelf not only expoſed to the complaints of the Lutheran Divines, but alſo to thoſe of ſome Princes, as if he had eſtabliſhed a doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, condemned by the Augſburg Confeſſion, was for that reaſon obliged to order an expoſition of the true doctrine concerning the ſacraments to be printed: this piece was written by our Urſinus, who, the following year (d), aſſiſted at the conference at Maulbrun, where he vigorouſly oppoſed the doctrine of Ubiquity. He afterwards wrote on that ſubject, and againſt ſeveral other Lutheran opinions. The plan and the ſtatutes which he drew up for that Elector in order to the eſtabliſhment of ſome ſchools, and ſeveral other ſervices, raiſed him ſo high in his eſteem, that ſeeing him reſolved to accept of the Divinity profeſſor's chair at Lauſanne in the year 1571, he wrote a long letter to him with his own hand, urging ſeveral reaſons to diſſuade him from it. The death of that Prince happening in 1577, occaſioned a great revolution in the Palatinate; for Prince Lewis, his eldeſt ſon, who ſucceeded him, would not ſuffer any miniſter there that was not a Lutheran. Urſinus, and the ſtudents whom he educated in the Collegium Sapientiæ, were obliged to depart (e). He retired to Neuſtadt, to be profeſſor of Divinity in the illuſtrious ſchool which Prince Caſimir the ſon of Frederic III, erected there at that time. He began his lectures there on the twenty-ſixth of May 1578. He alſo taught Logic in his chamber, publiſhed ſome books; and was preparing for the compoſition of ſeveral others, when his health, which had been impaired by ſeveral great indiſpoſitions ariſing from his incredible application to ſtudy, at laſt entirely ſunk under the weight of a tedious diſtemper, of which he died at Neuſtadt on the ſixth of March 1583, in the fourty-ninth year of his age. His works were collected after his death, as well by the care of his only ſon, who was a miniſter, as by the care of David Pareus and Quirinus Reuterus, his diſciples. To the laſt of theſe we owe their publication in three volumes. Urſinus was laborious [D], modeſt, paſſionate (f). As for readineſs in anſwering objections, he did not think he ought to aim at it; but he ſo contrived the matter, that if an explanation of any thing was ever demanded of him, it was done in writing at the end of his lecture, and he anſwered it the next day (g).

We have elſewhere (b) ſeen how fatiguing he found the direction of a college.

who went to the dioceſe of Cologn with Prince John Caſimir, as his Miniſter. Philip Pareus, his nephew (4), has obſerved this miſtake of Thuanus, and informs us at the ſame time, that this John Stibelius was afterwards Chaplain to the court of Heidelberg, and Counſellor to the Prince, and that he died in the year 1595, being the firſt Miniſter at Creutznac. It was probably the authority of Thuanus, which moved John Lætus, to repreſent Urſinus as one of the reformers of the Electorate of Cologne (5). Hofman following Lætus, makes him labour in this part of the Lord's vineyard. I ſay, following Lætus; for beſides, that he refers to him, he could not herein have been miſled by Moreri, who hath not ſaid any thing of Urſinus, (miſplaced under the name of Zachary,) unleſs that he was a Sileſian, and a Profeſſor at Heidelberg, who left behind him a great many books. He cites Geſner's Bibliotheque, which ſaith nothing of this author. He ought to have quoted the Epitome of that Bibliotheque. Several authors have committed the ſame miſtake.

[D] Urſinus was laborious.] To be convinced of this we need only conſider the inſcription which he had put upon the door of his ſtudy: it runs thus:

Amice, quiſquis huc venis
Aut agito paucis, aut abi,
Aut me laborantem adjuva (6).

Friend, whoſoe'er you be
That come to viſit me
Make quick diſpatch, and go away,
Or labour with me if you ſtay.

This was the reaſon that he paſſed for an ill-conditioned man (7).

Note, that Aldus Manutius, before him made uſe of a like inſcription. 'Nothing was more uneaſy to 'him than unprofitable viſits, which obliged him to 'loſe his time . . . to ſecure himſelf from which, in 'a civil manner, he cauſed to be writ over his cloſet 'door the following words: 'Quiſquis es, rogat te 'Aldus etiam atque etiam, ut ſi quid eſt quod à ſe 'velis, perpaucis agas, deinde actutùm abeas, niſi tan'quam Hercules veneris ſuppoſiturus humeros: ſemper 'enim erit quod & tu agas, & quotquot huc attule'rint pedes. - - - - Whoſoever you are, Aldus earneſtly 'begs of you that if you have any buſineſs with him, you 'would diſpatch it in a few words, and then leave him 'immediately, unleſs you come to his aſſiſtance, like Her'cules to relieve Atlas: for there will always be work 'enough for you, and for as many as ſhall enter here.' 'Theſe words that learned Greek Profeſſor, and af'terwards Printer at Baſil, John Oporinus, borrowed 'from him, and put them alſo on the door of his 'ſtudy (8).'

URSINUS (John) a French Phyſician, who flouriſhed in the XVIth century, wrote ſome Medicinal tracts in Latin verſe [A], and a Commentary on Cato's diſtichs (a). He

[A] He wrote ſeveral Medicinal tracts in Latin verſe.] He therefore deſerves, what he hath not, a place in the catalogue of poetical Phyſicians, publiſhed by Bartholinus. His Proſopopœia Animalium aliquot, is a poem in hexameter and pentameter verſe, in which he mentions ſeveral particulars, concerning the nature and quality of animals, more eſpecially as they belong to Phyſic. This book was printed at Vienne in

---

(d) That is in the year 1564.

(e) See, above, the text of the article PAREUS (David), after the citation (d).

(f) Fuit tamen ὀξύχολος, ut fit in ejuſmodi ingeniis. Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, p. 531.

(g) Taken from Melchior Adam, who wrote Urſinus's life from the Funeral Oration, which Francis Junius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Neuſtadt, ſpoke there, and from another Oration of Quirinus Reuterus.

(b) In the remark [D], of the article PAREUS (David).

(4) In Vita David. Parei, pag. m. 29. He calls Thuanus, Auguſtinus, inſtead of Auguſtus.

(5) Compend, Hiſtor. pag. m. 488.

(6) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(7) See what Junius ſays concerning this in Urſinus's Funeral Oration.

(8) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 234, He quotes James Zwinger, in the Theatrum Vitæ humanæ, at Baſil, 1604, pag. 3713.

(a) See the remark [B].

He is highly extolled by Stephen Royboſius Tulinus [B].

Dauphiné, in the year 1541, in 4to, with the Scholia of James Olivier, a Phyſician. And in the ſame city and year was printed his Elegiæ de Peſte eaque medicinæ parte quæ in victus ratione conſiſtit (1).

(1) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 509.

[B] He is highly extolled by Stephen Roybosius Tulinus.] His words cited by Reineſius, run thus. ‘Is eſt etenim, quo cum ſi congreſſus fueris, nihil ignotum homini eſſe putes. Mirus Poëta, eximius & bene fortunatus Medicus, Philoſophus ſummus, Orator facundus. Quorum documentum locupletiſſimum præſtant quæ de re medica carmine ſcripſit, eruditiſſima Comm. in Catonis libellum, ethologus elegans de moribus & alia plura quæ ſub ejus nomine circumferuntur (2). - - - He is ſuch a man, that if you were to converſe with him, you would think he knew every thing. He is an admirable Poet, an excellent and ſucceſsful Phyſician, a Philoſopher of the firſt rank, and an eloquent Orator. All this fully appears from his learned diſſertations upon Phyſic, in verſe, his Commentary upon Cato's Diſtichs, his elegant treatiſe of Morality, and ſeveral other pieces which are publiſhed under his name.’

(2) Reineſius, Epiſt. xli ad Daumium, pag. 118.

URSUS (Nicolas Raimarus) author of ſome Aſtronomical tracts, was born at Henſtede in Dithmarſen (a). He was a Swineherd in his youth, and did not begin to learn to read before the age of eighteen, when he diligently ſpent all his ſpare hours from keeping the hogs, in learning to read and write. After which, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the learned languages; and being endowed with a ſtrong genius, ſoon made a conſiderable progreſs in the Latin and Greek tongues. He alſo learned French, the Mathematics, Aſtronomy (b), and the other parts of Philoſophy, moſt of them without the aſſiſtance of any maſter [A]. Afterwards, leaving his own country, he gained his ſubſiſtence by the inſtruction of youth: it was the buſineſs he followed in Denmark, in the year 1584, and on the frontiers of Pomerania and Poland in 1585. In this laſt place, he invented a new Aſtronomical ſyſtem, not very different from that of Tycho Brahe. He communicated it in the following year to the Landgrave of Heſſe, whence there aroſe a violent conteſt betwixt him and Tycho Brahe [B], in which our Raimarus diſcovered that he ſtill retained the manners of his primitive occupation; for he fell into ſuch a brutiſh paſſion againſt Tycho, that he expoſed himſelf to a criminal proceſs [C]. He read private Mathematical lectures at Straſburgh in the year 1588, and in 1589, and alſo

(a) Part of the Duchy of Holſtein.

(b) Juſtus Burgius, Engineer to Philip and Maurice, Landgraves of Heſſe, taught him Mathematics and Aſtronomy.

[A] He learned . . . . . without the aſſiſtance of any maſter.] It was his good luck to make but one leap from the plough to the Republic of Letters, and he was not like others, obliged to ſerve an apprenticeſhip in the ſchools. Aliaſque ſcientias Philoſophicas, brevi, & pleraſque quidem αὐτοδίδακτος, ſibi reddidit familiares. Scholas enim, ut ipſe in Libro (1) paulo ante laudato, Ruſticum ſe vocans Dithmarſum, teſtatur, uti ſus hortum percurrit, & vix à limine ſalutavit, ſed à Stiva illico, ſingulari quodam fato ac genio, in Remp. literariam irrupit (2). This is an undeniable proof of great parts. His works afford ſeveral marks of his haſty ſtudies; and his learning was as ill digeſted as his ſtile was incorrect: ‘Homo certe fuit admodum ingenioſus, & in Antiquorum etiam lectione verſatus, ſed doctrinæ indigeſtæ, Styli haud ſatis caſtigati, & vere, quod Naſonis de Ennio eſt Judicium, Ingenio maximus, Arte rudis (3). - - - He was without doubt a very ingenious man, and well verſed in the Antients; but his learning was indigeſted, and his ſtile ſomewhat incorrect; and the character which Ovid gives Ennius might truly be applied to him,

> ‘A noble genius unimprov'd by art.

(1) De Syſtemate mundano.

(2) Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, pag. 629.

(3) Id. ibid.

[B] There aroſe a violent conteſt betwixt him and Tycho Brahe.] Tycho Brahe accuſed him of Plagiariſm. Urſus, ſaid he, coming with his maſter into my ſtudy, ſaw the ſcheme of my ſyſtem on a piece of paper, and not long after arrogated the invention to himſelf: Cum menſe Septembri verſaretur apud ipſum nobilis vir Ericus Langius, quidam illius famulus nomine Nicolaus Raymarus, Dithmarſus, delineatam hypotheſin quapiam in charta obiter vidit, ac ſibi quaſi à ſe in angulo Poloniæ quodam excogitatam arrogans, illam ut ſuam biennio poſt apud Landgravium venditavit; ubi & impudenter in Tychonem deblaterans repreſſus à Rothmanno fuit (4). Upon this charge, Urſus, in a book he publiſhed at Prague de Aſtronomicis Hypotheſibus, outrageouſly abuſed Tycho Brahe, who was touched to the quick with this ill uſage. Gaſſendus gives us the particulars of this ſtory. ‘Quia ſuperiore anno Raimarus Urſus, ille Dithmarſus, Librum Pragæ ediderat de Aſtronomicis Hypotheſibus, in quo Rothmannum quidem, & Roëſlinum variis probris onerat, ſed Tychonem innumeris, occaſione eorum, quæ de ſe in Epiſtolis ejus legerat: ideò, cùm ejuſmodi Liber ad Tychonis manus recens perveniſſet, iſthæc occaſione ipſius literis inſeruit, Vidiſti proculdubio Plagiarii mei, impuri illius Urſi, maledicentiſſimum ſcriptum, in quo præter alia innumera convitia, meo, & meorum honori non parcit. Ego quidem refutatione illum indignum cenſeo, cum omneis modeſtiæ limites, imò honeſtatis longè tranſcenderit: efficiam tamen, ut non impunè ferat (5). - - - - Raimarus Urſus, a native of Dithmarſen, had publiſhed the year before at Prague a book de Aſtronomicis Hypotheſibus, wherein he throws out various reproaches upon Rothmannus and Roëſlinus, but chiefly upon Tycho Brahe, on account of what he had ſaid of him in his letters. For that reaſon Tycho, ſoon after the book had come to his hands, took occaſion to inſert the following words in a letter. You have ſeen, no doubt, the ſcurrilous writing of my dirty Plagiary, Urſus, wherein, beſides innumerable other reproaches, he does not even ſpare the honour of me and my family. I for my part do not think him worthy of a confutation, ſince he has far exceeded all the bounds of modeſty, and even of honeſty: I will nevertheleſs take care to make him ſuffer for it.’ Theſe are Tycho's words in a letter to Longomontanus. But more on this head in the following remark.

(4) Gaſſendus, in Vita Tychon. lib. ii, pag. m. 411, ad ann. 1584. See alſo lib. iii, pag. 428.

(5) Gaſſend. ibid. lib. v, pag. 451, ad ann. 1597.

[C] He expoſed himſelf to a criminal proceſs.] In Tycho Brahe's Funeral Oration, we are told that a man of ſenſe and learning, but utterly void of religion or virtue, was not content to arrogate the Aſtronomical inventions of this great man to himſelf, but alſo barbarouſly injured his reputation with black calumnies. The Orator adds, that if his death had not put a ſtop to the proſecution commenced againſt him upon that account, he had been ſeverely puniſhed. This is ſaid of our Raimarus. Ante annos pauculos, quidam ingenioſus, & doctus, ſed abſque religione, & virtute homo, tetricum, & famoſum contra præſtantiſſimum hunc Virum divulgavit ſcriptum, quale in hoc genere non vidit antiquitas, nec fortaſſis ſpectatura eſt unquam poſteritas. Non ſat fuerat infamatori illi plagium committere litterarum, & Tychonis Hypotheſin, Uraniburgi repertam, falſariè pro proprio invento venditare, niſi etiam Virum aviti generis, ſummæ eruditionis, inculpatiſſimæ vitæ, cum tota ipſius honeſtiſſima familia, ſexcentis contumeliis, & totidem mendaciis, apud alios, ſi non deformatum, ſuſpectum ſaltem reddidiſſet. Et profectò jure actum cùm hoc fuiſſet, velut etiam jam agi cœptum fuerat, niſi mors feram illam ſingulari beneficio affeciſſet, & pœnæ ſubduxiſſet commeritiſſimæ (6). Gaſſendus quotes a fragment of a letter, by which it appears, that Tycho Brahe deſigned to proſecute his adverſary. His own words, which inform us that Raimarus Urſus eſcaped from Prague, run thus: ‘Cæterum de fera iſta Dithmarſica, nimis effera, & bruta, ut aliqua ſubjungam, licet indigna ſit, cujus recordetur, alſo publiſhed a book. After that he was called by his Imperial Majeſty, to teach the Mathematics at Prague. But he ſilently retired from that town to avoid the preſence of Tycho Brahe, in the year 1598, and died ſome time after (c). He was entirely unknown to Voſſius: I ſhall ſet down the titles of his works [D].

(6) Joann. Jeſſenius, in Orat. funebri Tychon. Brahei, apud Gaſſendum in Appendice Vitæ Tychonis, pag. 483.

(c) Taken from John Mollerus's book, intituled, Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, printed at Hamburgh in the year 1691, p. 628, 629, Part. iv. He quotes for moſt of thoſe things Ant. Heimreichius, in Catalogo Autorum Chronico Dithmarſico præfixo.

‘ recordetur, ſcias iſtam ante aliquot ſeptimanas, prout nuper reſcivi, Pragâ ſe ſubduxiſſe, ſive malè ſibi conſcia, & quòd juſtas pœnas per leges formidaret; ſive quid aliud ſinu ſuo latenter more ſuo ruminans. Sed inveſtiganda tamen ſuo tempore per otium, atque in jus pertrahenda, & punienda, quod etiam optimi quique Pragæ ſuadent (7). - - - - - As for this wild beaſt of Dithmarſen, who is indeed too ſavage and brutal, though he does not deſerve to be mentioned, yet I would have you to know that, as I have been lately informed, he left Prague ſome weeks ago; being either diſturbed by an evil conſcience, and dreading the juſt vengeance of the law, or elſe hatching, as his manner is, ſome new projects in his head. But care ſhall be taken to find him out ſome time or other, that he may be brought to juſtice and condign puniſhment; for ſo the beſt people of Prague adviſe me to do.’ To make the character of this quondam ſwineherd better known, I add that he had raiſed a report, that Rothmannus was dead of a ſcandalous diſtemper (8). Rothmannus appeared very zealous for Tycho Brahe, when he ſaw that Urſus calumniated him at the court of Heſſe: from that time they became utter enemies, and treated each other with the utmoſt violence. The following words were written by Rothmannus in the year 1586. ‘ Plura ſcriberem præſertim de impuro nebulone Nicolao Raymaro Urſo Dithmarſo, qui ſuperiori hyeme apud tuam Excellentiam typographicam literarum collectionem & ordinationem, ut opinor, exercuit (9). I ſhould ſay more of that ſorry fellow Nicolas Raimarus Urſus of Dithmarſen, who laſt winter, if I am not miſtaken, followed the buſineſs of collecting and diſpoſing the letters for the preſs at your Excellency's court.’ Fuerat ille quoque Rothmanno ea propter infenſus, quod Caſſellis tranſiens & Tychonem convitiis proſcindens repreſſus ab eo vehementer fuiſſet (10).

(7) Tycho Brahe, Epiſt. ad Longomontanum, apud Gaſſend. in Vita Tychon. lib. v, pag. 455.

(8) Rumorem ſparſerat fuiſſe ipſum pudendis neſcio quibus morbis pridem infectum, & tandem confectum. Gaſſend. ibid.

(9) Gaſſend. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

[D] I ſhall ſet down the titles of his works.] He publiſhed his fundamentum Aſtronomicum in the year 1589, at Straſburgh, at the expence of his pupils. His book de Aſtronomicis Hypotheſibus ſeu de Syſtemate mundi was printed at Prague in the year 1597, as was alſo Aſtronomicarum Hypotheſium à ſe inventarum Vindicatio & Defenſio: item Problemata totius proceſſus Aſtronomicæ obſervationis ſeu rationis obſervandi τὰ φαινόμενα (11). The Oxford catalogue mentions our Raimarus's Tetragoniſmus Circuli expeditiori ſtructura productus per Pet. Crugerum, printed at Leipſic 1607 in 4to. Mr Konig (12) aſcribes to him a book de Doctrina ſinuum & triangulorum, printed in 1588. Mr Mollerus (13) ſays that he never ſaw the book de Civitatibus in Dithmarſia Hanſeaticis, printed at Leipſic in the year 1563, and aſcribed to Raimarus Urſus by Albert Bartholinus and Lipenius. He doubts whether any ſuch work was ever publiſhed, by reaſon that there is not one town in the whole province of Dithmarſen which ever engaged in the Hanſeatic confederacy: ‘ Impoſitum illis eſſe à catalogis, quos frequenter exſcribunt, proletariis, conjecto (14). - - - I conjecture that they have been impoſed upon by the catalogues which are often wretchedly drawn up and tranſcribed.’ I do not know whether he carefully obſerved Bartholin's words, which run thus: Nicolau. Reimers. De Civitatibus Henſaticis in Dithmarſia, Gæodeſia Rantzoviana, Leipſic 1583 in 4to (15). Who can certainly conclude from hence that he ſpeaks of our Raimarus Urſus? Is it not more probable that he did not mean him? He was no Dane, nor author in Denmark; and therefore it is not probable that Bartholin ſhould put him into his catalogue. Nor is it true that Bartholin ſays that this book was printed at Leipſic in the year 1563.

(11) Mollerus, ubi ſupra, Part. iv, pag. 628.

(12) Bibliotheca vet. & nova, at the word Urſus. He ſpeaks of him as of another writer under the word Reimarus, and he mentions one Nicolas Reimarus, who writ Theatrum temporis, in fol.

(13) Iſagoge, &c. pag. 517.

(14) Ibid. pag. 628.

(15) Alb. Bartholinus, de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 109.

USHER (Henry) Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland in the beginning of the XVIIth century, ſpent a great deal of time in the compoſition of a book againſt Cardinal Bellarmin; but we are told that his wife forced the ſheets from him, and threw them into the fire, on pretence that the match was not equal betwixt a man burdened with children, and domeſtic affairs, and a perſon diſingaged from all worldly concerns. The author who relates this, and who may very well be ſuſpected, adds that Todd Biſhop of Down (a) being diſguſted at his wife, and deſirous to put her away, petitioned this Archbiſhop for a letter of divorce, but could not obtain it [A]. He conjectures that the ſole reaſon of this prelate's refuſal was the fear of diſpleaſing his wife, who would have been very uneaſy at any thing which tended to introduce the diſannulling of marriages, by reaſon ſhe might her ſelf at ſome time or other be in danger of falling under the like inconvenience. The reader may believe as much or as little of this as he pleaſes. I will not anſwer for the truth of it, and indeed I relate it for no other reaſon than to make way for the examination of a falſe ſuggeſtion of Father Garaſſe [B]. Obſerve

(a) In the Province of Ulſter.

[A] The author who relates this, and who may very well be ſuſpected, adds, &c. . . . . .] Henry Fitz Simon, an Iriſh Jeſuit, relates the matter thus: Toddus pſeudo-Epiſcopus Dunenſis in Ibernia, ſuæ conjugis ſeu verius ſcorti pertæſus . . . . . eam voluit repudiare. Acceſſit primò ſymmiſtam ſuum (ut loquuntur) totius Iberniæ Primatem, Henricum Uſsherum; libellum ab eo repudii acriter efflagitans. Nimirum fruſtrà, apud virum integerrimum ſcilicet, & apprimè uxoris (quæ illi viribus ſuis quam tenuiſſimis impar onus exantlanti, nempe multorum annorum elucubrationes contra Bellarminum, extorſit, tradiditque Vulcano, quod iniqua futura eſſet, ut ajebat, concertatio, inter hominem prolibus & domeſticis curis gravatum, & hominem omnis ſæcularis ſolicitudinis expertem) imperio, ac voluntati, obnoxium. Diſplicuiſſet autem matronæ gravi (abdominis centum pondio) divortii Miniſtralis cauſaria prætenſio, per quam ipſa fortè brevi, technis id generis Miniſtralibus, conjugali toro diſcluderetur (1).

(1) Henric. Fitz Simon Britannomach. Miniſtrorum, lib. iii, cap. vi, pag. 348.

[B] For the examination of a falſe ſuggeſtion of Father Garaſſe.] That author's ſtile is ſo well known that the burleſque expreſſions in the following quotation will not appear very ſurpriſing. ‘ The miniſters (ſaith he) as Humphredus tells us in the ſecond part of his Jeſuitiſm, accuſe the Jeſuits of Magic by reaſon of their learning. No wonder (ſay they) that the Jeſuits are learned ſince they are all Magicians, and learn all they know by diabolical aſſiſtance (2). . . . . . Let them remember the ſtory of an eminent Roman citizen, who was accuſed by his enemies that he made uſe of Sorcery to attract the fat and ſubſtance of the adjoining lands, by reaſon that he had always a much richer crop than any of his neighbours: a day being appointed, he brought before the court his oxen in good caſe, his ploughs in good repair, and his children well fed, and offered no other defence to the Judges than, Gentlemen, theſe are the charms I make uſe of, Hæc ſunt veneficia mea Quirites, nor can I further produce my ſweats, my waking nights, and toilſome days. I ſay the ſame thing to the Calviniſt and Lutheran miniſters; the Jeſuits are not embarraſſed with the family cares of the miniſters, they are not clogged with the long train of a wife and a whole neſt of miniſterial brats; their nocturnal reſt is not broken with the cries of ten or a dozen chits, nor are they interrupted in

(2) Garaſſe, Recherche des Recherches d'Eſtienne Paſquier, pag. 973, 974.

Obſerve that whilſt this Henry Uſher was only Archdeacon of Dublin, he was twice deputed to Queen Elizabeth, firſt on an affair relating to St Patrick's Church (b), and afterwards the day-time with the cares of maintaining fifteen or ſixteen craving famiſhed children; any more than they are diverted by uſury, luxury, and pleaſures. Hæc ſunt eorum veneficia. Theſe are their magical charms, of which I would willingly prepare an amulet to hang about the miniſters necks. I remember to have read in Conſtantine Baſſus's Geoponics in the fourteenth book page 380, that an honeſt countryman wiſhed to be informed of a charm to prevent the cats, rats, and ſnakes ever infeſting his pigeon houſe, and was anſwered by an anonymous author, that he knew a very effectual one to keep out the cats and rats. I. Said he, carefully ſhut your pigeon-houſe door. II. Open the windows as little as you can. III. Keep your walls tight and whole. IV. Stop up the chinks of the door, and I will engage neither cat nor rat ſhall enter your pigeon houſe. Accordingly I can oblige the Calviniſt miniſters with a good charm, that they may be as learned as the Jeſuits. 1. Let them diſcharge themſelves of their wives, and the brawls of a family. 2. Let them ſpend leſs time in combing their hair, tricking themſelves up, and ſetting their ſtarched bands and ruffs. 3. Let them more ſeriouſly apply themſelves to the ſtudy of the goſpel than of Rabelais; which advice is particularly directed to the miniſter Du Moulin. 4. Let not Chamier, Pother, Bonnet, Bonvouloir, and other miniſters fill themſelves with ſuch loads of wine and meat, in order to keep their minds more free and unclogged. . . . . . 5. If they take and make uſe of this amulet, and are endowed with as good capacities as the Jeſuits, I promiſe that they will become as learned as they (3).'

(b) The Cathedral of Dublin.

Before I make any reflexions on this paſſage, I ſhall look back to the original of the ſtory of the Roman citizen, who was accuſed of fertilizing his land by Sorcery. It is related by Pliny. ‘C. Furius Creſinus, ſays he (4), è ſervitute liberatus, cum in parvo admodum agello largiores multo fructus perciperet, quam ex ampliſſimis vicinitas, in invidia magna erat, ceu fruges alienas pelliceret veneficiis. Quamobrem a Sp. Albino curuli die dicta, metuens damnationem, cum in ſuffragium tribus oporteret ire, inſtrumentum ruſticum omne in forum attulit, & adduxit filiam validam, atque (ut ait Piſo) bene curatam ac veſtitam, ferramenta egregie facta, graves ligones, vomeres ponderoſos, boves ſaturos. Poſtea dixit: Veneficia mea, Quirites, hæc ſunt: nec poſſum vobis oſtendere, aut in forum adducere lucubrationes meas, vigiliaſque, & ſudores. Omnium ſententiis abſolutus itaque eſt. - - - Caius Furius Creſinus having recovered his liberty, was much envyed becauſe he reaped far more plentiful crops from a ſmall field than his neighbours did from very large ones, and it was given out that he attracted other peoples corn to himſelf by charms. Being therefore ſummoned to appear by the Ædile Spurius Albinus, and doubting the iſſue of the trial, when the votes of the tribes were to be called, he produced all his inſtruments of huſbandry in the Forum, and brought his daughter there in a vigorous ſtate of health, and (as Piſo ſays) well fed and cloathed, likewiſe his iron-tools extremely well faſhioned, his heavy ſpades, his ponderous plough-ſhares, and his oxen in good caſe. Afterwards addreſſing himſelf to the people, theſe, ſaid he, are the charms I make uſe of; nor can I further produce and ſhew you my ſweats, my waking nights, and my toilſome days. Upon this he was acquitted by the unanimous conſent of the people.' He doth not mention the time when this happened; but in general we may gueſs at it, becauſe it is very well known that Spurius Albinus here mentioned was Conſul in the year of Rome 568.

Take notice, by the by, that the antient Romans were ſo fully perſuaded that ſome Magic charms could remove the fruits of the earth from one place to another, that the laws of the twelve tables eſtabliſhed a great puniſhment againſt thoſe pretended enchanters. Mr Gravina, who to his polite literature has added the knowledge of the law, very juſtly laughs at this childiſh error. ‘Sequitur, ſays he (5), frugum incantatio; cum enim veteres illi omnium bonarum artium & diſciplinarum rudes putarent fruges carminibus magicis vel averti poſſe vel traduci (ut enim Tibullus ait, ideo Decemviri pro ſua puerili ac ridicula ſuperſtitione ſanxerunt, ut qui fruges excantaſſit, ſive Carminibus magicis creſcere prohibuerit, aut ſegetem alienam pellexerit, Cereri ſacer eſſet. - - - Next follows the incantation of corn. The Antients, being very ignorant of the Arts and Sciences, imagined that corn might be either blaſted or tranſported from one place to another by magical charms (for as Tibullus ſays,

Carmen vicinis fruges traducit ab agris.)

By charms the corn is from the neighb'ring fields Mov'd and tranſplanted.) . . . . . .

for this reaſon it was that the Decemvirs in their childiſh and ridiculous ſuperſtition made a law, that whoſoever ſhould enchant the corn, that is, hinder it from growing by magical charms, or remove it from his neighbour's field into his own, ſhould be devoted to Ceres.'

WHETHER ſingle men ſtudy better and write more good books than married men.

The reflexions which I deſign to make on Garaſſe's words will not concern his calumnies or comical hyperboles; I leave them to himſelf, and fix only on that which may in general confirm the maxim or principle of the wife of Henry Uſher, Primate of Ireland. That woman ſuppoſed that an author who had children was not able to hold up againſt a Monk. This maxim indeed appears ſomewhat probable in theory, but is falſe in practice; for it is eaſy to prove by numerous examples, that ſeveral perſons who have been clogged with the cares of a family have been very great authors, whether we conſider the quality or the quantity of their productions. If Garaſſe had writ judiciouſly, he would not have brought into play, Peter du Moulin and Daniel Chamier, two miniſters who were very fit examples to overthrow what he deſigned to eſtabliſh. They were both married and had children, and yet they wrote a great many good books, and glorioufly diſputed viva voce, and in their writings, with the beſt controverſiſts of the Romiſh party. The examples of ſeveral other miniſters might be added to theſe two. It may in general be affirmed that the maxim of the Primate's wife is ſo often contradicted and refuted by experience, that it ought by no means to paſs into a rule. For whatever is liable to ſo many exceptions doth not deſerve that name, and whoever would draw up a rule or aphoriſm upon ſuch a point, muſt neceſſarily make uſe of this limitation, all other things being equal, an author diſengaged from all domeſtic affairs will exceed one clogged with a wife and children. But who can ſuppoſe this equality, or where is it to be found? Compare an unmarried and a married writer together as long as you pleaſe, and if you find that the one hath not leſs wit, judgment or memory than the other, you will yet perceive that they are not perfectly alike in other particulars. The married man may prove more ſtudious and robuſt, and thereby make up for the diſtractions occaſioned by a thouſand petty domeſtic cares. He applies himſelf to ſtudy with more ardor after he hath diſpatched the affairs of his family; the ſtrength of his conſtitution and head allow him to ſtudy till midnight, and by that means to retrieve the loſt hours of the day. He is obliged to go abroad twice or thrice in the morning, and as often in the afternoon, but he returns to his ſtudy as ſoon as he can, and ſtudies with the greater ardency, becauſe he knows that he hath been and ſhall be interrupted. Four or five hours of ſuch a cloſe ſtudy are very well worth ſeven or eight of the common languid and lifeleſs labours of thoſe people, who have abundance of leiſure. They ſtudy at their eaſe, without hurrying or fatiguing themſelves, and reſt from time to time; nor are they ſo ſollicitous to avoid the idle ſpending of ſome hours: beſides, if they did not reſt themſelves, their way of going on may aptly be compared to that of a meſſenger, who without ever halting continually moves on his dull pace, but doth not reach the inn where he puts up at night ſooner than he, who after frequently ſtopping, mends his pace and ſets up a run.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 976, & ſeq.

(4) Plinius, lib. xviii, cap. vi, pag. m. 448. Note, that in chapter iv, of the xivth book, pag. m. 126, he ſays, that the Grammarian Palæmon, whoſe vineyards were very fruitful, was ſuſpected of witchcraft: litteris ejus altioribus contra id pigra vicinitate ſibi patrocinante. His neighbours excuſed their lazineſs upon that account.

(5) J. Vincentius Gravina, in Specimine priſci Juris, pag. 53, Opuſculorum, Editionis Romanæ, 1696, in 12mo.

afterwards for the foundation of the univerſity of Dublin. In both theſe commiſſions he was ſucceſsful (c).

(c) Taken from the life of James Uſher, in Collectione Bateſiana, pag. 735.

The latter is a lively image of the ſtudies of an active author, whoſe domeſtic cares frequently divert him from them.

Though ſome authors, who are free from avocations of this nature, ſtudy very hard, you will find on the other ſide that they want the natural endowments which others have, their frail conſtitution forcing them to ſtop. They find themſelves exhauſted, and are neceſſitated to keep from their ſtudies till a long repoſe hath recruited their loſt ſpirits. If they do not lie under this inconveniency, there are others which fall in their way, perhaps the want of books. A thouſand real obſtacles may be ſuppoſed which break in upon the equality, and compenſate the diſadvantage of interruptions: wherefore Garaſſe and Henry Uſher's wife advanced a very uncertain maxim. It is nevertheleſs true, that it may be ſaid of ſome authors, that they would have made a greater figure if they had lived ſingle, or that they would not have publiſhed ſo many excellent books, if they had been embarraſſed with a family. We may alſo aſſert, that ſeveral perſons buried in obſcurity had become very learned, if they had lived without a wife, miſtreſs, children, law-ſuits, &c.

Obſerve that the Monks have not ſo much leiſure as is imagined; the choir and breviary robs the ſtudious of a great deal of time; and if any of them diſtinguiſhes himſelf by learning or piety, he is loaded with confeſſions. He cannot exempt himſelf from the direction of conſciences, which frequently draws him from his ſtudy; he is obliged to give audience to a thouſand devout women, whoſe ſcruples often are very ridiculous and very odd. Bellarmin had not ſo much time as the Archbiſhop of Armagh's lady imagined. I find in a tract publiſhed in the year 1625, that 'Cardinal 'Bellarmin, of pious memory, frequently ſaid to the 'moſt illuſtrious Cardinal de la Roche-foucault, Mon'ſignore veramente ci ſono troppo Chriſtiani al mondo. 'I aſſure you that I am crowded with people and vi'ſits; and muſt own that I think there are too many 'Chriſtians in the world (6).'

(6) Francis de Fontaine, (it is a fictitious name which the Jeſuit Stephen Binet took. See Alegambe, p. 426) preacher to the king, Reſponſe aux Demandes d'un grand Prelat touchant la Hierarchie de l'Egliſe, & la juſte Défenſe des Privilegiez & des Religieux, p. 204, 205.

USHER (JAMES), nephew to the former, and Archbiſhop of Armagh, was one of the moſt illuſtrious prelates of the XVIIth century, as well with regard to his great piety and other virtues, as his profound learning. He was born at Dublin on the fourth of January 1580, and was taught to read by two aunts, though they were born blind: this is very particular. He made ſuch an expeditious progreſs in the ſciences, that at the age of eighteen he was able to diſpute with a famous Jeſuit, who, like a Goliath, challenged the Proteſtants [A]. He was ordained prieſt in the year 1601, though under the age preſcribed by the canons. He was choſen Divinity Profeſſor at Dublin about the year 1607, and exerciſed that employment for the ſpace of thirteen years. He choſe Bellarmin's controverſies for the ſubject of his lectures. He was conſecrated Biſhop of Meath in the year 1620, and Archbiſhop of Armagh in 1624 (a). He very vigorouſly oppoſed the deſign of the Lord Falkland, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, to permit the Papiſts

(a) Taken from his life, in Collectione Bateſiana.

[A] At the age of eighteen he was able to diſpute with a famous Jeſuit . . . . . who challenged the Proteſtants.] This Jeſuit was the ſame Henry-Fitz Simon, whom I have cited in the preceding article. He was kept priſoner in the caſtle of Dublin, but his confinement did not hinder his challenging all the Proteſtant Clergy to diſpute with him, and his fiercely engaging to maintain what they took for the weakeſt part of the Romiſh religion, and to attack what they thought the ſtrongeſt part of the Proteſtant doctrine. Donec ego, ſaith he (1), cauſæ bonitate ſuffultus, defendere quicquid inter nos infirmiſſimum, vel impugnare quicquid inter ipſos tutiſſimum reputant, in me reciperem. James Uſher, whilſt yet beardleſs, had the courage to enter the liſts with this old experienced ſtager, and we are aſſured that he vanquiſhed him. 'Cum Henrico Simonido Jeſuita, 'poſcente ſibi dari adverſarios in caſtro Dublinenſi de 'arce cauſæ ſuæ (ſcil. Antichriſto) ſæpius ita conflixit, 'imberbis juvenis cum veterano milite, ut & provacationis eum ſuæ pœniteret, & ſatis antagoniſtarum 'in uno hoc octodenario tyrone experiretur. Ipſum 'audite Jeſuitam in præfatione libri ſui quem de 'Britannomachia miniſtrorum placuit inſcribere. Pro'diit quidem ſemel, (inquit) octodenarius præcocis ſapien'tiæ juvenis, de abſtruſiſſimis rebus Theologicis, cum ad'huc Philoſophica ſtudia non eſſet emenſus, nec ephebis 'egreſſus, diſputandi avidus, &c. Quem poſtea cum 'adoleverat Acatholicorum doctiſſimum idem ille pro'nunciabat, amplum ſane & inſolitum ex id genus ad'verſarii ore teſtimonium (2). - - - When the Jeſuit 'Henry-Fitz Simon demanded that his adverſaries ſhould 'meet him in the caſtle of Dublin, this beardleſs youth 'entring the liſts with an old champion, had ſeveral diſ'putes with him touching the main point of his cauſe, 'viz. Antichriſt. The Jeſuit was ſo handled that he 'heartily repented his challenge, and found antagoniſts 'enough in this one youth, who was only eighteen years of 'age. Hear what he himſelf owns in the Preface to his 'book which he has thought fit to intitule, de Britanno'machia Miniſtrorum. Once, indeed, ſays he, there 'came forth a youth, not above eighteen years old, 'but of a forward underſtanding, who ſhewed a great 'eagerneſs to diſpute upon the moſt abſtruſe points of 'Divinity, tho' he has not as yet finiſhed his Philo'ſophical ſtudies, nor was arrived at the age of a man, '&c. When he was grown up, the ſame Jeſuit de'clared him to be the moſt learned of all the Proteſtants, 'which was truly a high and uncommon teſtimony from 'the mouth of ſuch an adverſary.' Pray obſerve the et cetera at the end of the citation out of the Jeſuit's Preface, and do not imagine that ſome words were omitted becauſe they were foreign to the ſubject; for they were only ſuppreſſed becauſe they are inconſiſtent with what was ſaid juſt before. The whole paſſage of Fitz Simon runs thus: Sed neque in ſpecula eminentem videre, neque in caſtris, clauſtriſque Stentoria ut agnoſcunt voce provocantem, exaudire voluerunt. Prodiit quidem ſemel in ſumma vocis vultuſque trepidatione, octodenarius præcocis ſapientiæ (non tamen malæ, ut videbatur indolis) juvenis, neſcio an auræ popularis cupidior, ſaltem de abſtruſiſſimis rebus Theologicis cum adhuc pholoſophica ſtudia non eſſet emenſus, nec Ephebis egreſſus, diſputandi avidus. Hunc autem juſſi ſuorum calculos adferre, quibus pugil ſeu agoniſta idoneus renunciaretur, & vel cum ipſo diſputationem me initurum. Sed ſicut ipſi eum minime tanto honore dignati ſunt, ità me viciſſim ſua deinceps præſentia dignatus ipſe non fuit (3). The Jeſuit aſſures us that he aſked this ſcholar, who trembling came to diſpute with him, Are you authorized by your ſuperiors? and that he offered, if he was, to enter the liſts with him; but the young man not being honoured with any ſuch commiſſion could produce no credentials, and never came again. Nevertheleſs it is aſſured in the life of Uſher, which I have already cited, that he frequently diſputed with this Jeſuit, and got the better of him. We read in another life of this Archbiſhop, that he engaged in this diſputation with the conſent of the whole univerſity, and that at the ſecond conference he overthrew and ſo ſilenced his antagoniſt, that, after that time, he never was bold enough to engage again, tho' provoked to it: Communi Academiæ conſenſu placuit Uſſerium, qui tum non niſi Artium Baccalaureus 18 aut 19 ætatis annum agebat, cum ipſo committere: qui utut ab initio ab antagoniſta ſuo fere pro puero ac deſpectui haberetur, poſt unum tamen alterumque colloquium adeo præ fidentiam ejus perdomuit, ut ad incitas ſe, certe ad ſilentium

(1) Henr. Fitz. Simon, Epiſt. dedicat. Britannomach. Miniſtrorum.

(2) Vita Jacobi Uſſerii, in Collectione Bateſiana, pag. 737.

(3) Fitz Simon, in Præfat. Britannom. pag. 14.

Papiſts the public exerciſe of their religion [B], provided they would pay the neceſſary ſums for the ſubſiſtence of the forces. He went to England in the year 1640, and never returned to Ireland, being hindred by the civil wars, which reduced him to a melancholy condition. He died at Rygate in Surrey on the twenty-firſt of March 1655. His wife, the daughter of Luke Challoner, Doctor of Divinity, died eighteen months before him, having been married to him the ſpace of forty years; he had one daughter who was married to Timothy Tyrrel Eſq; Governor of Cardiff in Wales. This article would have been much longer, and would have contained more particulars concerning the merit and the works of this great man, if I had not known that there is in Moreri, and yet more at large in the ſecond volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (b), a good abridgment of his life.

(b) From pag. 219, to pag. 244, in the extract of Uſher's letters, to which his life written by Mr Parr, has been prefixed. Another life of Uſher came out ſince, as you may ſee in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for January 1701, pag. 77.

lentium redactum mox agnoſceret, nec ulterius confligere, ne provocatus quidem auderet (4). Either the Jeſuit's relation, or that of the author of Uſher's life muſt of neceſſity contain ſome falſities.

[B] He oppoſed the deſign of the Lord Falkland . . . . to permit the Papiſts the public exerciſe of their religion.] The Lord Falkland propoſed this to the parliament of Ireland in the year 1626. Archbiſhop Uſher, who knew how fatal this would be to Ireland, aſſembled all the Biſhops of his province, and drew up a declaration, which they all ſigned. It imported, that conſidering the falſity of the doctrine and worſhip of the Papiſts, it would be a great ſin to permit the exerciſe of ſuch a religion. The writing which they ſigned was read in the pulpit, and put a ſtop to the toleration which the Lord Lieutenant deſigned to procure. All this is related in ſtronger terms, and more particularly, in this Latin paſſage: ‘Reverendiſſimus Primas facile perſpiciens ea res quam fatalis Hiberniæ futura eſſet, omnes ditionis ſuæ Epiſcopos convocavit, qui ejuſmodi indulgentiæ impietatem, ſubſcriptis nominibus, unanimi conſenſu in hanc fere ſententiam teſtati ſunt. Quod quum Papiſtarum religio ſuperſtitioſa eſſet ac idololatrica, fides erronea ac hæretica, Eccleſia utriuſque reſpectu Apoſtatica, liberum iis religionis ſuæ exercitium liberamque fidei ſuæ ac doctrinæ profeſſionem indulgere grave peccatum foret; tum quod hac ratione omnium Papiſmi ſuperſtitionum, idololatriarum, hæreſium, ac uno verbo abominationum ejus omnium, quin & perditionis omnium, quotquot in illius apoſtaſiæ diluvio perirent, culpa & reatu nos (aiunt) involveret, tum vero etiam quoniam hoc facere pecuniæ gratia nil aliud foret quam religionem vænum exponere, imo & animas pretio prodere quas ſalvator noſter Jeſus Chriſtus precioſo ſuo ſanguine redimere non dubitavit. Deum propterea veritatis comprecantes, ut vellet omnes, qui cum imperio erant, zelo Dei gloriæ & veræ religionis propagandæ ſtudio imbuere & contra Papiſmum, Superſtitionem, ac Idololatriam omnem fortes eos reddere, zelo affectos, & animo quam maxime obfirmatos. Epiſcopi duodecim omnino erant qui huic proteſtationi ſubſcripſerunt; quam Downhamus Derrienſis Epiſcopus, cum poſtea coram Falklandio & concilio prædicaret, media concione publice recitavit; quin & Reverendiſſimus Primas eandem proximo die Dominico coram eiſdem inter concionandum comprobavit; una innuens quam gravis ira Dei ob talem animorum propenſionem ei genti impenderet. Unde tandem effectum eſt ut ad alia conſilia deflecterent (5). - - - The moſt reverend Primate, eaſily perceiving how fatal ſuch a thing would be to Ireland, aſſembled all his Suffragans, who, with an unanimous conſent, drew up and ſigned a remonſtrance, wherein they declared how impious it would be to grant an indulgence of that nature, in words to the following purpoſe. That whereas the religion of the Papiſts was ſuperſtitious and idolatrous, their faith erroneous and heretical, and their Church in both reſpects guilty of apoſtacy, it would be a great ſin to indulge them in the free exerciſe of their religion, and in the free profeſſion of their faith and doctrine; both becauſe ſuch a thing would (as they ſaid) involve us in the guilt of all the ſuperſtitions, idolatries, hereſies, and, in one word, abominations of Popery; nay, what is more, make us acceſſary to the ruin of all ſuch as ſhould periſh in the flood of that apoſtacy, and likewiſe becauſe to do this for the ſake of money would be in effect ſetting religion to ſale, and even betraying for hire the ſouls which our Saviour JESUS CHRIST has been pleaſed to redeem with his precious blood. Wherefore they prayed the GOD of truth, that he would endow all ſuch as were in power with a zeal for the glory of GOD and the propagation of religion, and that he would fortify them againſt all Popery, ſuperſtition and idolatry, inſpiring them with zeal and reſolution. There were twelve Biſhops who ſubſcribed this remonſtrance, which Downham, Biſhop of Londonderry, when ſome time after he preached before the Lord Falkland, and the Council, took occaſion to read in the middle of his ſermon: nay, the reverend Archbiſhop himſelf did, the next Lord's-day, preaching before the ſame perſons, approve of the remonſtrances, inſinuating at the ſame time that the dreadful vengeance of GOD threatened that nation for entertaining ſuch a deſign; whence it came to paſs that other reſolutions were taken.’ It is obſervable that Archbiſhop Uſher and his dioceſans acted according to the moſt rigid principles of the enemies to Toleration; for they did not, like moderate men of that party, ground their declaration on political reaſons, but only on the nature of worſhip in the Romiſh communion, without ſo much as ever mentioning it's perſecuting ſpirit, the ſole reaſon urged by the very favourers of Toleration for not tolerating the Papiſts.

(4) Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1687, pag. 115, in the Extract of Uſher's Life, written by Mr Parr. Note that Saldenus de Libris, pag. 368, relying, as I think, upon this paſſage of the Acta Eruditorum, does ſo far exaggerate the thing as to affirm that the Jeſuit himſelf owned that he was nonpluſſed. Faſtidioſam viri præ fidentiam ita perdomuit, ut ad novum provocatus conflictum, declinavit, eum non tantum, ſed & ad ἐχεμυθίαν redactum ſe eſſe ipſe confeſſus ſit.

(5) Bateſ. Vita Uſſerii, ubi ſupra, pag. 742.

USSON, in Latin Ucio, or Uxo (a), a ſmall town in Auvergne a league diſtant from the river Allier (b), and ſix leagues from Clermont, formerly depended on the county of Brive (c). The caſtle of Uſſon is very ſtrong by reaſon of its ſituation on a high rock naturally cut into round pillars (d). Nothing hath made this place ſo famous as the long reſidence of Margaret de Valois wife of Henry IV. She lived there ſeveral years, not in order to do penance for her paſt leudneſs [A], but to plunge her ſelf deeper and deeper

(a) Hadr. Valeſius, Notit. Galliar. pag. 588.

(b) Baudrand, Geograph. Tom. ii, pag. 363.

(c) Valeſ. ubi ſupra.

(d) Coulon, Rivieres de France, Part. i, pag. 265.

[A] For her paſt leudneſs.] I have elſewhere (1) mentioned ſome part of her leud practices, taken from a book which introduces Henry IV, relating the ill conduct of his wife. The reſt of the narrative runs thus: ‘(2) Time . . . . provided her with ſeveral ſervants; la Molle, one of them, had cauſe to repent it, for under pretence of being concerned in a conſpiracy with which the Marſhals de Montmorency and de Coſſé were charged, he left his head at St Jean en Greve, in company with that of Coconas, where they did not grow muſty, nor were long expoſed to public view; for the night following, my good wife, and Madam de Nevers, her companion, Coconas's faithful miſtreſs, cauſed them to be taken down, and carrying them off in their coaches, buried them with their own hands in St Martin's chapel under Montmartre: and this death of la Molle drew ſhowers of tears from his miſtreſs, who ſighed and ſung her paſſionate grief for him under the name of Hyacinthus, notwithſtanding the frequent and nocturnal conſolations of Saint Luc, who afterwards came often incognito and diſguiſed to Nerac, till Buſſy made her forget the loſs, which has been made up to her, tho' he was reported to be more valiant and ſtout amongſt the men than amongſt the women (3), by reaſon of a ſort of cholic, which generally ſeized him at midnight. She being diſguſted, excited her appetite with variety of

(1) In the remark [D], of the third article NAVARRE.

(2) Divorce Satyrique, pag. m. 191.

(3) Add this to the examples, quoted above, in the remark [B], of the article HENRY IV.

deeper in her impurities [B]. Notwithſtanding which ſhe hath met with ſome panegyriſts, who compared this caſtle, conſidered as the place of her reſidence, to the mountain where JESUS CHRIST was transfigured. To the end that her conſolation might be perfect, ſaith one of them (e), ſhe deſired to ſee the court of Henry the Great . . . . . . and to leave her dear Uſſon, which had kept her for the ſpace of twenty years, during which time ſhe rendered

'of ſauces, and took up with Mr de Mayenne, a jolly bulky fellow, as voluptuous as herſelf; after which they remained very good friends on all occaſions, tho' not without a quarrel, which laſted for ſome time on account of a letter written to Mrs Vitry, in which he promiſed to prefer the ſun to the moon. . . . To her former lovers ſucceeded at ſeveral times, (for their great number will excuſe my miſplacing them) that good fellow the Viſcount de Turenne, whom like the reſt ſhe ſoon diſmiſſed, finding him diſproportionate in ſome part or other: ſhe compared him to empty clouds which have nothing but a bare ſuperficial appearance. The melancholy lover being in deſpair, after a farewel, accompanied with many tears, was going to ruin himſelf in ſome diſtant region, if I, who knew the ſecret, and for the good of the churches, pretended ignorance of it, had not expreſsly enjoined my chaſte wife to recal him: which ſhe did very much againſt her will, proudly wiſhing that ſome blockhead might break his neck on her account. But theſe fools are grown ſcarce ſince they are laughed at; for to eat one's hat-feather in a rage, like la Bole, and to throw an ink-bottle in a paſſion at the ladies eyes, as Clermont d'Amboiſe did, are ſilly frenzies and jealouſies, which were but too common amongſt us, and which I knew and clearly ſaw, conſenting to my own diſhonour, and giving them, by my patience, the courage and opportunity of offending. She knows it very well, as do ſeveral of you who have aſſiſted her in her diverſions; nor was I ſo blind in an affair ſo apparent as not to perceive, as well as others, that Clermont frequently kiſſed her in her petticoat only, at her chamber-door, when in the evening I either by playing or walking in the hall with my nobility, gave him an opportunity to get into her bed . . . (4) Her beauty drew to me crouds of gentlemen, and her good nature retained them: nor was there any well-born ſpark or handſome fellow, who once in his life had not been an humble ſervant to the Queen of Navarre, who never denied any, but like the poors box, received the offerings of all comers.' Add to this the paſſage cited from the ſame book in the article of this Queen (5).

[B] To plunge herſelf deeper and deeper in her impurities.] The paſſages juſt cited or pointed at, carry our Margaret no farther than Auvergne. Let us go on and hear the author who introduces Henry IV ſpeaking. '(6) The King her brother hearing of her flight . . . ſaid aloud in preſence of all thoſe who then ſaw him at dinner, the Gaſcoon ſparks being inſufficient to ſatiate the Queen of Navarre, ſhe is gone in queſt of the mule-drivers and tinkers of Auvergne . . . . This profligate woman being arrived at Carlat, where ſhe long continued, not only without canopy or bed of ſtate, but even without a ſufficient number of ſhifts for every day, began to caſt her eyes about, and to conſider to which of her domeſtics ſhe ſhould proſtitute her honour; and not to be idle, ſhe pitched upon her cook, being tired with waiting for Duras, whom ſhe had ſent to the King of Spain for money, tho' her confident fearing ſhe might deprive her of her own lover, continually inculcated the conſtancy and merit of the abſent gentleman. But her inſatiate deſire, like the ravenous appetite of a blood-hound, which enfeebles one that is not continually ſatisfied, could not bear this delay, nor that of Saint Vincent, who was gone home to avoid expences, ſhe took up with the wretched Aubiac, as being the beſt tricked up of all her domeſtics, whom ſhe raiſed from her ſtables to her chamber, and cauſed him to ride her, till her belly became plump and ſwelled like a foot-ball, and, in due time, diſgorged a boy, by the help of a Midwife, whom this ſpark's mother, out of pure love to her ſon, brought thither, and by the aſſiſtance of du May, the Phyſician, who, beſides the exerciſe of his profeſſion in curing her of an impoſthume in her backſide, ſerved her alſo in conveying this young prince Lyſander, wretchedly ſwaddled, to his nurſe in the neighbouring village of Eſcoubiac: this was done ſo ſoon after his birth, that the cold he endured by the way utterly prevented his ever hearing or ſpeaking: theſe imperfections deprived him of the love and care of his own mother, who forgetting the pleaſure of the conception, for a long time ſuffered him to keep geeſe in Gaſcogne, where Mrs d'Aubiac, his grandmother, (as long as ſhe lived) kept him from ſtarving, and after her, Geſilax de Firmaçon, her ſon-in-law, who at preſent ſhews this pledge of the crown, as a great rarity to all thoſe who come to ſee him at Birac, where he keeps him for a penſion of two hundred crowns, which Goute Raquette has for ſome time been employed to go to Uſſon and Paris in queſt of . . . . (7) Aubiac, a ſorry groom, red haired, and more ſpeckled than a trout, when he conſulted his glaſs, could never have promiſed himſelf to be one day found in bed with a daughter of France, as he was at Carlat, by Madam de Marie (8), who hit on this noble adventure by a too early good morrow to the Queen according to her cuſtom, which officious compliment ſhe yet paid for with the death of her huſband, whom this virtuous Princeſs, perfectly acquainted with the potions of her mother's country, cauſed to be poiſoned in hopes that being delivered from this obſtacle, and aſſiſted by the ſoldiers whom Romes, d'Aubiac's couſin, had raiſed in Gaſcogne, ſhe ſhould make her ſelf abſolute miſtreſs of the place, and ungratefully wreſt it out of their hands who had generouſly received and protected her . . . . (9). The guard being re-inforced, and her Gaſcogne auxiliaries diſcovered, ſhe was familiarly adviſed to leave that place, and take another lodging: which (being throughly terrified) ſhe did at that inſtant, departing with the ſame precipitancy and confuſion, with which ſhe came thither, and after travelling ſome days ſhe reached Ivoi, the palace of the Queen, her mother; where ſhe was ſcarce arrived, but by the King's command ſhe was, by the Marquis de Canillac, beſieged, and taken with her paramour, who was found meanly hid under ſeveral ordures without either beard or hair, his miſtreſs having ſo diſguiſed him with her own ſciſſars in order to ſave him . . . Canillac . . . . (10) preferring a paltry pleaſure to the faith which he owed to his maſter, danced after the pipe, and ſuffered himſelf to be carried away by the artifices of his priſoner, and forgetting his duty, as well as quitting all pretenſions to the making of his fortune, he became enamoured of the Queen, and ſo very jealous that he ſacrificed poor Aubiac to his ſuſpicions, cauſing his indictment to be drawn up by Lugoly, and afterwards had him hanged at Aigueperſe, at which time, inſtead of conſidering his ſalvation, and the ſtate of his ſoul, he kiſſed a blue velvet muff which he had yet remaining of the benefactions of his lady . . . . Canillac having rather executed his jealouſy than my vengeance on this criminal, did not fail to caſt glances at her, and the little gentleman began to grow extraordinary careful of his dreſs, inſomuch, that in a little time, from as great a ſloven as my ſelf, he was as nicely ſet out as an amorous country beau: but at length what did his dreſs avail him? His inconſtant fair one, whoſe levity he propoſed to keep under lock and key, encloſed within the impregnable fortreſs of Uſſon, would become miſtreſs, and indulge her appetite to the higheſt with its uſual variety: to compaſs this, knowing by experience the power of voluptuous deſires, ſhe feigns to return love for love; and yields to the importunity of ſeveral addreſſes, after which ſhe ſo wrought on, and influenced, her guardian, that at laſt by her artificial careſſes ſhe obtained her liberty, by endearing promiſes that the favours which hitherto ſhe ſeemed to grant but ſparingly, and by force, ſhould be prodigally beſtowed out of choice, when ſhe came

'to

(e) Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames illuſtres, Tom. ii, pag. 306.

(4) Divorce Satyrique, p. 194.

(5) Citat. (76), of the third article NAVARRE.

(6) Divorce Sat. pag. 198.

(7) Ibid. pag. 200.

(8) The author means the ſame keeper of the caſtle, whom he calls Marze, pag. 197.

(9) Divorce Satyrique, pag. 201, 202.

(10) Ibid. pag. 203.

rendered that ſtrong caſtle of Auvergne a Tabor by her devotion, a Libanus by her ſolitude, an Olympus by her exerciſes, a Parnaſſus by her Muſes, and a Caucaſus on account of her afflictions. It would have ſavoured much leſs of calumny to have compared that place with the iſland of Caprea, Tiberius's retirement, than it ſavours of flattery to compare it to a place of devotion, and a Holy Temple of God, as another panegyriſt does [C]. If this lady's leudneſs were only mentioned in the Divorce Satyrique, or in ſome other libel, we

'to be free and abſolute miſtreſs of Uſſon. She deluded her ſpark in that manner; for the garriſon had ſcarce voided the place, before ſhe filled it with her own creatures, whilſt the eaſy Marquis retired to St Cirque to gather his apples; and ſhe proved ſo ungrateful to this ſervant of her's, that ſhe could not endure even the bare naming of him: being heartened by ſeveral men ſent to her from Orleans, and who ſoon after were like to treat her according to her wiſhes, ſhe then reſolved to follow her own will, and eſtabliſh an empire of pleaſure within this rock, where ſecurely encloſed by three walls, and all the great gates being walled up, God, and all France know what delicious games were played and practiſed there for the ſpace of twenty years. Aretin's Nanna and his holy woman are nothing to it. It is indeed true that inſtead of the gallants, who formerly uſed to ſweeten her life, ſhe was obliged for want of better to make uſe of her domeſtics, Secretaries, Muſicians, and mongrels of the nobility, whom ſhe drew to her by preſents, whoſe families and names unknown to their very neighbours, are unworthy of my remembrance, except only the famous Pominy, the ſon of a Tinker in Auvergne, who being taken from the cathedral church, where he was one of the ſinging boys, and being diſtinguiſhed from his equals by a fine voice, was preferred to this Queen's Muſic, and at laſt from the chapel to the chamber, and from the chamber to the cloſet, becoming her Secretary . . . . (11). It was upon his account that the bedſteads of her ladies at Uſſon, were raiſed ſo high, that ſhe might ſee under them without ſtooping, and not be obliged to crawl on all four in ſearch of him, as ſhe was wont to do to the great prejudice of her back parts. It was he whom ſhe often groped for behind the hangings, expecting to find him there, and it was in too eager queſt of him that ſhe frequently hurt her face, by running it againſt the walls and doors.'

I omit whatever concerns the amours which the author pretends (12) ſhe was engaged in at Paris, after ſhe left Uſſon. But it will not be improper to ſee here a paſſage of Hilarion de Coſte, which, as to ſeveral facts, may ſerve for a confirmation of the narrative we find in the Divorce Satirique. 'She left Agen in the habit of a plain citizen's wife, riding on horſeback behind Lignerac, on whom ſhe beſtowed the name of Knight of the Fine Flower, and fled the whole night, enduring a fatigue which tried her courage at the peril of her health. De Marſes came to meet her on the frontiers, accompanied with one hundred gentlemen, and lodging her at his manſion-houſe of Carlat, returned to Agen in order to ſecure her jewels, and the ſcattered remains of her retinue: and after the expiration of eighteen months, his death occaſioned her leaving that place, and taking up her ſtation at Yboi, a palace belonging to the Queen, her mother, where ſhe was arreſted. The thunder of the King's rage, threatning her every where, ſpared the ſacred lilies, which ſurrounded her head, but put one of her ſervants to an ignominious death at Aigueperſe. The Marquis de Canillac conveyed her to, and impriſoned her at, Uſſon; but ſoon after this nobly deſcended Lord became the captive of his priſoner: he thought he had triumphed over her, and the bare ſight of her hands, whiter than ivory, vanquiſhed him; after which he lived on nothing elſe but the favour of the victorious eyes of his charming captive. But the King's threats, the fear of death, the apprehenſion of deſtroying his fortune, and of the ruin of his houſe, made deeper impreſſions in his mind than any other conſideration, and forced him to uſe rigorous and ſevere commands againſt her. The protection of God, her own prudence and addreſs, together with the ſeaſonable aſſiſtance of the Duke of Guiſe, ſo happily ſnatched her from the ſhadows of death, that at the very inſtant when ſhe expected to die a captive, ſhe found her ſelf ſecure to reign free in that ſtrong place, from whence ſhe diſlodged them, who had fixed her there, and convinced them that virtue and valour make no diſtinction of ſexes (13).' You may ſee that this Monk owns whatever he thinks he may own without being obliged to blame her.

[C] Compare the caſtle of Uſſon . . . . to a holy temple of GOD, as another panegyriſt does.] This author was John Darnalt, the King's Attorney in the preſidial of Agen. Some parts of his elogy on this Queen run thus: 'It is very true, ſaith he (14), that her Majeſty, ſince ſhe is in that place (15), moſt ſtrictly obſerves a very laudable cuſtom. After having moderately recreated her ſelf with the exerciſe of the Muſes, ſhe ſpends the greateſt part of her time retired in her chapel, offering up zealous and fervent prayers to God, and communicating once or twice every week: is not this, ſtellis inſedere & concilio Jovis? - - - To ſit upon the ſtars, and in the council of Jove? Oh Phœnix! who by extending your wings, elevate the eyes of your underſtanding to the great bright cœleſtial ſtar, by the light of which you ſee, live, and revive in it. Phœnix! who are daily born again out of your own aſhes, flaming and conſuming your ſelf in the Divine love. Great Princeſs and Queen, who have neither motion, life, nor light, but that which you receive from this primitive light. You live a life different from that of mankind. We read that the bright and noble ſouls of the Elyſian fields, before they made their laſt flight

Illuc, unde negant redire quemquam,

To that ſame place whence none returns, to the ſeat of perfect bliſs, and eternal joy and delight,

Fortunatorum nemorum, ſedeſque beatas,

The happy groves and manſions of the bleſs'd, were for a time purified in a clear air, and freed from all manner of corruption. So this moſt noble royal ſoul retired to the Elyſian caſtle of Huſſon, and before her entrance into the glory of the heavens, was willing to make neighbouring approaches to them, and began to take her flight that way: having learned the exerciſe of the contemplative life, and how to ſeparate her bleſſed ſoul, from her moſt perfect body, in order to die well. For according to Plato τὸ μελέτημα αὐτὸ τοῦτο ἐστὶ τῶν φιλοσόφων, λύσις καὶ χωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ σώματος *. It is the ſtudy of a wiſe man to diſentangle and ſeparate the ſoul from the body. She is Jupiter's divine eagle, which contemplates and looks with a fixed eye, from an exalted place near the heavens, at the ſolar rays of the Divine goodneſs and providence . . . . (16). Thou rock of Huſſon, the honour and wonder of Auvergne, whoſe ſnow melts by the eyes, or more properly by the rays of this almoſt adorable terreſtrial deity! Rock, on which the light perpetually ſhines, where the day never fails, but the rays of the royal preſence are perpetually reſplendant, and illuminate that place and the circumjacent region! . . . (17) Fair ſtar of Europe, which is fixed at, and never ſtirs from Huſſon! Huſſon the royal reſidence of the laſt race . . . . of Valois . . . (18) Pious and religious habitation, thou holy temple of God, which ſerveſt not as an inviolable ſanctuary, or aſyle of refuge, but like righteous Noah's ark, has afforded her Majeſty a retreat from the inundations and ravages of France . . . . (19) I cannot yet leave Huſſon, that mountain crowned with this royal caſtle, that holy hermitage, and devout monaſtery where her Majeſty ſequeſters her ſelf

(11) Ibid. pag. 205.

(12) Ibid. pag. 210, & ſeq.

(13) Hilar. de Coſte, Elog. des Dames illuſtr. Tom. ii, pag. 301, 302.

(14) John Darnalt, Antiquitez d'Agen, chap. xxii, fol. 124, verſo.

(15) That is, in Uſſon Caſtle.

* In Phædone.

(16) Id. ibid. fol. 125, verſo.

(17) Id. ibid. fol. 126.

(18) Id. ibid. verſo.

(19) Id. ibid. fol. 127.

we might juſtly ſuſpect the truth of it; but ſince celebrated Hiſtorians are not ſilent on this head [D], we ought to believe the truth of the fact. Scipio Du Pleix is the perſon that ‘ ſelf to ſtudy and meditation which only tends to the end of ends, and the moſt perfect end. Thou rock art an evidence of the voluntary, moſt laudable and religious ſolitude of this princeſs; a place which for the tranſcendent harmony of its Muſic, and the melodious ſongs of the fineſt voices in France, ſeems the only terreſtrial paradiſe, and here her Majeſty taſtes that contentment and eaſe of mind, which the bleſſed enjoy in the other world.’

Obſerve that Mr de Perefixe is in the wrong to ſay, that Margaret voluntarily ſhut up her ſelf in the caſtle of Uſſon (20).

[D] Celebrated Hiſtorians are not ſilent on this head.] I have mentioned in another place of this Dictio- (21) what d'Aubigné ſays, not in a ſatire, but in his Univerſal Hiſtory, I have alſo quoted a paſſage out of Mezerai (22), and the reader has been told (23) that Varillas relates the ſame things. But I ſhall further quote a more credible Hiſtorian in this particular, by reaſon he was devoted to Catherine de Medicis, and conſequently not at all inclined to excuſe the conduct of the King of Navarre. I mean Davila, who acknowledges that this Prince did in a manner divorce his conſort, by reaſon of her ſcandalous reputation of unchaſtity. And he alſo owns that in her retreat ſhe led a looſe life: ‘ Movevalo grandemente il riſpetto della Reina Margherita ſua moglie, perche havendola per la fama delle ſue impudicitie, come repudiata, & eſſendoſi lei ritirata in Overnia a certi ſuoi caſtelli a vivere con libertà molto licentioſa, vedeva neceſſariemente, ò convenire riceverla di nuovo all' unione del ſuo matrimonio, ò non poter mai ſtare in ſincera amicitia, & in intera confidenza con la ſuocera, e co'l cognato (24). - - - - The conſideration of Margaret, his Queen, had great weight with him, becauſe having in a manner divorced her on account of her ſcandalous leudneſs, and ſhe being retired to ſome of her own caſtles in Auvergne, in order to live very licentiouſly, he ſaw that he ſhould either be obliged to take her back again, or elſe that he never could maintain a ſincere friendſhip, and an entire confidence with his mother and brother-in-law.’ He repeats almoſt the ſame thing in another place of his book: ‘ La quale (Reina Margherita) havendo abbandonata ſe ſteſſa a vita licentioſa per reſpetto de' riſſentimenti del marito, ſi era fuggita da lui, ma pervenuta per ordine ſuo, e per commiſſione del Rè ſuo fratello, ella fù poſta nel caſtello di Carlat in Overnia come prigione, e di là dopò qualche tempo traſferita ad Uſſone nella medeſima Provincia ſotto alla cuſtodia del Marcheſe di Canigliac; il quale come ſi diceva, fatto prigione della ſua prigioniera l'haveva ripoſta in liberta, onde ella trattenendoſi in alcune ſue caſtella pur in Overnia, e continuando l'iſteſſo modo di vite, era di grandiſſimo oſtacolo alle conventioni, che trà il marito, & il fratello poteſſero contrattarſi (25). - - - - Queen Margaret having given her ſelf up to a licentious life, and dreading her huſband's reſentment, had run away from him, but being arrived in Auvergne, ſhe was by his order, and by a commiſſion from the King, her brother, confined to the caſtle of Carlat, and from thence ſhe was ſome time after tranſported to Uſſon in the ſame province, under the cuſtody of the Marquis de Canillac. He, as it was reported, being captivated with the charms of his priſoner, ſet her at liberty; after which ſhe lived in ſome of her own caſtles in Auvergne, and continuing the ſame courſe of life ſhe was a very great obſtacle to any agreement that might have been made between her huſband and brother.’

There are ſome faults in this relation of Davila. I. It is not true that Queen Margaret retired to Auvergne in order to live licentiouſly. She lived every where in the ſame manner, and ſhe would have found her account better at Agen from whence ſhe fled, than in Auvergne whither ſhe retired. The truth is, that the fear of being ſeized at Agen was the cauſe of her departure thence (26), and if ſhe ſheltered her ſelf rather in Auverge than in any other place, it was not owing to her free choice, but pure neceſſity. Lignerac, her conductor, had no other place proper for refuge (27). II. It is not true that ſhe retired into ſome caſtles belonging to her. III. Nor is it true that ſhe was impriſoned at Carlat by order of her huſband, and by a commiſſion from Henry III. Her conductor's brother, purſuant to her own deſire, received her (28). It may be that afterwards the governor of the place received orders to be anſwerable for his gueſt, and ſecure her (29); but this doth not excuſe Davila. IV. It is falſe, that being ſet at liberty by the Marquis de Canillac, ſhe retired to one of her own ſeats. V. One of theſe paſſages of Davila is refuted by the other; for if ſhe retired to her ſeat when ſhe broke with her huſband, as we are told in the firſt paſſage, what is affirmed in the ſecond, that ſhe did not retreat thither till after ſhe was ſet at liberty by the Marquis de Canillac, is not true. Mr de Beauvais Nangis (30) hath cenſured only this laſt of Davila's errors, and hath given his approbation to all the reſt. But theſe ſmall miſtakes are no juſt reaſons againſt our believing this famous Hiſtorian, when he tells us that Henry III and Catherine de Medicis reſolved to annul the King of Navarre's marriage, and abandon Margaret as unworthy of being acknowledged of their blood. ‘ Deliberarono finalmente, che non era da tener più conto della perſona di Margherita, reſaſi da ſe ſteſſa poco degna d'eſſer da loro riconoſciuta, nè per ſorella, nè per figliuola, e che, poiche la diſpenſa difettoſa ottenuta dal Pontefice al tempo del ſuo matrimonio, porgeva cauſa, e preteſto a poterlo diſciogliere, ſi doueſſe fare queſto divortio, e dar per moglie al Rè di Navarra Chriſtiana figliuola del Duca di Loreno (31). - - - At laſt they concluded that no further regard was to be had to the perſon of Margaret, ſhe having rendered herſelf unworthy to be acknowledged by them either as a ſiſter or daughter; and that ſince there was a flaw in the diſpenſation obtained from the Pope at the time of her marriage, this divorce ſhould be made, and the King of Navarre ſhould marry Chriſtian daughter to the Duke of Lorrain.’ The Ambaſſador Buſbequius, whoſe authority is as good as that of an Hiſtorian, in a letter written from Paris to his Imperial Majeſty, dated the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, in the year 1583, expreſſes himſelf thus: ‘ Rex ſororem ſuam, Reginam Navarræ, palàm multis audientibus graviter increpuit, quòd vitam degeret turpem, & flagitiis contaminatam. Commemorat memoriter mœchorum introductiones, quibus illa conſueviſſet. Etiam puerum ſine mariti opera natum objectavit, eaque omnia ſuis temporibus, & reliquis rebus ita notata, ut ipſe interfuiſſe videretur, & Reginam ea magis confiteri puderet, quàm confutare poſſet. Finis orationis fuit, ut eam ſtatim Lutetiâ migrare juberet, urbemque ſuâ contagione liberaret. Sic, illa, collectis raptim ſarcinis, die ſequenti, non modò ſine ullo proſequentium officio, ſed ſine juſto etiam famulitio, Lutetiâ exceſſit (32). - - - - The King ſeverely rebuked his ſiſter, the Queen of Navarre, before a great deal of company, on account of her leud and infamous way of life. He put her in mind of the intrigues which ſhe had carried on with her adulterers. He likewiſe upbraided her with having had a boy by one of them. All theſe things he ſet forth in ſuch a particular manner, both as to their times and circumſtances, that he ſeemed to have been an eye-witneſs of them, and the Queen was rather aſhamed to own than able to anſwer the charge. He concluded his diſcourſe with ordering her to leave Paris immediately, and to rid the city of her infection. Upon this ſhe packed up her things in a hurry, and the very next day went out of Paris, being not only deſtitute of all ſuch attendance as follow out of reſpect and ceremony, but wanting even a proper number of ſervants.’ You ſee here that Henry III not only particularized the circumſtances of his ſiſter's adulteries, but alſo charged her with being delivered of a baſtard. This author adds, that after this reprimand, Chanvalon, a very handſome young gentleman, who paſſed for one of Margaret's favourite gallants (33) retired into Germany. He had loſt the favour of the Duke of Alençon (34), on account of ſome letters which he wrote from Antwerp, but according to others for bragging of the favours of a great lady. Read Varillas's words: The Lord, who, above all others in the kingdom, made the moſt regular court to Queen Margaret, was James de Harlay-Chanvalon, who had formerly followed the Duke of Anjou into Flanders, where he that has given the moſt particular account of it [E]: for this he was blamed, and juſtified himſelf: I ſhall examine whether the Marſhal de Baſſompierre's anger is juſt [F]. However that be, we may ſay that the makers of elogies are much leſs to be excuſed, ſince

---

(20) Perefixe, Hiſtoire d'Henri le Grand, ad ann. 1599, pag. m. 301.

(21) In the third article NAVARRE, citation (q). See alſo d'Aubigné, Tom. iii, pag. 641.

(22) Ibid. citation (47).

(23) Ibid. citation (48).

(24) Davila, lib. vii, pag. m. 379, ad ann. 1585.

(25) Idem, lib. viii, pag. 432, ad ann. 1586.

(26) Brant. Dames illuſtres. See his words in citation (74), of the third article NAVARRE.

(27) See citation (76), ibid. and citation (14), in the preceding page.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Conſult Brantome, in his diſcourſe on that Queen, pag. 421, Edit. 1699, & d'Aubigné, in Tom. iii, of his Hiſtory, book v, chap. iv, pag. 641, where he ſeems to contradict what he advances in the Divorce Satyr.

(30) In his remarks upon Davila, pag. 144, 149.

(31) Davila, lib. viii, pag. 432, ad ann. 1586.

(32) Buſbequius, Epiſt. xxiii ad Rudolphum II, Imperatorem, pag. m. 517.

(33) Chanvallonius juvenis eſt dubiæ nobilitatis, ſuavitate morum, ætatis flore, & formæ venuſtate præſtans, habitus inter primos ejus Reginæ procos. Id. ibid. pag. 518.

(34) Id. ibid.

he gave proofs of his valour on ſeveral occaſions. This Duke frequently received him at his table: but he not being ſo diſcreet as he ſhould have been, one day dropped ſome boaſting expreſſions concerning the good fortune which his beauty and good mien had obtained from one of the greateſt ladies of the court of France. The Duke of Anjou hearing him, baniſhed him from his table, and even from the Low-Countries; and it was but one year ſince Chanvalon was returned from thence. Being not very welcome to the King, becauſe the favourites did not look kindly upon thoſe who had declared for the Duke of Anjou; he applied himſelf to the ſervice of the Queen of Navarre, from which the favourites took occaſion to publiſh that love was the ſole cauſe of it: and as nothing could be ſaid of the King's ſiſter ſo ſcandalous but he believed it; he gave ſo much credit to this report that he baniſhed Chanvalon from her, without taking care to cover this with ſome pretence, that it might not reflect upon her. It alſo appears that the King publickly complained to his ſiſter of her way of living with Chanvalon (35). But now let us turn our eyes to the relation of Du Pleix the Hiſtorian: and we ſhall find amongſt other particulars, that Queen Margaret had a child by Chanvalon.

[E] Scipio Du Pleix is the perſon that has given the moſt particular account of it.] I ſhall collect together what this author hath diſperſed in ſeveral places: and begin with theſe words, The King of Navarre . . . . . made love to the maids of Queen Margaret his wife, which ſhe ſuffered the more patiently, by reaſon her huſband did not controul her own actions: though ſhe complains in her Memoirs, that her maids had done her ill offices with reſpect to him. But this ſhe ſays in order to cover the ſins which ſhe had been guilty of againſt the laws of marriage. Written words cannot bluſh; but I ſhould bluſh whilſt writing, if I ſhould ſet down what I have heard her ſay ſeriouſly about it. She was certainly a Princeſs enriched with excellent and perfectly royal endowments; but ſhe had alſo great weakneſſes, as well as ſome ill habits. Perhaps I may ſpeak of it more largely and more properly in the reign of Henry the Great, when my ſubject will oblige me more particularly to it, though with regret, having had the honour to belong to her houſhold for ſix years, and to be always favourably treated by that illuſtrious Princeſs (36). What follows ſtrikes with horror: ‘Henry III . . . . treated his ſiſters with fraternal tenderneſs, but at laſt hated Margaret Queen of Navarre, as well becauſe ſhe did not live well with her huſband, as by reaſon ſhe was a continual accomplice in all the conſpiracies of the Duke of Alençon. Notwithſtanding this he always ſhewed himſelf more indulgent to pardon than ſevere to puniſh them, till Margaret (either in jeſt or earneſt) let fall an inceſtuous expreſſion to Queen Louïſe his Majeſty's wife. For this good King finding himſelf touched in a particular, which moſt ſenſibly affects generous ſouls, never after looked favourably on that brother, or that incorrigible ſiſter. The perfectly chaſte and virtuous Princeſs Louïſe hearing this infamous diſcourſe of her ſiſter-in-law, ſuddainly ſtopped her mouth, by very modeſtly ſaying, as though ſhe did not take it ſeriouſly, pray, ſiſter, rally more agreeably. But yet dreading the artifices of her malice, ſhe related the immodeſty of her ſiſter to the King, which very ſenſibly incenſed him againſt her and his brother, and he loved Louïſe the more tenderly for it (37).’ When Du-Pleix tells the reaſons which Henry IV, had to ſue for a diſſolution of his marriage, he expreſſes himſelf thus (38): ‘The VI nullity was founded on the manners of Queen Margaret, which were equally inſupportable and manifeſt to the whole world; yet he did not urge this in order to obtain her conſent to the diſſolution and annulling of their marriage. But the Pope and the ſacred Conſiſtory being ſufficiently informed of it, did highly commend the goodneſs of the King, who being able to convict, and cauſe her juſtly to be puniſhed, (as ſome of his council adviſed) choſe rather to procure the liberty of a ſecond marriage another way.’ What follows is a very good ſupplement to the expoſition of this ſixth nullity: ‘Henry the Great was twice married: firſt to Margaret of France, a match which ſeemed very advantageous to the poſture of his affairs, if it had been as agreeable to him as honourable. For he knew ſhe had elſewhere fixed her amorous affection, and had no paſſion for him. . . . . . Notwithſtanding this he loved her, and bore with thoſe actions in her, which when known, are inſupportable to all huſbands. He had no iſſue by her; but during her elopement ſhe had two ſons: one by the Sieur de Chanvalon, who is yet alive, and is a Capuchin Fryer that goes by the name of Father Ange: the other, who is dead, ſhe had by the Sieur d'Aubiac, I knew them both. The notoriouſneſs of the thing obliges me againſt my will to mention this: it is, beſides, a ſhining proof of the goodneſs of this moſt illuſtrious monarch; who from hence could have drawn an invincible reaſon to have rid himſelf of her by the hands of juſtice, according to the advice of ſeveral of his council: but he choſe rather to break the marriage without any effuſion of blood, by the evident nullities above mentioned (39).’

I omit what he ſaith that ſhe entertained a more than fraternal correſpondence with the Duke of Alençon her brother (40).

[F] . . . . . For which he was blamed, and juſtified himſelf: we ſhall examine whether the Marſhal de Baſſompierre's anger is juſt.] Du Pleix ſpeaking of Queen Margaret's return to the court, doth not treat her in an obliging manner, and yet owns, that ſhe was pleaſed that he ſhould have the honour to be one of her ſervants in ordinary in quality of maſter of the requeſts, with a handſome ſalary (41); and notwithſtanding, adds he, that ſhe was very much addicted to changing, I always was very well with her: which being known to ſeveral perſons, ſome were ſurprized that I ſpoke boldly of her irregularities in the reign of Henry III, as I ſhall do alſo in this I am now writing. But for my part, it is more ſurprizing to me that any man of judgment could not diſcern that what I have done was grounded upon juſt and proper conſiderations, without its being neceſſary for me to expreſs them. I ſhall place her elogy after her death, and I ſhall with truth ſay ſome ſtrange and ſurpriſing things. He accordingly diſcharged his promiſe, when he came to mention the death of Margaret, under the year 1615. Some paſſages of his diſcourſe run thus (42): ‘All the world repreſenting her as a goddeſs, ſhe in a manner fancied her ſelf to be ſo; and during her whole life was very much pleaſed with the name of Venus Urania, or the Celeſtial Venus, as well to intimate that ſhe partook of the divinity as to diſtinguiſh her love from that of the vulgar. For in order to keep it up, ſhe formed her ſelf upon different rules from thoſe common to other women: affecting above all to make it the exerciſe of her mind rather than of her body, and her common expreſſion was: would you ceaſe to love, poſſeſs the beloved object. I could from this compoſe a more excellent and ſurprizing romance than any written in former ages: but I am engaged in a more ſerious employment . . . . . . The perſecution and menaces of her brother (43); the terrible apprehenſions ſhe conceived, that her crimes would oblige her huſband to attempt upon her life, and the ſolitude in which ſhe lived for twenty years, ſo diſcompoſed her mind, that ſhe grew extremely miſtruſtful of every body: ſo that her continual vexations and fears made her hypocondriac.’ In the Divorce Satyrique Henry IV is brought in ſpeaking thus: ‘Though I pity her, I cannot ſometimes forbear laughing at the extravagant jealouſies, and mad tranſports that are told of her amours, which frequently prompt her to ſlight what ſhe ſees, and to believe what is falſe; looking ſometimes for her ruffians in every part of the houſe, though ſhe knows they are ſomewhere elſe; and ſometimes when ſhe ſees and hears them, ſhe fancies they are other men in their ſhape, who deſign to deceive and do her miſchief . . . . . She has brought her ſelf to that paſs, that ſhe cannot abide that any body ſhould cough, laugh, or ſpeak with a low voice in her preſence: ſhe is grown ſo ſuſpicious and miſtruſtful, that ſhe thinks every body ſpeaks of her actions (44). This weakneſs at firſt appeared only by certain

(35) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri III. livr. vii, p. m. 231, 232.

(36) Du Pleix, Hiſt. de Henri III, ad ann. 1578, pag. 70.

(37) Id. ibid. ſub fin. pag. 202, 203.

(38) Id. Hiſt. de Henri IV, ad ann. 1599, pag. 264.

(39) Id. ibid. ad ann. 1599, pag. 411, 412.

(40) Id. Hiſt. de Henri III, pag. 23.

(41) Id. Hiſt. de Henri IV, ad ann. 1605, pag. 368.

(42) Id. Hiſt. de Louïs XIII, pag. 53.

(43) That is, Henry III.

(44) Divorce Satyrique, pag. 208, 210.

ſince they have entirely ſuppreſſed the odious paſſages of the life of this Queen, in order to crown her with the moſt magnificent praiſes, that can be beſtowed on the moſt illuſtrious things which fell under the cognizance of her domeſtics; but after her laſt journey to Court, it was but too much divulged, ſhe her ſelf diſcovering it to every body . . . . . (45) She having as many amorous addreſſes made to her as he (46) made to other women, they agreed very ill. She hath endeavoured to throw all the infamy upon that great King in her memoirs, which are publiſhed, therefore I have been obliged to repreſent her as bearing her own ſhare of it in this Hiſtory. For I am not here writing Panegyrics on Princes and Princeſſes, but a true Hiſtory, which ought to expreſs their virtues, and not conceal their vices, to the end that their ſucceſſors, by a fear of the like ſtain in their memory, may be excited to imitate their praiſe worthy actions, and avoid their faults. Beſides, for political reaſons it was requiſite to obſerve, that her baſtards were born during her divorce and ſeparation from the King; becauſe they might otherwiſe paſs for legitimate: ſince his Majeſty never would puniſh the Monk as an impoſtor, who for ſo long a time hath been, and is produced as Queen Margeret's ſon. I am neceſſitated to declare this for the ſatisfaction of thoſe, who have charged this important ſtory with detraction.' After this he ſets forth ſeveral encomiums on this Queen.

(45) Du Pleix, ubi ſupra, p. 54.

(46) That is, the King of Navarre.

The Marſhal de Baſſompierre hath made the following obſervation on that paſſage, which charges her with having had two baſtards: 'Infamous Viper, who by thy calumnies haſt torn the entrails of her that gave thee life! Thou worm, which gnaweſt the ſame fleſh that begot thee! Thou mad dog, who biteſt they own maſter, what moved thee to injure a poor Princeſs after her death, who cheriſhed thee during her life? Is it the intereſt of the late King, who, to his own prejudice, choſe rather to retard the diſannulling his marriage with her, than utter one ſingle word to her diſadvantage, and tho' the good of the State hindred him from keeping her any longer as his wife, yet he always honoured her as Queen, loved her as his ſiſter, beſtowed large penſions on her, and made her immenſe preſents? Is it truth which obliges thee to it, thou who haſt given the title of a Hiſtory to this book filled with fables, and ſtuffed with calumnies and ſcurrilities? What a ſcandal haſt thou caſt upon France, by publiſhing to the whole world, and leaving recorded to poſterity, ſuch infamous ſtories of one of the moſt noble Princeſſes of the royal blood, which perhaps are falſe, or, at moſt, were only known to very few? Is a private man allowed, under the name of an Hiſtorian, to publiſh the faults of another, to ſpot and defame the royal race, and defile the memory of the dead? If any attempt had been made to force thee, tho' but lightly to ſcandalize that poor Princeſs, (who kept thee from ſtarving) thou ſhouldeſt rather have ſuffered martyrdom than yielded to it; whereas, on the contrary, without any conſtraint or the leaſt invitation, thou haſt hunted after, and adviſed even improper and unreaſonable opportunities to ſay ſuch execrable things of her, that no Chriſtian can utter without ſin, or hear without horror. No, no, there are wheels and executioners to puniſh thee ſeverely in this world, and a divine juſtice in the other, to inflict eternal torments upon thee for thy infinite crimes (47).' Laying aſide abuſive reflexions, we find ſcare any thing elſe in this ſentence of condemnation, but that Du Pleix ought not to have defamed a Princeſs, whoſe domeſtic he had been, nor publiſhed adventures, known to few, which diſhonoured the royal family. It is perfectly unneceſſary for me to examine the laſt of theſe objections. Du Pleix himſelf hath ſatisfactorily anſwered it in one of the paſſages which I have already cited; and it doth not appear that Baſſompierre ever refuted that part of his defence. Wherefore let us only conſider the firſt objection.

(47) Baſſompierre, Obſervat. ſur Du Pleix, pag. 173, & ſeq. See alſo pag. 210, & ſeq.

Considerations upon the duties of an Hiſtorian.

All that are acquainted with the laws of Hiſtory, will agree, that every Hiſtorian, who deſigns faithfully to diſcharge his function, ought entirely to diſpoſſeſs himſelf of the ſpirit of flattery and calumny, and put on as much as poſſible, ſuch a Stoical temper, as is out of the reach of any diſturbance from paſſion. Inſenſible to every thing elſe, he ought only to be concerned for the intereſt of truth, to which his duty obliges him to ſacrifice the reſentment of an injury, the remembrance of a favour, and even the love of his country. He ought to forget that he was born in a certain country, that he was bred up in the communion of a certain Church, that he is indebted for the making his fortune to ſuch and ſuch perſons, and that ſuch or ſuch perſons are his relations or friends. An Hiſtorian as ſuch, like Melchiſedec, is without father, without mother, and without pedigree. If he be aſked, Of what country you are? He ought to anſwer, I am neither a Frenchman, nor a German, nor an Engliſhman, nor a Spaniard, &c. I am an inhabitant of the world, neither engaged in the ſervice of the Emperor, nor of the King of France, but only in that of truth: ſhe is my ſole Queen, and I have taken no oath of allegiance to any beſides her (48): I am her ſworn knight, and the collar of the order which I wear, is the ſame ornament worn by the chief-juſtice, and the high-prieſt of the Egyptians. Ἔχει δὲ καὶ ἄγαλμα περὶ τὸν αὐχένα ἐκ σαπφείρου λίθου, καὶ ἐκαλεῖτο ἄγαλμα Ἀλήθεια. Circa collum imaginem ex ſapphiro gemma confectam geſtabat: quæ vocabatur VERITAS (49). - - - - He carried about his neck an image made of ſapphire ſtone, and the image was called TRUTH. So far as he yeilds to the love of his country, ſo far does he deviate from the rules of hiſtory, and by how much he ſheweth himſelf a good ſubject, by ſo much he becomes a bad Hiſtorian.

(48) Tuus ô regina quid optes
Explorare labor, mihi juſſa capeſſere fas eſt.
- - - 'Tis yours, O Queen! to will
The work which duty bids me to fulfil.
DRYDEN. Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 76.

(49) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. xiv, cap. xxxiv.

Dum patriam laudat, damnat dum Poggius hoſtem;
Nec malus eſt civis, nec bonus hiſtoricus (50).

While Poggius doth his country-men extol,
And blame their enemies with all his ſoul;
He's no ill ſubject, that I muſt confeſs,
But he's a bad Hiſtorian ne'ertheleſs.

(50) Sannazar. apud Jovium, Elog. cap. x, pag. m. 31.

So that the cruel reproaches, which Mr de Baſſompierre grounds on the ſalaries and poſts which Du Pleix enjoyed under Queen Margaret, are unjuſt; for Du Pleix the Hiſtoriographer was not bound to diſcharge the obligations of Du Pleix this Queen's domeſtic. It was neither proper for him as an Hiſtorian, to acknowledge a good office, nor to revenge an injury: his ſole obligation was to repreſent things as they really where, without miſrepreſenting them either in favour of his friends, or to the prejudice of his enemies. He had the ſame ſtrict engagements to truth, as the Judges have to juſtice; and therefore ſince it would be highly unreaſonable to reproach a Counſellor of parliament with ingratitude for having made his benefactor loſe a bad cauſe, we ſhould be equally in the wrong to complain of Du Pleix, on pretence that he hath publiſhed defamatory truths of a Princeſs under whom he was employed. It is to betray an ignorance of the true bounds of things, to maintain, that gratitude ſhould extend even to the diſpoſal of thoſe things which are none of our own; I mean, that to acquit ourſelves of our obligations, we may make uſe of what belongs to others. If you will acknowledge the good offices done you, do it at your own expence, and not at that of your neighbour. Such a one is the cauſe of your growing rich, that you enjoy the poſt of Maſter of the Requeſts, or Preſident, &c. Aſſiſt him with your purſe in his indigence, but be not an inſtrument to make him carry an unjuſt cauſe; for if you make him carry it, your gratitude is a downright robbery, and a violation of the moſt eſſential duties. You are the miniſter of juſtice, and nothing can permit your violation of it; you ought not, as a Judge, to acknowledge the benefits, which you formerly received as ſteward or tutor. The application of all this to an Hiſtoriographer, who is a public miniſter of truth, is not very difficult.

If during the proſecution of a criminal indictment againſt Margaret de Valois, Du Pleix had refuſed to give evidence againſt her, and had endured the torture rather than reveal the adulteries of this lady, whoſe domeſtic he was, he would have deſerved high praiſe; and his ſilence in that caſe had been an hundred times more commendable than an ingenuous confeſſion: but in writing the Hiſtory of France, he was diſengaged illuſtrious princeſſes. She was thus praiſed by reaſon of her liberalities to the monaſteries [G], the moſt ſure and infallible means to cover a multitude of ſins (f). For the reſt, if ſhe diverted her ſelf very agreeably at the caſtle of Uſſon, ſhe alſo ſuffered ſeveral troubles there. ‘From the terraſs of that caſtle, ſhe ſaw her friends cut in pieces, and the Count de Randan, their chief, a lord of the houſe of Rochefoucaud killed on the ſame day gaged from all domeſtic obligations, and might publickly declare what he ought not to have done to the commiſſioners appointed to draw up an indictment. I own that he defamed a Princeſs of the royal blood; but if out of fear of caſting ſome ſcandal on the royal family, he had been obliged to ſilence, it muſt thence be concluded alſo, that an Hiſtorian ought never to mention any of the rebellions and conſpiracies of the Princes of the royal blood; and for inſtance, the Spaniſh Hiſtorians ought never to have ſpoken of the combinations of Don Carlos, nor of the puniſhment which was the conſequence of them. But as this is abſurd, it follows that Mr de Baſſompierre hath unjuſtly cenſured the conduct of Du Pleix. His other obſervations are much better; for it cannot be denied that he hath detected an almoſt infinite number of her ill actions. If I am anſwered, that the rebellions of Princes are notorious facts, and conſequently ought not to be ſilently paſſed over by an Hiſtorian; I reply, that Queen Margaret's amours were, in their kind, as publickly known as the frequent relapſes of the Duke of Orleans (51). All the court was perfectly informed of the reprimand which ſhe received from the king her brother, who, amongſt other things, charged her with having a baſtard. All the Ambaſſadors knew it, and undoubtedly they wrote the news to their reſpective maſters, as well as the Emperor's Ambaſſador did (52). All France was acquainted with the affront which the ſame king cauſed to be offered to Margaret in a public road; and the conſequences of this affront were blazed abroad by the complaints of the King of Navarre. In a word, to ſay in an hiſtory what Du Pleix hath publiſhed concerning the intrigues of the Queen of Navarre, was not to reveal any ſecret practices. And you may, if you pleaſe, obſerve, that certain reaſons of ſtate, which he mentions (53), obliged him to ſpeak of them: which is a good juſtification. I deſire you would alſo obſerve that ſeveral have cenſured his inſerting theſe events in his work, but have not affirmed, that they were meer lies. See the margin (54). On the contrary, they never ventured farther than to ſay that the veil of diſcretion ought to have been drawn over them. Wherefore ſince he had no occaſion to juſtify himſelf on any other account than taking the liberty of publiſhing truths of this nature, and ſince after that juſtification, he left all theſe paſſages in his works, ſo that they were not only printed but re-printed with the royal licence; we may conclude, that theſe facts ought to paſs as undoubted truths; for if they were calumnies, the author would have been obliged to retract and leave them out in the ſecond edition.

We may ſay that he hath contributed more than any body elſe to fix the certainty of theſe facts. The Sieur d'Aubigné's ſatires did not amount to a ſufficient and authentic evidence; but when they appear confirmed by the public atteſtation of an Hiſtorian, who was a domeſtic ſervant to this Queen, there is no longer any room for doubting. What defect can you ſuppoſe in them? The Hiſtorian lived at the time of the events, and was ſervant to this Princeſs: he hath not deprived her of the glory which ſhe deſerved on other accounts; he was not blamed for calumniating, but for not ſparing her; and never retracted or ſuppreſſed, in a new edition, what he had ſaid in the firſt. So that the ſilence of a thouſand and a thouſand authors, and the elogies beſtowed on her memory may, at pleaſure, be alledged, but can never ſhake this matter of fact; for we ought to take notice that even her flatterers never preſumed to affirm that ſhe was an example of chaſtity, but contented themſelves with ſilence on this head. If they had affirmed that ſhe was always very chaſte, they would have formed a ſort of faction and ſchiſm in the hiſtorical world, and fomented in it that Pyrrhoniſm which is already but too general on other accounts: a diſorder which chiefly owes it's propagation to the different accounts of things at the very time of the events (55). A lie is ſuppoſed to be always poſterior to the truth; but this is not certain with reſpect to relations; for it but too frequently happens that the falſe precede the true; and that the true and falſe ſtart at the very ſame inſtant, and ſo run through future ages under the auſpicious authority of traditions that are alike old. Obſerve what Tacitus ſaith on occaſion of a very remarkable event, which at firſt was variouſly repreſented. ‘Is finis fuit ulciſcenda Germanici morte, non modo apud illos homines qui tum agebant, etiam ſecutis temporibus vario rumore jactata. adeo maxima quæque ambigua ſunt, dum alii quoquo modo audita pro compertis habent, alii vera in contrarium vertunt. & gliſcit utrumque poſteritate (56). - - - This was the end of revenging the death of Germanicus, an affair ambiguouſly related, not by thoſe only who then lived and intereſted themſelves in it, but likewiſe in following times, ſo dark and intricate are all the higheſt tranſactions; while ſome hold for certain facts the moſt precarious hearſays, others turn fact into falſhood, and both are ſwallowed and improved by the credulity of poſterity.’

It was foretold, that truth would not be ſtifled by the artifices of mercenary pens and tongues. ‘Thoſe, who in hopes of her liberality, praiſe her in their ſermons, dedicate books to, or write elogies on her, do in vain beſtow on her qualities to which ſhe hath no pretence; for true tradition, which in ſpite of them ſhall be immemorially preſerved from father to ſon, will plainly prove them liars, and as full of avarice and flattery, as ſhe is an enemy to virtue (57).’ This prediction is verified by the event, for which we are not a little indebted to Du Pleix.

[G] She was thus praiſed by reaſon of her liberalities to the monaſteries.] Hilarion de Coſte, a Minime Friar, ſpeaks thus of the charities of this Princeſs: ‘At the four moſt ſolemn feſtivals, and on her birth-day, ſhe gave, with her own hand, one hundred gold crowns, and as many loaves to an hundred poor people. She annually maintained one hundred and eleven perſons, and forty Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh Prieſts, beſides the alms ſhe daily diſtributed at her palace, and going from maſs, as well to ſtrangers, as to the modeſt uncraving poor. She alſo contributed ſeveral ſums to the building of divers churches and monaſteries. She built and founded the Jeſuits college at Agen, and the convent of the Reformed Auguſtins near her palace, in the ſuburbs of St Germain des Prez at Paris. There is no order of mendicant Friars that has not partaken of her annual bounty; amongſt others, the Carmelites, Auguſtins, Franciſcans, Jacobins, the Jeſuits of St Lewis, the Ave-Maria Nuns, the Bernardins, the Capuchins, Recollects, and Minimes of Nigeon. In the latter years of her life, building all her hopes on GOD, ſhe daily heard three maſſes, one high and two low (§ a); ſhe communicated three times every week, on Thurſday, Friday, and Sunday; every Saturday ſhe viſited the low chapel of our Lady in St Victor's church; and the hoſpitals in the holy week, and never gave leſs than three or four thouſand blankets, beſides frequently a conſiderable ſum for the marriage of poor girls (58).’ Scipio Du Pleix relates the ſame (59), but he adds a reflexion which makes a vaſt difference betwixt his narrative and that of the Minime. ‘If ſhe, ſaith he (60), ſuffered herſelf to be drawn away by ſome ſenſuality in her youth, amongſt ſo many pernicious opportunities as happen in the lives of princes, and the allurements of the court, yet having renounced them in order to return to GOD, and having redeemed her ſins, by large charities, who can doubt but that the prayers of ſo many religious perſons, and the bleſſings of the people have opened the heavens for her ſoul, and made way for her reception after her death amongſt the bleſſed angels, conſidering withal that more eſpecially towards the end of her days, ſhe prepared and diſpoſed herſelf for it with a truly Chriſtian contrition and reſolution.’ The Minime took great care not to intermix his relations with any thing of this nature; we find nothing

(f) See, above, the remark [I], of the article GREGORY I.

(51) Brother to Lewis XIII.

(52) See, above, citation (34).

(53) See, above, citation (46).

(54) Baſſompierre, pag. 149, of the Journal of his Life, ſays that, in 1606, Queen Margaret loſt the Sieur Sulliendat her lover, who had been killed by a gentleman called Charmond.

(55) See, below, my Diſſertation concerning Defamatory Libels, paragraph viii.

(56) Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. xix.

(57) Divorce Satyrique, p. 212.

(58) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 308, 309. See alſo Paſquier, pag. m. 761, of Tom. ii of his letters.

(59) Du Pleix, Hiſt. de Louis XIII, pag. 54, 55.

(60) Id. ibid. pag. 55.

‘ day that the King her huſband triumphed over his enemies at Yvry: and though this ‘ place fears nothing but Heaven, it being impoſſible for any thing but the ſun to enter ‘ it by force, and its triple encloſure deſpiſes the efforts of the aſſailants, as a high rock ‘ contemns the billows and ſurges; yet want got into it and obliged her, in order to ‘ avoid its outrages, to pawn her jewels at Venice, to melt down her plate, and to have ‘ nothing free but the air, hoping but very little, and fearing every thing: for all round ‘ about her was in flame and confuſion (g).’ I ſhall conclude with this paſſage of Brantome:

(g) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 302.

nothing there which tends to inſinuate that Margaret had occaſion to buy off the ſins of her youth by ſo many alms; and omiſſions like this are indeed unſufferable. Generally ſpeaking, we cannot complain of his placing her amongſt the illuſtrious ladies; but his ranking her equally and without any diſtinction, with thoſe whoſe virtue always remained untainted, is what cannot be excuſed. He ought at leaſt to have divided his work into three claſſes, one for the ladies of perpetual and unſpotted virtue, one for thoſe unjuſtly ſlandered, and another for thoſe whoſe good qualities compenſated their vices, and who, in their wiſe old age, expiated the ſins of their youth. No body would have been offended at ſeeing Margaret in this laſt claſs, nor have taken it amiſs that the Monks out of gratitude for her alms, ſhould make her ſhine amongſt the illuſtrious penitents, and celebrate her wiſdom, learning, and the reſt of her good qualities. We ought to do juſtice to every body, and even to beſtow thoſe praiſes upon courtezans, which they deſerve when they have diſtinguiſhed themſelves by ſome virtues, of which there are examples to be found (61). We are not ignorant of the nullity of her alms, by reaſon they were given at the expence of others and the ruin of her creditors. Have you ever obſerved any of her lovers, (Henry IV introduced ſpeaking) a few excepted, grow rich by her liberality? But you ſee the priſons full of thoſe whom ſhe hath empoveriſhed . . . . I know very well that at my expence ſhe gives the tenth of all her rents and penſions quarterly to monaſteries and convents: but then ſhe withholds the ſalary of her domeſtics, (whoſe caſe I very much commiſerate) and of thoſe who for the whole year have furniſhed her with their proviſions as well as their labour (62). If any one ſhould ſcruple to give credit to this paſſage on pretext that it is taken out of a defamatory libel, he needs only conſult the hiſtory of Henry the Great, written by Mr de Perefixe, who died Archbiſhop of Paris. There he will find that the palace which Queen Margaret built near the Pre-aux-Clercs, was ſold to pay her debts . . . . that ſhe was liberal to prodigality, very pompous and magnificent; but knew not what it was to pay her debts. ‘ This is undoubtedly one of the greateſt faults in a prince, by reaſon ‘ that nothing is ſo diametrically oppoſite to juſtice, of ‘ which he ought to be the protector and pattern (63).’ This teſtimony agrees with that of Mezerai (64), and yet one would be apt to excuſe the panegyriſts who have ſo extolled this Queen's alms, if like Du-Pleix they had regulated the whole matter of fact; and one would not exact from them a rigorous ſearch into the circumſtances of her liberalities to the poor and the monaſteries.

[(§ α) It is ſhe that is drawn in the following epigram, book iii. chap. 21 of Feneſte:

Commune, qui te communies
Ainſi qu'en amours en hoſties;
Qui communies tous les jours
En hoſties comme en amours:
A quoi ces Dieux que tu conſommes
Et en tous temps & en tous lieux?
Toi, qui ne t'es peu ſouler d'hommes,
Te penſes tu crever de Dieux?

Harlot, that haſt an equal ſhare
Of love and ſacramental fare;
To whom each day a feaſt doth prove
Both of the ſacrament and love:
Say to what end do you devour
So many gods at every hour?
Is it that you, who never can
Once get your belly-full of man,
Such is your appetite accurſt,
Reſolve with eating gods to burſt? REM. CRIT.]

(61) See chap. xxv, of book iii, Miſcellanearum Obſervationum, written by Peter Petit, a Paris Phyſician, and printed at Utrecht in 1682.

(62) Divorce Satyrique, p. 213.

(63) Perefixe, Hiſtoire de Henry le Grand, ad ann. 1599, pag. m. 301.

(64) See, above, the remark [O], of the third article NAVARRE.

I ſay again, that the Minime Hilarion de Coſte ought to have obſerved in his book, what Robert d'Arbriſſel did in his monaſteries, one of which was appointed for women of good reputation, and the other for thoſe who had quitted their ill courſes (65). That mixture is very ſcandalous which in the ſame book preſents us with the elogies of Anne of Bretagne, and Iſabella Clara Eugenia, together with thoſe of Bona Sforza and our Margaret de Valois. I add that it is a medley which encourages thoſe to give up themſelves to vice, whom an ambition of being one day placed amongſt the illuſtrious ladies, might, perhaps, keep in the right way. Nothing is more pernicious than equally to extol and honour looſe and virtuous women (66). This Minime had been leſs to blame, if his praiſes had been reduced to the particular deſcription of any ſingle action; but he hath couched them ſo as to take in the hiſtorical ſeries of the Queen's whole life. He mentioned whatever he found excellent, and forgot nothing but what was ill. I make this reflexion only to ſhew that I never pretended that all thoſe, who have mentioned either the learning or charities of Queen Margaret, ought alſo to have taken notice of her faults. This never entred into my thoughts, nor do I in the leaſt diſlike Stephen Paſquier's contenting himſelf with hinting what he condemned in general (67), and particularly enlarging on what he admired in her; for he did not attempt a hiſtory or an hiſtorical elogy. See what he ſaith of the meals of this Princeſs. ‘ Tho' dinners and ſuppers are chiefly de‘ſigned for the nouriſhment of the body, yet ſhe more ‘ highly valuing the aliment of the mind, has com‘monly four men near her, to whom ſhe firſt propoſes ‘ what propoſition ſhe pleaſes for their examination, ‘ frequently overthrowing their arguments and never ‘ reſenting their criticiſms, provided they be grounded ‘ on good and ſolid reaſons. Thus ſhe nouriſhes her ‘ mind and feeds her body with all ſobriety, and after ‘ theſe learned men have ended their diſcourſe, not to ‘ abate any part of her royalty, then follows a band ‘ of violins, after that a conſort of vocal Muſic, and ‘ laſtly of lutes, which play ſucceſſively in emulation ‘ of each other (68).’

A CONSIDERATION upon the effect of many old devout women, who have been leud in their youth.

Give me leave to obſerve by the by that this Queen, and all other ladies who imitate her, perhaps do more harm to the world, by their frequent communions and extreme aſſiduity in convents and churches, than if they continued in their ſcandalous courſe, and grew old in impenitence. They are immortalized by an hundred artful elogies, which never mention any of their former ſins. Is not this to cauſe thoſe who live in impurity to hope for an unſpotted fame, and expect to be loaded with honour, provided in their decayed and deformed age they turned devout? And why ſhould they not hope for this glory after ſo many examples before their eyes? For it is the common courſe of looſe women to turn devout when no longer able to charm (69). They are then very conſtant at ſermon and maſs, and very liberal to convents; whence it is believed they ſhall open the gates of Paradiſe, which had been ſhut againſt them, and conſequently young ladies may flatter themſelves that their debaucheries will not deprive them either of human glory, which the applauſes of Monks procure for the dead, or of eternal happineſs. What is more pernicious than this ſecurity? What can poſſibly let looſe the reins of corrupt nature to a greater degree? The ladies would be terrified at the apprehenſions of an infamous character in future ages, and the torments of Hell, if they ſaw that all or almoſt all the women of pleaſure continue hardned in their crimes till death. This fear would prove a bridle, and a powerful leſſon of wiſdom, and by this means the damnation of ſome few would prove a remedy againſt incontinence, and the means of the ſalvation of a great number. If in every age there were but one leud woman, that turned devout in her old days, ſhe alone would no more inſpire

(65) See, above, citation (10), of the article FONTEVRAUD.

(66) See, above, the remark [M], of the article LEWIS XII.

(67) If I ſhould tell you that this Queen has no faults, I ſhould be a ſilly man; for tho' God has been pleaſed to make her a great Princeſs, ſhe is made up of the ſame pieces as all of us are. And conſequently we muſt not pretend that ſhe ſhould be perfect, which no man or woman can be; but we muſt only conſider her leſſer imperfections. Paſquier, Letters, Tom. ii, pag. 759.

(68) Id. ibid. pag. 761, 762.

(69) See, above, citation (25), of the article GUEBRIANT.

a ſpirit

Brantome: the caſtle of Uſſon is a very ſtrong or rather impregnable place, which that cunning and crafty King Lewis XI, partly made ſo on purpoſe to lodge his priſoners, and keep them much ſecurer there than at Loches, Bois de Vincennes, or Luſignan (b).

(b) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames illuſtres, pag. m. 241.

a ſpirit of ſecurity, than the good thief (70), ſhe could only remove deſpair. But when the number of theſe Magdalens (71) mounts high, they univerſally occaſion confidence and boldneſs, ſo that one may ſay, that indirectly and contrary to their intention they are the firmeſt pillars of the Empire of Venus, even when they themſelves are retired out of it. What glorious arms would they afford the preachers and confeſſors, if being become the laughing-ſtock and execration of the whole town, when grown grey under Venus's yoak, and following their old trade, with all the ridiculous impertinences which attend the conjunction of wrinkles and coquettery, they ſhould at laſt die blaſpheming or in deſpair; ſo that their rejection of the ſacraments ſhould cauſe their corpſe to be dragged on a hurdle to lie unburied! Such a diſmal ſpectacle would fill them with horror. Little Father Andrew would have frequently taken occaſion from thence to cry out in his ſermon, the ſame fate attends you.

A famous author, in a letter dated the twenty-third of June 1678, ſaith, that the diſeaſe of which Madam M* died, had brought her to repentance, and that ſhe was one of thoſe mentioned in the Goſpel, who were as well payed for the laſt hour, as thoſe who engaged in the morning (72). Father Bourdaloue ſays (73), that this lady diſcovered a great ſhare of Chriſtian reſolution at her death. This edifies the public, but yet lays a ſnare for ſinners. Note, that we are taught by ſome that thoſe have a greater intereſt in the favour of GOD, who extricate themſelves out of great ſins, than if they had never fallen into them. This is another ſnare. The Biſhop of Meaux ſets this in a proper light, after having obſerved (74) that when we ſee in the Goſpel † the loſt ſheep preferred by the good ſhepherd to all the reſt of the flock, when we read of the happy return of the prodigal ſon, and the tranſports of a tender father, which rejoice the whole family; we are tempted to believe that repentance is preferred to innocence itſelf, and that the returning prodigal receives greater favours than the eldeſt ſon who never ſtrayed from his father's houſe. See the remainder in the author himſelf.

(70) Unus eſt ne deſperes, ſolus eſt ne confidas, -- There is one, leſt you ſhould deſpair, there is only one leſt you ſhould be too confident, ſays a Father of the Church ſpeaking of the good thief.

(71) I mean ſuch women as are falſe or true converts.

(72) Buſſi Rabutin, letter cvi, of Tom. i, pag. 257, Dutch Edit.

(73) Ibid. letter cvii, pag. 258.

(74) Biſhop of Meaux, Oraiſon funebre de la Reine Marie Thereſe, p. 66. Dutch Edit.

† Luke xv. 4, 20.

UTINO (LEONARD DE) a Jacobin Monk, flouriſhed in the XVth century, and was a great preacher. His ſermons on the ſaints were one of the earlieſt productions of the preſs, being printed in the year 1446 (a) (α). His other works were printed before the end of the ſame century [A]. It was probably he, who complained that the confeſſions which the women made at the confeſſion chair, were defective in ſome things [B].

(a) Olearius, in Abaco, apud Konig Biblioth. vet. & nova, pag. 467, 859.

[(α) It is generally agreed upon that printing was not uſed, in the manner that it now is, before the year 1457. Thus what is ſaid here may very well be a miſtake either in Olearius, or at leaſt in Konig; and we have much more reaſon to affirm, with Mr le Duchat, in note 10, on chap. 19 of the firſt book of Rabelais, that firſt edition of Leonard de Utino's ſermons is of Venice, 1473. REM. CRIT.]

[A] His other works were printed before the end of the ſame century.] His treatiſe of common-places was printed at Ulm in the year 1478. His Lent and Dominical ſermons were printed at Lyons in 1495. See the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, pag. 543.

[B] That the confeſſions, which the women made at the confeſſion-chair, were defective.] James Olivier, Licentiate of the Civil and Canon Law, ſays, that the learned de Utino obſerves that womens confeſſions 'are 'commonly deficient in three particulars, which they 'very ſeldom or never confeſs; the profuſeneſs and 'vanity of cloaths, believing it to be due to their 'ſex; leudneſs in thought or deed, according to the 'nature of the ſin or it's circumſtances, either by 'ſhame or cuſtom; and immoderate loquacity, which 'is not free from mortal or venial ſin, of which an 'account muſt be given before GOD, even of idle 'words (1).' I do not aſſert this for a truth, but only ſay that it is very probable that the author here cited is the Monk I am ſpeaking of.

(1) James Olivier, Alphabet de l'Imperfection & Malice des Femmes, letter G, pag. 97, Edit. of Rouën 1658.

VULCANIUS (a) (BONAVENTURA) was born at Bruges on the thirtieth of June 1538. He made ſuch expeditious advances in polite literature, that at the age of twenty-one Cardinal Francis de Mendoza (b), choſe him, by reaſon of his learning, to be his Secretary and Library-keeper, and gave him ſeveral authorities of the Greek Fathers to tranſlate into Latin. He returned from Spain to the Low-Countries, after an abſence of eleven years, and finding his country embroiled in confuſions, he went to Cologn, and from thence to Baſil and Geneva, publiſhing in each of theſe cities a book of his compoſure. Being returned home he was choſen Profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the univerſity of Leyden in the year 1578, and three years after began the exerciſe of that employment. He continued in it for the ſpace of thirty-two years (c), and died at Leyden on the ninth of October 1614 [A], after having publiſhed ſeveral books (d), which diſcovered his erudition. He had promiſed an edition of all St Cyril's works [B]. His

(a) The name of his family was Smet, which ſignifies a Smith, the trade of Vulcan according to the Poets.

(b) He was Biſhop of Burgos.

(c) Taken from Meurſius, Athenæ Batavæ, pag. 103, & ſeq.

(d) You will find the titles of ſome of them in Moreri, and all of them in Meurſius, ibid. pag. 107, 108, or in Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 116, 117.

[A] He died at Leyden on the 9th of October 1614.] I am obliged to the Athenæ Belgicæ (1) for the particular day of this date, which I believe right (2), tho' the date of the year which follows it is falſe, for it is not true that Vulcanius died in 1610, as it is ſaid there. Mr Konig adopts this error. Meurſius, Valerius Andreas, and Moreri after them, are miſtaken in placing the death of Vulcanius in 1615. Ghilini, who hath only paraphraſed, and ill tranſlated Swertius, hath exceeded the fault of his original, by making it 1600 inſtead of 1610, and yet he tells us, that Vulcanius, born, according to him, and according to truth, on the 30th of June in 1538, lived above ſeventy years (3). This is not the ſole blunder he is guilty of: he tells us beſides (4), that Cardinal Francis de Mendoza was Biſhop of Bruges, and that Vulcanius having been profeſſor of the Greek tongue in Flanders for three years, went to Lyons, and obtained the ſame employment in that univerſity, which he exerciſed for thirty-two years, to the great ſatisfaction of the French (5). It is not neceſſary to tell the reader, that inſtead of Burgos, a city of Spain, he hath put Bruges, a city of Flanders; and that inſtead of Leyden, he hath clapt in Lyons, where there never was an univerſity. He did not underſtand theſe words of Swertius: 'Lugduno Batavorum iter faceret, à 'Curatoribus Academiæ Profeſſor linguæ Grecæ de'ſignatus eſt anno Domini MDLXXVIII. Triennio 'demum poſt Lugdunum venit, & Profeſſionem ſuſce'pit (6). --- When he was going through Leyden, he 'was named by the Curators of the univerſity to be pro'feſſor of the Greek tongue, in the year 1578. He came 'to Leyden three years after, and accepted of that Profeſ'ſorſhip.' Since he is miſtaken in ſuch particulars as theſe, we ought to believe that on an hundred more dangerous occaſions he hath corrupted the authors whom he paraphraſed.

[B] He had promiſed an edition of all St Cyril's works.] Of this Scultetus gives a curious account, ſpeaking of the learned men he viſited at Leyden, in the

(1) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 162.

(2) Mr Drelincourt, a Phyſician at Leyden, and a worthy ſon of the Profeſſor, has been pleaſed at my requeſt to make ſeveral inquiries concerning the time of Vulcanius's death, and has found in the Records of the town-houſe that he was buried in St Peter's Church, October 13, 1614.

(3) Ghilini Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 49.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 48.

(5) Con intera ſodisfazione de' Franceſi. Ibid.

(6) Swert. ubi ſupra, pag. 161.

His funeral Oration raiſed the murmurs of ſome Critics [C]. Ghilini hath committed a great many faults (e).

the year 1612. ‘Quem (Bonaventuram Vulcanium) ſenem admodum ſellæ affixum, & manibus pedibuſque captum inveni. Promiſerat ille triginta quatuor annis antè, editionem omnium operum Græcorum Cyrilli hactenus à multis deſideratam: hanc cùm fruſta hactenus ſingulis propemodum nundinis expectaſſem, & jam coram hominis ætatem valetudinemque perditam conſiderarem, petii ab eo, ut Cyrillum Græcum fidei meæ concrederet: me non ſolùm operam daturum, ut ex ipſius voto ille in vulgus exiret, ſed etiam de Codicis precio ipſi ſatisfacturum: At ille gratiis pro officio actis, tantum adhuc virium ſibi ſupereſſe ajebat, ut ipſemet promiſſo ſe exſolvere poſſit; uſque adeò verum eſt, Neminem eſſe tam ſenem, qui, non dico diem, ſed annos ſupervivere ſe poſſe, ſperet. Quanquam erat non nemo in Angliâ, qui Bonaventuram de tanti theſauri poſſeſſione magnificè potiùs ſe jactaſſe, quàm verè gloriatum fuiſſe, affirmaret (7). - - - - I found the good old man, Bonaventura Vulcanius, confined to his chair, having neither the uſe of his hands nor feet. He had promiſed thirty years before an edition of all St Cyril's works, which has hitherto been wiſhed for by many. I expected to ſee it publiſhed almoſt every Fair. But finding myſelf diſappointed hitherto, and conſidering the age and ſickly condition of the man, I begged of him that he would truſt me with the Greek copy; and that I not only would take care to have it publiſhed according to his mind, but likewiſe would ſatisfy him as to the price of the manuſcript. He thanked me for the offer, but told me that he had ſtill ſtrength enough left to perform his promiſe himſelf; ſo true it is that there is no man ſo old who does not expect that he may live not only a day but years longer. It was neverthleſs affirmed by ſomebody in England, that Vulcanius bragged of his poſſeſſing ſo great a treaſure with more vanity than truth.’ Obſerve that Vulcanius began to tranſlate St Cyril, to aſſiſt Cardinal de Mendoza, who was writing a tract de Naturali noſtra per dignam Euchariſtiæ ſumptionem cum Chriſto unione (8).

[C] His funeral oration raiſed the murmurs of ſome Critics.] They found fault with Cunæus who made it, for not mentioning that the deceaſed, when dying, recommended himſelf to the merits of JESUS CHRIST, and ſuch like things. Cunæus juſtified himſelf by declaring that he could not have ſaid ſo without incurring the guilt of an officious lie. It is very well known, added he, that the good old man fell into a paſſion againſt thoſe who exhorted him to prepare for death, and that he never was obſerved to comfort himſelf by the maxims of piety. I ſhall inſert Cunæus's whole letter; it was never printed, and it will not be unacceptable to the reader. A friend of mine tranſcribed it from the original, and did me the favour to communicate his tranſcript to me. I know who hath the original.

‘Ampliſſimo Viro Rumoldo Hogerbetio Petrus
‘Cunæus S. D.

‘Vir Ampliſſime. Ante dies aliquot rogatu Mag. Rectoris, & Senatus Academici laudavi Bonaventuram Vulcanium funebri oratione, in qua reprehendi quædam audio ab ineptis. Et jam perlatus Hagam rumor eſt. Ego non decrevi orationem publicare, neque enim tanti eſt. Sed tamen animi cauſa ſcripſi brevem diſſertatiunculam quam legi à vobis cupio, uti intelligatis quam frigida & febriculoſa ſint, quæ illi culpavere. Præcipuæ illud exagitatum eſt de Lipſio & Eraſmo. De Lipſio crimen dilui ſatis ſolide: Eraſmum autem ita defendi ut ſub illius perſona cauſam ipſe meam egerim. Etiam illud culpavere quod de Chriſti meritis locutus non ſum. Sed multæ cauſſæ fuere cur hæc & alia multa omiſerim. Novimus nos, novere cæteri Vulcanium qui familiariter cum illo vixerunt. Sane quoties aliquis hominem extrema ſenectute ad mortis meditationem hortaretur, vehementer iraſcebatur ille. Sermones vero de Chriſto aut de pietate, adeo nunquam ex ſene audivimus, ut ſæpe mirati ſimus quibus ille cogitationibus feſſam ætatem ſolatus fuerit. Itaque laudo in funere ea quæ cunctis eruditis literatiſque communia. Cætera omiſi, ne viderer ſcenæ inſervire. Sermones de Chriſto non ſunt gladii Delphici qui omnibus aptari poſſint. Et profecto qui hæc indignantur relegandi ſunt ad D. Henſii orationes quibus nobiliſſ. Douzam & Scaligerum laudavit. Eadem enim illi objici poſſunt atque etiam objecta fuerunt. Vale Ampliſſime Senator. Lugdun. Batav. Kal. Nov. CIƆ IƆCXIV.

‘Peter Cunæus, to the honourable Rumoldus ‘Hogerbetius.

‘Honourable Sir,

‘At the deſire of the Rector, and the academical Senate, I pronounced, ſome days ago, a funeral oration in praiſe of Bonaventura Vulcanius. I hear that ſome things in it are cenſured by idle people, and the rumour is already got as far as the Hague. I never deſigned to publiſh the oration, nor do I think it worth while. But for my own amuſement I have writ a ſhort diſſertation, which I ſhould be glad you would read, that you may fully underſtand how groundleſs and inſipid their exceptions are. They have chiefly dwelt upon what I ſaid of Lipſius and Eraſmus. As to Lipſius, they allow that the charge againſt him is anſwered with ſolidity enough; but they pretend that I have vindicated Eraſmus in ſuch a manner as to plead my own cauſe in his perſon. They likewiſe blamed me for not mentioning the merits of CHRIST. But there were many reaſons for my omitting theſe and many other things. We knew Vulcanius very well, ſo did the reſt of his familiar friends. Certain it is, that in his extreme old age, when any body exhorted him to prepare for death, he fell into a violent paſſion: and we were ſo far from ever hearing him diſcourſe of CHRIST, or Religion, that we often wondered with what thoughts he comforted himſelf in his old age. For theſe reaſons I praiſe him in the funeral oration for ſuch things as are common to all learned men; paſſing over the reſt, leſt I ſhould ſeem to have had nothing elſe in view, but to ſuit myſelf to a preſent occaſion. Diſcourſes about CHRIST are not Delphic ſwords, which can be fitted up for any body. To conclude, thoſe who are diſpleaſed with theſe things, ſhould be adviſed to read the orations of Daniel Heinſius, wherein he praiſes Scaliger and Douza. For the ſame things may be and have been objected to him. Moſt noble Senator, adieu. Leyden, Nov. 1. 1614.’

If any one objects that I ought not to have revealed this great fault of Vulcanius, he muſt be ignorant that the public hath long ſince been informed of it; to which purpoſe ſee what we find in the Scaligerana: Vulcanius's religion is that of dice and cards; he knows not what religion he is of, nor is he acquainted with the difference of religions . . . . Vulcanius pretends to be one of our communion, but he doth not know what religion is (9).

(e) See the remark [A].

(7) Abrah. Scultetus, Narrat. Hiſtor. pag. 55.

(8) Meurſ. Athenæ, Bat. pag. 103.

(9) Scaligerana, voce Vulcanius, pag. m. 255.

W.

WART (BERNARD) a Dominican Friar, Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity in the ſchools of Thomas Aquinas of Poictiers, publiſhed (a) in the year 1650 a book intituled The Heretic overcome and put into his grave (b). It is an anſwer to the Motives of Converſion publiſhed by Giles Goffart who had turned Huguenot. The Jacobin inſerted them entire in his anſwer. Neither of theſe two books is of any value.

(a) At Poictiers.

(b) It is a book in 4to, of 230 pages.

WECHEL (CHRISTIAN) a famous Printer at Paris before the middle of the XVIth century. He was ſo correct in his editions, that the errata of a book in folio did not ſometimes contain above two faults (a). Thoſe who tell us that he firſt began to print in Greek in the year 1538, are miſtaken [A]. There are ſome Hebrew books which he printed in the year 1533 (b). By the catalogue of the books which came from his preſs before the year 1548, it appears that he was a diligent man, and that he printed a great many. This catalogue is at the beginning of the thirteenth book of Geſner's Pandects, with a very obliging Epiſtle Dedicatory. I mean by this that Geſner dedicated his thirteenth book to him. He was proſecuted in the year 1534, for ſelling a book of Eraſmus De eſu interdicto carnium, which was cenſured by the Faculty of Divines (c). Some authors ſay that he became poor, by a particular curſe of God, which fell on him, for printing an impious book [B]. ANDREW WECHEL, his ſon, was alſo a very ſkillful

(a) There are only two faults in the errata of Francis Burana's (a Veroneſe) Commentary in priora reſolutoria Ariſtotelis, printed by Wechel in folio, in the year 1539. See Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie, pag. 141, 142.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 296.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 353.

[A] Thoſe who tell us that he firſt began to print in Greek, in the year 1538, are miſtaken.] I had mentioned this epoch when I cited the 256th page of Mr Chevillier's tract of the origine of printing at Paris; but I have been informed by Mr Van Dale, that he has ſome Greek books printed at Paris, by Chriſtian Wechel in the years 1530 and 1531. Of this number are Hermogenes περὶ εὑρέσεων τόμοι τέσσαρες in 4to, and Lucian's Dialogues of the Gods. Theſe two books are in Greek only, and came out in the year 1530. Of this number are alſo the ſame Hermogenes περὶ μεθόδου δεινότητος, & περὶ ἰδέων τόμοι δύο, printed in Greek alone in 1531. I here return thanks to Mr Van Dale for diſcovering to me Mr Chevillier's miſtake.

[B] Some authors ſay that he became poor . . . . for printing an impious book.] Here is my evidence. ' In the year 1530, after the diſmal and prodigious leudneſſes related by our Hiſtorians, and Dr Cochleus, in ſeveral places, aroſe this abortive child of hell, who wrote a book againſt the Divine Juſtice, in favour of infants dying without Baptiſm, of which GOD be thanked, there is no more at preſent remaining than the bare title in Geſner's Bibliotheque; and ſeveral have wiſely obſerved, that the ruin of Chriſtian Wechel and his labours fell out as a puniſhment for his preſſes and characters, being employed in ſuch an infamous work. It was this wretched anonymous author, who under the borrowed name of Antony Cornelius, traced out the firſt lineaments of this Atheiſtical monſter, which by little and little, like a venomous ſerpent, is grown up, and by intricate meanders hath crawled in amongſt us (1).' That the reader may know more exactly what this book was, I am obliged to recite what Father Garaſſe ſaith of it in another place of the ſame book. ' The ſecond objection is not couched in ſuch elegant terms as the firſt, but it is incomparably worſe and more impious than that of Symmachus, and is taken out of that curſed anonymous author, who took the name of Antonius Cornelius, and compoſed a Latin diſcourſe againſt the diſtributive juſtice of the Creator, eſpouſing the cauſe of infants deceaſed before Baptiſm, and pleading pro and con, with texts and formal allegations of the law, by which he condemned the Divine Juſtice, and called its proceeding unjuſt, wicked, and inhuman . . . . Time, the laſt and moſt incorruptible judge of our performances, hath diſcovered the impiety of this wretched book; for Chriſtian Wechel who printed it, ſaw his riches moulder away before his eyes, without being able to ſtop the courſe of his ruin; and GOD be thanked, the book is ſo vaniſhed, that there is not a ſingle copy to be found in libraries, and at preſent, nothing but the title is left of that infamous and abominable work (2).'

Several things make me doubt of the principal parts of this ſtory. I. Father Garaſſe cites no authority, and affirms a fact which is falſe, viz. That the title of this impious book is preſerved in Geſner's Bibliotheque. It is certain that there is no ſuch perſon mentioned there as Antony Cornelius, and that he whom we find in the epitome of that work of Geſner, is not mentioned as the author of the tract, of which I am ſpeaking. II. If Chriſtian Wechel had printed a book of this nature in 1530, had he been left undiſturbed? Would he not have been more proſecuted for this attempt, than for ſelling a book of Eraſmus, which had no greater blemiſh than that of being cenſured as a ſuſpicious piece (3)? Would this Printer have been ſuffered to make any figure in Paris from the year 1530, to 1548 at leaſt? I expreſs my ſelf with this reſtriction, becauſe I have not been able to carry him farther than that year, in which I find that Conrad Geſner dedicated a book to him (4), and repreſents him as a moſt thriving Printer in the city of Paris. III. Andrew Wechel, his ſon, ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf amongſt the Bookſellers and Printers of Paris, that it is not at all probable that his father's eſtate was ſo miſerably impaired. IV. Laſtly, it is not perfectly agreed what that accurſed book which ruined him was; for ſome ſay it was that de tribus Impoſtoribus, a chimerical book which was never in being, if we may believe thoſe who are beſt able to give an account of things of this kind (5). ' Chriſtus Dominus . . . impoſtor atque adeo mendax & planus audivit non modò à Celſo . . . ſed etiam ab impio & immemorando homine, imo Dæmone corporato, cujus opus de tribus Magnis Impoſtoribus, Moſe, Chriſto, Mahumete, exitiale fuiſſe Wechelo, inſigni alias Typographo, ſed ejus libri peſtifero attactu funditus everſo, referunt qui legerunt, digni fide teſtes. Mihi inceſtare oculos tam infandæ ſcriptionis lectione, ad ingens ſcelus videtur pertinere (6). - - - The Lord Jeſus Chriſt was called an impoſtor, and conſequently a liar

(1) Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, pag. 19.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 298.

(3) Cum libellum Eraſmi de eſu carnium, ab Academia Pariſienſi tanquam ſuſpectum reprobatum, Chriſtianus Wechelus vendendum expoſuiſſet. Chevillier, Orig. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 353.

(4) The 13th book of his Pandects.

(5) See the article ARETIN (PETER), remark [G].

(6) Theophilus Raynaud. Hoplotheca, Sect. ii, Serie ii, cap. xiv, pag. 259, 260.

ſkilful Printer [C]. He retired from Paris to Francfort (d); ſome writers ſay, that it was

---

(d) Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, ſur les Imprimeurs. Art. xviii.

‘ a liar and cheat, not only by Celſus . . . but likewiſe ‘ by that wicked and infamous writer, or rather that ‘ devil incarnate whoſe book Of the three great impoſtors, Moſes, Chriſt, and Mahomet, proved fatal to ‘ Wechel, who, being in other reſpects a famous Printer, ‘ was utterly ruined by meddling with that peſtilential ‘ book, as it is affirmed by credible witneſſes who have ‘ peruſed it. As for my part, I ſhould look upon it as a ‘ very great crime to pollute my eyes with the reading of ‘ ſuch an abominable performance.’ By theſe four remarks I do not pretend to deny the whole narrative of Father Garaſſe; I only call in queſtion Wechel's ſuffering ſuch terrible effects of the Divine wrath, for having printed a book in the year 1530, and do not believe that the diſſertation concerning the puniſhment of infants, was ſo impious as he repreſents it. As for the reſt, I agree with him, that there was a book intituled, Querela infantium in limbo clauſorum adverſus divinum judicium, ab Ant. Cornelio (7) J. U. Lic. If we rely upon the title, it was printed at Paris by Chriſtian Wechel, in the year 1531, in 4to. There are two copies (8) of it in the Archbiſhop of Rheims's library. Without having read this tract, I conjecture that it is not impious, and that it is like that of Bartolus à Saxoferrato, and that of Jacobus de Ancharana. The firſt of theſe Civilians is author of a piece intituled, Proceſſus Sathanæ contra D. Virginem coram Judice Jeſu: and the other of a treatiſe called Proceſſus Luciferi contra Jeſum coram Judice Salomone. They introduce the devil entering an action, obſerving the formalities of the bar, and conſequently urging all his reaſons. Is it poſſible to repreſent him ſpeaking without making him utter impieties? And yet theſe two books are not impious. Every thing ends in the confuſion of the plaintiff.

(7) See Bibliotheca Telleriana, pag. 167. He is there called Cornellius, pag. 422, and in the Index.

(8) What Garaſſe affirms is not therefore true, that it is wholly loſt.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary I have read the book in queſtion (9). The entire title of it runs thus: Exactiſſima infantium in limbo clauſorum Querela adverſus divinum judicium apud æquum judicem propoſita. Apologia divini judicii contra Querelam Infantium. Infantium ad Apologiam divini judicii Reſponſio. Æqui Judicis ſuper hac re Sententia. Autore Antonio Cornellio Juris utriuſque Licentiato Doctiſſ. Lutetiæ apud Chriſtianum Wechelum in via Jacobæa ſub ſcuto Baſilienſi, anno MDXXXI. menſe Januario. This tract, containing about ſeventy pages in 4to, was dedicated by the author to Antony du Bourg, Lieutenant-Civil at Paris (10), and Preſident of the Council of Louiſe of Savoy, mother of Francis I (11). The Epiſtle Dedicatory is very ſhort, and precedes a Preface which is a little longer, and dated at Paris on the ſecond of January 1531. Antony Cornellius acknowledges his great obligations to the perſon to whom he dedicates his book, and that he undertook that performance at the requeſt of one of his friends, who knew that he had dreamed that the infants detained in limbo, complain of being diſinherited contrary to the diſpoſition of the law Plautius, which enacts neminem ex facto alterius exhæredari poſſe. - - - That no perſon can be diſinherited for the fault of another. He declares that their complaints are ill-grounded (12). Where is then the impiety? Doth it conſiſt in his citing ſome paſſages of the Scripture, and of the Civil and Canon-Laws which favour the infants cauſe? But does he not alſo alledge ſome that are contrary to them? and at laſt, after their reply, doth he not bring in the following definitive ſentence? ‘ Penſitatis diligentiſſime in utramque partem legibus, ‘ cenſeo infantes injuſte de divino judicio queri per tex. ‘ in c. regenerante de conſec. diſti. iiii fallit dicit lex. ‘ & fallitur qui parvulos non baptiſatos prædicat in ‘ condemnatione non futuros, cum dicat Apoſtolus ob ‘ unius delictum omnes homines damnari. - - - Having ‘ attentively conſidered the laws on either ſide, I am of ‘ opinion that children have no reaſon to complain of the ‘ Divine Juſtice. The law, ſays he, deceives one; and ‘ I am of opinion that he is deceived who affirms, that ‘ little children, not baptized, are not liable to be ‘ damned, ſince the Apoſtle expreſsly ſays, that by the of- ‘ fence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation.’

(9) Mr Bourdelot did me the favour to ſend it me from Paris.

(10) Antonio Borg Judici civili apud Pariſienſes.

(11) Præſes ſacri Conſiſtorii illuſtriſſ. D. Lodovicæ Galliarum gubernatricis.

(12) Non quod dubitem pueros illos juſta pœna condemnatos. Antonius Cornelius, in Præfat.

A Reflexion upon the complaints of ſome perſons, againſt thoſe who repreſent the objections of the Libertines with all their force.

Thus we ſee with what temerity Father Garaſſe mentions Antony Cornellius's book. Who can be ſufficiently ſurprized at his blunder? Perhaps ſome may reply to me that the infants objections are carried too far, and that it makes the faith of their Advocate ſuſpected. I ſhould not vouchſafe an anſwer to this ſcruple, if I did not well know that it is in the mouths of an infinite number of people, and objected againſt thoſe, who, without any diſguiſe, fairly repreſent the arguments of Heretics, or Libertines. Give me leave to anſwer thoſe gentlemen with this queſtion: If you were obliged to examine ſome of the controverſies in agitation betwixt the Chriſtians and the Infidels, would you, to the utmoſt of your knowledge, repreſent whatever the laſt could urge with the greateſt force in favour of their opinions? Or would you deſignedly weaken their arguments, that your readers might meet with nothing to render the victory dubious? You will undoubtedly anſwer me, that you would do the firſt of theſe two things, and that the ſecond is a fraud utterly unworthy of a man of honour, and much leſs excuſable in a ſervant of God. Wherefore then are you ſurprized to ſee the objections of the Infidels repreſented with all the force which natural reaſon gives them? You ſay you would do it your ſelf, if you were to refute them, and you agree, that ſwerving from this rule is to incur the guilt of an ignominious fraud. Learn then not to take all thoſe for prevaricators, who fairly ſhew the beautiful ſide of their adverſaries cauſe; and if they are obliged to confeſs that nothing but the Scripture can furniſh arms againſt certain objections of the Infidels, and that they recur to it as to the immovable foundation of their faith, be very well contented with their conduct; for otherwiſe the world will be apt to diſtruſt you, and to ſuppoſe that you endeavour to triumph by the aſſiſtance of a train of military ſtratagems, which are inconſiſtent with the Goſpel.

I have lately diſcovered one of the cauſes, which induce a great many people to ſuſpect thoſe of Libertiniſm, who propoſe the objections of the Libertines in their full force. A very honeſt and truly religious man ſaid to me a few days ago, mentioning ſome writers, whoſe zeal for the good cauſe is known to the whole world; you do not find in their books that the enemies of truth offer any thing conſiderable; the objections of the Infidels are propoſed there in few words, and they are amply and victoriouſly refuted: but in ſuch and ſuch writers who do not paſs for great zealots, they are very prolix and more ſpecious than the anſwer. I made uſe of the ſame queſtion as above. Did thoſe zealous writers know all that appears in the leſs zealous authors, or were they ignorant of it? If the latter, they are not to be praiſed for their ſilence, nor for their victory. But if the firſt, they deſerve a ſevere cenſure, as being guilty of a pious fraud, which truth ought never to ſtand in need of; and I am very ſure they would not dare to own that they have paſſed by the leaſt particular, which could repreſent in a beautiful light their enemies objections. Wherein then doth their zeal ſurpaſs the leſs devout writer, whom you was ſpeaking of? They ſaid all they could in favour of their adverſary before they anſwered him; hath the leſs zealous author done more?

We have ſeen ſome other miſtakes of Garaſſe in the article CORNELLIUS.

[C] Andrew Wechel, his ſon, was alſo a very ſkilful Printer.] I have read in the Hiſtory of Printing (13), firſt, That he was obliged to retire to Francfort, under the protection of the Count of Hanaw, on account of his religion about the year 1573. In the ſecond place, That his ſon John, who was married to one of the daughters of Jerom Drouart (14), Bookſeller at Paris, going to Francfort with his father, carried with him half the impreſſion of Polybii opera Gr. Lat. cum notis Caſauboni, in folio, in 1609; which is the reaſon why ſome copies of Polybius are to be ſeen with his name to them, though it be the ſame edition with that of Paris. Thirdly, That Andrew Wechel died at Francfort towards the year 1600. In the fourth place, that his ſon John printed books in the ſaid city of Francfort in the year 1583, and afterwards Diodori Siculi Biblioth. Hiſtoriæ Gr. Lat. in 1604, and other books which procured him the reputation of one of the moſt able Printers and Bookſellers of his time. On the firſt of theſe four things I obſerve, that Francfort being a Republic, not in the leaſt depending on the Counts of Hanaw, it is not at all likely that Andrew Wechel

(13) Written by John de la Caille, and printed at Paris in the year 1689.

(14) The author ſays, pag. 208, that it is an error, and that this Jerom was never married.

was after the Paris maſſacre (e). See the remark [B].

(e) Id. ibid.

ſhould, in that city, have put himſelf under the protection of thoſe Counts. Perhaps the time is here confounded; at leaſt it is very certain that Wechel's heirs kept Printing-houſes at Hanaw, towards the beginning of the XVIIth century; and it was then that they put themſelves under the protection of the Count of Hanaw. On the ſecond head I obſerve, that Caſaubon was not yet fifteen years old, when John Wechel retired with his father to Francfort, towards the year 1573. Wherefore it is impoſſible that this Printer ſhould have carried with him half the impreſſion of Caſaubon's Polybius. On the third I obſerve, that Andrew Wechel died on the firſt of November 1581, as may be inferred from the Preface which John Opſopæus, his corrector, prefixed to the commentaries of Peter Ramus on ſome of Cicero's orations, printed at Francfort apud hæredes Andreæ Wecheli, in the year 1582. Laſtly, I ſay on the fourth head, that his heirs who continued to print, were Claudius Marni, and John Aubri: which plainly ſhews, that John Wechel was not what the author of the Hiſtory of Printing repreſents him. The edition of Diodorus Siculus in 1604, was printed by Claudius Marni, and the ſons of John Aubri.

Obſerve, that Opſopæus, ſpeaking of the heirs of Andrew Wechel, mentions only Claudius Marni, and John Aubri, the ſons-in-law of that Printer (15); which obliges me to renounce the opinion I once was of, that John Wechel was the ſon of Andrew. A letter of Frederic Sylburgius, dated on the twentieth of June 1587 (16), informs me, that he did no longer lodge in the houſe of John Wechel, but with John Aubri. After this man's death, the names of his ſons appeared in the titles of books, joined with that of Claudius Marni, with whom they had ſeveral diſputes. ‘ Aubriani rationes reddi ſibi à Marnio volunt, & hæ‘ reditatem prorſus dividi; adeo ut aliquoties officina ‘ claudi debuerit, quum alias inter has occupationes ‘ ad calculos ſedere quiete nequeant (17). - - - - The ‘ Aubri's will have Marni to ſettle his accounts with ‘ them, and require that the entire inheritance ſhould be ‘ divided. For this reaſon they have been obliged ſome‘ times to ſhut up their ſhop, becauſe their buſineſs did not ‘ give them ſufficient time to ſettle their accounts.’ It is certain, that what they call typi Wecheliani, typographia Wecheliana, were in the hands of the Marni's and the Aubri's. During that time John Wechel printed ſeparately. I have, amongſt other books printed by him, the Paraphraſe and Scholia of Monlorius in Ariſtotelis analyticorum priorum, ſeu de ratiocinatione libros duos, together with the ſame Monlorius's tract De Entelechia, & de Univerſis, Francofurti in officina typographica Joannis Wecheli 1593.

(15) Opſopæus, Præf. Commentar. Petri Rami in Orat. Ciceronis. Note, that Opſopæus wrote that preface ſoon after Andrew Wechel's death.

(16) It is in the collection of Marquardi Gudii & doctorum Virorum ad eum Epiſtolæ, &c. which the illuſtrious Mr Grævius publiſhed at Utrecht in 1696, by the care of Mr Burman, worthy ſon of the late Mr Burman, Profeſſor of Divinity at Utrecht. See pag. 338, of that collection.

(17) Gothofredus Jungermannus, Epiſt. ad Scip. Gentilem, pag. 361, 362, of the collection Marquardi Gudii &c. Epiſtolæ.

There is a groſs error in the French tranſlation of Bongars's letters; there we find the following words: I have wrote to one of Wechel's men to take great care of them, which anſwer to this Latin, Commendavi eas Aubrio Wecheliano (18). - - - I have recommended them to the care of Aubrius Wechelianus; and theſe, I have ordered one of Wechel's men to ſend you the tract which you deſire, for Libellum de Murrhinis juſſu meo mittet ad te Marnius Wechelianus (19). - - - I have ordered Marnius Wechelianus to ſend you the tract de Murrhinis. Bongars wrote this in the year 1597, and his tranſlator hath made him ſpeak as if Wechel had been alive then, not knowing that the original expreſſed the names of his ſons-in-law.

(18) Bongarſ. Epiſt. clxiii, pag. m. 580.

(19) Idem, Epiſt. clxi, pag. 575.

As for the reſt, I have very good reaſons to believe, that Andrew Wechel left France before the maſſacre. I find in Melchior Adam, that Laurence Zincgref was very uneaſy at Paris in the year 1569, on account of money remitted to him, which was ſeized in Wechel's hands, He adds that Wechel was baniſhed the kingdom, that all his effects were confiſcated, and that his books being the greateſt part of them Proteſtant, were ſeized and carried away from his ſhop, in order to be publickly burnt. ‘ Multa ‘ hoc in itinere perpeſſus eſt indigna (Zincgrefius) tum ‘ propter alia incommoda, tum propter rei pecuniariæ ‘ penuriam: cum inter peregrinos agens à patre nihil ‘ acciperet: & illa, quæ ex principis liberalitate, nec ‘ non ſecretò à matre tranſmiſſa fuerant, interciperen‘ tur apud Wechelium, Bibliopolam notiſſimum; quippe ‘ cujus bona omnia confiſcata fuerant, ipſo regni limi‘ tibus proſcripto, reliquiſque ut plurimum Proteſtan‘ tium libris ab officinâ illius, Lutetiæ publicè com‘ buſtis (20). - - - Zincgref endured great hardſhips in ‘ this journey, on account of ſeveral inconveniencies, and ‘ eſpecially for want of money. He received no ſupplies ‘ from his father though he was in a foreign country; ‘ and what ſums were remitted to him by the generoſity of ‘ the Prince, and privately by his mother, were ſeized in ‘ the hands of Wechel, a very noted Bookſeller, &c. . . . Zincgref agreed with the Wechels to take in payment ſome of the books which they had ſaved from the Inquiſition (21). He afterwards received ſome other money from home, and went to Orleans, where he was admitted Doctor of the Civil-Law, in the year 1570 (22). Theſe things happened before the Paris maſſacre.

(20) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Juriſconſ. pag. 431.

(21) Cum Wechelianis tranſigere, proque pecuniâ ſibi debita libros nonnullos, quos clam adhuc illi ſervarant, ac confiſcatoribus Regiis ſubduxerant, ſumere coactus fuit. Id. ibid.

(22) Id. ibib. pag. 432.

Notwithſtanding all this, it is moſt certain that Andrew Wechel was at Paris on that cruel day. He fled into Germany in the year 1569, when thoſe troubles were brought on him which Melchior Adam relates, in which he had periſhed if the Preſident de Harlai had not done him good ſervice (23). He returned to Paris, and re-eſtabliſhed his Printing-houſe there, in the beginning of June 1571 (24). He himſelf relates (25) the danger which he run in the night of the maſſacre, and how he was ſaved by Hubert Languet, who lodged in his houſe. He teſtifies his gratitude to him in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Albert Krantzius's Vandalia.

(23) Languet. Epiſt. xlii ad Camerarium Patrem, pag. m. 80.

(24) Idem, Epiſt. lvii, ad eundem, pag. 104.

(25) In the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Albert Krantzius's Vandalia, printed at Francfort 1575.

WEIDNERUS (Paul) a Jewiſh Phyſician in the XVIth century, was invited from Udine a city in Italy, to practiſe Phyſic in Carinthia, where he ſtayed ſix years, receiving a very handſome penſion from the public. During this time he conceived ſome doubts concerning his religion, which obliged him to compare the Old and the New Teſtament together, and diligently to examine the expoſitions of the rabbins; and being convinced by this courſe of reading that Jesus Christ is the Meſſias, he reſolved to embrace openly the Chriſtian Faith. He wavered for about the ſpace of one year after this full conviction (a), and carefully concealed his thoughts, not being ignorant of the dangers to which he ſhould expoſe himſelf [A], if he let the Jews know the ſtate of

(a) Quamvis nihil dubitarem de fide Chriſtiana & certiſſima. Weidnerus, ubi infra.

[A] Not being ignorant of the dangers to which he ſhould expoſe himſelf.] To be firmly perſuaded that a religion is true, to reſolve to profeſs it, and ſuffer a great many conflicts of mind before the execution of ſuch a reſolution, are not incompatible things. Wherefore we ought not to charge Weidnerus's narrative with inſincerity. There are very few deſigns, the execution of which meets with more obſtacles than that of the change of religion; for not to mention other hindrances, do not we know that we ſhall thereby anger the perſons whom we love and reſpect moſt? Do not we know that we ſhall become odious and infamous to our relations? I ſay infamous, for all nations are uſed to fix an infamous idea on any man's forſaking his religion. They are not contented with calling him a deſerter, an apoſtate, but he muſt alſo be called a renegado (1). They affirm, that his revolt is an ignominious blemiſh to his family, and I have ſeen a devout woman who ſaid very ſeriouſly, that ſhe had rather ſee her ſiſters common whores, than go to maſs. Theſe hideous notions are neceſſary to the temporal good of a communion, and this is the reaſon why they are fomented. A Caſuiſt will not think it ill for a father to turn his ſons out of doors if they apoſtatize, or that in the like caſe, one brother ſhould never ſee the other, and a man ſhould abhor his wife, or a woman leave her huſband. The Proteſtants charge this ſort of perſecution on the Catholics, who alſo on their

(1) That name was uſed among the Proteſtants in ſome towns of France, to denote thoſe who turned Papiſts.

of his ſoul; but at laſt the intereſt of his ſalvation prevailed over the conſiderations of the fleſh; and leaving Carinthia, he removed to Vienna, where together with his wife and four children he was baptiſed in St Stephen's Church, on the twenty-firſt of Auguſt 1558. He was made Hebrew Profeſſor in the univerſity of Vienna, and publiſhed ſomething concerning the motives of his converſion, and to refute Judaiſm (b).

(b) Taken from the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Emperor Ferdinand, prefixed to his book De locis præcipuis Fidei Chriſtianæ, printed at Vienna, in the year 1559. See John Henichius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Rinthel, de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ, pag. 360, & ſeq.

their ſide, reproach the Proteſtants with it (2). Be that as it will, it is certain that this cuſtom very frequently ſerves as a ſcare-crow to thoſe who are perſuaded, that they ought to quit the church in which they have been educated. Here follows a paſſage of Mr Arnauld on this head. The deſign of changing ones religion carries with it ſomething aſtoniſhing, ſaith he (3), and even thoſe who are fully reſolved to execute it, can hardly bring themſelves to do ſo . . . . . I know that a young lady, the daughter of a very zealous Huguenot concealed for ſeven years from her father that ſhe was a Catholic; and during that whole ſpace of time, ſhe accompanied him to the ſermon and ſervice only abſtaining from the ſacrament, out of fear that he ſhould die for grief at the news of it. She cauſed me to be conſulted in this caſe, and being informed that I did not approve of this diſſimulation, ſhe reſolved, though with a great deal of difficulty, to diſcover her ſelf . . . . . . There may be alſo ſome, as it was in St Auguſtin's time, who are throughly convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion, but cannot break the bonds of cuſtom which drags them to the Proteſtant aſſemblies, nor expoſe themſelves to the reproach which they fear from their relations and friends, on account of their change, unleſs ſome other human conſideration, contrary to thoſe which I have mentioned, counterballances them, and hindering the impreſſion which they made on their minds, enables them to follow more eaſily the truth of which they are convinced. There are ſome communities, which believe themſelves ſo much diſgraced by the apoſtacy of a Monk of merit, and are ſo afraid that it ſhould prove a fatal ſcandal to the faith of the weak, as well as too great a ſubject of triumph to the contrary party, that they would leave no means unattempted againſt any perſon who diſcovers the leaſt deſign to deſert them. The Jews are of the ſame diſpoſition. Would they not have murthered Spinoza (4)? And did they not attempt to deſtroy our Weidnerus after his converſion? Porro, ſaith he (5), ‘ſimulatque res celari amplius non potuit, protinus à meis ſecundum carnem non mediocria propter fidei Chriſtianæ ſuſpicionem exſpectare pericula cogebar, quæ proh dolor! in hunc uſque diem mihi intentari video & experior. - - - - - Beſides, when the thing could be no longer concealed, I was immediately forced to dread no ſmall miſchief from my brethren according to the fleſh, on account of their ſuſpecting me to be a Chriſtian; and to my great grief I both ſee and know by experience that I am expoſed to the ſame dangers ſtill.’ Let us not forget a very terrible ſort of perſecution againſt thoſe, who change their religion. They are loaded with defamatory libels (6); their whole lives are ſtrictly examined; and if any blemiſhes can be found they are repreſented to the public with all ſorts of artifice in the moſt hyperbolical manner. The leaſt ſlips of youth are never forgiven them. If they have written any private letters in confidence to their friends, which may injure their reputation, they are publiſhed. In a word, for the intereſt of the cauſe, and to diſcredit the authority of the change, no ſcruple is made to turn into great crimes, thoſe very things which would never have deprived them of the eſteem and affection of any one perſon in the world, provided they had not changed their religion. See the remark [C] of the article SPONDANUS (JOHN).

(2) See Mr Brueys's book, intituled, Réponſe aux Plaintes des Proteſtans: it is mentioned in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Auguſt 1686, Art. 1. See pag. 879, of thoſe Nouvelles.

(3) Arnauld, Apologie pour les Catholiques, Part. ii, ch. xii, pag. 240, 241.

(4) See the text of the article SPINOZA, between the citations (b) and (c).

(5) Weidnerus, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Ferdinandum.

(6) Confer with this the words of Peter CHARRON, which I have quoted in his article, remark [P].

WEILE (a) (FREDERIC RAGSTAT DE) a German Rabbi was an early convert to Chriſtianity; for he was no more than three and twenty years of age when he publiſhed a book againſt the Jews. A little before that he had abjured their religion, and had been baptiſed in the Proteſtant church at Cleves. He was named Frederic after the Elector of Brandenburgh (b). The book I ſpeak of was printed at Amſterdam in the year 1671 in 12mo, and contains one hundred and fifty pages. The title of it is Theatrum lucidum exhibens verum Meſſiam dominum noſtrum JESUM-CHRISTUM, ejuſque honorem defendens contra accuſationes Judæorum, ſeu Rabbinorum, in genere, ſpeciatim R. LIBMAN NITZACHON. We find there ſome very extraordinary particulars touching the impoſtures of the falſe Meſſiah Sabbathi Tzebhi, who had made a great deal of noiſe in Turkey a little while before. Mr Lendt has related them, and beſtowed praiſes on our de Weile (c), who was Miniſter at Spiik near Gorcum in Holland. He baptized a Portugueſe Jew (d) there on the tenth of February 1686 [A]. The Flemiſh ſermon which he preached upon that occaſion, on the ſixth verſe of the ſecond Pſalm, was printed at the Hague ſoon after in 8vo.

(a) And not Welle, as in Konig's Bibliotheca.

(b) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory, of the Theatrum lucidum.

(c) Jo. à Lendt, de Pſeudo Meſſiis, pag. 63.

(d) Whoſe name was Aaron Gabay Faro, and to whom in baptiſm they gave the name of John Rodriguez.

[A] He baptized a Portugueſe Jew . . . . . .] The writings of Mr de Weile, and particularly the Flemiſh book which he publiſhed in the year 1683 (1), made a great impreſſion upon that Jew, ſo that he found himſelf diſpoſed to embrace the Chriſtian Faith, and deſired to confer with the author in order to get more and more light. Mr de Weile, who had at different times been deceived by two Jews, did at firſt reject the propoſals of this, but at laſt he hearkened to them and made him a Proſelyte. We find a narrative of the affair prefixed to a ſermon which was preached at Spiik by the ſaid miniſter, on the day that this Portugueſe was baptized.

(1) He ſhews there that Jeſus Chriſt is the Meſſiah, and expreſsly confutes Abarbinel, and Iſaac Ben Abraham, and Lipman Nitzachon: The ſecond edition of this book was printed at the Hague in the year 1684, and contains 709 pages in 8vo.

WERT (JOHN DE) one of the great warriors of the XVIIth century, was born in a village of the province of Guelderland, called Wert. We may ſee by this that he was a man of no family, ſince he was only known by the name of his village. . . . He was taken priſoner at the battle of Rhinfeld [A]. . . . . . .

For

[A] He was taken priſoner at the battle of Rhinfeld.] They carried him to Paris, and put him in ‘the caſtle of Vincennes, and as ſoon as he had given his parole, they were very glad to leave him at his entire liberty. He went to make his court to the King who received him moſt graciouſly. He was regaled by the moſt conſiderable noblemen, and went to ſee all the public ſhews. While he ſtaid at Vincennes he had a magnificent table kept for him, and the ladies of the firſt quality in Paris made it a diverſion to go and ſee him eat. He ſaid a thouſand handſome things to all of them; though his compliments did always ſavour ſomewhat of the German and ſoldier . . . . . He was an admirable drinker, and no leſs famous

For the reſt, his name did not only make a noiſe in the public news-papers, but reſounded alſo in ſongs: ſeveral were handed about of which he was the burthen, and theſe latter times have reckoned them ſo pretty that they have been revived oftener than once [B].

‘ famous for uſing tobacco. He ſmoked, took ſnuff, ‘ and pigtail. He was accompanied by ſeveral German ‘ officers, who had every one the ſame talents (1).’

[B] Several ſongs were handed about of which he was the burthen, ... they have been revived oftener than once.] Mr Menage (2) to prove that the word Tudeſque is elegantly made uſe of in familiar converſation to denote a German (3) quotes Mr de Montpléſir who has ſaid in one of his ſongs,

Faut-il ſe lever ſi matin,
Dit le Comte de Fieſque.
On ne dort non plus qu'un Lutin
Avecque ce Tudeſque.
Maugré-bieu de la nation:
Le Diable emporte Gaſſion,
Et Jean de Vert.

'Sblood! muſt we then ſo early riſe,
Said the Count de Fieſque,
Gobblins as well might ſhut their eyes,
As I with this Tudeſque.
A pox upon the Nation. May
The Devil take and run away
With Gaſſion and John de Vert.

Several verſes were compoſed to the ſame tune in the year 1690. Every body ſung them. Many more have been publiſhed ſince (4). I have ſeen in the Mercure Galant for the month of April 1702, a ballad, from which I ſhall quote two things: the one will confirm what I have ſaid in another place (5), viz. that drunkenneſs becomes faſhionable among women: the other will ſhew us whether Mr Chevreau, in the paſſages which I have quoted elſewhere (6), had reaſon to ſay that there prevails at this time a chaſtity of converſation unknown to our anceſtors.

A ſe barbouïller de Tabac
Trouvoit-on de la gloire,
Se piquoit-on d'un eſtomac
Qui fut ſi propre à boire.
Certaines Dames de ce temps
L'emportent pour ces beaux talens
Sur Jean de Vert, ſur Jean de Vert (7) . . . .
. . . .
. . . .
. . . .
Dans les cercles les mieux choiſis
Fort peu je vous aſſure
Imitent par leurs tours polis
Saraſin ou Voiture.
Je quitterois tous les vivans
Pour tels defunts l'honneur du tems
De Jean de Vert, de Jean de Vert . . . . .

Comme l'on ſe retire loin
De la galanterie
On ſuit en ſa place avec ſoin
La poliſſonnerie.
On dit des bons mots plus groſſiers
Que les Goujats des officiers
De Jean de Vert, de Jean de Vert (8) . . . . .

Was it a ſtriſe who ſhould be moſt
Dawb'd o'er with ſnuff like Tinkers:
And did our honeſt fathers boaſt
Of being ſturdy drinkers?
There are ſome ladies in our days
Who claim in both a higher praiſe
Than John de Vert, than John de Vert.
. . . .
. . . .
. . . .
In the beſt choſen circles you,
After ſtrict ſearch, will find,
Like Saraſin and Voiture few,
Of manners ſo refin'd.
I'd change the living all away
For ſuch dead men as grac'd the day
Of John de Vert, of John de Vert. . . .

The farther ſtill that we remove
From gallantry and wit,
The more we carefully improve
In waggery and ſmut.
Our dirty jokes would have offended
The very lackeys that attended
The officers of John de Vert. . . . .

Mademoiſelle l'Heritier tells us in the following quotation what the original of thoſe ſongs was. She ſays (9) that John de Vert having made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places in Picardy (10) carried terror to the very gates of Amiens by the parties which he ſent out. That terror diffuſed itſelf as far as Paris, and as people are ever apt to magnify objects the bare name of John de Vert ſtruck with terror, and became ſo dreadful, that the ſound of it was ſufficient to frighten children. When this General was taken priſoner at the battle of Rhinfeld (11) the people of Paris, upon hearing the news of it, diſcovered ſuch tranſports of joy that it would be difficult to deſcribe them. The Muſe of the Pont Neuf celebrated her joy to a trumpet-tune which was then in vogue: ſhe ſet forth the triumph of the French, and ſaid that they had beat the Germans and John de Vert. She related how they had taken a great many colours, a great many ſtandards, and John de Vert, that they had taken ſuch a number of priſoners and John de Vert. In ſhort, all the couplets of this Savoyard's (12) ſong, which were very numerous, ended with this burden, and John de Vert. As there was a certain ruſtick ingenuity in theſe ſongs, which at the ſame time had ſomething chearful in it, the court and city rung with them, and John de Vert and his ſongs were ſo much in faſhion that nothing elſe was talked of (13) . . . . That valiant ‘ General, ‘ whoſe name had made ſo great a noiſe, left in ‘ France an everlaſting remembrance of his captivity, ‘ and they called the time in which it happened, the ‘ time of John de Vert. The trumpet tune which I ‘ mentioned a little before was called the tune of ‘ John de Vert . . . . . Several men of wit both in ‘ the court and city did in imitation of the Pont Neuf ‘ make divers pretty ſongs to that tune, which had ‘ all a relation to John de Vert. In ſhort he has ‘ made not only himſelf but his tune immortal, ſince ‘ from his time to this there have not paſſed ten ‘ years together wherein ſome agreeable ſongs have ‘ not been compoſed to that tune (14).’

WESALIA (JOHN DE) a Doctor of Divinity in the XVth century, was very ill treated by the Inquiſition in Germany, for having taught ſome doctrines which diſguſted the Catholics. It is pretended that his converſation with ſome Jews diſordered his head, and occaſioned his falling into ſeveral extravagancies [A]. He was a famous preacher,

[A] His converſation with ſome Jews diſordered his head, and occaſioned his falling into ſeveral extravagances.] The plague having obliged him to leave Mentz, he retired to Worms, where he converſed with the Jews; as a Rabbi, converted to Chriſtianity, informed Orthuinus Gratius. This Rabbi was Victor de Carben, who embraced the Chriſtian Faith in the year 1515, being forty-two years of age, and became a prieſt, and lived to the age of ninety-two (1). He wrote ſome tracts in honour of the Bleſſed Virgin and the Church, which preacher, which the Monks, eſpecially the Thomiſts, did not love, and accordingly they were the principal authors of the perſecutions which he ſuffered. They accuſed him for certain propoſitions which they had heard him deliver in the pulpit; and obliged the Archbiſhop of Mentz to proceed againſt him (a). That prelate being unwilling to expoſe himſelf once more to the indignation of the Court of Rome [B], convoked an aſſembly of Doctors in the year 1479. John de Weſalia, who was then a priſoner in the convent of the Cordeliers at Mentz, was interrogated by John Elten the Inquiſitor, who was preſident of the aſſembly. He anſwered in the negative, to moſt of the queſtions put to him, and ſeemed a little to evade ſome others. Wherefore on the next day, the Inquiſitor declared with a great deal of eloquence [C], that he ought to be interrogated once more. His anſwers were much the ſame with thoſe of the fore-going day; but he had the confuſion to be convicted out of his own writings [D], of having taught principles which he had denied in anſwering the Inquiſitor. He ſubmitted to the puniſhment impoſed on him, which was to retract before all the people. His books were burnt; but ſome Doctors thought that this venerable old man was uſed too ſeverely, and that monkiſh paſſion had a great ſhare in this affair (b) [E]. He was confined to perpetual

---

(1) Mademoiſelle l'Héritiere, in the Mercure Galant, for the month of May 1702, pag. 77, & ſeq.

(2) Menage, Obſervat. ſur la Langue Françoiſe, Tom. ii, pag. 310.

(3) He confutes Father Bouhours, who has obſerved in the 349th page of his Remarks, that Tudeſque is only uſed by the French to ſignify the language of the old Germans. ibid.

(4) We find a ſong to this tune in a book which was printed in the year 1695, with this title, Le Porte feuille de Mr L. D. F.

(5) In the remark [F], of the article LYCURGUS.

(6) See the Explanation on Obſcenities, remark [A].

(7) Romance de Madle. l'Heritier, in the Mercure Galant, for the month of April 1702, pag. 298.

(8) Ibid. pag. 298, 299.

(9) Mercure Galant, for the month of May 1702, pag. 74.

(10) In the year 1636.

(11) In the year 1638.

(12) Concerning this man, ſee the remark [C], of the article DASSOUCI.

(13) Mercure Galant, ubi ſupra, pag. 76, & ſeq.

(14) Ibid. p. 81.

(1) Orthuinus Gratius, in Faſciculo rerum expetend. & fugiendar. pag. 325, Edit. Londin. 1690.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Taken from a relation of that trial, inſerted by Orthuinus Gratius, in the Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum, pag. 325, & ſeq. Edit. Londinenſ. 1690.

which Orthuinus Gratius turned into Latin. Is Victor quum achillicè adhuc valeret, mihi ſæpius retulit prætactum Johannem Weſalienſem è Moguntia ob peſtis metum Wormaciam ſe contuliſſe, atque ibidem cum Judæis Chriſti inimicis frequentem habuiſſe converſationem, eumque ab illis deceptum in putidam errorum ſentinam corruiſſe (2). There is no manner of appearance of truth in this ſtory; for the doctrines, for which John de Weſalia was condemned by the Inquiſition did not at all ſavour of Judaiſm.

[B] The Archbiſhop of Mentz . . . . . being unwilling to expoſe himſelf once more to the indignation of the Court of Rome.] The liberty which he had taken of condemning the avarice of that court had been fatal to him, and was the cauſe that not only he was deprived of his archbiſhopric, but Mentz was deſtroyed. The following paſſage expreſſes his name and family; ‘ Reverendiſſimus præſul Moguntinus Dietherus Iſenburgius miſit litteras ad Univerſitatem Heidelbergenſem & Colonienſem inſtigantibus, imo cogentibus Thomiſtis quibuſdam: veritus ne denuo ab epiſcopatu ejiceretur juſſu Romani Pontificis, quod commeruerat ante levibus verbis Romanorum in vendendis palliis notata avaritia. Et minabantur ei Romani præſulis iram, quam pridem non tam ipſe fuerat expertus, quàm tota Moguntia & capta & direpta, ac à victoribus nullum non contumeliarum genus paſſa. Unde ferunt Pium Pontificem ad Moguntiæ mentionem ſemper ingemuiſſe, quod jus ſuum tam inſigni damno vindicaſſet (3): - - - - - The moſt reverend Archbiſhop of Mentz, Dietherus Iſenburgius ſent letters to the univerſities of Heidelberg and Cologn, being incited, or rather forced, thereto by certain Thomiſts, and fearing leſt he ſhould be again thruſt out of his biſhopric by the Pope's orders, as he had been before on account of ſome ſlight reproaches which he had thrown upon the avarice of the Court of Rome in the ſale of preferments. They threatened him with the Pope's indignation, which had formerly fallen not only upon himſelf but upon the whole city of Mentz; for it was taken and plundered, and ſuffered all manner of indignities from the conqueror. Hence it is ſaid that Pope Pius always ſighed when he heard the name of that city mentioned, becauſe he had aſſerted his right in ſuch a deſtructive way.’ We ought not to be ſurprized that the agents of the Inquiſition, are ſo greedy of rendring people ſuſpected and amplifying things by malicious interpretations; for thoſe who find themſelves ſuſpected, are afraid of loſing their poſts if they have any, and break out into a thouſand violences, in order to take off the ill impreſſions that have been given of them. The inquiſitors do very well know that their odious ſlanders will produce this effect; wherefore they never make any ſcruple of calumny. To how many people may juſtly be applied this ſaying of Horace, you deſign to ſilence envy by forſaking virtue (4).

[C] On the next day, the Inquiſitor declared with a great deal of eloquence.] Thoſe who read his ſpeech on that occaſion, need not be advertiſed that I here ſpeak ironically. ‘ Adducto Johanne de Weſalia, dixit Inquiſitor: Tria jam futura in hoc actu. Primum quia M. Johannes heſterna die non ſatis reſolutus ad certos reſponderit articulos, iterum ſibi illos proponendos eſſe, ut luculenter & clare, plus maſticando, reſponderet: deinde ad quoſdam alios articulos heri non auditos quid ſentiat, reſpondere deberet: tertio relegi debere omnes articulos principaliores cum reſponſionibus, ut audiatur ſi adhuc in illis velit perſiſtere aut ab illis reſilire (5). - - - - - - John de Weſalia being brought before the Inquiſitor, the Inquiſitor ſaid that three things were to be done at that ſitting. Firſt, becauſe the ſaid John had not given direct and poſitive anſwers the day before to certain articles, they ſhould be propoſed to him again, that he might anſwer diſtinctly and clearly, by pondering more than he had yet done: next, that he ſhould be obliged to declare his ſentiments upon ſome other points, which had not been mentioned the preceding day: and thirdly, that all the principal articles, together with his anſwers, ſhould be read over, to ſee whether he ſtill adhered to them or was willing to depart from them.

[D] He had the confuſion to be convicted out of his own writings.] This poor man, broken by age and diſeaſes, was not able to expreſs his thoughts before ſuch a dreadful tribunal, and perhaps did not remember all that he had written. The Inquiſitors clearly foreſaw his negative plea; and for that reaſon they were not content with binding him by the moſt ſolemn oaths, but firſt of all they ſeized on all his papers. ‘ Mandavit eidem Johanni (Inquiſitor) ſub pœna obedientiæ, in virtue Sancti Spiritus, ſub pœna excommunicationis latæ ſententiæ (à quo nemo habeat ipſum abſolvere niſi ſolus Papa, vel ipſe Inquiſitor, niſi in articulo mortis) ut diceret plane verba veritatis ſuper interrogandis de ſua fide, ſine ambagibus, ſine verborum ſophiſticatione (6). - - - - - - The Inquiſitor charged the ſaid Weſalia, by his vow of Obedience, in the name of the Holy Ghoſt, and under pain of excommunication (from which no man ſhould abſolve him beſides the Pope and the Inquiſitor himſelf, unleſs at the point of death) that he would plainly ſpeak the truth in theſe things upon which he was to be interrogated, without any ſhuffling or equivocation.’ ‘ Concluſum quod M. N. Weſalia jusjurandum facere deberet, quod præſentare & tradere vellet omnes tractatus, opera, ſcripta ſua qualiacunque quæ condidiſſet, ut per proprios ſermones vinceretur . . . . . . Adjungebatur quod doctores Heidelbergenſes cum tribus aliis, ſcilicet Macario, decano Sancti Victoris, & quodam alio perſpicerent tractatus ejus, errores excerperent dearticularent (7). - - - - - It was concluded that an oath ſhould be adminiſtred to Weſalia, by which he ſhould oblige himſelf to preſent and deliver up all his treatiſes, works, and compoſitions whatſoever, that he might be convicted by his own words. . . . . . . It was added that the Profeſſors of Heidelberg, together with three more, viz. Macarius, the Dean of St Victor, and a certain other perſon, ſhould examine his treatiſes, extract the errors, and digeſt them into articles.’ It was therefore very eaſy to convict him on thoſe points which he improperly denied: ‘ Dum certas propoſitiones negaſſet ſe ſcripſiſſe, tractatus ſui propria manu conſcripti ei præſentabantur, quam revera literam eſſe ſuam non valuit negare (8). - - - - - When he denied that he writ certain propoſitions, they produced to him treatiſes written with his own hand, which he was not able to deny.’

[E] Some doctors thought that he was uſed too ſeverely, and that monkiſh paſſion had a great ſhare in this affair.] This is teſtified by the anonymous author of the verbal proceſs; who was preſent during the whole proceedings. ‘ Dempto ſolo articulo, ſaith he (9), de proceſ-

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Auctor Examinis Magiſtralis ac Theologicalis Joh. de Weſalia, apud Orthuinum Gratium in Faſciculo Rerum expetend. pag. 327.

(4) Invidiam placare paras virtute relicta. Horat. Sat. iii, lib. ii, ver. 13.

(5) Auctor Examinis Magiſtral. apud Orth. Gratium, pag. 330.

(6) Ibid. pag. 328.

(7) Idem, Auctor Examinis, apud eumdem, pag. 327.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 330.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 332.

perpetual penance in a monaſtery of the Auguſtins, where he died ſoon after (c). The Proteſtants have placed him in their liſt of the witneſſes of truth; which I am not ſurprized at, for he was condemned for ſeveral doctrines which they have ſince taught. What Coëffeteau offers in anſwer to this, hath no manner of ſolidity [F]. Weſalia taught at Erford (d). Conſult the article WESTPHALUS (JOHN).

(c) Trithemius, in Chronico Sponheimenſi, ad ann. 1479, apud Coëffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1213.

(d) Wimpfelingus, apud Wolfium, Lect. memorab. Tom. i, pag. 875, ad ann. 1464.

‘ ſione Spiritus Sancti in aliis videtur non ita gravi cenſura fuiſſe caſtigandus, ſi induciæ datæ fuiſſent, ſi conſultores ei fuiſſent adhibiti, ſi non omnes uno ſolo dempto, fuiſſent de via realium. Et niſi forſitan impetus quidam irrepſiſſet in religioſos triumphandi de ſeculari, & præſertim de eo qui illorum Thomam peculiariter non coluerat, forſitan poterat cum eo mitius, humanius, & clementius benigniuſque actum & proceſſum fuiſſe. Deum teſtor qui omnia novit hunc proceſſum qui cum eo ſervatus fuit uſque ad revocationem & librorum ſuorum exuſtionem, vehementiſſime diſplicuiſſe Magiſtro Engelino de Brunſuico, maximo Theologo, & Magiſtro Joanni Keiſerſbergio, duobus utique viris cum doctis, tum integris. Præcipue Magiſtro Engelino viſum fuit nimis præcipitanter cum tanto viro actum eſſe. Immo non verebatur aſſerere multos articulos ejus, & majorem partem poſſe ſuſtineri. Nec obticuit de ſimultate Thomiſtarum contra Modernos, & de gaudio triumphandi religioſorum contra ſeculares. - - - - - - Setting aſide one article touching the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt, he ſeems in other things not to have deſerved ſuch a ſevere cenſure, if they would have given him ſome reſpite, and allowed him perſons to conſult with; and if they had not all except one been Realiſts. Perhaps too, if the Monks had not been violently ſet upon running down a ſecular man, eſpecially one that had never ſhewn any particular reverence for their great St Thomas, they would have proceeded againſt him in a more mild, human, merciful, and good-natured way! I call GOD, who knoweth all things, to witneſs, that this proceſs which was carried on againſt him, till ſuch time as his books were called in and burnt, did highly diſpleaſe Dr Engelin of Brunſwic, a great Divine, and Dr Keiſſerſberg, two men that were famous both for their learning and integrity. Dr Engelin particularly was of opinion, that they had proceeded too raſhly with ſo great a man. Nay he did not ſcruple to affirm, that many of his articles, if not the greateſt part of them, might be defended. Neither was he ſilent concerning the ill will which the Thomiſts bear the Moderns, and the pleaſure which the Monks take in triumphing over ſecular Prieſts.’ He adds, that the Devil ſowed the tares of diviſion betwixt the Divines and Philoſophers, and ſo alienated their minds, that if any perſon denied the reality of the Univerſalia, he was immediately thought to have ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and to be guilty of a mortal ſin againſt GOD, Chriſtianity, Juſtice, and the State. Can this blindneſs proceed from any other cauſe but the devil, who, in order to divert us from all that is good, engages us in vain ſpeculations, which neither inſpire us with devotion towards GOD, nor charity towards our neighbour? Unde hæc cæcitas mentis niſi à diabolo? qui ne utiliora, ne honeſtiora, ne moribus, virtutibus, & ſaluti animarum conducentia diſcamus, phantaſias noſtras illudit, & trahit ad res minus ſalutares, & ad gelidas harum intentionem ſpeculationes quibus neque ad Deum devoti reddimur, neque ad proximi dilectionem inflammamur (10). This reflexion is very juſt, and ſufficient to mortify not only the Realiſts and Nominaliſts, but alſo other factions.

[F] What Coëffeteau offers in anſwer to this hath no manner of ſolidity.] Du Pleſſis Mornai did not forget to ſay that (11) John de Veſalia, Doctor and preacher at Worms, was accuſed before the Inquiſitors of having maintained the following propoſitions, viz. That the prelates had no authority to inſtitute new laws in the Church, but to perſuade the faithful to obſerve the Goſpel precepts, &c (12). Coëffeteau having in a different manner repreſented the opinions of this man, ſuch, ſaith he (13), as the Proteſtants themſelves relate them, exclaims thus (14), ‘Theſe are the extravagancies of the Preacher of Worms, of which du Pleſſis hath left out thoſe he found contrary, as well to his own, as the Catholic doctrine; namely the article of the proceeding of the holy Spirit from the perſon of the Son as well as the Father, which the Latin Church always hath aſſerted againſt the Greek. And it is certain that thoſe whom du Pleſſis alledges, who ſupported him againſt the Thomiſts, owned that he erred in this article; and as to moſt of the other points, he denied that he had aſſerted ſome, and endeavoured to explain others. But afterwards he publickly recanted in the church-yard at Mentz, in preſence of the Archbiſhop, and ſeveral eminent doctors of the univerſities of Mentz, Cologn, and Heidelberg; and, according to Trithemius, his books and writings were committed to the flames, and he in perpetual penance confined in an Auguſtin monaſtery, where he died ſoon after. Thus it appears what the Saumur witneſſes are. In the mean time the reader will remember, that the Proteſtant author, from whom we have cited the heads of his doctrine, hath couched them as he thought fit, in order to make them look leſs odious and more plauſible. Trithemius adds, that he aſſerted that there was not, nor ever had been any ſuch thing as original ſin, and that children were not conceived in original ſin. He alſo recites the other articles quite differently from the Proteſtant, who hath perverted the Abbot of Urſperg's chronicle, from whence thoſe who furniſhed du Pleſſis with them, made their extracts.’ Rivetus replied in favour of du Pleſſis, that it is true that John de Weſalia agreed with the Greek Church on the article of the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt (15); but that in his other propoſitions to the number of 23, he was taxed with the ſame errors with which the Proteſtants are charged, and this according to the enumeration, and relation not of a Proteſtant, as Coëffeteau falſely aſſerts, but of a bigoted Papiſt (16) who uſes the following expreſſions, impios Waldenſes, impiorem Weſalienſem, impiiſſimum Wiclefum, - - - The impious Waldenſes, the more impious de Weſalia, and the moſt impious Wickliff, to ſhew that he did not at all ſavour of Proteſtantiſm, and ſpeaking of this poor old man he reproaches him with childiſh dotage. In general, Rivetus is in the right, for John de Weſalia's propoſitions, cited by du Pleſſis, are in a book of Orthuinus Gratius, a very good Papiſt; but he was in the wrong to charge Coëffeteau with pretending here that Orthuinus was a Proteſtant. Coëffeteau did not cite the Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum, but only the continuator of the Abbot of Urſperg. It is at pag. 1188, and 1189, that he ſays that the author of the Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum was a Proteſtant and a Lutheran. Rivetus had a great deal of reaſon to correct him here (17).

Obſerve, by the way, that the author of the Préjugez légitimes contre le Papiſme hath been cenſured for alledging the Abbot of Urſperg's continuator in evidence. He hath been told that it is very well known, that the publiſher of that work was Cratomelius of Schleſtad, one of Melanchthon's diſciples (18). I believe the cenſurer meant Crato Mylius, for that is the name of the Bookſeller who publiſhed in the year 1537, the Abbot of Urſperg's Chronicle, corrected and continued by Gaſpar Hedion, Miniſter of Straſburgh. See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque (19), and the firſt tome of the Obſervationes ſelectæ, printed at Hall in the year 1700 (20).

(10) Ibid. pag. 333.

(11) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 598.

(12) You will find the other propoſitions of that Doctor, in the Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 598.

(13) Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1214.

(14) Ibid. pag. 1215.

(15) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. ii, pag. 631.

(16) That is to ſay Orthuinus Gratius. See what he ſaith of John de Weſalia above, remark [A].

(17) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 611.

(18) Critique des Préjugez, pag. 256.

(19) At the word Gaſpar Hedio.

(20) At page 307.

WESSELUS

WESSELUS (John) one of the moſt learned men of the XVth century, was born at Groningen about the year 1419 [A]; and having loſt his father (a) and mother in his infancy, was educated by the care of a good lady, who having but one ſon cauſed him to ſtudy with him. She ſent them both to Zwol, where there was a college, which was more eſteemed than that of Groningen. It was a ſociety of regular Prieſts of St Jerom, where youth were inſtructed. All thoſe that were educated there were ſhaven like Prieſts and wore the religious habit; but when they quitted the college they were free to wear what habit they pleaſed. So that though Weſſelus wore the cowl whilſt he ſtudied at Zwol, yet there is no reaſon to infer from thence that he was a Monk, ſince it is certain that he never engaged in a Monaſtical life [B]. It is indeed true, that early in his youth he had ſome thoughts which tended that way, but he refrained them as ſoon as he perceived that ſort of life charged with ſome ſhocking ſuperſtitions, and at laſt the inclination wore off. As his great natural parts were attended with an incredible application to ſtudy, he made a conſiderable progreſs in learning at Zwol, and even publickly inſtructed others there. He left that city in order to continue his ſtudies at Cologn, where he improved to ſuch a degree of learning, as not only rendred him highly admired, but ſuſpected of Heterodoxy. He conſulted the originals, and there found matter for difficulties and arguments which puzzled and ſurprized his maſters. He was by no means ſatisfied with their anſwers, that Ariſtole, St Thomas, and the Seraphic Doctor, &c. had ſaid this or that (b); and becauſe he applied himſelf much to the ſtudy of the Platonic Philoſophy, he thereby fell into a contempt of that of Ariſtole, which rendred him very diſagreeable to the Scholaſtic Profeſſors. He frequently croſſed the Rhine, to go to the monaſtery of Duytz (c) in order to read the works of the Abbot Rupert, of whom he was a great admirer. He was adviſed to go to Heidelberg, to read Divinity lectures there, and followed that advice; but the directors of the univerſity alledged that he was unqualified for the Divinity Profeſſor's chair, becauſe he was not yet promoted to the degree of Doctor [C]; and when he requeſted to be ſo, he was anſwered that the canons did not allow the admiſſion of Laymen to that degree. So that being reſolved againſt the taking of orders, he contented himſelf

(a) He was a Baker.

(b) See the remark [D], citation (12).

(c) Situated over againſt Cologn. Rupert, who is called Abbas Tuitienſis, was Abbot of that monaſtery.

[A] He was born at Groningen about the year 1419.] Others place his birth about the year 1400 (1): but it is probable that they are miſtaken, ſince two authors of Frieſland ſay that he died in 1489, at ſeventy years of age (2). If we believe Geldenhaur, he lived above ninety years, and his ſight remained ſo good to the laſt, that he never made uſe of ſpectacles either to write or read: Geldenhaurius nonageſimum eum annum ſuperâſſe narrat, integro viſu & auditu, ita ut nunquam ſpecillis uſus ſit, minutiſſimaſque literas & commodè legeret, & pulchrè ipſe pingeret (3). Hardenbergius doth not confirm this, but on the contrary ſaith, that Weſſelus, having never had good eyes, they grew ſo weak in his old age, that the continual blunders occaſioned by his bad ſight, in reading the Scripture before the Monks, rendered him the jeſt of his auditors. At quod ad viſum, Hardenbergius luſcitioſum eum fuiſſe, & ſenio quoque caligare oculos cœpiſſe tradit, ut cum ſemper die Cœnæ Dominicæ in Cœtu Fratrum veſperi pro collatione, ut illi vocant, legeret ſermonem Domini in Cœnâ habitum à cap. Joh. 13 uſque ad 18. frequenter à textu aberrans à Monachis rideretur (4). As for the age attributed to him by Geldenhaur, it is thus refuted: ‘ Quod verò ad ætatem, Suffridus Petri & Regnerus Prædinius, quibus ut Friſiis & in Urbe hac verſatis rectius conſtare potuit, unde ſeptuaginta annos vixiſſe affirmant, natum 1419, mortuum 1489 (5). - - - As for his age, Suffridus Petri and Regnerus Prædinius, who were natives of Frieſland, and lived in this city, had an opportunity of knowing it much better. Now they affirm that he lived ſeventy years, being born in the year 1419, and dying in 1489.’ The regiſters of the church where Weſſelus was buried expreſs the year of his death, but not that of his age: which if they had mentioned we ſhould have been more certain of Geldenhaur's, or Suffridus's error. ‘ Sepultus Groningæ, in Monaſterio, quod Spiritualium Virginum dicitur, in ipſo templi choro, non longè à ſummo altari. In libro memoriali templi illius hæc leguntur: Anno Domini 1489 obiit Venerabilis Magiſter Weſſelus Hermanni, egregius Doctor Sacræ Theologiæ, & in Latinâ, & Græcâ, & Hebræâ linguis multùm eruditus, & in tota Philoſophia quaſi univerſalis (6). - - - - He was buried at Groningen in the convent which is called the Convent of the Spiritual Virgins, in the choir of the church, not far from the great altar. In the regiſters of that church we find the following words: In the year of our Lord 1489, died the venerable Maſter Weſſelus Hermanni; an excellent Divine, very well verſed in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew tongues, and in a manner thoroughly acquainted with all the parts of Philoſophy.’

(1) As Hardenbergius, Seckendorf, Altingius, &c. See Seckendorf's Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm, lib. i, pag. 226.

(2) Vita Weſſeli, in Libro cui Titulus Effigies & Vitæ Profeſſorum Academiæ Groningæ & Omlandiæ, pag. 12, 13, & 24.

(3) Ibid. pag. 24.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

[B] It is certain that he never engaged in a monaſtical life.] This is affirmed, and frequently repeated in the tract from whence I have taken this article: ‘ Cucullum monaſticum ſive Franciſcanorum ſive alius ordinis nunquam induit. . . . Rogatus quare non ſaltem primam tonſuram adſumeret? dixit ſe non metuere patibulum quanto quidem tempore mentis maneret compos (7). - - - It is certain that he never put on the cowl of the Franciſcan, nor of any other order. . . . Being aſked why he did not at leaſt take the firſt tonſure, he replied that he did not fear the gallows ſo long as he kept in his right wits.’ Nay, we are there aſſured that he conſtantly reſiſted the importunities of the General of the Franciſcans, who preſſed him to aſſume the habit of that order: ‘ Is cùm eſſet eruditus & eruditorum fautor, ad ſe attraxit Weſſelum, tùm ut in diſputationibus, quarum avidiſſimus erat, & quotidiano exercitio ejus opera uteretur; tum verò ut ſui ordinis monachum eum poſtea faceret; à quo tamen Weſſelus abhorrebat. Sed uſus præſenti fortunâ in familiam ſe ipſius dedit (8). - - - As he was a learned man himſelf, and a favourer of the learned, he took Weſſelus into his houſe, that he might uſe his aſſiſtance in diſputes, of which he was extremely fond, and in his daily ſtudies; and likewiſe that he might afterwards make him a Monk of his order. Weſſelus had an averſion to that: but, embracing the favourable opportunity, he was glad to be admitted into his family.’ Notwithſtanding this a learned man pretends, that Weſſelus was a Franciſcan, in the following words. Wherefore Lewis XI commanded John Boucart, Biſhop of Avranches, to take care of this reform; he being aſſiſted by a Franciſcan, whoſe name was Weſelus Gransfortius of Groningen, who by his voyages in the Levant, had acquired a perfect acquaintance with Ariſtotle, and all the good Greek authors in each ſcience, aſſembled all the principal heads and members of the univerſity, and, with their concurrence and good advice, drew up and publiſhed an edict againſt the Nominaliſts, which we ſhall inſert entire at the end of this chapter, as a monument not yet printed, very much to the honour of our Lewis XI (9).

(7) Ibid. pag. 13, 14.

(8) Ibid. pag. 17.

[C] Becauſe he was not yet promoted to the degree of Doctor.] This objection furniſhes us with an invincible argument to confute ſome writers, who have ſaid, that our Weſſelus acquired ſuch a treaſure of erudition in the univerſity of Cologn, that he was made Doctor of Divinity, Law, and Phyſic, there. Geldenhaurius refert magno & aſſiduo & vix credibili labore hoc eum adſecutum

(9) Naudé, in his additions to the Hiſtory of Lewis XI, pag. 193.

himſelf with reading Philoſophical lectures : after which he returned to Cologn, from whence he went to Louvain, and having ſpent ſome time in hearing the lectures of the Theological Profeſſors there, he went to Paris. The Philoſophical controverſies being then very hot betwixt the Realiſts, Formaliſts, and Nominaliſts ; he endeavoured to convert the principal champions of the Formaliſts, by bringing them over to the ſect of the Realiſts ; and afterwards, he himſelf went over to the Formaliſts, and not finding that ſect more in the right than the other, he embraced the opinions of the Nominaliſts. Some authors ſay, that he travelled to Greece and the Levant [D], the better to learn the Greek and Hebrew languages. However that be, the reputation which he acquired, procured him the particular eſteem of Francis della Rovere, General of the Minor Fryers. He adhered to him, and if he was thereby obliged to ſee ſeveral blamable actions, amongſt tum eſſe, ut non ſolum Theologicæ Majeſtatis lauream mereretur, ſed etiam Jureconſultis & Medicis Doctoribus annumeraretur : adeoque ſummis in omnibus Facultatibus titulis fuit ornatus ; ut vulgò quidem perhibetur. Mihi tamen vix veriſimile videtur. Si enim jam tum triplici laureâ inſignitus fuiſſet Weſſelus, quæ ratio fuerit, quod poſtea admiſſus non fuerit ab Heidelbergenſibus, nullam aliam ob cauſſam, quam quod titulo Doctoris deſtitueretur. Pro exaggeranda ergo Weſſeli viri incomparabilis eruditione hanc de tribus titulis fabulam, & plura alia, jactatam jam olim fuiſſe credo (10).

[D] That he travelled into Greece and the Levant.] We have ſeen above that Naudæus affirms it. Others pretend that the name of Baſilius, given him by ſeveral authors, was beſtowed upon him by Beſſarion. They tell us that Beſſarion having been acquainted with our Weſſelus in Greece, at firſt by changing the U into B called him Bæſſelus, and afterwards Baſilius. The author already cited rejects theſe traditions, and doubts whether Weſſelus ever was in Greece. His words are : ‘ Hardenbergius pro Weſſelo Baſilium dictum ait, quod elegantiorum hominum auribus Weſſeli nomen nimis durum & veluti barbarum videretur : vel quod alterum quodammodo Baſilium magnum judicarent ; vel quod Beſſarion Cardinalis Græcus, quo ibi amiciſſimo uſus, ſuum B per noſtrum B quam V exprimere maluerit, atque pro Weſſelo Bæſſelum, ac mox Baſilium cœperit vocare. Quamvis vix videatur veriſimile aut in Græcia unquam fuiſſe Weſſelum, aut in ea familiariter uſum fuiſſe Beſſarione : cùm enim hic teſte Jovio jam anno 1434 in Italia vixerit, atque anno 1439 ab Eugenio Papa creatus ſit Cardinalis, debuerit Weſſelus ante annum XV ætatis in Græciam ad Beſſarionem abiiſſe : quod à vero abhorret (11). - - - - Hardenbergius ſays, that he was called Baſilius inſtead of Weſſelus, becauſe this latter name ſeemed too harſh, and in a manner barbarous to polite ears ; or becauſe they looked upon him to be in ſome ſort another great Baſilius ; or becauſe the Greek Cardinal Beſſarion, who treated him with great friendſhip there, rather choſe to expreſs his country B by our B than V, and ſo inſtead of Weſſelus, began to call him Bæſſelus, and preſently after Baſilius. But after all, it neither ſeems probable that Weſſelus was ever in Greece, nor that he contracted a friendſhip with Beſſarion there ; for ſince, according to Jovius, the latter lived in Italy as early as the year 1434, and was made a Cardinal by Pope Eugenius in 1439, it follows that Weſſelus muſt have gone to Beſſarion in Greece before he was fifteen years of age ; which is utterly falſe.’ A little farther he brings in Weſſelus boaſting of his travels in Greece. ‘ In diſputationibus Theologicis magnos titulos Doctorum contemnebat, ſolis Divinis literis firmiter adhærens. Quare ſiquis fortè inter diſputandum, ut fieri ſolet, ei objiceret, hoc dicit Doctor Sanctus ; hoc Seraphicus &c. ipſe reſpondere ſolebat ; Thomas fuit Doctor, quid tum poſtea ? Et ego Doctor ſum. Thomas vix latinè intellexit, & unilinguis fuit. Ego trium principalium linguarum mediocrem peritiam aſſecutus ſum. Thomas vix umbram Ariſtotelicam vidit : Ego Ariſtotelem Græcum IN IPSA GRÆCIA DIDICI (12). - - - - In Theological diſputes he deſpiſed the great titles of Doctors, ſtrictly adhering to the holy ſcriptures alone. Wherefore if any one in a diſputation objected to him as it uſually happens. This, ſaith the holy Doctor, this the Seraphical Doctor, &c. he generally made anſwer ; Thomas was a Doctor, what then ? I alſo am a Doctor. Thomas ſcarce underſtood Latin, and but one learned language ; whereas I have acquired a tolerable knowledge in the three principal tongues. Thomas ſcarce ſaw the ſhadow of Ariſtotle ; whereas I IN GREECE IT SELF HAVE STUDIED Ariſtotle in his original Greek.’ But in the ſame page looks upon this voyage as a fiction : ‘ Poſtea in Græciam abiiſſe creditur ; at ſi quis cogitet eo tempore non ſolùm literas in Græcia jacuiſſe, ſed totam quoque regionem bello arſiſſe, & hoc confictum fuiſſe cognoſcet. Ita de Petro de Aliaco quoque relatum eſt, quod Græcè exactè ſciret, per decennium in Græcia vixiſſe ; quamvis certum ſit nunquam Italiâ exceſſiſſe (13). - - - - It is thought that he went into Greece afterwards : but if any one conſiders that not only learning was then at a low paſs in Greece, but likewiſe that the whole country was engaged in a bloody war, he will know that this is alſo a fiction. In the ſame manner was it reported of Peter de Aliaco that he was a great maſter of the Greek tongue, and lived ten years in Greece ; whereas it is certain that he never went out of Italy.’ Let us alſo ſee what he obſerves on Weſſelus's anſwer to a ſcholar, who put a queſtion to him : Stay till I return from Egypt a ſecond time, then your difficulty ſhall be ſolved. My author imagines that by Egypt he myſtically meant Rome. ‘ In Ægyptum quoque profectus creditur Weſſelus noſter, perſuaſus omnes libros Solomonis, & totam illam glorioſam Bibliothecam Judæorum ibi adhuc ſervari : ſed reverſus ſolebat dicere ; fruſtra perfectionem abſolvi. Judæi enim totam bibliothecam ſuam perdere maluerunt, quam legere quod confiteri noluerunt. Quamvis ego ratione habitâ belli, quo eo tempore totus Oriens flagrabat, exiſtimarim Weſſelum nunquam profectionem in Ægyptum inſtituiſſe, ſed intellexiſſe Egyptum myſticam, ſive Romanam, juxta ſtylum Sp. Sancti, atque Cantero ſignificare voluiſſe, ſe nunquam Romam rediturum eſſe. Joannes Canterus, quem ipſe inſtituerat, & præter alia artem Raimundi Lullii eum docuerat, aliquando curioſiorem quæſtionem ei propoſuit : ad quem Weſſelus : Expecta donec ſecundò ex Ægypto rediero : tunc reſpondebo tibi ; deridens curioſitatem Canteri (14). - - - It is likewiſe believed that our Weſſelus went into Egypt, being perſuaded that all the books of Solomon, and the glorious library of the Jews there were ſtill preſerved entire. But he uſed to ſay after his return ; that his journey had been undertaken to no purpoſe : for that the Jews had rather choſen to deſtroy their whole library, than read what they were unwilling to confeſs. Nevertheleſs, conſidering the war which at that time raged over the whole Eaſt, I am apt to think that Weſſelus never undertook a journey to Egypt, but that he meant the Myſtical or Roman Egypt, according to the ſtile of the Holy Ghoſt, and only intimated to Canterus that he never would return to Rome. John Canterus, his diſciple, whom beſides other things he had taught the art of Raymond Lullius, did, at a certain time, propoſe a queſtion to him of ſomewhat too curious a nature ; upon which Weſſelus ſaid : Stay till I return from Egypt a ſecond time, and then I will anſwer you ; thereby ridiculing the curioſity of Canterus.’ All this ſhews that the life of Weſſelus is little known, and that ſeveral falſities are reported concerning this illuſtrious man. A Modern author aſſures us that Weſſelus went to the river Euphrates on purpoſe to ſee Ezekiel's tomb, and the antient library of the Jews ; an evident ſign of the contagious evil which perpetuates falſities. Let us hear this Modern (15) : ‘ Though Rabbi Benjamin maintains, that the Prophet Ezekiel's tomb on the river Euphrates, and the library of the firſt and ſecond temple were to be ſeen in his time ; nevertheleſs, the Sieur Weſſel of Groningen, and many other great men, who went to that country on purpoſe to ſee that tomb, and that library,

(10) Vita Weſſeli, pag. 14.

(11) Ibid. pag. 12.

(12) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.

(13) Ibid. pag. 15.

(14) Ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(15) Gallois Traité des plus belles Bibliotheques, pag. 14, 15, Paris Edition, 1680. See alſo Lomeier, de Bibliothecis, pag. 34, Edit. 1680.

amongſt other motives he was induced to it by the hopes of going to Baſil at the time of the Council [E], where he did not doubt but his maſter would be preſent. His hopes were not vain, for he ſaw that council, and made himſelf known to the learned men; he was alſo conſulted, and admired in ſome public diſputes. He returned to Paris with Francis della Rovere, his patron, and ſome authors ſay he was perſecuted there and even baniſhed [F]. His Mæcenas being elected Pope under the name of Sixtus IV, continued his favour to him, and offered him all ſorts of preferments; but he only aſked a copy of the Bible in Hebrew and Greek, which he obtained [G]. He left Rome and returned into ‘ library, have unanimouſly reported, that it was a dream of the Rabbins, and that neither of them were to be found. I went thither in vain, ſays the Sieur Weſſel (16), ſince the Jews have rather choſen to loſe all their books, than to read what they will not confeſs.’

[E] By the hopes of going to Baſil at the time of the Council.] The author whom I have abridged in the text of this article, ought to be cenſured here. He ſaith that Weſſelus having intrigued for the Formaliſts in their diſputes with the Realiſts and Nominaliſts, at laſt ſided with the Nominaliſts. Theſe things happened, continues he, at the time of the Council of Baſil, when Weſſelus was already become a domeſtic to Pope Nicolas V, by the recommendation of Francis della Rovere, General of the Franciſcans, who was afterwards Sixtus IV, and who founded the Vatican Library. ‘ Erant hæc ſub id tempus, quo Concilium Baſileenſe celebrabatur. Ipſe autem jam pervenerat propter celeberrimam famam & incredibilem eruditionem in omni genere diſciplinarum & artium in familiam Nicolai V, Pontificis Maximi, operâ Franciſci à Ruvere, Generalis miniſtri Fratrum Minorum, qui poſtea Papa creatus Sixtus IV vocatus eſt, primuſque fundamenta jecit celebratiſſimæ illius Bibliothecæ, quæ à loco vulgo Vaticana vocatur . . . (17) . . . . in qua (familia Fr. à Ruvere) multa digna & indigna, quædam etiam pia, ſed pleraque impia vidit & expertus eſt. Obduruit tamen, ut per illum in notitiam omnium doctorum Virorum magis magiſque perveniret, & liberis ſine periculo diſputare poſſet, ſimulque nanciſci liberam occaſionem admonendi hominis de vitandis idololatricis ſuperſtitionibus & apertis obſcœnitatibus monaſticis; maximè verò, ut via aperiretur, quâ pervenire poſſet in Synodum Baſileenſem, in quam ſciebat Franciſcum, utpote totius Ordinis Supremum, vocatum iri, quod & contigit. Nam paulò poſt eo profectus eſt, & operâ Domini ſui in Doctiſſimi cujuſque notitiam pervenit, & ad multa conſilia adhibitus eſt, & publicè aliquoties auditus diſputare cum ſumma omnium admiratione (18). - - - - Theſe things happened at the time that the Council of Baſil was held. Weſſelus, on account of his great reputation and incredible learning in all the different arts and ſciences, was already in Pope Nicholas Vth's family, by the recommendation of Francis della Rovere, General of the minor Friars, who was afterwards created Pope, under the name of Sixtus IV, and was the firſt who laid the foundation of that moſt famous library, which, from the place, is commonly called the Vatican . . . . In which family (of Francis della Rovere) he was an eye-witneſs to many good and many bad actions, to ſome piety, but to a great deal of wickedneſs. Notwithſtanding he continued there, that by his means he might become more and more acquainted with all the learned men, and be more at liberty to diſpute without running any riſque, and at the ſame time have opportunities of freely admoniſhing his patron to ſhun the idolatrous ſuperſtitions and public obſcenities of the Friars; but, above all, that he might find means to go to the Council of Baſil, in which he knew that Francis, as General of the whole order, would aſſiſt. The thing fell out as he deſired: for in a ſhort time after he went thither, and by the recommendation of his maſter became acquainted with the moſt learned men, he was often conſulted, and ſometimes heard to diſpute with univerſal applauſe.’ There are ſeveral miſtakes in theſe words. I. The Council of Baſil began in the year 1431, and ended, properly ſpeaking, in 1443: and therefore ſince the author, whom I am cenſuring, ſuppoſes 1419 to be the year of Weſſelus's birth, he cannot, with any colour of reaſon ſay, that this Doctor was very much admired at Baſil during the ſeſſion of that Council. Obſerve, that according to him, Weſſelus's journey to Baſil was poſterior to his long reſidence at Cologn, to his journey to Heidelberg, to his return to Cologn, to his journey to Louvain, as well as to Paris, to all his intrigues in favour of the Formaliſts againſt the Realiſts, and laſtly to his adhering to the ſect of the Nominaliſts. If you ſuppoſe that our Weſſelus was not at Baſil before the laſt year of the Council, it were ſtill true that he had done what I have juſt now mentioned before the age of twenty-four years; which cannot be ſaid without a great abſurdity, and nothing can be more falſe. II. Nicolas V was not elected Pope before the year 1447, and conſequently was not in the Pontifical chair, during the ſeſſion of the Council of Baſil. That Pope is ſaid to be the founder of the Vatican Library (19). It is true, that others aſcribe that glory to Sixtus IV. Both may be in the right in ſeveral reſpects, therefore I do not charge what our author ſays on that head as a fault. III. It is falſe that Francis della Rovere ſat in the Council of Baſil as General of the Franciſcans. He was born in the year 1414. He run through his courſe of ſtudy by the age of twenty-two, and taught afterwards publickly for ſeveral years before he was made aſſiſtant to the General of his order, who was ſucceeded by three Generals before Francis della Rovere attained that dignity (20). Hence it plainly appears that it is impoſſible he ſhould have been poſſeſſed of that poſt during the Ceſſion of the Council of Baſil, the concluſion of which happened in the year 1441, or, as others will have it, in 1443.

[F] Some ſay that he was perſecuted at Paris, and even baniſhed.] This particular is very uncertain: Hardenbergius declares that he never heard it mentioned by any of thoſe who had been acquainted with Weſſelus. ‘ Cum Domino ſuo Franciſco, Generali miniſtro, reverſus eſt Lutetiam ubi multa expertus eſt, multa etiam paſſus, ita ut quidam ſcribant, illum Scholâ aut Urbe pulſum eſſe propter reprehenſas ſuperſtitiones: quod tamen Hardenburgius à nemine unquam ſibi auditum eorum ait, qui cum illo domeſticè verſati ſunt. Et certum eſt, illum plus minùs ſedecim annos Pariſiis verſatum eſſe, & cum Domino ſuo, jam in Papam electo, unà Romam profectum. Unde non videtur veriſimile, Papam & eundem Monachum & quidem Minoritanum monachum, paſſurum eum fuiſſe, ſi à Schola Theologica Pariſienſi proſcriptus fuiſſet antea. Fieri potuit, quod poſtea illuc reverſus pulſus ſit (21). - - - - He returned with his maſter Francis, General of the Friars minors, to Paris, where he ſuffered ſeveral hardſhips. Some even ſay that he was baniſhed the ſchool or city, for having cenſured certain ſuperſtitions. But Hardenburgius declares that he never heard it mentioned by any of thoſe who moſt frequented his houſe. Certain it is that he lived ſixteen years at Paris, and went to Rome with his maſter upon his being choſen Pope: whence it does not ſeem probable that a Pope, who had been not only a Friar, but a Friar minor, would have ſuffered him, if it had been true, that was baniſhed from the Divinity-ſchool at Paris before. Poſſibly ſuch a thing may have happened to him after his return.’ Obſerve, that the edict of Lewis XI againſt the Nominaliſts is dated on the firſt of March 1473 (22). Wherefore if it was true that Weſſelus had been aſſiſtant to John Bouchart, Biſhop of Avranches in the preliminaries of that edict (23), he would have been a very conſiderable man in France, even during the Papacy of Sixtus IV.

[G] He only aſked a copy of the Bible . . . which he obtained.] The Pope thought this was a very ſilly requeſt; Why do not you rather aſk a miter, or ſomething like it, ſaid he? Becauſe I have no need of any ſuch thing, anſwered Weſſelus. He choſe the good part, but he expoſed himſelf to the ralleries of the worldlings. Reſpondit Sixtus; Hæc nobis curæ erunt, tu pro te aliquid pete. Rogo ergo, inquit Weſſelus, ut mihi detis ex Bibliotheca Vaticana Græca & Hebræa Biblia. Ea, inquit Sixtus, tibi dabuntur: Sed tu ſtulte, quare non petis Epiſcopatum aliquem aut ſimile quidpiam? Reſpondit Weſſelus, quia iis non indigeo. Hæc ipſa Ebræa

(16) This word Sieur, ſhews that the author was very ill acquainted with our Weſſelus.

(17) What is wanting here is to be found above in citation (8).

(18) Vita Weſſeli, pag. 17.

(19) See Father Jacob, Traité des Bibliotheques, pag. 84. Lomeier, de Bibliothecis, pag. 194, & ſeq.

(20) Taken from a manuſcript Memoir imparted by a perſon, whom I cauſed to be conſulted.

(21) Vita Weſſeli, inter Vitas Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 17.

(22) See Naudé, ubi ſupra, pag. 223.

(23) See Naudé's words in the remark [B].

into his native country, where he got the affection and eſteem of all men. He died at Groningen on the fourth of October 1489. He was perplexed with ſome doubts concerning the Chriſtian religion during his laſt ſickneſs, but at length they entirely vaniſhed away (d) [H]. It is beyond queſtion that his opinions were in ſeveral particulars contrary to thoſe of Rome [I]; and he has been juſtly called Luther's fore-runner, I muſt not forget in this place that he is cited under different names [K]. Part of his writings

(d) Taken from his Life among thoſe of the Profeſſors of Groningen, pag. 12, & ſeq.

Biblia diu hæſerunt Groningæ, apud virgines Spirituales, eorumque adhuc hodie quædam fragmina ſuperſunt (24). Others ſay that it was Nicolas V, of whom he aſked this preſent. ‘ Tantò eum promovendarum litterarum Hebraicarum ſtudio flagraſſe accepimus, ut, cùm Romam profectus Nicolao Pontifici gratiſſimus eſſet, iſque ampliſſima Weſſelo munera offerret, his omnibus repudiatis unicum modò petierit & obtinuerit, Biblia Hebræa MSS. ſibi ut liceret è Bibliotheca Vaticana in Belgium aſportare (25). - - - He had ſuch a prodigious deſire to promote the Hebrew tongue, as we have been informed, that when he went to Rome, and was in high favour with Pope Nicholas, who offerred him very conſiderable preſents, he refuſed every thing elſe, and only begged that he might be allowed to carry from the Vatican Library to Holland, a manuſcript of the Hebrew Bible, which he obtained.’

[H] He was perplexed with ſome doubts concerning the Chriſtian religion . . . . but at length they entirely vaniſhed.] Doubts of this kind more rarely occur in a death-bed than in the vigour of youth. Wherefore for the rarity of the thing I ſhall ſet down the whole narrative. ‘ Illapſum in morbum, qui etiam vitæ ipſi finem attulit, cum amicus quidam inviſeret, utque valeret interrogaret: Reſpondit, ſe pro ſua ætate & morbi moleſtia utcunque valere; ſed unum admodum moleſtum ſibi eſſe, quod variis cogitationibus & argumentationibus circumactus de veritate Chriſtianæ religionis ſubdubitare inciperet. Obſtupeſcebat ille, ac hortari ægrum cepit, ut omnes cogitationes ſuas in Chriſtum Servatorem unicum rejiceret. Sed cùm hujuſmodi admonitionem ei moleſtiorem eſſe ſenſiſſet, triſtis tum abiit. Atque poſt unam vel alteram horam reverſum ad ſe cùm Weſſelus vidiſſet, alacri animo, & quantum valetudo ſinebat exſultans dixit; Gratias ago Deo, omnes illæ vanæ diſputationes abierunt: & nihil ſcio, niſi Jeſum & hunc crucifixum. Et in hac confeſſione animam DEO reddidit (26). - - - In his laſt ſickneſs, when a friend, who came to ſee him, aſked him how he did, he anſwered, That conſidering his age, and the nature of his illneſs, he was pretty well; but that one thing gave him great uneaſineſs; which was, that being perplexed with various reflexions and reaſonings, he began to call in queſtion the truth of the Chriſtian religion. His friend was aſtoniſhed at this, and exhorted him to turn all his thoughts towards the only Saviour JESUS CHRIST. But when he found that ſuch an admonition diſpleaſed him, he went away with concern. About two hours after, when Weſſelus ſaw that he was come back, he ſaid, with a chearful mind, and with as much joy as his weakly condition would ſuffer him to expreſs; I thank GOD that all my vain doubts are vaniſhed: and now I know nothing but CHRIST, and him crucified; and, with this confeſſion, he expired.’

[I] His opinions were contrary to thoſe of Rome.] See the Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, and conſult alſo le Myſtere d'Iniquité, where you will find theſe words: ‘ At the ſame time, tho' ſomewhat younger, lived Dr Weſſelus of Groningen, called the light of their world, who in one of his letters diſcovers, that after the Inquiſitors had condemned John de Weſſalia, he expected they ſhould fall upon him, and ſaith, that at Paris and Rome, he defended his opinions againſt ſeveral articles of the Church of Rome; and that ſome even of the court had approved of them: and it is plainly to be collected from his writings, that they were very little different from the confeſſion of the Vaudois. Likewiſe in his book concerning ſubjects and ſuperiors, he aſſerts that the Pope may err, and that when he doth ſo he ought to be reſiſted; that by his Simony and ill adminiſtration, he clearly enough diſcovers that he neither regards GOD, nor the ſalvation of his church; that his commands are no farther obligatory than they are conſiſtent with the word of GOD; that his excommunications are leſs to be feared than thoſe of any good and learned men: whence it was that the Council of Conſtance regarded John Gerſon more than John XXIII; and good men long before that regarded St Bernard more than Pope Eugenius. His works are ſeverally printed at Leipſic, Antwerp, and Baſil, (27).’ It is obſerved in his life that he had been overwhelmed by the tempeſt which bore down John de Weſalia, in the year 1479, if David of Burgundy, Biſhop of Utrecht, his good patron, had not ſupported him. Quibus (fratribus prædicatorii ordinis hæreticæ pravitatis inquiſitoribus) non minus quam coævus & amicus Joannes Weſalienſis jam anno 1479, ſuccubuiſſet, niſi Epiſcopi Ultrajectini Davidis de Burgundia (cui non quidem Medicus erat Weſſelus, ut multi perperam tradiderunt, ſed dilectus Cliens) autoritas eum protexiſſet (28). To all theſe may be added the words of Luther, which I have cited in the article of SIXTUS IV (29), and Mr Seckendorf's extracts of Weſſelus's works (30).

[K] He is cited under different names.] In the collection of the Groningen Profeſſors, his life begins thus: ‘ Weſſelus Groningenſis . . . . diverſis aliàs & nominibus inſignitus, & elogiis celebratus. In Chronici Urſpergenſis Paralipomenis Magiſter Joannes Weſſelus Groningenſis nominatur. In libro memoriali templi Groningani quo ſepultus Weſſelus Hermanni, Pelantino (qui ad annos plures fuit Archiater Davidis Burgundi Epiſcopi Ultrajectini) Weſſelus Goſvoert, Alberto Hardenbergio Goeſvort, Geldenhaurio Gansfortius vocatur. Rodolphus Agricola in epiſtolis ad Reuchlinum, aliique, Baſilium vel Baſilium Phriſium eum indigitant. Quarum appellationum diverſitas, Friſicorum nominum non ignaro, facilè agnoſcetur, quo fonte promanârit. Nempè Joannis nomen ei proprium ex ſacro Baptiſmate videtur, Hermanni à patris, Weſſeli ab avi nominibus adſcitum, quod poſtremum in Græcia, (ut vulgo creditur) aut potius ſupra ſeculum Græcorum linguâ imbutus, ad ejus ſonum vel ipſe inflexit, vel detortum ab aliis admiſit, ut Baſilius diceretur (31) . . . . Goſvoerti autem ſeu Goeſeforti, aut Ganſefortii cognomen, dialecto illud Weſtphalicâ, hoc Germanicâ anſerum vadum ſonans (Weſtphalis enim Goos vel Goes eſt, quæ Germanis olim teſte Plinio 10. 22. hodieque Ganſa) ſuſpicari liceat inde ei obveniſſe, quod majores fortè ex vicina Weſtphalia (ut multæ aliæ honeſtæ hujus Urbis familiæ) huc commigrâſſent, quum illud nomen villæ non procul Harena, hodieque maneat. Cæteræ appellationes Patriam teſtentur. - - - Weſſelus of Groningen . . . . had ſeveral names given him, and various encomiums. In the Paralipomena of the chronicle of Urſperg, he is called John Weſſelus of Groningen. In the regiſter of that church, where he lies buried, he is named Weſſelus Hermanni. By Pelantinus (who was for ſeveral years Phyſician to David of Burgundy, Biſhop of Utrecht) he is called Weſſelus Goſvoert, Goeſvort, by Albertus Hardenbergius, and Gransfortius by Geldenharius. Rodolphus Agricola, in his letter to Reuchlinus, and other authors, call him Baſilius, or Baſilius Phriſius. Such perſons as are not unacquainted with the Frieſland names will readily perceive whence theſe different appellations proceed. John was his chriſtian name. He was called Hermanni after his father, and Weſſelus after his grandfather. This laſt name was changed into that of Baſilius when he was in Greece, (as it is commonly believed) or rather becauſe he was an extraordinary maſter of that language, he was willing his name ſhould have a Greek ſound; for which reaſon he either made that alteration himſelf, or allowed of it when made by others . . . . As for the ſirname Goſvoert or Goeſefort, and the ſirname Ganſefortius, the one in the Weſtphalian, and the other in the German dialect, ſignifying the ford of the Geeſe, (for the Weſtphalians call Goos or Goes what the Germans of old, according to Pliny 10. 2. and even to this day, call Gans) they were probably owing to this, that his forefathers came hither from the neighbouring Weſtphalia (as many other honeſt families of this city have done); and where there is a village near Harena, which ſtill retains that name. His other appellations denote his country.’

(24) Vita Weſſeli, ubi ſupra, pag. 18. This is mentioned as a thing which Weſſelus had frequently related.

(25) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 849.

(26) Vita Weſſeli, ubi ſupra, pag. 24.

(27) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 569. See alſo pag. 572, 573.

(28) Vita Weſſeli, ubi ſupra, pag. 21, 22.

(29) Citat. (20).

(30) Seckend. Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. 1, pag. 226, & ſeq.

(31) What is wanting here is to be ſeen in citation (20), of the article SIXTUS IV.

writings are loſt [L].

[L] Part of the writings are loſt.] He made a great many collections out of the works of the Abbot Rupert, and of ſeveral others, to which he added his own reflexions. Theſe rhapſodies ſwelled to ſuch an unweildy bulk under his pen, that he called them Mare magnum, - - the great Sea. Several of them were preſerved in the monaſtery of mount Saint Agnes, but the ſending of the manuſcript to ſome learned men of Holland and Zealand, occaſioned the entire loſs of it (32). After the death of Weſſelus the Monks and ſome other perſons burnt all the manuſcripts which they found in his cloſet (33). Whatever eſcaped the flames was printed at Groningen in the year 1614, and at Amſterdam in 1617 (34). Valerius Andreas quotes theſe two editions, but inſtead of telling us that the firſt was at Groningen, he ſaith it was at Arnheim (35). But poſſibly he might find Arnhemii in the title of his copy without the book being ever printed there, by reaſon it is cuſtomary amongſt Bookſellers to allow a correſpondent, who buys of them a certain number of copies, to inſert his name in the title-page as well as he who printed them. It is probable that the Groningen Bookſeller allowed that of Arnheim this liberty. This cuſtom very frequently impoſes on the Bibliographers, and occaſions their unneceſſary multiplication of editions.

I ought not to forget that ſeveral tracts of our Weſſelus appeared in print before the compleat edition of his works, in the year 1614. Some were publiſhed at Leipſic in 1522, with the title of Farrago Rerum Theologicarum, and a Preface by Martin Luther. It was reprinted at Baſil in 1523, by Adam Petri, &c.

WESTPHALUS (JOHN) an imaginary perſon, who Moreri tells us was ſo named becauſe born in Weſtphalia. He adds, that he was a Lutheran Heretic, ‘who about the year 1533, began to preach abominable errors; particularly that the Scripture doth not ſay that the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from the Son; that the Church hath erred, and ſeveral other impoſtures worthy of Hell, from whence they proceeded.’ He cites Prateolus v. Veſt. Gautier in Chron. But we ſhall prove all this to be chimerical [A]. Not but that there was one JOHN DE WESTPHALIA; but he was a Printer, who ſettled at Louvain in the year 1475 [B].

[A] We ſhall prove all this to be chimerical.] I cannot accuſe Moreri of having cited Prateolus falſely; for that writer doth indeed affirm (1) that John Weſtphalus, ſeu de Weſtphalia ſuperiore, a German, and a Doctor of Divinity, was very much infected with the Hereſy of Martin Luther, and that his books were burnt at Mentz in the time of Charles VI and of Pope Clement VII, about the year 1533. He mentions ſeventeen erroneous tenets of the ſame man, and then concludes with theſe words: ‘Hi ergo ſunt articuli, qui (authore Bernardo de Luxemburgo ſacrarum literarum profeſſore, Ordinis Prædicatorii, in ſuo Catalogo hæreticorum) per fratrem Gerardum de Elthen inquiſitorem fidei, & patrem Jacobum Sprenger, doctores itidem ſacræ paginæ, ejuſdem Ordinis Prædicatorii, conventus Colonienſis, ex Joannis de Weſtphalia libris excerpti ſunt. - - - Theſe are therefore the articles which (according to Bernard of Luxemburg, profeſſor of Divinity, and of the order of the Dominicans, in his catalogue of Heretics) were extracted from John Weſtphalus's books, by Friar Gerard of Elthem, Inquiſitor of the Faith, and Father James Sprenger, likewiſe Doctors of Divinity, and of the ſame order of Dominicans in the convent of Cologn.’ He directs us to the book whence he had this; which is the catalogue of Heretics, compiled by brother Bernard of Luxemburg, a Dominican Monk. Upon conſulting this catalogue I found that Prateolus hath changed Joannes de Weſalia, into Joannes de Weſtphalia; for it is to Joannes de Weſalia ſuperiore (2), that Bernard of Luxemburg aſcribes the ſeventeen Hereſies which Prateolus charges on Joannes Weſtphalus, ſeu de Weſtphalia ſuperiore. I cannot apprehend what ground Prateolus, or thoſe who have copied him, had for ſo many alterations as they have made in names and times. The Dominican Monk obſerves, that John de Weſalia's books were burnt at Mentz during the reign of the Emperor Frederic III (3), and mentions this fact ſix years at leaſt before the year 1533 (4).

Moreri hath not been leſs faithful in his citation of Father Gaultier; for it is certain that this Jeſuit (5) placed Johannes Weſtphalus amongſt the Heretics of the XVIth century, and made him a Lutheran, juridically convicted of ſeveral errors, by his own confeſſion, about the year 1533. He cites Prateolus ex Bernardo Lutzemburgo. Thus we ſee how theſe authors copy one another without taking the pains to look back ſo much as two ſteps. This Jeſuit ſtops at Prateolus, without conſulting the author whom Prateolus cites.

Moreri hath, of his own head, ventured to ſay, that his pretended John Weſtphalus was ſo named from his being of Weſtphalia. The two authors whom he cites have not made this obſervation, and I am ſure that he found it no where. Prateolus groundleſsly believed that Weſtphalia was divided into higher and lower. For the reſt, we ought not to be ſurprized that Moreri fell into this ſnare, ſince Theophilus Raynaud, though a man of ſo much reading, alſo fell into it before him. He tells us on the authority of Prateolus, that John Weſtphalus, the Lutheran, was the only perſon that ever doubted that JESUS CHRIST was nailed to the Croſs. De hac (clavifixione) nemo dubitavit, præter unum quendam haud dubie cum ea effutiret, hilariorem, è Lutheri caula, Joannem Weſtphalum, ut ex eo refert Prateolus eo verbo artic. damnato 17 (6). In which words are two faults: 1. John Weſtphalus is an imaginary perſon. 2. Suppoſe that he really had exiſted, and been a Lutheran, he would not have been either the only or the firſt man who raiſed this doubt; for it was one of the things objected againſt John de Weſalia, in his proſecution for Hereſy in the year 1479. ‘Item prædicavit publice in Ser. de paſſione Chriſti, crucifixerunt eum, quis ſcit an funiculis ipſum alligaverunt, aut clavis crucifixerunt. - - - - - - He likewiſe ſtarted this doubt in a ſermon which he preached publickly upon the paſſion of Chriſt, they crucified him, who knows whether they faſtened him with cords, or nailed him to the croſs?’ They are Bernard of Luxemburgh's words (7): and in the Examen Magiſtrale Doctoris Joannis de Weſalia, inſerted in the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum of Orthuinus Gratius, we find the following words: ‘Viceſimo quinto (interrogatus) an prædicaverit publice populo dubium eſſe an Chriſtus fuiſſet funibus Cruci alligatus, aut clavis affixus. Fatetur ſe dixiſſe, quod non habeatur in Evangelio paſſionis an clavis ſit affixus, an funibus: Credit tamen quod clavis (8). - - - - In the twenty-fifth place, being aſked if he had affirmed in a public ſermon that it was doubtful whether Chriſt was faſtened to the croſs with cords or with nails; he confeſſes that he ſaid there was no mention made in the Goſpels whether he was faſtened with nails or cords, but he believes it was with nails.’

[B] A Printer who ſettled at Louvain in the year 1475.] Let us examine theſe words of Gabriel Naudé: the firſt that I know of, who printed in the Low-Countries was Joannes de Weſtphalia, who ſettled at Louvain in the year 1475, and began the exerciſe of this art on Ariſtotle's Ethics (9). Revius's Hiſtory of Deventer is not ſufficient to confute this; for tho' we find there that Richard Pafroed, or Pafraed, a native of Cologn, and Printer at Deventer, publiſhed there the Doctrinale altum, ſeu liber parabolarum Alani metrice deſcriptus in the year 1449 (10), one cannot believe it, conſidering that this book is the twelfth in Revius's catalogue of the books printed by Pafroed. The two firſt are without any date: the third is dated

in

(32) Vita Weſſeli, pag. 15.

(33) Ibid. pag. 27.

(34) Ibid. Conſult alſo Geſner's Bibliotheque.

(35) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 849.

(1) In Catalogo Hæreſ. voce Joannes Weſtphalus, p. m. 236.

(2) This ſhews that he was born at Weſel, between Coblentz and Mentz, and not at Weſel in the Duchy of Cleves.

(3) Joannes de Weſalia ſuperiore, Doctor Theologiæ prædicans ſæcularis in diverſis locis, Bohemis communicans condemnatus fuit, & ejus libri combuſti fuerunt Moguntiæ ſub Friderico Imperatore tertio. Bernardus Lutzemburgus, in Catal. Hæreticorum.

(4) I expreſs myſelf thus, becauſe I have only ſeen the third edition of his book, which is that of the year 1527. I believe he ſpeaks of John de Weſalia in the foregoing editions; but I am not ſure of it.

(5) In Tabula Chronographica, pag. m. 757.

(6) Theoph. Raynaud de Stigmat. §. i, cap. v, pag. m 108.

(7) In Catalogo Hæreticorum.

(8) Faſcic. rerum expetend. & fugiendar. p. 330.

(9) Naudé, Additions to the Hiſtory of Lewis XI, pag. 309.

(10) Revius, Hiſtor. Daventrienſ. pag. 144.

in the year 1477, the fourth, which is the Golden Legend, in 1479, and the following to the eleventh are dated from 1480 to 1494. How then is it probable that the twelfth ſhould be of the year 1449? It is doubtleſs a typographical error.

WESTPHALUS (Joachim) a Lutheran Miniſter in the XVIth century, was born at Hamburgh [A] in the year 1510. He was maſter of the ſecond claſs in St John's college of that city; after which he was miniſter of St Catherine's church there from the year 1541, to the year 1571 [B]. From that time to the ſixteenth of January 1574, which was the day of his death, he was ſuperintendant of the churches. There was a great diſcord between the Miniſters of Hamburgh, ſome of them being moderate, and the others rigid Lutherans; Weſtphalus was the moſt zealous of the latter party (a). He was violent even to brutality [C]. The Lutherans themſelves own that he ſhewed too great an animoſity [D]. Calvin, when he wrote againſt Weſtphalus, pretty well adapted his ſtyle to that of his adverſary (b); but it is ſaid that he did not reproach him with the character of a drunkard [E]. Beza was ſurprized, and not without reaſon,

(a) Ex Mollero, Iſag. ad Hiſtor. Cherſoneſ. Cimbr. p. 579. Zelotarum Hamburgenſium Primicerius, ſays he, pag. 577.

(b) See the remark [E].

[A] He was born at Hamburgh.] Thoſe who ſay that he was called Weſtphalus becauſe a native of Weſtphalia, are miſtaken. Mr Moreri is guilty of that error; which he copied from Mr Teiſſier, (1), who had it from a German Lutheran. I mean Quenſtedt, as appears by his citation (2). Mr Mollerus when he cenſures Mr Teiſſer for this fault, ſpares Quenſtedt (3).

[B] From the year 1541 to the year 1571.] Mr Seckendorf (4) tells us that Weſtphalus was invited from Wittemberg to Hamburgh in the year 1542, in order to ſucceed Kempius in the paſtoral office of St Catherine's church, and that afterwards he ſucceeded Æpinus in the office of ſuperintendant. In my opinion more credit is due to Mr Mollerus (5) who places the beginning of his miniſtry in 1541, and of his ſuperintendency in 1571. How could he then ſucceed Æpinus, who died in 1553 (6)?

[C] He was violent even to brutality.] The Divines of the Confeſſion of Geneva beſtowed that encomium upon him, one of them ſaith that he was fitter to keep beaſts of burthen, than to adminiſter the ſacraments. ‘ H. Bullingerus hominem illum vocat vere Weſtphalum, id eſt, craſſum. Theod. autem Bibliander, hominem ineptum & importunum, qui rectius in agris farragines jumentis colligeret ac miſceret, quam ſacroſancta myſteria unionis ac fidei Chriſtianæ, & ſalutis humanæ ſacramenta tractaret (7). - - - - - Bullinger calls him a true Weſtphalian, that is, ſtupid. Theod. Bibliander gives him the character of a fooliſh aud impertinent fellow, that was more fit to look out for provender in the fields and to mix it up for beaſts of burthen, than to meddle with the ſacraments of ſalvation aud the holy myſteries of the Chriſtian union and faith.’ Bibliander alludes to a book which Weſtphalus publiſhed in 1552, intituled, Farrago confuſanearum & inter ſe diſſidentium de S. Cæna opinionum, ex Sacramentariorum libris congeſta. It is thought that this book kindled again the Sacramentarian war, which ſeemed extinct after the death of Luther (8). ‘ Belli Euchariſtici Lutheri obitu ſopiti acrius denuo inſtaurandi claſſicum A. 1552. ipſum ceciniſſe, edita adverſus Calvinum Farragine confuſanearum &c. è Pontificiis * Laur. Surius, ex Calvinianis † J. Sleidanus, ⸸ J. Sturmius, ‡ Caſp. Peucerus,  Lud. Lavaterus, & †† Rud. Hoſpinianus uno ore clamitant. - - - - - Among the Papiſts Laur. Surius, and among the Calviniſts J. Sleidan, J. Sturmius, Caſp. Peucerus, Lewis Lavaterus, and Rud. Hoſpinianus, cry out with one voice that this was the man who ſounded the charge, and kindled up a-freſh with greater violence the Sacramentarian war, (which had been extinct ever ſince the death of Luther) by publiſhing againſt Calvin his Farrago confuſanearum &c.’ The author whom I quote (9), relates what Altingius and Hoornbeeck have ſaid of Weſtphalus. ‘ Ab Henr. Altingo Lutheranis, accenſetur immoderatis, furioſis & blaſphemis, ab Hoornbekio autem animi inflati & αὐτογνώμονος inſimulatur. - - - - - By Henry Alting he is reckoned among the zealous, furious, and blaſphemous Lutherans, by Hoornbeck he is accuſed of being ſelf-conceited and tenacious of his own opinions.’

[D] The Lutherans themſelves own that he ſhewed too great an animoſity.] I ſhall again quore Mollerus (10). ‘ Theologus celebris quidem, ſed famam ⸸⸸ Joach. Vagetio Judice, per magni nominis Adverſarios, quos Scriptis provocabat, adeptus. Zelus illius, & ſumma, in impugnandis Calvinianis, Crypto-Calvinianis, Synergiſtis, Adiaphoriſtis, Majoriſtis, atque Heterodoxis aliis, vehementia, Theologis etiam aliquot γνησίως Lutheranis, & in his Sim. Sulcero. Prof. Baſileenſi ‡, in exceſſu viſa peccare, plurimis in Germania certaminibus ſacris vel anſam præbuit, vel fomitem ſuppeditavit. - - - - - - He was a famous Divine, but he acquired his reputation, in the opinion of Joachim Vagetius, by the renowned adverſaries whom he provoked by his writings. His zeal and great animoſity in attacking the profeſſed Calviniſts, and ſuch as were ſo in their hearts, the Synergiſts, Adiaphoriſts, Majoriſts, and other hetorodox ſects, nay even ſome Divines that were ſincere Lutherans, and among theſe Simon Sulcerus, profeſſor at Baſil, ſeemed to err in the exceſs, and either gave a handle to many religious contentions in Germany, or added fewel to them.’

[E] That he did not reproach him with the character of a drunkard.] The proof which I am going to alledge of this, informs us, that Weſtphalus accuſed Calvin of gluttony. ‘ Uſus eſt aliquoties Calvinus, carnalem edendi modum oppugnans ab abſurdo, vocabulis voracitatis & ingurgitationis. Quid tu ad hæc Weſtphale? Admodum, inquis religioſe & reverenter loquitur Calvinus, ex crudo ſuo ſtomacho eructans voracitatem & ingurgitationem. Nempe Calvinum bene noſti, ut video: quem tota hæc civitas teſtari poteſt tam parvam ſui rationem habere in cibo & potu, ut in eo interdum amicis non leviter peccare videatur. Quum te de temulentia reprehenſum à Calvino ægrè patereris, reſpondit Calvinus id quod res eſt, ſeſe de ſpiritus temulentia loquutum: & cur ad iſtam verborum aſperitatem adactus eſſet copioſè declaravit (11). - - - - - - Calvin, expoſing the carnal way of eating, did ſometimes make uſe of the words voraciouſneſs and gluttony. What conſtruction did you, Weſtphalus, put upon this? Calvin, ſaid you, ſpeaks in a moſt religious and reverend manner, while he belches up voraciouſneſs and gluttony from his crude ſtomach. This indeed ſhews that you know Calvin well, of whom all this city can atteſt, that he is ſo negligent of himſelf, as to his eating and drinking, that ſometimes his friends think him highly blamable in that reſpect. When you took it ill that Calvin ſhould accuſe you of drunkenneſs, Calvin made anſwer, as the thing really was, that he meant a drunkenneſs of ſpirit, and ſet forth at large what had obliged him to make uſe of theſe harſh words.’ But let us ſee what anſwer Calvin himſelf made, and at the ſame time let us give the Hiſtory of this quarrel.

There was, for ſome time, a miſunderſtanding betwixt the Church of Zurich and Calvin, about the Doctrine of the Euchariſt; but it ceaſed in the year 1549, and both ſides agreed on a treaty of peace, which contained twenty-ſix articles, and was called Conſenſio mutua in Re Sacramentaria (12). The rigid Lutherans were offended at this agreement, and publiſhed ſeveral libels againſt it: and it was on this occaſion that Weſtphalus wrote the book, the title of which I have mentioned in the remark [C]. Calvin thought himſelf obliged to ſilence all theſe clamours, by publiſhing an expoſition of his agreement. This he did in the year 1554, by a little tract in which he fell very ſeverely upon Weſtphalus, without naming him. But he had not the ſame regard for him two years after, when he refuted (13) that adverſary's anſwer, nor in 1557, when he inſcribed another treatiſe to him; for he named him in both theſe books. Afterwards he gave him up to his obſtinacy, and threatned to do ſo in the title of the laſt book (14). But now let us examine

(1) Additions to the Elogies extracted out of Thuanus, Part i, pag. 454.

(2) He quotes Quenſt. de Patr. illuſtr. Viror.

(3) Moller. Iſagoge ad Hiſtor. Cherſoneſ. Cimbricæ, Part. iii, pag. 579.

(4) Hiſtor. Lutheran. lib. i, p. 245, litera i.

(5) Ubi ſupra, pag. 579.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 581. He quotes the livth and xxiiid letters of Gabbema's Collection. Upon examination, I find his quotation to be right.

(8) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 580.

* In Comm. hiſtorico ad an. 1552, p. 604.

† Lib. 26. Comm. de ſtatu relig. & reip. p. m. 780.

⸸ In Anti-Pappo ſecundo, pag. 128, 129, 180. & in Anti-Pappo tertio, pag. 241, 242.

‡ In Narrat. hiſtorica Controv. Sacramentariæ, apud Schluſſelb. l. 2. Theol. Calv. p. m. 192, 193.

 In Hiſt. Sacram. pag. 119.

†† In Dedic. Concordiæ diſcordis.

(9) Moller. ibid. pag. 581.

(10) Ibid. pag. 579.

⸸⸸ In Præcidaneis de orbe habitabili, pag. 263.

‡ In Epiſt. ad Joh. Marbachium A. 1558, ſcripta v. Joh. Fechtii ſupplem. H. E. Sec. XVI. P. II. n. 63. pag. 82.

(11) Beza, de Cœna Domini, contra Weſtphalum, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 257.

(12) See the volume of Calvin's Tracts, pag. m. 752.

(13) That Refutation is intituled, Secunda Defenſio piæ & orthodoxæ de Sacramentis fidei, adverſus Joachimi Weſtphali calumnias.

(14) Ultima Admonitio Joannis Calvini ad Joachimum Weſtphalum, cui niſi obtemperet, eo modo poſthac habendus erit, quo pertinaces hæreticos haberi jubet Paulus.

reaſon, that Weſtphalus ſhould publiſh that Calvin's mother had been a Prieſt's concubine [F]. He fully refuted this calumny. What is ſaid by ſome that this Lutheran Doctor was the inventor of the Ubiquitarian opinion, is not true [G]. In order to judge of his character, it is ſufficient to remember, that he ridiculed all the Proteſtant martyrs who did not believe Conſubſtantiation [H]. The arguments, which he once uſed againſt the examine the grounds of the complaint concerning drunkenneſs. ‘ Indocti & temulenti homines dum Sacramentarium bellum inſtaurant, primis librorum paginis audacter jactant pro tota Saxonia & vicinis regionibus ſe pugnare. - - - - - Theſe unlearned and drunken men, while they revive the Sacramentarian war, boldly pretend in the firſt pages of their books that they fight the cauſe of all Saxony and of the neighbouring countries.’ This period (15) of Calvin induced Weſtphalus to complain, that he in particular, and the Germans in general, were charged with drunkenneſs: to which Calvin anſwered, that he did not in the leaſt ſpeak of a drunkenneſs occaſioned by wine, but of another metaphorical drunkenneſs mentioned by the Prophet Iſaiah. ‘ Quia fortè veritus eſt, ne ſi ſolus ipſe læſus foret, paucos inveniret privati doloris ſocios, totam gentem ſuam ad commune prælium incitat, ac ſi Germanis omnibus vulgatum temulentiæ probrum à me objectum foret. Si ita eſſet, ne ipſe quidem mihi vellem ignoſci. Sed notanda eſt quam mox addit probatio. Crimine hoc, inquit, ſemel atque iterum me perſtringit. Quaſi verò ſi bibulus eſt, ſine compotoribus inebriari nequeat. Quamquam ne hîc de nihilo anxius ſit, ſciat non indictum fuiſſe prælium ſuis poculis, ſcias de alia temulentia me loquutum eſſe, quam Propheta Iſaias dicit non eſſe à vino (16). - - - - - - Perhaps becauſe he was afraid leſt, if he were the only perſon hurt, he ſhould find few people to ſympathize with him, he ſtirs up his whole nation to a common war, as if I forſooth, had upbraided all the Germans with the trite reproach of drunkenneſs. Were that the caſe I ſhould not even deſire to be forgiven. But what he ſubjoins as a proof of this is ſomewhat remarkable. He upbraids me, ſays he, with this vice ſeveral times. As if a man who is that way inclined could not get drunk without having his pot-companions. Neverthel eſs that he may not be diſturbed about nothing here, I would have him to know once for all that I did not declare war againſt his cups: I meant another kind of drunkenneſs, which, as the Prophet Iſaiah ſaith, does not proceed from wine.’ He renewed the ſame apology at the end of his laſt advertiſement. ‘ Weſtphalum alicubi hominem temulentum vocare contigerat, non ut bibacitatem illi objicerem, ſicuti interpretatus ſum: ſed qualiter Propheta ebrios eſſe dicit, & non à vino, qui ſtupore percuſſi, aut vertigine correpti, à ſana mente exciderunt. Quod privatim de uno homine dictum eſt, ad totam Gentem trahi cææ profecto temulentiæ eſt (17). - - - - - I happened ſomewhere to call Weſtphalus a drunken man, not that I wanted to upbraid him with a tippling diſpoſition, as I explained myſelf before; but in the ſenſe that the Prophet Iſaiah calls drunk, though not with wine, ſuch people who being ſtruck with ſtupidity and dizzineſs have loſt their right underſtanding. Now to apply to a whole nation what is particularly ſaid of one man is certainly the blind effect of drunkenneſs.’ I am apt to think that this explanation did not ſatisfy Weſtphalus; and indeed it leaves room for great ſuſpicions: beſides, it is very viſible that Calvin expreſſes himſelf in ſuch words, as ſhew that he was not ſorry it ſhould be believed that he juſtly charged this vice on his adverſary, though he proteſts that he meant another vice. He doth not deny the having treated him roughly, but he affirms that his vehemency is reaſonable, and juſtifies himſelf by the example of GOD. Sicubi vehementius in eum invehar, pro veſtra prudentia & æquitate, quibus me ſtimulis adegerit expendite . . . . . Quid mihi hic reſiduum fuit, niſi ut malo nodo aptarem durum cuneum, ne ſibi in ſua vecordia nimis placeret? Equidem ſi homines iſtos mollire poſſe ſpes eſſet, non recuſarem demiſſus ac ſupplex Eccleſiæ pacem redimere. Sed quo feratur ipſorum violentia, omnibus ſatis notum eſt. Itaque meam in iſta duritie tractanda auſteritatem, * Dei quoque exemplum excuſat, qui ſe pronuntiat non modo inclementius acturum cum præfractis, ſed contra eos præfractum fore (18). That is, ‘ if in ſome places I have dealt too roughly with him and expreſſed my ſelf in too ſharp terms, be pleaſed according to your prudence and equitable diſcretion to conſider what ſharp weapons he hath pointed againſt me, to conſtrain me to it . . . . . . What could I do, in this caſe, but act according to the proverb, which preſcribes a ſevere driver for a head-ſtrong aſs, that he might not grow too fond of his fury? Indeed if there were any hopes of mollifying theſe men, I would not refuſe to make humble ſupplications to them, in order to redeem the peace of the Church. But it appears to all men what their extravagant impetuoſity aims at. So that if I have been very ſevere in handling ſuch a ſtrange obſtinate people, I am excuſed by the example of GOD himſelf, who declares not only that he will treat the froward without tenderneſs, but ſhew himſelf froward to them.’

[F] He publiſhed that Calvin's mother had been a Prieſt's concubine.] A little after the words of Theodorus Beza, which I have already cited, we find theſe. ‘ Quid amplius? Ingerit, inquis, Calvinus voces auribus & oculis, meretricibus convenientes: quas fortaſſe didicit à matre ſua Pontificii ſacrificuli concubina. Itane verò nugator? honeſtiſſimam matronam jam olim defunctam, & ejus viri matrem, cui quantum debeat Chriſtiana Eccleſia tot ſuſcepti labores teſtantur, & gratioribus futuris poſteris (ut confido) teſtabuntur, tuis verè meretriciis probris afficere maluiſti quam animo tuo morem non gerere? Sed continebo ipſe me, & quid nos potius quam quid te deceat, ſpectabo. Calvinum & honeſto loco & integerrimæ famæ parentibus natum, & in nobiliſſima familia à pueritia educatum ſi teſtibus probare oporteret, nos non unum aliquem teſtem, ſed integram civitatem Noviodunenſem citare poſſumus. Itaque de hoc refutando convitio minime laboramus. - - - - - - What next? Calvin, ſay you, preſents to our eyes and ears words that are fit for leud women to make uſe of; poſſibly having learned them from his mother who was once a Popiſh Prieſt's concubine. Say you ſo, Mr Trifler? Is it thus that, rather than not gratify your own humour, you throw your looſe reproaches upon a moſt virtuous woman who is long ago deceaſed, and who was the mother of that man, to whom the Chriſtian Church is under ſo great obligations, as his many works teſtify, and as they will teſtify to poſterity, which, I hope, will be more grateful than the preſent age has been? But I will contain myſelf, and conſider more what is becoming for me to ſay than for you to hear. If it were neceſſary to prove by witneſſes that Calvin was born of creditable and blameleſs parents, and that he was brought up from his youth in a very noble family, not one witneſs alone, but the whole city of Noyon might be called upon to atteſt it. We ſhall therefore take no pains to refute this calumny.’

[G] What is ſaid . . . . . that he was the inventer of the Ubiquitarian opinion is not true.] George Hornius affirms it, but Mr Mollerus refutes it by the teſtimony of Hoſpinian, who acknowledges that Weſtphalus and Heſhuſius, otherwiſe good Lutherans, oppoſed the new opinion concerning the Ubiquity which Brentius and Smidelin advanced (19). The Biſhop of Meaux is therefore miſtaken when in his Hiſtoire des Variations (20) under the year 1558 he ſaith, that the great diſpute at that time amongſt the Lutherans was concerning the Ubiquity, which Weſtphalus, James Andrew Smidelin, David Chytræus, and others, eſtabliſhed with all their might.

[H] He ridiculed all the Proteſtant martyrs who did not believe Conſubſtantiation.] Beza laſhes him on this account with the utmoſt ſeverity. ‘ Ut tuam pietatem orbi teſteris, in martyres jocaris qui apud Gallos & alias gentes quotidie crudeliſſimam & ignominioſiſſimam mortem perpetiuntur. Extant enim eorum aliquot confeſſiones, quæ tibi non ſatisfaciunt. Atque ut tibi non ſatisfaciant, an ideo digni erant quibus etiam mortuis inſultares? Nam certè pro Chriſti nomine ingreſſi ſunt flammas, quas haud ſatis ſcio an tu vel uno digito velles attingere. Quòd ſi negotium the miniſters of the confeſſion of Geneva were very ridiculous [I].

---

(15) It is at pag. 756, of the volume of his Tracts.

(16) Calvin. II Defenſ. de Sacramentis, pag. 768. Tractat. Theolog.

(17) Idem, Admonit. ultima, pag. 839, ejuſd. Vol.

* Pſal. xviii.

(18) Idem, II Defenſione, circa init. pag. m. 765. See alſo the beginning of the ultima Admonitio, where he ſays, Quia cum duro & præfracto capite negotium erat, an non liceret malum nodum duro cuneo retundere?

(19) Georgius Hornius (Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 496.) in eum itidem debacchaturus more ſuo impegit, & primum Ubiquitatis auctorem fuiſſe nugatur ipſe Hoſpiniano (in Dedic. Concordiæ diſcordis) invito, qui novum Brentii & Smidelini de Ubiquitate delirium, à Weſtphalo atque Heſhuſio, inter Lutheranos ipſos, ait, eſſe impugnatum. Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 581.

(20) Livr. viii, num. 37.

I have not yet taken notice that he is reproached with having commended as a very Chriſtian action the harſh refuſal of a Toleration in Germany to the Proteſtants that were baniſhed out of England [K].

‘ Cœnæ Domini nonniſi ex parte cognoverunt (demus enim id Weſtphalo, ac ne nobis quidem ſingula eorum dicta ac facta ſatisfaciunt) an idcirco non fuerunt victimæ Deo gratæ, quum ad extremum uſque halitum omnes idolomanias ſint execrati, & Chriſtum ut verum Filium Dei & unicum noſtrum per fidem μεσίτην ſint amplexi (21). --- To give a proof of your piety to the world, you ridicule the martyrs, who, both in France and other countries, are daily ſuffering the moſt cruel and ignominious deaths. You are not pleaſed with ſome of their confeſſions. But what then? Is that a reaſon why you ſhould inſult them even after they are dead? It was certainly for the ſake of CHRIST that they gave their bodies up to the flames, which I doubt whether you would venture to touch with one finger. Let us ſuppoſe that they did not thoroughly underſtand the article of the LORD’s Supper (for we are willing to grant ſo much to Weſtphalus, ſince we ourſelves do not approve of all that they ſay and do) ſhould it therefore be ſaid that they were not acceptable victims in the ſight of GOD; ſince, to their laſt breath, they abominated all idolatrous extravagances, and embraced CHRIST as the true Son of GOD, and our only Mediator through faith.’ Compare the article HUTTERUS with this (22).

[I] The arguments which he uſed . . . . were very ridiculous.] Laſcus and Micronius, Miniſters of the Flemiſh Church at London, being forced to leave that country, endeavoured to eſtabliſh themſelves and their flock in the territories of the King of Denmark (23), but the Lutherans oppoſed it, and even for ſome time refuſed an amicable conference with them, ſaying, that it was wholly unneceſſary, ſince neither the King nor they had any ſcruples concerning the truth of the doctrine eſtabliſhed in Denmark. But at laſt they condeſcended to a conference, and urged that the Calviniſts rejected plain texts of Scripture; for, ſaid they, what can be clearer than theſe words, this is my body? Beſides this they told them, you follow neither Luther nor the Saxon Churches, and are condemned by the confeſſion of Augſbourg; in a word, you teach a doctrine which is not agreeable to the prevailing opinion in Denmark. They were anſwered, that the word of GOD, and not what Luther taught, or the kingdom of Denmark approved of, was the rule of faith. This, and ſeveral other ſuch like anſwers, proved uſeleſs to the Flemiſh Refugees, and they were conſtrained to retire out of the kingdom in the midſt of winter (24). Micronius ſome time after conferred, at Hamburgh, with Joachim Weſtphalus, who immediately urged the conſent of the Saxon Churches asan invincible argument. They, ſaid he, have condemned Zwinglius’s opinion; it is therefore falſe, and ought to be rejected. Micronius replied, that if the truth of an opinion ought to be determined by the conſent of the Churches, the Papal cauſe would be triumphant. Weſtphalus anſwered, that the Saxon Churches were the Church of GOD; and when the other urged that the true Church was not confined to any certain place, and that there was no Church but what might err, as was allowed by Luther, he affirmed that the import of Luther’s words was not that the Church of JESUS CHRIST might be miſtaken, but that the Popiſh Church might. Micronius always inſiſted upon this maxim, That the Holy Scripture is the ſole rule of Faith; which did not prevent Weſtphalus’s anſwering him: it would follow from your arguments, that his Daniſh Majeſty, and the Senate of our city, who have decreed againſt you, are guilty of a great fault: conſider that you are condemned by a Diet of Augſbourg (25). Si dubia adhuc eſſet noſtra doctrina, graviter peccaſſet ſenatus noſter, & ſereniſſimus Daniæ Rex, qui adverſum vos decreta tulerunt . . . . Contra veſtram doctrinam Comitiis Auguſtanis pronunciatum eſt (26). Micronius did not fail to reply, that by ſuch arguments as theſe Popery would every where gain its cauſe (27). We have here a proof of the natural inclination of all parties, to make uſe of the compendious way of authority, and convert their adverſaries errors into ſtate-crimes. Dare you charge the magiſtracy of Hamburgh, and the King of Denmark, who have condemned you, with injuſtice? If Weſtphalus had remembred that there are great numbers of Papiſts in the world, and had he but uſed his reaſon a little, would he have talked at this rate?

[K] He is reproached with having commended . . . . the harſh refuſal of a Toleration in Germany to the Calviniſts that were baniſhed out of England.] I have already mentioned (28) the treatment which they met with; but I add, that the deſcription which they gave of it may be ſeen not only in the books of Utenhovius, Laſco, and Micronius, but likewiſe in the anſwers that were made to our Weſtphalus, in the year 1555, and afterwards (29). They likewiſe quote (30) the firſt letter of Theodore Beza, and page 40 Inſtitutionis Sacramentariæ of Lavaterus: but the following paſſage will ſhew us that nothing was more diſagreeable in this perſecution than to ſee it publickly commended, and upon that we are referred to a book of Weſtphalus. ‘ Non meminerunt illi fratres, quidnam ſit illud paſtorale μετριοπαθεῖν καὶ συμπαθεῖν de quo Apoſt. ad Hebr. cap. 5. 2. Qui in tanta cœli inclementiâ, inter tot hoſtes, noſtros palantes majores indigniſſimè ſuis finibus ejecerunt, & ne quidem illud Jacobi c. 2. v. 16. (quod vel in ipſos reprobos cadit) illis apprecabantur Abite cum pace, caleſcite, & ſaturamini, vix ac ne vix quidem illis dantes τὰ ἐπιτήδεια τοῦ σώματος & crudeliter iis invidentes τὰ ἐπιτήδεια τῆς ψυχῆς. Sed hoc imprimis noſtris diſplicuit, iſtius ἀναισθεσίας auctores & ſibi hac in re fuiſſe gratulatos & reperiſſe poſtmodum qui illud factum tanquam præclarum, Deo gratum, Regibus & Magiſtratibus dignum, publicè auſi fuerunt defendere; & impetrarunt à Rege Daniæ & aliis, ut ne noſtri, odioſè dicti Sacramentarii, in Dania, Hamburgi, & in aliis maritimis urbibus, vel hoſpitio exciperuntur. Vidi lib. Weſtphali de Cœnâ Domini ex Auguſtino, ad an. 1555 (31). --- Theſe brethren did not remember what is the duty of a Paſtor, which requires him to be mild and compaſſionate, of which the Apoſtle ſpeaks in his Epiſtle to the Hebrews, chap. v. ver. 2. I ſay they did not remember it, ſince they did in ſo unworthy and ſhameful a manner oblige our wandering fathers to leave their territories, notwithſtanding the great inclemency of the weather, and their being encompaſſed with ſo many enemies. Nor did they ſo much as wiſh them what is mentioned by James, chap. ii. ver. 16. (which is ſaid even of wicked men) Depart in peace, be you warmed, and filled. Scarcely, or rather not all, would they ſupply them with the neceſſaries of the body, and moſt cruelly denied them the neceſſaries of the ſoul. But the moſt diſagreeable thing to our fathers was, that the authors of this inhumanity did not only congratulate themſelves upon what they had done, but likewiſe found perſons who durſt publickly defend it as an action commendable in itſelf, acceptable to GOD, and worthy of Kings and Magiſtrates: and they obtained of the King of Denmark, and others, that it ſhould be made unlawful for any one in Denmark, Hamburgh, and other ſea-coaſt towns, to give the leaſt entertainment or ſhelter to thoſe of our perſuaſion, whom by an odious name they called Sacramentarians. See Weſtphalus’s book, de Cœna Domini, &c.’ The perſon who ſpeaks in this manner, was a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Breda, in the year 1651, when he cauſed the book, of which I have ſpoken elſewhere (32), to be reprinted with ſome notes of his own.

(21) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 215.

(22) In the remark [B].

(23) You will find in Hoſpinian. Hiſt. Sacram. Part. ii, fol. 224, & ſeq. the occaſion and the conſequences of it. Mr Samuel Andreas, Profeſſor of Divinity at Marpurg, ſpeaks of it in his Epiſtola Gratulatoria & Apologetica, printed in 1690, againſt the Dania Orthodoxa, fidelis, & pacifica of Mr Maſius, Profeſſor of Divity at Copenhagen.

(24) See the Acts of the Conference of Coldingen, publiſhed by John Utenhovius, elder of the church of the Flemiſh Refugees. Voſſius relates all this out of them in a letter to Grotius, which is his xxiiid letter.

(25) Taken from the ſame letter of Voſſius, pag. 50.

(26) Voſſius, ibid. col. 2.

(27) Similibus argumentis facile omnes vicerit Papa. ibid.

(28) In the remark [I], of this article.

(29) Et eorum qui docte & acriter reſponderunt nimium ſuit affectibus indulgenti Joachimo Weſtphalo anno 1555 & deinceps. Lud. Ger. à Reneſſe, ubi infra.

(30) Id. ibid.

(31) Ludov. Gerardus à Reneſſe, Not. in Apologet. Reformat. in Belgio Eccleſ. Epiſt. pag. 86.

(32) In the remark [E], of the article HEMMINGIUS.

WICELIUS (George) a pretty good Divine of the XVIth century, was born at Fuld in the year 1501. He entred young into a monaſtery (a), but was not there long, before he not only renounced the monaſtical life, but the Roman Catholic Religion, and turned Lutheran. He had not the gift of perſeverance, for he returned to the Romiſh communion. He was not able to digeſt the diviſions which he ſaw ſpringing up amongſt the Reformers, and the particular perſecutions raiſed againſt him: but what ſide ſoever he was of, he never believed that marriage ought to be forbidden to Prieſts (b). We may therefore eaſily imagine that he married whilſt he was a Proteſtant; but it is falſe that he had ſucceſſively ſeveral wives [A]. He contented himſelf with his firſt marriage, though he was perſuaded that it was impoſſible to live or die well in celibacy (c); and it ſeems, that even when a Lutheran, he diſliked Bigamy. He embraced the Proteſtant Religion at the age of thirty, or thirty-one years [B], and became Miniſter of a Church, from which he ſays that he was forced by a cruel perſecution. Juſtus Jonas was one of his moſt violent antagoniſts, but Luther, on the contrary, wrote in his favour, and diſſipated the ſtorms raiſed againſt him by his being accuſed of ſome ſtate crimes (d). It is ſaid that his return into the pale of the Romiſh Church, procured him but very ſlowly the rank he deſerved. He was expoſed to ſeveral diſgraces before he could be made even a pariſh Prieſt; but at laſt he became counſellor to the Emperors Ferdinand and Maximilian. His principal character was that of being earneſtly deſirous of a reunion among Chriſtians; to accompliſh which, he would willingly have aboliſhed ſeveral things practiſed in the Church of Rome [C], though, after his return to that Church, he continued in her boſom till his death. Caſſander, the reconciler, took his conciliating ſpirit from our Wicelius. Maſius, Ferus the Franciſcan, and Biſhop Julius Pflug who had been for the Interim, were alſo his particular friends. By this we may judge of his inclinations; but much better by his writings, his Via Regia, his Methodus Concordiæ, &c. He wrote a prodigious number of Books, moſt of which were in the German language; and being afterwards tranſlated into Latin, they were printed ſeveral times. He died at Mentz in the year 1573, and was buried in St Ignatius's church. He left one ſon, named (as well as himſelf) George, who publiſhed ſome books: therefore to avoid confuſion, the father is diſtinguiſhed by the addition Major, or Senior. This is what I thought my ſelf obliged to extract out of the life of Wicelius (e), which is inſerted in the appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum (f). From thence I have taken the body of this article and the citations, without any correction, referring criticiſms to the remarks. The author of this life was a very learned man; but give me leave to ſay that he might and ought to have been much more exact in the writing of it.

[A] It is falſe that he had ſucceſſively ſeveral wives.] His life inſerted in the ſecond tome of the Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum, confutes Cornelius Loos, who ſaid that Wicelius having loſt his firſt wife, married a ſecond, then a third, and after that others, as it is reported. Adoleſcens Monaſticen amplectitur, à quo vitæ inſtituto mox reſiluit, uxorem duxit, qua defuncta, alteram, & hac, tertiam, & (ut ferunt) plures. Serarius accuſes him of having left the Lutherans on account of their diviſions, and of having retained ſome of their opinions, but more eſpecially thoſe relating to marriage; that in order to remain a married Prieſt, he endeavoured to obtain orders from a Biſhop of the Greek Church; that being willing to ſerve two maſters, he was true to neither of them; that he was diſobedient to the Canons of the Latin Church, by uniting marriage to the Prieſthood, and to thoſe of the Greek communion, by marrying more than once. Georgium Wicelium lego primis adoleſcentiæ annis ad monaſticum ſeſe ſtatum applicuiſſe: ſed poſtea carnis Lutherique philtris dementatum uxorem quæſiiſſe; magnoque apud Lutheranos, propter aliquam eruditionis, linguarumque peritiæ opinionem, loco fuiſſe. Ab illis tamen cùm nova, neque cum Eccleſiaſticæ antiquitatis norma ſatis conſentanea fingi ac refingi quotidie cerneret, variiſque illos & acerbis inter ſe opinionibus diſſidere, pedem retulit; ſed ita ut proprii neſcio quâ cerebri pertinacia ei quam par eſſet diutius glutinatiuſque adhæſerit, in uxoria præſertim re: cui ſervire ſimulque ſacerdos eſſe cum vellet, dicitur Græcum neſcio ubi Epiſcopum, ut ab eo conſecraretur, quæſiiſſe. Sicque cum quodam veluti probro & riſu Græcus audiebat Sacerdos. At ſellis ſedere duabus dum voluit, utraque decidit. Neque enim Latinus ſacerdos bonus fuit, qui ad nuptias tranſiit: neque ſacerdos Græcus bonus, quid ad ſecundas & tertias, imò, ut quidam ferunt, etiam ad plures: Sed prole parum felici, ut Moguntiæ eſt notum (1).

[B] He embraced the Proteſtant religion at the age of thirty or thirty-one years.] Paul Freherus, in his Theatrum, contradicts Thomas James in this particular; for we find there, that Wicelius went to ſtudy at Wittemberg, about the year 1521, that afterwards he became the leader of the rebels in Thuringia; that he was taken and condemned to die, but that he was pardoned by the interceſſion of Pontanus, Chancellor of Saxony; that Luther ſettled him as Miniſter in a village called Nimeck, near Wittemberg; that in the year 1531 he was impriſoned by order of the Elector John Frederic, and by the advice of Melanchthon, on account of his attacking the Divinity of JESUS CHRIST; that not long after, he was baniſhed the Elector's territories; that he retired to Leipſic, where Duke George protected him; that ſome time after he turned Papiſt (2), and in the year 1534, wrote againſt Luther's book de bonis Operibus; that after the death of that Duke, he was driven from Leipſic, ſpent the remainder of his life at Mentz and Cologn, turning a bitter enemy to the Lutherans, and that he died in 1563. As to the laſt particulars, Freherus's Theatrum wants correction; for the Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum, affords inconteſtable proofs, that Wicelius would have yielded to the Lutherans ſeveral things for the ſake of peace, and that he was ſtill alive in the year 1564. What is yet more, one of his tracts inſerted in this Appendix, pag. 750, is dated on the tenth of Auguſt 1575; and yet page 787, Cornelius Loos is allowed to be in the right, in placing the death of Wicelius in 1573. Molanus (3) and Serarius (4) place his death in the ſame year 1573.

[C] Several things practiſed in the Church of Rome.] A ſpecimen of it extracted out of his books, may be ſeen in the Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum ſubjoined to his life.

See alſo the ſecond volume of John Wolfius's Lectiones Memorabiles (5). Wicelius's Letters, printed at Leipſic in 1537, contain as many invectives againſt the Canoniſts and Scholaſtic Divines, as againſt the Lutherans. There is juſt reaſon to wonder that the Inquiſition did not fulminate againſt theſe works (6): this confirms what has been ſaid of them, that their conduct is not uniform (7).

(a) Cornelius Loos, in Catal. illuſtr. Germaniæ Scriptor.

(b) See his Via Regia, apud Wolfium, Lect. Memor. Tom. ii, pag. 376.

(c) Uxorem in primo ſtatim fervore ſchiſmatis duxi, perſuaſus neminem poſſe neque pie vivere, neque bene mori, citra uxorem. Wicel. Conf. Reſponſ. Jonicæ, pag. 63.

(d) Juſtus Jonas excitavit Principes adverſus eum, ſeditionario facto conjectus eſt in lacum, neque longe fuit à laqueo præfocatore: ſed Lutherus pro eo ſcripſit.

(e) Thomas James is the author of it.

(f) Printed at London in 1690.

(1) Nic. Serarius, in Moguntia, lib. i, cap. xl, apud Miræum de Scriptor. Sæculi xvi, p. 23.

(2) Molanus, ubi infra, ſaith, that he returned to the Romiſh Communion, in 1532.

(3) Molanus, in Bibliotheca Sacra, MS. apud Miræum de Scriptor. Sæculi xvi, pag. 23.

(4) Serarius, ubi ſupra, apud Miræum, ibid.

(5) From pag. 354, to 393.

(6) See Rivetus, pag. 976, of Tom. iii, of his Works.

(7) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Sep. 1685, p. 1053, & alibi paſſim.

WICKHAM (William) Biſhop of Wincheſter, was born at Wickham in the county of Southampton in the year 1324. He went through his claſſical learning at Wincheſter, and beſides, he learned the elements of Geometry, Arithmetic, and Logic, as well as the French tongue: he was afterwards ſent to Oxford, where he cloſely attended the lectures of Lewis Carleton, profeſſor of Mathematics, and of William Dorach, profeſſor of the Civil-Law. He ſtaid near ſix years in that univerſity, and behaved himſelf ſo well that he was very much eſteemed by the moſt famous Doctors. He would have ſtaid longer if his patron Nicolas Wedal (a), upon his being made Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Southampton by King Edward III, had not obliged him to come and live with him, in order to make him his Counſellor and Secretary. He could not have choſen a fitter perſon for that employment; for no man in thoſe days either wrote or ſpoke more politely than our Wickham. From thence it came to paſs that three years after Edington Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Lord Treaſurer of England, choſe him for his Secretary. King Edward having ſeen him in that prelate's palace, could not help owning that he diſcovered a majeſtic air in him, upon which, receiving a great character of him from Nicolas Wedal, and Biſhop Edington, he engaged him in his ſervice. Encouraged by this, Wickham made his court to that great monarch with the utmoſt aſſiduity, and with equal addreſs acquitted himſelf of the affairs entruſted to him: beſides, he anſwered ſo pertinently to ſeveral political queſtions which the King put to him, that the idea of his merit which that Prince had conceived, daily increaſed. ‘ Quo ‘ ejus ingenium altius exploraret multas illi illuſtres quæſtiones quæ ſtatum ac ſummam ‘ rerum continerent, ut de bello ſuſcipiendo vel deponendo, de conditionibus pacis ‘ ineundæ, de ærariis rationibus amplificandis, de induſtria proponere ſolebat, quibus ‘ Wicamus extempore ita ornate & prudenter tum verbis tum ſententiis reſpondiſſe fertur, ‘ ut Rex præſenti ejus ingenio & peracutis reſponſis mirifice oblectaretur (b). - - - - - In ‘ order to make a further trial of his capacity, the King uſed to propoſe many remarkable ‘ queſtions to him concerning the ſtate and management of affairs, the neceſſary meaſures for ‘ beginning or ending a war, the conditions upon which a peace was to be concluded, and the ‘ ways and means of increaſing the revenues: to all which queſtions Wickham anſwered ‘ extempore (as it is reported) with ſo much elegance and diſcretion, both in words and ſentiments, that his Majeſty was wonderfully delighted with his ready wit and ſmart anſwers.’ As he underſtood Geometry and Architecture, he was made ſurveyor of the King's buildings, to which poſt was joined that of Chief-Juſtice in Eyre. It was he who had the direction of the builing of Windſor Caſtle, Edward was born in that place, and had at one time the King of France, and the King of Scotland priſoners there. Being therefore deſirous to erect a magnificent monument of his victories, he preferred this to all other places: he cauſed all the ancient buildings to be demoliſhed, and ordered a new and moſt magnificent ſtructure to be erected. Wickham, who had the whole management of this, accquitted himſelf in a glorious manner, and took up but three years to finiſh the whole. His enemies gave ſo malicious a turn to an inſcription which he put upon that palace [A], that they expoſed him to the King's diſpleaſure; but he ſoon diſpelled that (a) He was Lord of the village of Wickham.

(b) Hiſt. deſcript. Vitæ Wicami, pag. 22.

[A] So malicious a turn to an inſcription which he put upon that palace.] The words were, This made Wickham, which admitting of the double interpretation of Wickham made this, or this made Wickham, his enemies interpreted it in the firſt ſenſe, and poſſeſſed the King, that the ſurveyor of that edifice inſolently arrogated the glory of it to himſelf. Non deerant quidam invidi & malevoli qui Regi in aures inſuſurrarent Wicamum tam magnificæ ſtructuræ honorem ſibi arroganter vendicaſſe, adeoque in nomen ſuum in interiori quodam pariete arcis Windeſoriæ inſculptum regalis ædificii titulum nominatim trajeciſſe (1). The King being very much incenſed, charged Wickham with that crime, but was ſoon appeaſed, and laughed at it when he heard his defence. Wickham anſwered, with a ſmiling air, that his accuſers muſt either be very malicious, or very ignorant of Grammar, ſince the true ſenſe of the inſcription was this: I am the creature of this palace, it is that which hath procured me the favour of my Prince, and raiſed me from a low to a high ſtate. It is proper to inſert the Hiſtorian's own expreſſions here: Cum autem Rex ſtomacharetur & iracunde Wicamo crimen objiceret, quod delatum erat, ille vultu non triſti aut conſternato, ſed hilari ac jucundo reſpondit, aut ſtultum hominem inſcitia Grammaticæ, aut calumniatorem malitioſa caſuum inverſione illam criminationem inſtituiſſe. Neque enim Rex ſereniſſime (inquit) ego hanc Arcem, ſed hæc Arx me quantus quantus ſum effecit, hoc eſt me in laude ac gratia apud tuam majeſtatem poſuit, atque ab humili conditione ad tantas fortunas & dignitates evexit. Quod reſponſum tam facetum ac Wicamo dignum (erat enim verum ſpecimen humanitatis, venuſtatis, ac leporis) non ſolum omnem iracundiæ acerbitatem Regi abſterſit, verum etiam lætitiam in ejus animo tum commotionem ſuavem jucunditatis in corpore excitavit (2). I would not ſwear that Wickham had no eye to the equivocal ſenſe of this inſcription. But that King Edward's anger, expreſſed on this occaſion, may not paſs for an uncommon weakneſs, I ſhall mention ſome particulars concerning the nicety and jealouſy which ſovereign Princes have diſcovered in parallel caſes.

Facts concerning inſcriptions.

The magnificence of Pericles in the conſtruction of public edifices at Athens is very well known. ‘ Now ‘ when the Orators, who ſided with Thucydides, and ‘ were of his party, were at one time inveighing (as ‘ their cuſtom was) againſt Pericles, as one who ſquandered away the public ſtock in idle expences, and ‘ made havock of the ſtate-revenues, he ſtarting up ‘ in the open aſſembly, put the queſtion to the ‘ people, whether they thought that what he had ‘ laid out was too much; and they ſaying, Too much ‘ of all conſcience. Well then, ſaid he, ſince it is ſo, ‘ let not the coſt and charge go upon your account, but ‘ upon mine, provided the inſcription upon the temples and ‘ other public buildings be only in my name. When they ‘ heard him ſay this, whether it was out of a ſurpriſe to ſee the greatneſs of his ſpirit, or becauſe ‘ they would not yield to him the glory of having ‘ erected ſo magnificent and ſumptuous buildings, they ‘ cried aloud, bidding him ſpend on, and take what ‘ he thought fit out of the public purſe, and ſpare no ‘ coſt, 'till all were finiſhed (3).’

When Pauſanias, King of the Lacedemonians, conſecrated a golden tripod to the temple of Delphi, he cauſed to be inſcribed on it, that under his conduct the Perſians were beaten at the battle of Platæa. The Lacedemonians not being able to ſuffer this vanity, cauſed the inſcription to be raſed, and the name of the towns which had furniſhed the victorious troops to be inſerted inſtead of it, as we are informed by Cornelius

(1) Hiſtorica Deſcriptio (See the whole title at the end of the text of this article, in the margin, citation (f), pag. 27, 28.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

(3) Plutarch in the Life of Pericles.

that ſtorm, and made it contribute to the increaſe of his intereſt with that Prince. Having entred into Holy Orders, he was immediately preſented to ſeveral rich benefices by the liberality of that monarch, who not thinking theſe donatives ſufficient, made him Principal Secretary of State, and Keeper of the Privy-Seal. Whilſt he continued in theſe poſts, and with the greateſt conduct diſcharged all his offices, he was promoted to the See of Wincheſter in the room of Biſhop Edington, in the year 1367. Not long after he was made Lord High-Chancellor, and afterwards Preſident of the Privy-Council. In a word, he had ſuch a large ſhare of the King's favour, that they applied to him what St John ſays of the Eternal Word [B]. In order to diſcharge the duties impoſed on him both by his ſpiritual and temporal dignities and poſts, he applied himſelf on one ſide to regulate his manners, according to the ſtricteſt diſcipline, and to eſtabliſh in his dioceſe a Clergy which led an exemplary life, and were able to inſtruct their pariſhioners [C]; and on the other ſide he omitted nothing that might contribute to the exact and impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. In the year 1371, when he foreſaw that the great ſeal would be taken from him, he prevented the diſhonour, and ſurrendred it to the King. That Prince returning to England after a very ſucceſsful war with France, found his treaſury very much exhauſted. The Duke of Lancaſter, one of his ſons, at the head of ſeveral of the nobility complained of the Eccleſiaſtics, who at that time had the greateſt part of the civil offices in the kingdom; they repreſented to the King that it was not the clergy's buſineſs to intermeddle with temporal affairs, and that it was more proper thoſe places ſhould be filled by the laity, who would diſcharge them with

Cornelius Nepos. Quâ victoriâ elatus plurima miſcere cœpit, & majora concupiſcere. Sed primum in eo eſt reprehenſus, quod ex prœda tripodem aureum Delphis poſuiſſet, epigrammate ſcripto, in quo erat hæc ſententia: SUO DUCTU BARBAROS, APUD PLATÆEAS ESSE DELETOS, EJUSQUE VICTORIÆ ERGO APOLLINI DONUM DEDISSE. Hos verſus Lacedæmonii exſculpſerunt, neque aliud ſcripſerunt, quàm nomina earum civitatum, quarum auxilio Perſæ erant victi (4). Alexander, proud as he was, and jealous leſt any body elſe ſhould ſhare in his glory, made uſe of an inſcription which admitted the Greeks to a part of the honour of the triumph. Κοινούμενος δὲ τὴν νίκην τοῖς Ἕλλησιν . . . . κοινῇ τοῖς ἄλλοις λαφύροις ἐκέλευσεν ἐπιγράψαι φιλοτιμοτάτην ἐπιγραφὴν, ἈΛΈΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ Ὁ ΦΙΛΙΠΠΟΥ ΚΑῚ ΟἹ ἝΛΛΗΝΕΣ, ΠΛῊΝ ΛΑΚΕΔΑΙΜΟΝΊΩΝ, ἈΠῸ ΤΩ͂Ν ΒΑΡΒΆΡΩΝ ΤΩ͂Ν ΤῊΝ ἈΣΊΑΝ ΚΑΤΟΙΚΟΥΝΤΩΝ. Participans autem Græcis victoriam . . . cæteris manubiis in communi glorioſiſſimum titulum inſcribi juſſit, ALEXANDER PHILIPPI ET GRÆCI, PRÆTER LACEDÆMONIOS, DE BARBARIS ASIATICIS (5). - - - - That the Grecians might partake of the fruits of his victory . . . . upon all the reſt of the ſpoils he ordered this glorious inſcription to be written, ALEXANDER, THE SON OF PHILIP, AND ALL THE GRECIANS, EXCEPT THE LACEDEMONIANS, WON THESE FROM THE BARBARIANS WHO INHABIT ASIA. This was after the battle of Granicus; when he had occaſion for their further aſſiſtance, and conſequently was afraid to irritate them by omitting their names in the monuments of his victories, and hoped to endear them to him by mentioning them (6). He deſired to appropriate the whole inſcription of the temple of Diana to himſelf, and offered to defray the expence of the whole edifice; but the inhabitants of Epheſus would not conſent to it, and not daring directly to refuſe him this honour, they had recourſe to a flattering ſhift, which extricated them out of this affair. They told him that it was not proper for one god to raiſe monuments to another. Scripſit Epheſiis, ſe omnes ſumptus qui in id ædificium facti eſſent, reſtituturum; quique porro requirerentur, præbiturum de ſuo, ita tamen ut ipſius nomen inſtaurato operi inſcriberetur. Idque deprecati ſunt Epheſii. quo tempore, quia Alexandro petenti aliquid denegare arduum erat, legatus eorum ad adulationem confugit, qua maxime expugnabilem norat, dixitque dedecere culmen ipſius, ſi diis aliquid conſecraret, quum ipſe deus eſſet. nam eum honorem ab hominibus haberi potiori naturæ. Ea gloriæ contentio inter maximum regem, & unam civitatem fuit. obtinuerunt Epheſii; & maluerunt ingenti pecunia carere, quam inſtaurati templi titulo regi cedere (7). The Thebans, I believe, were not in ſuch a perplexity, when a courtezan offered to rebuild their walls on the ſame condition. I am ſure they abſolutely rejected the offer, if what Athenæus ſays be true. Ἐπλούτει δὲ σφόδρα ἡ Φρύνη καὶ ὑπισχνεῖτο τειχιεῖν τὰς Θήβας, ἐὰν ἐπιγράψωσι Θηβαῖοι, ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ ΜΕΝ ΚΑΤΕΣΚΑΨΕΝ, ΑΝΕΣΤΗΣΕ ΔΕ ΦΡΥΝΗ Η ΕΤΑΙΡΑ, ὡς ἱστορεῖ Καλλίστρατος ἐν τῷ περὶ ἑταιρῶν. Phryne uſque adeo dives erat, ut Thebarum mœnia extructuram ſe polliceretur, ſi adſcriberetur, ALEXANDRUM DIRUISSE, PHRYNEN VERO SCORTUM REFECISSE, ut ait Calliſtratus libro de Scortis (8). - - - - Phryne the courtezan was ſo rich, that ſhe promiſed to build the walls of Thebes, upon condition that the Thebans would make the following inſcription, ALEXANDER DEMOLISHED THESE WALLS, BUT PHRYNE THE COURTEZAN REBUILT THEM. So ſays Calliſtratus in his book Of Courtezans. But before I conclude, I ſhall relate a ſtratagem full as good as that of Wickham. The architect who built Pharus, engraved his own name on a ſtone, and that of the King on the lime which covered it. The trick was not diſcovered during his life, nor was he conſequently expoſed to any manner of danger on that account, no perſon being able to accuſe him to the King as a robber of his glory; but he expected after the expiration of ſeveral years that the name written in the lime would crumble away, and none would remain viſible beſides his own, which he had fixed in a much more durable ſubſtance than lime. The following citation acquaints us with the name of this Architect. Οἰκοδομήσας ἐν τὸ ἔργον, ἔνδοθεν μενὸς κατὰ τῶν λίθων τὸ αὐτοῦ ὄνομα ἐπέγραψεν. ἐπιχρίσας δὲ τιτάνῳ, καὶ ἐπικαλύψας, ἐπέγραψε τοὔνομα τοῦ τότε βασιλεύοντος, εἰδὼς ὅπερ καὶ ἐγένετο, πάνυ ὀλίγου χρόνου συνεκπεσούμενα μενὸς τῷ χρίσματι τὰ γράμματα, ἐκφανησόμενον δὲ, Σώστρατος Δεξιφάνους κνίδιος, θεοῖς σωτῆρσιν ὑπὲρ τῶν πλωϊζομένων. Poſtquam igitur hoc opus exædificaſſet, intus in ſaxis ſuum nomen inſcripſit: quo calce illita occultato, nomen ejus qui tum regnavit, ſuperinſcripſit, ratus, id quod etiam evenit, fore ut brevi admodum, literæ illæ cum illita calce caderent: hoc verò appareret: Soſtratus Cnidius, Dexiphanis filius, Diis ſervatoribus pro ſalute navigantium (9). - - - - - When therefore he had finiſhed the building, he engraved his own name, &c. . . . expecting, as it really happened, that after a ſhort time theſe letters would crumble away with the lime, and that then the following inſcription would appear: Soſtratus Cnidius, the ſon of Dexiphanes, erected this to the gods preſervers, in behalf of ſeafaring men.

[B] They applied to him what St John ſays of the Eternal Word.] The author I here cite (10) quotes a paſſage of Froiſſard which runs thus; At that time reigned a certain Prieſt called William of Wickham, and this William of Wickham was ſo much in favour with the King of England, that all things were done by him, and without him nothing was done. Compare this with the words of St John (11), and you will find no great difference.

[C] A Clergy which led an examplary life, and were able to inſtruct . . . . .] It is not ſufficient for them to be either learned or good men. Both theſe qualities ought to be united. But in the age we are ſpeaking of, it was much eaſier to find Prieſts who were neither learned nor pious, than to find any that were either the one or the other; and though the ignorance of with more fidelity and decency. The King being perſuaded that if he ſlighted theſe complaints, he ſhould diſoblige a potent faction, and that if he removed the Eccleſiaſtics from the civil offices, he ſhould draw vaſt ſums from thoſe whom he ſhould call to an account, reſolved on the alteration. Wherefore our Wickham very ſeaſonably reſigned the ſeal, and deſired leave to retire to his dioceſe, which he did not obtain before the year 1374. The laymen being promoted to the public offices, diſcharged them ſo ill that the court was forced to re-inſtate the Eccleſiaſtics. The Duke of Lancaſter was removed from the helm, but returned to the adminiſtration, when the death of the Prince of Wales had thrown the King into a languiſhing and mortal diſeaſe. Being now in power, he vehemently declared againſt the Clergy, and left no means unattempted to ruin our Wickham. He cauſed him to be accuſed of diſloyalty and extortion, and forced him to appear at the King's-Bench, as being the court impowered by law to take cognizance of this affair. He provided judges to condemn him, without allowing him the neceſſary time to digeſt his papers in order to his defence. Not content with depriving him of his temporalities, he adviſed King Edward to baniſh him; but that Prince though enfeebled in body and mind, refuſed it. He remembred that Wickham was found innocent of all manner of extortion five years before, when all the Eccleſiaſtics were obliged to give an account of their adminiſtration of the treaſury. Wherefore he ſuſpected the juſtice of the ſentence which condemned him, and gave encouraging hopes to thoſe deputed by the Biſhops to him in order to requeſt the annulling of this ſentence; and at the ſame time ſuſpecting the Duke of Lancaſter to be guilty of ſome ſiniſter deſign [D], he declared Prince Richard his grand-ſon (c) his ſucceſſor, and reſtored to Wickham whatever the Duke of Lancaſter had deprived him of. He died not long after (d). King Richard who ſucceeded him was but eleven years old, which rendred it very eaſy for the Duke of Lancaſter, Preſident of the Council, to revive the accuſations againſt our Biſhop of Wincheſter. They were accordingly reduced to ſeven heads, and maintained with very great aſſurance before the Council by the accuſers, but the accuſed ſo ſtrenuouſly refuted them that he was declared innocent. From that time, his noble deſire of applying the riches which providence had beſtowed on him, to very good uſes, increaſed more than ever; and not being able to think of a more uſeful appointment, than that which furniſhed youth with the means of learning the ſciences, he founded two magnificent colleges, the one at Oxford, and the other at Wincheſter [E]. Whilſt he was taking care of whatever could contribute to the compleating theſe two noble eſtabliſhments, he was recalled to court, and by a ſort of force obliged to accept of the dignity of Lord High Chancellor in the year 1389. He diſcharged that office for three years ſo well, that he rendred the nation happy; and this was

---

(4) Cornelius Nepos, in Pauſania, cap. i.

(5) Plut. in Alexandro, pag. 673. C.

(6) See Freinſhemius, Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. ii, cap. v.

(7) Freinſhemius, Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. ii, cap. vi, num. 33. He quotes Pauſanias, lib. vii, and Strabo, lib. xiv. I have found no ſuch thing in Pauſanias, but only in Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. m. 441.

(8) Athenæus, lib. xiii, pag. 591, D.

(9) Lucianus de conſcribenda Hiſtoria, ſub fin. pag. m. 706, Tom. i.

(10) The author of the Hiſtorica Deſcriptio, pag. 32.

(11) All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. John i. 3.

(c) He was the ſon of the Prince of Wales.

(d) In the year 1377.

of thoſe times was prodigious. yet there were more who were able to inſtruct than thoſe who led a good life: and therefore this care of our Wickham muſt have proved a buſineſs of no ſmall fatigue, ſince he ordered, in an eſpecial manner, that all Deacons and Prieſts ſhould be obliged to be free from drunkenneſs and leudneſs. ‘ Ante omnia tam Diaconos quam qui ‘ ſupra eos collocati ſunt preſbyteros ac ſacerdotes ab ‘ infami illa ebrietatis & libidinis macula omnino im‘munes eſſe voluit. Nam quum ipſi ſal terræ, lux ‘ mundi, ac diſpenſatores myſteriorum Dei crebro in ‘ ſcripturis uſurpentur, nimis indignum eſſe dicebat eos ‘ vinolentia deformari vel cubilibus & immunditie in‘quinari, à qua turpitudinis labe & ignominia omnes ‘ etiam ex populo (quos Laicos vocant) melioris notæ ‘ abhorrerent (12). - - - Above all he required that as ‘ well the Deacons as the Preſbyters and Prieſts, that ‘ were in a rank above them, ſhould keep themſelves entirely free from the foul ſtains of drunkenneſs and un‘cleanneſs. For whereas in the Scripture they are fre‘quently called the ſalt of the earth, the light of the ‘ world, and the diſpenſers of the myſteries of G O D, he ‘ ſaid that it was a thing very unbecoming their charac‘ters to be guilty of drunkenneſs, or luſt and uncleanneſs; ‘ eſpecially ſince even the better ſort of people among the ‘ Laity abſtained from theſe filthy vices.’ This is not the leaſt glorious part of his adminiſtration.

(12) Hiſtor. Deſcriptio, pag. 34.

[D] Edward . . . ſuſpecting the Duke of Lancaſter to be guilty of ſome ſiniſter deſign] It was thought that the Duke intended to uſurp the crown (13), and this ſuſpicion was grounded on the ſecret meaſures which he took with ſome members of the Parliament, in order to engage the Engliſh in imitation of the French, to enact a law for the excluſion of women from ſucceeding to the crown of the realm. But this rendered him odious, and very much diſturbed King Edward now grown more ſuſpicious than ever (14), and made him reſolve to declare his grandſon for his ſucceſſor. This is my author's account. But perhaps it may be aſked what the Duke of Lancaſter aimed at, ſince the eſtabliſhment of the Salique law could not prevent the grand-ſons from ſucceeding, and conſequently he could not get any thing by its eſtabliſhment; he ſtood in need of a law that ſhould prefer the uncles to the nephews. It may be replied that not daring to endeavour directly at the excluſion of Richard his eldeſt brother's ſon, he began with the project of an innovation, wherein he could not be ſuſpected to have an intereſted view: but if he could have gained his end, (viz.) the eſtabliſhment of the Salique law, he would have found room for other innovations, and would have requeſted a law in preference of the rights of uncles to thoſe of nephews. Mr Varillac imagines that he deſigned to abrogate the law for the ſucceſſion of grand-children, and that on that account he was an encourager of Wickliff (15); but Mr de Larroque agreeably and ſolidly refutes this thought (16).

(13) Vehementiſſima regni appetendi ſuſpicione & invidia laborabat. Ibid. pag. 53.

(14) Qui in ſenili ætate credulus & ſuſpicionibus paulo indulgentior eſſe cœpit . . . poſt hujuſmodi ſcrupulum injectum paulo alienior deinceps à filio Lancaſtrio pater nonnullis videbatur. Ibid. pag. 54.

(15) Varillas, Hiſtoire du Wicleſianiſme, pag. 11, & ſeq.

(16) Larroque, nouvelles Accuſations contre Varillas, pag. 11, & ſeq.

[E] He founded two magnificent colleges, the one at Oxford, and the other at Wincheſter.] He had long given very ſignal proofs of a zealous inclination to relieve the neceſſitous. Hoſpitality, one of the virtues, which, according to St Paul (17), ought to ſhine in the life of a Biſhop, was remarkably exemplified in him. He lodged in his houſe twenty-four poor people, and maintained them there all his life. He received all ſtrangers with great humanity; and ſeven years before the foundation of the abovementioned colleges, he began to ſettle an annual penſion on fifty hopeful youths, whom he ſent to ſtudy at Oxford (18). Theſe were his preludes. After which, having obtained Letters-Patents to build a college in that city, he laid the firſt ſtone of it very early in the morning on the fifth of March, in 1379, and deſigned it for one hundred perſons, beſides ſervants, fifty ſcholars were to be entertained there, in order to be inſtructed in the ſciences, and a grave and learned man to govern the college with the title of Warden. He added ten Chaplains, three Clerks, and ſixteen Choriſters. This edifice being finiſhed in ſeven years, he himſelf placed thoſe hundred perſons (19) in it at three of the clock in the morning, on the fourteenth of April 1386. The firſt thing they did after their entrance was by a ſolemn public prayer to implore the bleſſing of God (20). The following year he founded another college in

(17) Tit. i. 8.

(18) Taken from Hiſtorica Deſcriptio, pag. 35, 36.

(19) He choſe them himſelf.

(20) Taken from the ſame book, pag. 101, 102.

was the reaſon why, without the moſt preſſing inſtances, he could not obtain the King's leave to retire, when he ſaw the fatal troubles that were ready to break out, which induced him to deſire a retreat in order to ſhelter himſelf from the ſtorm. Being then returned to his church, he finiſhed the building of his college at Wincheſter, and there built that ſumptuous cathedral, which equalled, or wanted but little of equalling, that of St Paul in London. Beſides this he very liberally diſburſed ſeveral ſums to the great advantage of the public, and the poor; all which could not yet prevent his being expoſed to imminent dangers in the year 1397, when he and ſome others were accuſed of high-treaſon in full parliament (e), but he was very honourably acquitted. From that time to his death he lived quietly in his dioceſe, and was wholly intent upon diſcharging all the duties of a good prelate. Nay he was there pretty ſecure from all thoſe commotions which violently ſhook England. He died in the eighty-firſt year of his age in the year 1404. Several ſcandalous reports were ſpread againſt him; amongſt other things it was ſaid that he revealed a ſecret declared in confeſſion concerning a ſuppoſititious ſon [F], and that he made preſents and promiſes to King Edward's miſtreſs, in order to obtain the reſtitution of his epiſcopal temporalities (f) [G]. We ought not to forget that he

(e) Omnes illos ſimul ac conjunctim proditionis ac læſæ majeſtatis reos fecit, perinde ac ſi illi Regem regio imperio ac omnium rerum dominatu deſpoliare ſtatuiſſent. Hiſtorica Deſcript. Vitæ Wickami, p. 109.

(f) Taken from a book, intituled, Hiſtorica Deſcriptio complectens Vitam ac Res geſtas beatiſſimi viri Gulielmi Wicami quondam Vintonienſis Epiſcopi, &c. printed at Oxford in the year 1690, in 4*to.*

in the ſuburbs of Wincheſter, near the Epiſcopal palace. He laid the firſt ſtone of this on the twenty-ſixth of March, in 1387. He deſigned it for one hundred and five perſons beſides ſervants. Theſe perſons were, a Head or Warden, ten Prieſts, ſeventy ſcholars, an upper and under School-maſter, three Chaplains, three Clerks, and ſixteen Choriſters (21). All theſe entered the firſt time at three in the morning, on the twenty-eighth of March 1393 (22). The ſtatutes of theſe two colleges are ſo excellent, that they ſerved as a model for all thoſe, who for the ſpace of two hundred years made the like foundations in Oxford and Cambridge (23). I muſt not omit that Wickham provided that this college at Wincheſter ſhould be a nurſery for that which he founded at Oxford; for he ordered that all the places vacant in the laſt ſhould be ſupplied by a draught from the former: which is religiouſly obſerved to this very day. My author expreſſes this part of the ſtatutes in very ſignificant words: Quod Collegio ſuo Oxonienſi quaſi fons & ſeminarium inſerviret, ex cujus (ut ita dicam) utero junior alia ſoboles quotannis naſceretur, & in alterum Collegium decreſcentium loco veluti ad Patres literarum ac Senatores immigraret. Eſt enim hoc illius Collegii Oxonienſis proprium & peculiare, ejuſque ſtatutis ſancitum ut cum cætera Collegia Oxonienſia in demortuorum aut diſcedentium locum ex ſcholis quibuſcunque aſcititios cooptare ſoleant, ſolum hoc non niſi naturales ex ſeminario ſuo Vintonienſi velut ex ſua & propria ſtirpe ſuccreſcentes eligat, & electos ad ſe tanquam ad novam Coloniam ſuo tempore & loco deducat (24). Obſerve that his laſt teſtament and codicil were very memorable proofs of his charity and liberality (25).

[F] It was ſaid that he revealed a ſecret declared in confeſſion, concerning a ſuppoſititious ſon.] This is the third of the five calumnies which my author undertakes to refute. The two firſt are that Wickham's learning was even below a moderate degree, and that he had been a ſervant. Our author refutes this by ſeveral remarks which it is not neceſſary to tranſcribe here; thoſe who are curious to ſee them may conſult the original, to which I refer them (26). But as for the third calumny I ſhall give the ſubſtance of the Apology: in order to which let us begin with the accuſation. It is pretended that the Duke of Lancaſter's hatred to Wickham was grounded on his divulging that that Duke was not the ſon of Edward III. They add, that Philippa, King Edward's Queen, revealed in confeſſion to our Biſhop of Wincheſter, that John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, was the ſon of a German, and that ſhe had fraudulently impoſed him on the King, her huſband, inſtead of a female infant ſhe had by him. They farther ſay, that ſhe intreated this Prelate to reveal it to the nobility of the realm, in caſe the Duke, this ſuppoſed ſon of King Edward, ſhould aſpire to the crown, or prepare to ſucceed to the true Princes of the blood according to the laws. Hence ſome have taken occaſion to charge this Biſhop with a notorious ſacrilege, I mean the non-obſervation of the Canon-Law, which forbids the divulging any ſecrets delivered in confeſſion. His Apologiſt juſtifies him. I. By the ſhining virtue of the Queen. II. By the good underſtanding always preſerved betwixt the King and Queen. III. By the impunity of Wickham. IV. By his reconciliation to the Duke of Lancaſter. V. By the ſilence of Hiſtorians, and public records on this head. It is impoſſible, ſaith our author, that ſuch a virtuous Princeſs ſhould have killed her own daughter (27), in order the better to cover an abominable fraud. A King of ſuch a great ſpirit would not have left ſo villanous an action of his wife unpuniſhed: nor could he be ignorant of it, ſince it is pretended that it was revealed to the nobility of the realm. And if he had not believed it, he would have treated Wickham as the moſt infamous detractors deſerve; the whole royal family being diſhonoured by a report ſo injurious to the Queen, the ſlanderer would have been duly puniſhed. But the Duke of Lancaſter, hereby diſgraced more than all the reſt, would have brought him to juſtice, and never have been reconciled to him; and yet it is certain that after King Richard had reconciled them, they continued very well together till the Duke's death (28), that is about twenty-one years. Obſerve alſo that this ſtory is no where to be found except in the compilation of a Monk: 'Recte Harpisfieldus in hiſtoria illud de ſuppoſito Reginæ partu tanquam fictum & commentum rejicit, ac nullibi niſi in Monacho Albanenſi reperiri ſcribit (29). - - - - Harpsfield, in his Hiſtory, very juſtly rejects as a fiction what is ſaid of the Queen's ſuppoſititious ſon, and affirms that it is no where mentioned but by a Monk of St Albans.'

[G] . . . . And that he made preſents and promiſes to King Edward's miſtreſs, in order to obtain the reſtitution of his Epiſcopal temporalities.] This is the fourth calumny: our author indeed refutes it, but by arguments very far ſhort of the ſtrength of thoſe which he alledges againſt the third. The expreſs terms of the accuſation run thus: 'Regi jam ægroto, ipſaque ſenectute confecto ſemper aderat atque miniſtrabat quædam fœmina Alicia Pierce, quæ Regi languido & infirmo obſecuta majorem quam ipſe dux (30) cum Rege iniit gratiam: hanc præſenti mercede & uberiori promiſſa ſpe Wicamus adduxit ut à Rege reſtitui ſibi ablata Epiſcopatus jura tam quæ ante percepta & in fiſco reſervata eſſent, quam omnia prædia procuraret, quod illa invito duce, continuo impetravit (31). - - - The King being now ſick and worn out with age, a certain woman, whoſe name was Alice Pierce, always attended and ſerved him. She, by humouring him in his weak and languiſhing condition, got more into his favour than the Duke himſelf. Wickham prevailed upon her by a preſent he made her, and the promiſe of another much greater, to ſollicit the King to reſtore the temporalities of his biſhopric which had been taken from him, as well thoſe which he had enjoyed before, and which were ſequeſtered in the Exchequer, as all the lands belonging to it. This ſhe immediately obtained for him in ſpite of the Duke.' He refutes this. I. By the hatred which this immodeſt woman bore to the Biſhops. II. By the very ſmall confidence which the corruption of her manners could allow any perſon to have in her. III. By her ſtrict friendſhip with Wickham's enemies. IV. By the expreſs terms of the Letters-Patents granted to this Prelate for his re-eſtabliſhment, which contain the reaſons of it, and declare the conſent of the Duke of Lancaſter, of all the nobility, and all the King's council: they are ſubſcribed at the bottom in this manner, per ipſum Regem & conſilium, - - - by the King and his council. The Apologiſt's exclamation ought not to be forgotten. 'O inſignes calumniatores, & chartarum publicarum malicioſos

(21) Ibid. pag. 102, 103.

(22) Ibid. pag. 104.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 102.

(25) Ibid. pag. 112, 113.

(26) Ibid. pag. 116, & ſeq.

(27) Si primo hujus calumniæ auctori credimus, ea quem non peperit, aluit, quam peperit, occidit. - - - If we believe the author of this calumny, ſhe killed her own child, and brought up another's. Ibid. pag. 123.

(28) Ibid. pag. 121.

(29) Ibid. pag. 124.

(30) That is, the Duke of Lancaſter.

(31) Ibid. pag. 125, ex Acwortho in Vita Sadburei.

he was employed in the expulsion of Wickliff [H].

‘ licioſos interpretes, qui quod inſtrumenta Regalia ‘ per ſanctum Senatum fieri aſſerunt, id per impurum ‘ ſcortum factitatum prædicant. Num ſcortum & con‘ ſilium iſtis idem ſonat (32)? - - - O notorious calum‘ niators, and malicious interpreters of the public records, ‘ who pretend, That to be the action of a ſtrumpet which ‘ the royal acts aſſert to have been done by the ſacred ‘ council. Do the names, council and ſtrumpet, ſignify the ‘ ſame thing with them?’ He thinks it very ſtrange, that, notwithſtanding this declaration of King Edward, ‘ ſe liberalitate Epiſcopi ex promiſſione in difficultati‘ bus ſuis atque Regni adductum fuiſſe ut ea bona re‘ ſtitueret, - - - that he had engaged himſelf by a pro‘ miſe to reſtore theſe temporalities, being induced to it by ‘ the liberal aſſiſtance which the Biſhop gave him in the ‘ ſtraits that he and his kingdom were reduced to,’ any ſhould preſume to aſſign, as the cauſe of this reſtiſtution, the good offices of a courtezan, purchaſed with money. V. Laſtly, he urges that King Richard, after the flight of Alice Pierce (33), confirmed this reſtitution by the advice of his council, in which were preſent the Duke of Lancaſter, the Prelates, Earls, and Barons. I am inclined to believe, that this calumny, of which we have juſt now ſeen the refutation, is falſe; but I do not find that it is refuted by very ſtrong reaſons. Thouſands of inſtances prove theſe two things: firſt, that thoſe who are perſecuted by a King's miſtreſs, will apply to her to be re-eſtabliſhed, and endeavour to gain her by dint of money and promiſes, without ever diſtruſting her on a ſuppoſition that a profeſſed whore muſt be capable of all ſorts of perfidy; ſecondly, that an act of Replevy, obtained by the intereſt of a miſtreſs, runs in the ſame ſtile, with that obtained by lawful means. A King, who grants any thing at the ſollicitation of his miſtreſs, may eaſily engage his council to approve it; and if he doth not do it, his miſtreſs her ſelf will be able to gain the chief Counſellors: and then the moſt favourable and glorious clauſes are inſerted in the Letters-Patents, and no part of the uſual form is omitted. To this may be added, that there have been ſome perſons unjuſtly oppreſſed, who have been reſtored by no other means but by buying the good offices of a miſtreſs. Nor ought we to be ſurprized, that after the diſgrace of ſuch a woman a confirmation of the Patent was obtained: for that is not at all extraordinary. So that the arguments of our author do not ſeem to me to be very ſtrong. But it would indeed have been enough to have laid it upon the authors of this calumny to prove it. What is very certain, is, that King Edward's miſtreſs could do every thing with him at that time, and that her power ended only with the life of that Prince. This King was unexpectedly ſurprized by the loſs of his ſpeech all at once, ſo that he had only time to expreſs ſome pious ſentiments, (to which he was exhorted by a Prieſt) by his geſture and eyes. This did not happen by reaſon that he was not long and dangerouſly ill; but the famous Alice Peers, too really his miſtreſs, had ſo poſſeſſed him, that no perſon could have acceſs to ſpeak to him before he himſelf was ſpeechleſs. Then this diſſolute harpy, having in haſte tore off the diamond rings which he wore on his finger, withdrew, and left him in the hands of a Chaplain, who could only draw ſome ſigns of penitence from him; which indeed, tho' late, when ſincere are good; but are rarely ſincere when ſo late (34).

(32) Ibid. pag. 126.

(33) Quum jam Alicia Peers ſe in fugam cum ſua peſte ac pernicie convertiſſet. Ibid.

(34) Father D'Orleans, Hiſt. des Revolutions d'Angleterre, livr. v, pag. 68, 69, Tom. ii.

I ſhall by the by ſay, that the fifth calumny, refuted in the above-cited book (35), is, that Wickham was baniſhed, and continued three years in exile, according to ſome, and ſeven entire years, according to others. But this is utterly falſe, for he never lay under any ſentence of baniſhment. I add farther, that he was never deprived of his biſhopric, ſo that the ſee of Wincheſter was never vacant from 1367 to 1404. Whence it neceſſarily follows that Wickliff was refuſed this biſhopric in 1367, if what is pretended by Varillas (36) were true, viz. that his not being able to obtain that biſhopric ſo diſguſted him, that it inſpired him with a deſign of ſetting up for a Hereſiarch; but if he was not able to obtain it that year, one of the reaſons by which Mr de Larroque (37) refutes Varillas concerning the conſequences of this pretended refuſal, will become yet more ſpecious.

(35) Hiſtor. Deſcript. pag. 127, 128.

(36) Varillas, ubi ſupra, p. 2.

(37) Larroque, ubi ſupra, pag. 13, & ſeq.

[H] He was employed in the expulſion of Wickliff.] My author touches only accidentally on this particular, when he is proving that our Biſhop of Wincheſter was more learned than his detractors imagined. ‘ Quid animi fuiſſe putas Richardo Regi quum Wica‘ mum anno Regni ſui ſeptimo una cum Courtneo Can‘ tuarienſi Archiepiſcopo Oxonium contra virum acer‘ rimum Johannem Wicklefum mitteret? An mediocris ‘ eruditionis & ingenii eſſe oportebat, qui (quod ille ‘ ibi præſtitit) diſſentientes in religione opiniones con‘ ciliaret, & tam celebrem & acutum virum ſuſpectæ ‘ fidei redargueret & ex Academiæ finibus extermina‘ ret (38)? - - - - - What do you think was King Ri‘ chard's motive for ſending Wickham in the ſeventh year ‘ of his reign, together with Courtney Archbiſhop of Can‘ terbury, to Oxford, againſt that ſubtle and acute man ‘ John Wickliff? Is it reaſonable to ſuppoſe that he was ‘ only a man of inconſiderable parts and erudition, who ‘ reconciled the differences of opinion in religious matters, ‘ and convicted the great Wickliff of being a Heretic, ‘ and expelled him from the bounds of the univerſity? Obſerve here a remarkable particular of which the Jeſuit Maimbourg (39), Mr Varillas, nay, even Mr de Larroque, as well as ſeveral others, have made no manner of mention; viz. that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was in perſon at Oxford with the Biſhop of Wincheſter, in the year 1383, or 1384 (40), in order to expel Wickliff from that univerſity.

(38) Hiſtorica Deſcriptio, pag. 117. The Records of Lambeth are quoted.

(39) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du grand Schiſme d'Occident, Tom. i, pag. 177, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

(40) The ſeventh year of Richard is partly in 1383, and partly in 1384.

WIDA (a) (HERMAN DE) ſon to William de Wida Count of the empire, was made Archbiſhop of Cologn in the year 1515 (b). Long after he was elected Biſhop of Paderbon, and perſecuted the Proteſtants of that place [A]. In the year 1536 he held a council,

---

(a) It is more commonly written ſo in Germany, than Weda, or Weida. See Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 435.

(b) Seckendorf, ibid. Theod. de Beza, in Iconibus, ſays it was in the year 1510.

[A] He perſecuted the Proteſtants of Paderborn.] As a commentary upon this I ſhall cite Father Maimbourg's words. ‘ After * the death of Eric of Brun‘ ſwic, Biſhop of Paderborn, Wida being elected by ‘ the Canons of that church to ſucceed him, with a ‘ deſign that he ſhould oppoſe the Lutherans who ‘ began to eſtabliſh themſelves there, he performed it ‘ ſo well, that being aſſiſted by his friends, who, to‘ gether with ſeveral good troops, accompanied him, ‘ he made himſelf maſter of that city, drove out all ‘ the preachers he found in it, utterly aboliſhed Lu‘ theraniſm there, and prohibited any perſons profeſ‘ ſing it on pain of death (1).’ Mr Seckendorf obſerves, that our Herman was excited to this rigour by the Canons, and by his reſentment againſt the inſolence of the populace (2), and that, notwithſtanding this, he gave ſome proofs of moderation. For he did not moleſt two Miniſters who had eſcaped out of priſon, and pardoned ſixteen citizens who were condemned to death. To this mercy, the interceſſion of their relations, and the executioner's refuſing to behead them, contributed very much. ‘ Civibus Paderbornenſibus ‘ XVI ad mortem condemnatis gratiam fecit, precibus ‘ ſupplicum & adſtantium, immo & carnificis facto ſin‘ gulari, motus: Hic enim gladium, quo productos ‘ in forum decollare juſſus erat, judicibus publice tra‘ didit, negans, ſe innocentium cruore manus pollu‘ turum eſſe (3). - - - - He pardoned ſixteen citizens of ‘ Paderborn who had been condemned to death, being ‘ moved by the prayers and intreaties of thoſe who were ‘ ſtanding by, and even by a very ſingular action of the ‘ executioner; for the ſword with which the executioner ‘ was ordered to behead thoſe who were brought forth ‘ into the market-place, he publickly delivered to the ‘ judges, and ſaid, that he would not ſtain himſelf with ‘ the blood of the innocent.’

* Chytræus, ad ann. 1532.

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Lutheraniſme, livr. iii, pag. 264, Dutch Edit.

(2) Irritatus plebis Paderbornenſis petulantia & à Canonicis ſtimulatus. Seckendorf. Hiſt. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 435.

(3) Id. ibid. He refers us to Chytræus, lib. ix, fol. 278, & lib. xiii, fol. 392, & ſeq.

[B] He

a council, the regulations of which were very much approved [B]; for being a very good man, whoſe life was exemplary, he paſſionately deſired the eſtabliſhment of good order in his dioceſe. He not only endeavoured to reſtore a good diſcipline there, but alſo intended a reformation of doctrine, and having conſulted Melanchthon, and had ſeveral ſecret conferences with Bucer, he cauſed the latter to preach at Bonn, and engaged the former to come thither ſome time after [C]. The majority of the canons of Cologn oppoſed this enterprize, and not being able to gain any advantage by the books which they

[B] He held a council, the regulations of which were very much approved.] Let us again cite Maimbourg. ‘ Being apprehenſive that the Lutherans already ſpread ‘ in the * neighbouring provinces, would inſenſibly ‘ introduce the venom of their Hereſy into his electo- ‘ rate, he, in conjunction with his ſuffragans, held a ‘ council at Cologn, where he made the moſt excel- ‘ lent Canons that could be deſired for the mainte- ‘ nance of religion in it's purity, the re-eſtabliſhment ‘ of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline in it's vigour, and the re- ‘ gulation of the duties and morals of all true Chri- ‘ ſtians in every ſtation (4).’ Cardinal Sadolet very much commended this Council of Cologn, but thought it ſomewhat ſtrange that purgatory was not mentioned in it. See his letter to Herman (5). For the reſt, this Archbiſhop was not much afraid that the Lutherans ſhould introduce the venom of their Hereſy into the electorate of Cologn: Father Maimbourg was ignorant of his real ſentiments: read Mr Seckendorf, and you will find that this Prelate was already at that juncture more than half a Lutheran. ‘ Hermannum ‘ jam tum meliora intendiſſe, ex epiſtola M. S. Joh. ‘ Lumpii, Doct. Colon. quæ inter Heckelianas extat, ‘ & d. 6. Oct. hoc anno data eſt, apparet. Scribit enim: ‘ Archiepiſcopus nondum audet, quæ ſentit, prodere, ob ‘ Monachorum & Theologorum ſuperſtitioſa ſupercilia, ‘ quibus adhuc, inſipidum eſt, quod ex eorum non prodit ‘ culina, ſperatur tamen finis. Addit: Minoritanum, ‘ qui Præſuli à confeſſione & ſacra concione eſt, cucullum ‘ ferre adhuc, ſed aliud ſentire: in templo majori concio- ‘ nari aliquem puram Evangelii doctrinam, advolanti- ‘ bus ex vicinis oppidulis, etiam ex Haſſiaca ditione pro- ‘ cul diſſita, tot millibus ut eos vix capiat Templum (6). ‘ - - - It appears by a manuſcript letter of John Lumpius, ‘ Doctor at Cologn, (which letter is to be found among ‘ the Heckelianæ, dated the ſixth of October that year) ‘ that the Archbiſhop had even then better ſentiments. ‘ The Archbiſhop, ſays Lumpius, dares not yet declare ‘ his ſentiments, for fear of the ſuperſtitious frowns of ‘ the Monks and Divines, who ſtill look upon every ‘ thing as inſipid which does not come out of their ‘ own kitchen. Nevertheleſs an end of this is to be ‘ hoped for. He adds, that the minor Friar, who was ‘ Father Confeſſor and Preacher to the Archbiſhop, ‘ ſtill wore the cowl, but that his opinion was ‘ changed; that in the great church there was one ‘ preached the pure doctrine of the Goſpel; and that ‘ ſo many thouſands of people crowded thither from ‘ the neighbouring villages, and even from the remote ‘ dominions of Heſſe, that the church could hardly ‘ contain them.’

[C] Having conſulted Melanchthon, and had ſeveral ſecret conferences with Bucer, he cauſed the latter to preach . . . and engaged the other to come . . . . ſome time after.] He deputed Peter Medman to Melanchthon in the year 1539, and wiſhed he would come to him immediately, but his journey was deferred to the year 1543. Bucer being ſent for by this Archbiſhop, came to him towards the end of 1541, and after ſeveral conferences which were very well reliſhed by that Prelate, he went back to Straſbourg, from whence he returned to Herman the following year, and preached publickly at Bonn. He alſo informed the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Heſſe, that this Prelate had very good deſigns; but that he wanted encouragement, by reaſon of his age which made him act timorouſly and ſlowly. Thoſe Princes did not fail to write to him in order to confirm him in his Chriſtian intentions. He thanked them, and informed them that he had no other aim than the glory of GOD, and the happineſs of his neighbours. He had before entreated the Elector of Saxony to ſend Melanchthon to him; who accordingly ſet forwards on his journey about the end of April 1543, and, in conjunction with Bucer, drew up a project of Reformation, which the Archbiſhop cauſed to be read to him, and he himſelf carefully examined it (7). Some particulars, which did not ſavour much of Proteſtantiſm, were overlooked in this project to pleaſe him; which obliged Luther to complain of Melanchthon's and Bucer's connivance. The Elector of Saxony was not better pleaſed with this conduct, tho' the Landgrave told him, it was not to be expected that the work could be perfected all at once (8). We ought to know that the Archbiſhop was deſirous to retain all the ceremonies which were not impious, and that each order ſhould preſerve it's privileges: he did not pretend to aboliſh Epiſcopacy. ‘ Propoſitum ſci- ‘ licet erat Hermanno ut ex Melanchthonis literis colligi ‘ poteſt, Chytræus etiam Lib. 16. fol. 460. apertius ‘ tradit, ceremonias veteres omnes, quotquot ſine im- ‘ pietate ſervari poſſent, una cum collegiorum digni- ‘ tate, libertate, prærogativis & juribus omnibus, re- ‘ tinere, ut moderatæ & piæ ordinationis Eccleſiæ Ca- ‘ thedralis exemplum eſſe poſſet: ſed eventus oſtendit, ‘ in rebus tantopere corruptis modum difficillime in- ‘ veniri; quapropter omnis iſta cautio inutilis fuit, ‘ &, retenta illa pompa, doctrinæ puritati incrementa ‘ omnia ſubtracta fuerunt (9). - - - Herman propoſed, as ‘ may be gathered from Melanchthon's letters, and as ‘ Chytræus more plainly affirms, to retain all the old ‘ ceremonies which were not impious, together with the ‘ dignity, freedom, and all the rights and privileges of ‘ of the colleges; that there might be an example of a ‘ moderate and pious adminiſtration in his Epiſ- ‘ copal church. But the event ſhewed that, when things ‘ are ſo far corrupted, it is very difficult to find a me- ‘ dium; for which reaſon all this caution proved uſeleſs, ‘ and the retaining of that pomp put an entire end to the ‘ increaſe of the purity of doctrine.’ The project of Reformation which he publiſhed, did not at all mention either Luther, or the Pope (10), and he took care to expreſs himſelf ſo cautiouſly concerning the LORD's Supper, that the Zuinglian's could agree to it (11). Luther was very well pleaſed that his name was not mentioned (12), becauſe he was well aſſured it might have deterred people; but he condemned the other parts of this cautious conduct, and became ſo violently enraged againſt Melanchthon, that, perhaps, he had never been reconciled to him, if the latter had not laid the fault on Bucer, and if the Elector of Saxony had not laboured to prevent an open rupture betwixt them. ‘ Non latuit Melanchthonem indignatio Lutheri, immo ‘ tantopere eum afflixit, ut de deſerenda Wittenberga ‘ cogitaret, ſi Luthero inviſus eſſet, aut quod futurum ‘ eſſe dicebatur, publice ab illo refutaretur. Sed pia ‘ Electoris Saxoniæ providentia & induſtria Pontani ‘ placatus eſt Lutherus, & Melanchthonis excuſatio- ‘ nem accepit, dicentis, ſe neque caput illud reforma- ‘ tionis Colonienſis de ſacra Cœna compoſuiſſe, neque ‘ Bucerum celaſſe, quæ in eo deſideraret, hunc tamen ‘ admonitionis ſuæ nullam habuiſſe rationem. Sic ira ‘ Lutheri vehementius in Bucerum verſa eſt (13). . . . ‘ Melanchthon was not ignorant of Luther's indignation; ‘ nay, he was ſo much concerned at it, that he reſolved to ‘ leave Wittemberg, if he ſhould prove obnoxious to Luther, ‘ or in caſe (for ſuch a thing was talked of) he ſhould be ‘ publickly confuted by him. But by the pious care of the ‘ Elector of Saxony, and by Pontanus's means, Luther was ‘ appeaſed, and admitted the excuſe of Melanchthon, who ‘ ſaid that it was not he who compoſed the article of Re- ‘ formation at Cologn touching the LORD's Supper, and ‘ that he had freely told Bucer what he thought was want- ‘ ing in it, but that he had ſhewn no regard to his ad- ‘ monition. Thus the edge of Luther's indignation was ‘ turned againſt Bucer.’

This project of Reformation was printed at Buſſhoven, if we believe the Preface, and that is all we can know of it; the time of the impreſſion not being mentioned. A ſecond edition appeared at Bonn, in 1543, printed by Laurence Mylius, or von der Muhlen. And a third was printed the following year. Theſe three impreſſions were in the German language. But the Latin edition, printed at Bonn, in 1545, by the ſame Mylius, is intituled, Noſtra Hermanni, ex gratia Dei Archiepiſcopi they publiſhed, they had recourſe to the Pope and the Emperor. The former excommunicated and depoſed the Archbiſhop, and was ſo effectually ſeconded by Charles V, that our prelate was forced to renounce his dignity in the year 1547 [D]. He retired to his paternal eſtate (c), where he died on the thirteenth of Auguſt 1552, being eighty years old (d). His ſcheme of reformation was more like that of England, than that of Germany

---

* Concil. Colon. I. t. 14. Concil. edit. Pariſ.

(4) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

(5) It is in the xivth book of Sadolet's letters, pag. 559, Edit. Lugd. 1554, in 8vo.

(6) Seckendorf, ubi ſupra, pag. 138, 139.

(7) Taken from Seckendorf, ubi ſupra, pag. 436.

(8) Non ſatis placebat illa diſſimulatio Electori monito licet a Landgravio quod non omnia ſub initium exacte conſtitui poſſent. Id. ibid. pag. 437, num. 8.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Hermanno ea placuit lenitas qua etiam cavit ne in toto ſcripto aliquid contra Pontificem nominatim ſpargeretur. Id. ibid. pag. 448, d.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid.

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Chytræus, in Saxoniâ, ad ann. 1552, in fine.

Archiepiſcopi Colonienſis & Principis Electoris, ſimplex ac pia Deliberatio, qua ratione chriſtiana, & in verbo Dei fundata, Reformatio doctrina, adminiſtrationis divinorum Sacramentorum, ceremoniarum, totiuſque curæ animarum, & aliorum miniſteriorum Eccleſiaſticorum, apud eos, qui noſtræ paſtorali curæ commendati ſunt, tantiſper inſtituenda ſit, donec Dominus dederit conſtitui meliorem, vel per liberam & chriſtianam Synodum, ſive generalem ſive nationalem, vel per Ordines Imperii Nationis Germanicæ in Spiritu ſancto congregatos The copies of the firſt edition were kept, as it were locked up (14) for ſome time, and perhaps the publication had been longer deferred, if all thoſe that were concerned in it had been as phlegmatic as Herman. The chapter of Cologn no ſooner diſcovered that the copies were ſpread on all ſides, but they cauſed to be publiſhed in German and Latin, a book, intituled, Antididagma, ſeu Chriſtianæ & Catholicæ Religionis per Rever. & Illuſt. Dominos Canonicos Metropolitanæ Eccleſiæ Colonienſis Propugnatio, adverſus Librum quendam univerſis Ordinibus ſeu ſtatibus Diocæſis ejuſdem nuper Bonnæ titulo Reformationis exhibitum, ac poſtea mutatis quibuſdam, Conſultoriæ Deliberationis nomine impreſſum (15). At the end of the Antididagma is a grave and moderate diſcourſe of twelve pages only, intituled, Sententia delectorum per venerabile capitulum Eccleſiæ Colonienſis de vocatione Martini Buceri. Theſe were not the only books that were publiſhed on each ſide: Mr Seckendorf informs us (16), that a book appeared under the title of Judicium deputatorum Univerſitatis & ſecundarii Cleri Colonienſis de doctrina & vocatione Martini Buceri, which was aſcribed to Everard Billicus, a Carmelite, and ſo ſtuffed with ſcurrilous boffooneries, that the Canons of Cologn would not licenſe it; wherefore the firſt title, Judicium Cleri & Academiæ, was ſtruck out, and the other made uſe of, as we find in one of Melanchthon's letters. ' Coloniæ liber editus eſt, non ' tam contra Bucerum, quam contra univerſam do' ctrinam Eccleſiarum noſtrarum, & contra noſtros ' Principes. Poeta operis eſt Carmelita ille bene ſagi' natus, & Bacchi ac Veneris ſacerdos. Titulum operi ' fecerant: Judicium Cleri & Academiæ. Cum autem ' ſaniores in Collegio quidam Comites vidiſſent, ſcrip' tum dignius eſſe ſcurris, quam Clero, juſſerunt mu' tari titulum, ac teſtati ſunt, id opus non probari ſuo ' Collegio. Addita eſt ergo tituli correctio, pro ' Clero jubent legi Clerum ſecundarium, nothos vide' licet Cleros intelligunt. Petulantiſſime convitiatur ' doctrinæ & Luthero, & in loco de conjugio ſpurcitie ' & obſcœnitate verborum utitur, quam vix in lenone ' ferrent aures mediocrium hominum. Convitia ex ' Plauti fabulis lecta ſunt, quibus fortaſſe Carmelita ille ' magis delectatur, quam Pſalmis (17). - - - - A book ' was publiſhed at Cologn, not ſo much againſt Bucer, ' as againſt the whole doctrine of our Churches, and ' againſt our Princes. The author is that high-fed Carme' lite, who may very well be taken for the Prieſt of Bac' chus and Venus. The book was originally called, The ' Judgment of the Clergy and the Univerſity. But ' when ſome of the more judicious Fellows of the college ' had obſerved that it was a piece more worthy of buf' foons than Clergymen; they ordered the title to be ' changed, and publickly declared, that their college did by ' no means approve of the book. For this reaſon they cor' rected the title, and inſtead of the word Clergy, they ' ordered to be put in, Under Clergy. The author rails ' in a moſt ſaucy manner at Luther and his doctrine, and ' in that place where he ſpeaks of marriage, he makes ' uſe of ſuch filthy and obſcene words as the ears of ordi' nary men could hardly bear from profligate fellows. ' Unſeemly jeſts are picked out of Plautus's comedies, ' which, perhaps, that Carmelite liked better than the ' Pſalms.' Gaſpar Gennep tranſlated this tract into German (18); and Melanchthon publiſhed a refutation of it. The appeal which the Chapter of Cologn brought in before the Pope, may paſs for a controverſial tract (19): the Archbiſhop cauſed it to be refuted. The Chapter publiſhed a Programma in German, on the eighteenth of November 1544; and the Archbiſhop anſwered it on the thirteenth of December, the ſame year (20). In all probability, the prodigious ſuperſtition of the city of Cologn, was one of the obſtacles which ſtifled Herman's deſign. That city ſo vaſtly abounds with monaſteries, reliques, and images, that it may be called the Teutonic Rome. Manſit aut reſtituta eſt, de qua Melanchthon quæſtus fuit, populi ſuperſtitio, Coloniæ potiſſimum Agrippinæ, Clero, templis, ſacellis, ſtatuis, reliquiis, plus, quam ulla in Germania civitas, repletæ, ita ut Romam Teutonicam eſſe dicant (21).

(14) Taken from Seckendorf, ibid. pag. 443.

(15) The Latin edition I make uſe of is that of Louvain, printed for Servatius Zaſſenus 1544, in 8vo.

(16) Seckend. ubi ſupra, pag. 438.

(17) Melanch. Epiſt. ad Crucigerum. It is the lxxvth of the iiid book. It was written at Bonn, in 1543.

(18) Seckend. ubi ſupra.

(19) See Seckendorf, ibid. pag. 442.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 448.

[D] He was obliged to renounce his dignity in the year 1547.] He was promiſed aſſiſtance, that he might oppoſe force againſt force, but he choſe rather to ſubmit, in order to ſave his faithful ſubjects from the devaſtations of war. Read what follows, and you will find there the character of a good man: ' Conſtantiam ' profitebantur Ordines, & res ad vim ſpectabat: ſed ' bonus ſenex Comitibus Manderſcheidio & Nuenario, ' nobilitatis in Archiepiſcopatu facile primis, ita ſua' dentibus obtemperans, tum miſericordia Populi ſui ' motus, & ne bello vaſtaretur provincia, ultro ceſ' ſit, fidemque & jusjurandum omnibus remiſit. Obiit ' poſt annos ſex Idibus Auguſti anno 1552, in patria ' ſua, &, ut Sleidanus loquitur, qualem expetivit, fi' nem habuit. Nam, aut Evangelii propagare do' ctrinam, & recte conſtituere ſuæ ditionis Eccleſias, ' aut privato ſibi vivere licere, non ſemel optaverat: ' Et ab amicis aliquando monitus, quantum invidiæ ſibi ' conflaret ex iſta religionis mutatione, reſpondere ſole' bat: nihil eſſe, quod inopinanti poſſet accidere, ſeque jam ' pridem in omnem caſum obfirmaſſe mentem (22). - - - ' His ſubjects profeſſed their reſolution to ſtand by him, ' and it looked as if violence would have enſued. But the ' good old man complying with the advice of the Counts ' Manderſcheid and Nuenarius, who were the chief ' noblemen in the Archbiſhopric, and moved with compaſ' ſion for his people, whom he was willing to ſave from ' the devaſtations of war, ſubmitted of his own accord, ' and abſolved them all from their oath of fidelity. He ' died ſix years after, on the thirteenth of Auguſt 1552, ' in his own country; and, as Sleidan ſays, his end was ' ſuitable to his deſire. For he had been oftener than once ' heard to wiſh that he might rather have it in his ' power to propagate the doctrine of the Goſpel, and to ' ſettle the Churches upon a right footing in his dominions, ' or elſe that he might live a private man: and ſometimes ' when his friends adviſed him to conſider how much ' hatred he would draw upon himſelf by this change ' of religion, he uſed to anſwer, that nothing which ' ſhould happen to him could ſurprize him un' awares, for that he had prepared himſelf againſt all ' events.' Eraſmus would have admired this conduct, he being ſo charmed with a ſaying of Otho, that he thought it very well deſerved the Roman empire. Otho finding that he could not diſpute the empire without prolonging the war, choſe rather to die than occaſion it's continuation. Cum inter ethnicos etiam hoc animo repertus ſit Otho, ut potius duxerit ſpontanea morte vitam abrumpere, quam imperium tot hominum vita mercari, vir vel ob hoc ipſum dignus imperio, ſi fortuna virtuti faveret (23). This thought hath ſomething in it ſo heroic, that it is pity ſuch an effeminate perſon as Otho ſhould diſcover ſo much greatneſs of mind. But, as we have ſhewn elſewhere (24), his body and his mind were not of the ſame temper (25). The former was drowned in effeminacy, but the latter retained a large vigour; I ſpeak of that vigour which forms itſelf on the ideas of equity. He always abhorred civil wars, and never would have attempted to ſet up againſt Galba, if he had not believed that affair would terminate without any effuſion of blood. Othonem etiam privatum uſque adeo deteſtatum civilia arma, ut memorante quodam inter epulas de Caſſii Brutique exitu cohorruerit: nec concurſurum cum Galba fuiſſe, niſi confideret ſine bello rem tranſigi poſſe (26). When he reſolved to kill himſelf, he had a ſufficient number of forces to have continued the war with juſt hopes of ſucceſs; but becauſe it would have coſt the lives

(22) Id. ibid. See alſo Beza, in Iconibus. Non modo, ſays he, conſcientiam tuam liberaſti, ſed teipſum quoque memorabili ſeculis omnibus exemplo ſuperaſti, quum ultro vi majori cedens, paternis bonis contentus, placide Chriſtianéque vivere, quàm licet immerito ereptam dignitatem tuorum ſubditorum ſanguine tutari maluſti.

(23) Eraſm. Epiſt. Dedic. Suetonii Dionis Caſſii, &c.

(24) In the remark [B], of the article SUETONIUS: towards the end.

(25) Non erat Othonis mollis & corpori ſimilis animus. Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i, cap. xxii.

(26) Sueton. in Othone, cap. x.

Germany (e). Though it cannot be denied, that this Archbiſhop was rather a good man than a learned man, it may yet be ſaid, that he was not ignorant [E]. The error committed in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary is one of the moſt enormous that can be ſeen any where [F]. In the Paris edition of Moreri of 1699 (f) our Herman's article runs in Maimbourg's words.

I ſhall add ſomething to the remark (g) concerning the prodigious miſtake in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary [G].

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Under the word Weiden.

(g) It is the remark [F].

lives of great numbers of men, he concluded that it would be buying the preſervation of a crown at too dear a rate. This was what Eraſmus thought ſo excellent. He had read it in Tacitus and Suetonius. ‘ Hunc inquit, (Otho) animum, hanc virtutem veſtram ‘ ultra periculis objicere, nimis grande vitæ meæ pre‘ tium puto . . . . Civile bellum à Vitellio cœpit; & ‘ ut de principatu certaremus armis, initium illic fuit: ‘ ne pluſquam ſemel certemus, penes me exemplum ‘ erit, hinc Othonem poſteritas æſtimet . . . . An ‘ ego tantum Romanæ pubis, tot egregios exercitus, ‘ ſterni rurſus, & Reip. eripi patiar (27). - - - I ſhould ‘ think that I bought my life at too dear a rate, if I ſhould ‘ expoſe this ſpirit and this invincible courage of your's to ‘ any farther dangers. . . . . The civil war was begun ‘ by Vitellius; and to him it is owing that we have ‘ fought once for the ſovereign power: but it ſhall be my ‘ part to prevent our fighting more than once. From ‘ this let poſterity form their character of Otho. . . . . ‘ Shall I ſuffer the Republic to be deprived of ſuch a ‘ number of young citizens, and of ſo many brave armies, ‘ by offering them up to a ſecond havock?’ Eraſmus would not have failed to approve the pacific modeſty of our Herman, had he lived to that time; but I do not think he would have ſaid, that it was leſs ſurprizing in a Biſhop than in a Pagan.

[E] Tho' he was rather a good than a learned man . . . . . he was not ignorant.] Here is another paſſage of Father Maimbourg: ‘ He was † very ignorant, and ‘ and utterly unacquainted with what a Prelate ought ‘ know, even to that degree, that he had not Latin ‘ enough to enable him to ſay maſs and read his Breviary. ‘ In effect, when the Landgrave of Heſſe, who ‡ took ‘ him into his protection after he was perverted, one ‘ day told the Emperor, that the only crime of ‘ that Archbiſhop was his attempting to reform his ‘ church: Alas, anſwered that Prince, what can that ‘ poor man reform, who hardly underſtands a little ‘ Latin? He never could ſay above three maſſes in his ‘ life, two of which I have heard, and am witneſs that ‘ he could not read even the introit. All thoſe excel‘ lent Canons of his Council, which are ſo well ex‘ preſſed, were not made by him who knew nothing ‘ of the matter, but by the celebrated Dr Gropperus, ‘ Archdeacon of the church of Cologn, who drew ‘ them up, and put them in the condition we now ‘ ſee them in (28).’ It is certain that Sleidan (29) recites this diſcourſe betwixt the Emperor and the Landgrave; but he adds, that the Landgrave replied, that this Archbiſhop had very carefully read the German books, and underſtood religion very well. Sed diligenter evolvit libros Germanicos, ait ille, & quod certo novi religionem intelligit. Melanchthon informs us, that this Prelate diſcovered a great deal of knowledge, when the model of the Reformation was examined in his preſence: ‘ Legi ſibi totum librum juſſit, ‘ attentiſſime audivit, multa de pleriſque locis graviter ‘ diſſeruit, quædam ſup judicio recte mutavit, inter‘ dum noſtras ſententias, re diſputata, ſuæ opinioni ‘ prætulit. Huic labori dies ſex tribuit, ac quotidie ‘ matutinas horas quatuor continuas. Miratus ſum ‘ Senis aſſiduitatem & diligentiam, ac animadverti ‘ ſerio hanc rem tantam ab eo agi; quod, quantum ‘ referat, intelligis. Et has controverſias, pene ut ‘ artifex, dijudicat (30). - - - - He ordered the whole ‘ book to be read to him, heard it with great attention, ‘ and made many ſolid reflexions upon the moſt part of it. ‘ Some proper alterations he made according to his own judg‘ ment, and ſometimes after the matter had been argued, ‘ he preferred our opinion to his own. He allotted ſix ‘ days to this work, four hours at a time every morning. ‘ I was amazed at the old man's aſſiduity and diligence, ‘ and obſerved that he was very earneſt in this important ‘ affair. Of what conſequence that is you know very ‘ well. He reaſons upon theſe controverſies, as if he was ‘ perfectly maſter of the ſubject.’

[F] The error committed in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary is one of the moſt enormous that can be ſeen any where.] ‘ It was by expreſs order of Herman, ‘ that Cardinal John Gropper was ſtrangled with his ‘ hatband for endeavouring to oppoſe this new religion,’ are the words of the ſupplement (31). It would be very difficult to form probable conjectures concerning this horrible falſity, if the author had not cited Beza; but when we conſult the place he points at, we find what was the occaſion of his miſtake, and then our ſurprize continues, and, what is more, increaſes. Beza compares our Herman to JESUS CHRIST, and John Gropper to Judas. He pretends that Gropper betrayed his maſter, and obtained for a recompence, a ſtring which ſtrangled him, that is to ſay, a Cardinal's hat. Tu vero haud ſecus quam olim à Juda Chriſtus à tuo Joanne Groppero proditus quum eſſes, retulit quidem hic quoque proditor ſtipendium peccati mortem Cardinalitii Galeri vinculis ſtrangulatus (32). It would be infinitely more excuſable to ſay with Father Maimbourg, that Beza childiſhly aiming at wit, made a wretched dull jeſt (33), than to find in thoſe words an execrable crime of the Archbiſhop of Cologn.

[G] I ſhall add ſomething . . . . . concerning the . . . . miſtake in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary.] Florimond de Remond furniſhes me with this addition. He ſays that Theodore Beza, not ſatisfied with employing this alluſion to Judas in proſe, has likewiſe thought fit to expreſs it in rhyme:

Voy d'un autre coſté ce malheureux Groper,
Qui ſon Seigneur trompant, ſon cœur laiſſe attraper,
Eſtranglé d'un cordon d'un chapeau deteſtable.
De la grace divine Herman eſt le teſmoing
A celuy qui du Ciel plus que du monde a ſoing, Groper monſtre de Dieu la vengeance effroyable.

See wretched Gropper on the other hand,
Seduc'd and ſtrangled with an impious band,
His maſter he betrays. While Herman ſhall
Remain an evidence of grace to all
Who heav'n before vain earthly things deſire,
Lo! Gropper ſtands a monument of ire.

‘ A ſilly fool,’ adds he, ‘ taking Beza's words in their ‘ literal ſignification, wanted to perſuade me, that ‘ Groper had made a halter of his hat-band, and ‘ ſtrangled himſelf with his own hands: whereas ‘ Beza only means that his ſtrong inclination for a ‘ Cardinal's hat had taken away his ſpeech from him, ‘ which he would otherwiſe have employed in the ‘ defence of Lutheraniſm (34).’ Who could have imagined that ſuch a plain metaphor as this would occaſion ſuch groundleſs and ridiculous fancies.

(27) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xlvii. Theſe are Suetonius's words, ubi ſupra, cap. ix. Moriendi imperium cepit: ut multi nec fruſtra opinantur, magis pudore, ne tanto rerum hominumque periculo dominationem ſibi aſſerere perſeveraret, quam deſperatione ulla, aut diffidentia copiarum.

† Rouer. Pont. Suri Comm. Sleid. l. 1.

‡ Sleid. l. 17.

(28) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 265.

(29) Lib. xvii, pag. m. 438, verſo.

(30) Melanchthon, Epiſtola ccciv, lib. iv. It was written from Erford. to Camerarius, the 11th of Auguſt 1543.

(31) At the word Herman, pag. 670. This article is not in Moreri's Dictionary of the Dutch edition. Note, that Moreri, calls this Archbiſhop, Herman de Meurs, which is wrong.

(32) Beza, in Iconibus.

(33) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 268.

(34) Flor. de Remond. Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. livr. iii, ch. ix, num. 4, pag. 321.

WILHEM (DAVID LE-LEU DE)

WILHEM (DAVID LE-LEU DE) Counſellor in the council of the Princes of Orange, and in that of Brabant, deſerves to be placed amongſt the illuſtrious men of the XVIIth century. He was deſcended from a very noble and antient family [A], and born

[A] He was deſcended from a very noble and antient family] It held an honourable place amongſt the nobility of Artois, and Cambreſis ever ſince the year 1096, being, beſides other eſtates, then poſſeſſed of the lordſhips and ſeats of Bantœux, Bantouſel, Wilhem, Chantemerle, Froidebize, and Aveſnes lez Gobert, &c. as appears by a deciſion of the council of Brabant at Bruſſels, on the fifth of July 1678. GEORGE LE-born at Hamburgh on the fiſteenth of May, 1588. His mother, who joined to nobility of blood [B] great piety, and great zeal for the Proteſtant religion, educated him with a particular care; ſhe ſent him to ſtudy at Stade, at ten years of age, under the direction of very good tutors: and after he had improved, at Hanaw, by the lectures of John George Crobius, and John Rodolphus Lavaterus, ſhe carried him to the univerſity of Franeker. He ſtaid there three years, and in 1611 went from thence to Leyden, where he made great advances in Philoſophy, the Civil-Law, and the Oriental languages, &c. After that, he went to France, and made ſome ſtay in the Academy of Saumur, and afterwards in 1613, he went to lodge at Thouars, in the houſe of the learned Andrew Rivetus, who ſhewed him all the marks of a very particular eſteem [C], on account, amongſt other excellencies, of the Theological learning he had acquired. He improved himſelf very much by his Levantine voyages to Grand Cairo, Jeruſalem, Alexandria, &c. in the years, 1617, 1618, 1619. He was very intimate with Cyril Lucaris, and frequently conferred with him concerning the differences betwixt the Greek and Latin Churches. He received ſeveral letters from that famous Patriarch (a), which very well deſerve printing; and his heirs promiſe accordingly to publiſh them to gratify the curioſity of the learned. After his return from this long voyage, he reſided ſome years with his brother at Amſterdam [D]; but his earneſt deſire of a more perfect knowledge of the Oriental tongues, and an inclination for the Levant, engaged him to make a ſecond voyage thither in the year 1625. It is certain, that he travelled like a man of parts, that is to ſay, he made excellent and curious obſervations, acquiring beſides an accurate knowledge of the Arabic, Perſic, and Chaldaic tongues (b). He was met in thoſe countries by the learned Golius, who had been recommended to him [E], and they contracted a cordial and intimate friendſhip which laſted as long as their lives. Being returned to Holland about the year 1631, he inſinuated himſelf ſo far into the eſteem of Frederic-Henry, Prince

LEU DE WILHEM, the father of him who is the ſubject of this article, left Tournay at the beginning of the troubles concerning religion, being himſelf, together with his five brothers, out-lawed for having buried their mother without obſerving the ceremonies required by the Romiſh communion. It appears by an authentic act of the twenty-ſecond of December 1565, that their eſtates were confiſcated; but they endeavoured to releaſe themſelves from this act, after the year 1576, by virtue of the pacification of Ghent. JAMES LE-LEU DE WILHEM, one of the ſix brothers, took refuge in England, and firſt married Margaret de Zegre, and for his ſecond wife Mary de Duyts. By his firſt wife, beſides other Children, he had TIMOTHY LE-LEU DE WILHEM, born at London the twenty-ſixth of November 1568, and Lord of Borgerie Finges lez-Courtrai. By the ſecond, he had beſides others, MICHAEL LE-LEU DE WILHEM, born the twenty-ſeventh of September 1587, who died Counſellor and Schepen of the Hague, and who had married at Delft on the twenty-fifth of May 1614, Anne de Rechtere Niece to the Secretary Adrian Duyck: his ſiſter (1) was married to Sir Dudley Carlton (2), King James's Ambaſſador in Holland (3).

[B] His mother, who joined to nobility of blood.] Her name was Gilliette van Opalſens: ſhe was the daughter of John van Opalſens Eſq; and of Joan l'Empereur d'Oppyck, ſiſter to John l'Empereur d'Oppyck, Lord of Malerit, &c. (4), who was deputed to the Ducheſs of Parma, Governeſs of the Low-Countries, by the city of Tournay, in conjunction with the confederate nobility. His ſon Antony l'Empereur d'Oppyck was the father of CONSTATIN L'EMPEREUR, born at Bremen in 1591, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, and Counſellor to Prince Maurice, a perſon very well verſed in the Oriental tongues, as he hath ſhewn by ſeveral books. He was twice married, firſt to Levina de Witt, daughter of the Lord of Roſenburgh, Counſellor of Amſterdam. Secondly, to Catherine Thyſius of Kynogen. He died in the year 1648, leaving only one daughter Sarah l'Empereur d'Oppyck, who was married to Mark du Tour, gentleman to the Prince of Orange, Father to the King of England. He died Counſellor in the Court of Brabant. But after this digreſſion juſtly due to the merit of Conſtantin l'Empereur, I return to the mother of our David Wilhem. She was at Paris on St Bartholomew's day, and was ſaved from the maſſacre as it were, by a miracle; her huſband was then at Rouen, and was alſo ſaved. Her father, John Van Opalſens, had the ſame good fortune ſome years before. He was condemned to death for his religion, the ſentence was pronounced; but he eſcaped out of the priſon of Tournay by the connivance of the goaler, and fled into England.

[C] Andrew Rivetus who ſhewed him all the marks of a particular eſteem.] To know the mutual friendſhip, which they contracted, and the peculiar eſteem Rivetus had for him, we need only caſt our eye on the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his commentary on the decalogue (5). It alſo gives a very great character of the virtue, learning, piety, and other excellent qualities of David Wilhem.

[D] With his brother.] That is, with PAUL LE-LEU DE WILHEM, the Father of DAVID LE-LEU DE WILHEM, ſtill living (6), who is Preſident of the Schepens, and receiver of the city of Amſterdam. His wife is Hillegonda Van Beuningen, ſiſter to the late Mr Conrad Van Beuningen, ſo well known by his embaſſies.

[E] The learned Golius, who had been recommended to him.] I have ſeen the original of the letter which Rivetus wrote to Mr de Wilhem (7) on the twenty-ninth of October 1625, and from thence I have extracted theſe words: 'Servo adhuc tibi literas itineris 'tui Hieroſolymitani, & eas quas à Patriarcha Alex'andrino acceptas mihi communicaſti quas vel tibi, 'vel ei qui tuo nomine eas petet, reſtituam cùm vo'lueris. Commendatione mea apud te non opus habet 'Clariſſ. Golius, vir in rara eruditione, rara pietate '& modeſtia præditus, noſtro defuncto Erpenio inti'mus, & mihi tam proprio nomine quam tali neceſ'ſitudine chariſſimus, &c. - - - - - I ſtill keep for you, the 'letters which you received in your journey to Jeruſalem, 'together with thoſe of the Patriarch of Alexandria, 'which you were ſo good as to communicate to me. I 'ſhall reſtore them, as ſoon as you will, either to yourſelf, 'or to any one that you ſhall commiſſion to receive them. 'Mr Golius, a man of rare erudition, ſingular piety, 'and great modeſty, does not ſtand in need of my recom'mendation to you. He was intimately acquainted with 'our deceaſed friend Erpenius, for whoſe ſake, and no 'leſs for his own, he is exceedingly dear to me, &c.' This informs us that Rivetus was, at that time, the depoſitory of the Patriarch Cyril's letters to Mr de Wilhem. He has acquainted the public with the correſpondence which his friend kept up with Cyril; as appears by theſe words we find in the Epiſtle Dedicatory which I have already quoted. 'Ex iis (re'gionibus) etiam ex ipſa Ægypto, quæ tabernaculo 'Dei inſervirent abſtuliſti non pauca, aliis liberaliter 'communicaturus, ad communem utilitatem. Inter 'quæ non minima ſunt, quæ ex intimâ illâ admiſſione 'cum Reverendiſſ. Cyrillo tum Patriarcha Alexan'drino, hauſiſti; cujus communicationis fructus, & 'ſedulitatis tuæ in eo de rebus noſtris plenius infor'mando utilitatem, ringentibus adverſariis, etiamnum 'colligimus & percipimus, poſtquam evectus eſt ad 'ſummam inter Orientales Chriſtianos dignitatem.

'Quæ

(a) See the remark [E].

(b) Beſides the learned languages, which he underſtood to perfection, he could eaſily ſpeak moſt languages that are now ſpoken in Europe, and Aſia.

(1) I follow word by word the Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(2) Who had by her a daughter, that is ſtill living (in 1696.) She is the widow of the Lord Ferers, and mother of the Counteſs of Arran, widow of a ſon of the Duke of Hamilton, mother of an only daughter, who is a very rich heireſs.

(3) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller. Idem dic de pleriſque infra Memorandis.

(4) He married the heireſs of the houſe of Aigremont, Lady de Malerit, &c.

(5) Ad Ampliſſimum præſtantiſſimum pietate & multiplici eruditione virum D. Davidem de Wilhem. - - - To the honourable, pious and learned David de Wilhem.

(6) I write this in the year 1696.

(7) Who was then at Aleppo.

Prince of Orange, that he was made a Counſellor in his Highneſs's council at the Hague. He married a ſiſter of the celebrated Mr de Zuylichem (c), a lady of great parts. He had ſome children by her [F], as we ſhall ſee below. The States-General having made very conſiderable conqueſts in the province of Brabant, by the victorious arms of Prince Frederic-Henry, augmented the council of that province in the year 1634, beſtowed a counſellor's place on our Mr DE WILHEM, and made him Superintendant of that country in 1640. As he loved and underſtood the ſciences and the liberal arts, the great buſineſs in which ſo many poſts engaged him, never hindered his ſtudying hard, and keeping up an extenſive correſpondence with the Learned [G]. He took pleaſure in protecting and ſerving them on all occaſions at the court and elſewhere. He had a very fine library, furniſhed with the moſt excellent books in all faculties, beſides a large number of very curious manuſcripts (d) in Arabic, Perſic, Chaldaic, &c. The preſent of mummies, manuſcripts, and ſuch other rarities, which he made to the univerſity of Leyden [H], is ſtill preſerved there as an ornament. He died of the Stone on the twenty-ſeventh of January 1658, having faithfully, and with great application, ſerved three Princes of Orange, namely Frederic-Henry, William II, and William-Henry, at preſent King of England (e).

(c) See his article.

(d) This may be confirmed by a paſſage of Frederic Spanheim, Vindic. Exercit. de Grat. univerſali, Part. i, pag. 67, wherein he ſays that David de Wilhem è tenebris eruit tractatum de tribus quæſtionibus, compoſitum à Lupo Servato Abbate Ordinis Benedicti, Rabani diſcipulo, qui vixit octavo ſeculo, & mihi communicavit.

(e) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

‘ Quæ argumento ſunt, quantæ fuerit in te propagandæ veræ Religionis cura, etiam inter remotiſſimos à nobis (8). - - - - - - From theſe countries, as well as from Egypt itſelf, you brought away many things, that were to be of no ſmall uſe to the Church of God, and you intend generouſly to communicate them to others, for the public advantage. Among theſe what you learnt from your intimate familiarity with the moſt Reverend Cyril, then Patriarch of Alexandria, is not the leaſt conſiderable: and even now ſince he had been raiſed to the higheſt dignity among the eaſtern Chriſtians, we reap the fruits, and, notwithſtanding the malicious ſcoffs of our adverſaries, feel the benefit of your correſpondence with him, and of the pains you took to inform him more particularly concerning our affairs. All theſe are proofs of your great diligence in propagating the true religion even among thoſe people who are the moſt remote from us.’

(8) Andreas Rivetus, Epiſt. Dedicator. Commentar. in Decalog. Oper. Tom. i, pag. 1223.

[F] A lady of great parts. He had ſome children by her.] Her name was Conſtantia Huygens, and ſhe was very well read. Mr Des Cartes highly eſteemed her, and readily, nay with great deference, deſired to know her opinion on the new Philoſophical ideas which he had invented. She ſurvived her huſband about ten years, and died on the firſt of December 1667, very much regretted by all the judicious people of the Hague. Mr de Wilhem left behind him three daughters and one ſon, MAURICE LE-LEU DE WILHEM, at preſent Dean of the Council and Feodal Court of Brabant, ſetting at the Hague (9), who is a gentleman of great honour, enriched with a very great ſtock of learning and merit; and whoſe converſation is moſt entertaining. I ſpeak by experience, he being one of the firſt acquaintance which I had the honour to make at my arrival in Holland. After he had compleated his ſtudies, he travelled in Italy, France. Germany, Hungary, Sweden, and ſeveral other places, where he gained the eſteem of all eminent perſons. He accompanied Mr de Zuylichem his uncle to Orange in the year 1665, when that principality was reſtored with all the neceſſary formalities to its lawful ſovereign. He was then received a Doctor of Law with great applauſe (10). He hath been always very curious, not only in the antiquities of his own country, but the Roman alſo. His ſtrong inclination for theſe made him interrupt his ſtudy of the practical part of the law in 1670, in order to travel a ſecond time in a more advanced age; and having ſtaid ſome months at Paris, he ſet forward for Italy with Don Franciſco Brancaccio (11), nephew to the Cardinal of that name, and in company with Meſſieurs de Grancei, the ſons of the Marſhal. He ſtayed a whole year at Rome, in order to ſearch into whatever was remarkable in that famous city. Being returned into Holland, he diligently applied himſelf to inquire into the law of nations, and the intereſts of the Princes and ſtates of Europe. His genius led him to it, and his acquaintance with ſeveral languages furniſhed him with great helps for that ſtudy. In November 1671, he went into Sweden with his Excellency Mr de Haren, Ambaſſador from the United Provinces, and was choſen (12) by the States-General to take care of their affairs at that court, when that Ambaſſador was upon the point of his return. A few days after, the ſame States beſtowed on him the place of Counſellor in the Court of Brabant, in the room of Mr Fagel, promoted to be their Regiſter. Having acquired a very conſiderable acquaintance at the Court of Sweden, and ſtanding very well with the Chancellor de la Gardie, and the other Senators of that kingdom, the States of Holland reſolved in June 1673, to ſend him to that court, with the character of Deputy-Extraordinary of the United Provinces. The following year he was twice nominated to the office of Counſellor at the Court of Holland, firſt on the part of the towns and afterwards on the part of the nobility. In 1683, he married the eldeſt daughter of Mr Timmers, Burgomaſter of Rotterdam, who has been Director of the India company, and ſeveral times Deputy to the Admiralty of the Maes (13) (§ α).

(9) He was made Preſident of it in the month of September 1703.

(10) See Mr Chambrun's Relation, printed at Orange in 1666, pag. 161.

(11) He had been a Captain of Horſe in the ſervice of the King of Spain, in the Low-Countries.

(12) By a reſolution taken on the 26th of Auguſt 1672.

(13) Taken (as to matters of fact) from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(§ α) He has by her a fine family of children, viz. DAVID LE-LEU DE WILHEM, Lord of Barlicum, of Middelrode, &c. Counſellor in the Council and Feodal Court of Brabant, by the voluntary demiſſion of his father Lord of Woelwyk, who had been a long time Dean and fifteen years Preſident of that court: PAUL-SEBASTIAN, and CONSTANTIN, LE-LEU DE WILHEM, who have taken their degrees in law in the univerſity of Leyden; and MARY-CONSTANCE LE-LEU DE WILHEM, married to Mr William Paedt's Counſellor of the city of Leyden †.

† Taken from a Memoir communicated to the Bookſeller, in the year 1719.

[G] An extenſive correſpondence with the learned.] And above all, with Salmaſius, Heurnius, Rivetus, Des Cartes, Heinſius, Voſſius, Junius, Manaſſeh-Ben Iſrael, who dedicated to him his treatiſe de Creatione (14). The letters which he received from them and ſeveral other illuſtrious men, lie in heaps amongſt the papers of his ſon Mr de Wilhem, who, if he had but leiſure to ſelect them, would find great numbers of which he might make a conſiderable preſent to the Republic of Letters. He would likewiſe find there pieces in manuſcript like that which has been ſeen above (15).

(14) That Epiſtle Dedicatory deſerves to be conſulted: It may ſerve for a proof to this article.

(15) Remark [L], of the article BORE.

[H] The preſent . . . . which he made to the univerſity of Leyden.] Here is a public teſtimony of it: ‘ Id mihi ſilentio non eſt prætereundum, quod ergà hanc noſtram Academiam, ſtudiorum tuorum olim promotricem, matrem proinde tuam, liberalem admodum te præbueris: factum eſt enim id curâ tuâ & ære tuo, ut Theatrum in eâ Anatomicum, tot raris & pretioſi σκειμηλίοις, exterorum omnium qui illud inviſunt animos in admirationem rapiat; inter quæ eminent duo condita cadavera (Mumias vocant) antiquiſſima, quæ in Ægypto eruta, & à te redempta, integerrima, te mittente, ad nos pervenerunt (16). - - I muſt not forget to mention your generoſity to our univerſity, which formerly gave you your education, and is conſequently your mother: to your care and expence we owe it that the Anatomical theatre, by the many rare and curious things contained in it, excites the wonder of all foreigners who come to ſee it. Among the reſt, there are two very antient mummies, which being found out in Egypt, and purchaſed by you, came very ſafe and and entire from you to us.’

(16) Rivetus, ubi ſupra.

WIMPINA (CONRAD), Divinity Profeſſor at Francfort on the Oder in the XVIth century, was born at Buchen (a). He acquired a great reputation by his public as well as private lectures at Leipſic, in Philoſophy, Divinity, and Poetry, &c. He had great crowds of auditors, and at the ſame time raiſed the envy of ſeveral people. Theſe not being able to obſcure his glory, by the ſophiſtical ſubtilties which they propoſed to him, and to which he learnedly anſwered, had recourſe to calumnies and libels. He was obliged to appear at the tribunal of the Archbiſhop of Magdeburg, Primate of Germany, where he triumphed over his enemies. He was in a ſplendid manner promoted to the degree of Doctor of Divinity : a Cardinal-Legate, to whom he made a ſpeech in St Paul's church at Leipſic, and who admired his eloquence, cauſed that degree to be conferred on him. Wimpina was preſented by the whole faculty of Divinity. The reputation of this doctor advanced ſo high, that the Marquiſſes of Brandenburgh deſigning to found an univerſity at Francfort on the Oder, made him offers of a very conſiderable ſalary to be Profeſſor there. He accepted the propoſal, and went thither to lay (b) the foundation of that new univerſity, where he became rector of two colleges, and firſt Profeſſor of Divinity. He publiſhed ſeveral books (c) [A]. He was one of Luther's antagoniſts [B], and paſſed for the real author of the Theſes which appeared under the name of the Dominican John Tezelius againſt this reformer (d).

(a) It is a ſmall town of Odenwald, in the Dioceſe of Wurtſburg.

(b) In the year 1506.

(c) Taken from the book publiſhed by Joachim-John Maderus at Helmſtad 1660, and written by an anonymous author with the title of Scriptorum inſignium . . . Centuria.

(d) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. i, pag. 25. num. 1.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The anonymous author of the catalogue of illuſtrious men, publiſhed by Joachim-John Maderus (1), mentions ſeveral books written by Wimpina before the year 1514; but he makes no diſtinction between thoſe already printed, and thoſe which were not. However the catalogue of them runs as follows : Editio proprietatum logicalium in commentatione non vulgari libri IV. De erroribus Philoſophorum in fide Chriſtiana. De nobilitate cæleſtis corporis. De eo an animati cæli poſſint dici. De nobilitate animarum cæli. De fato opus inſigne & præclarum. Palillogia de Theologico faſtidio. Panegyrici de Chriſti mirabilitate ac ſublimitate. Apologeticus in ſacræ Theologiæ defenſionem. Apologia ſecunda contra obtrectationem Theologiæ. Apologia tertia ad Mellerſtatinas offenſiones & denigrationes S. Theologiæ. Apologia quarta contra Laconiſmum Mellerſtat. pro defenſione Theologiæ. Apologia quinta pro repreſſione errorum Mellerſtat. Cribratio in tergiverſationes Martini Mellerſtat. De ortu, progreſſu, & fructu S. Theologiæ. Super ſententias libri IV. Præcepta coagmentandi rhetoricè orationes. Opus quodlibeticæ diſputationis mirum & varium. Orationes & Carmina. I do not in the leaſt doubt but this Martin Mellerſtat, againſt whom Wimpina ſo often drew his pen, was the ſame Martin Melrſtat of whom our anonymous author ſpeaks particularly under number thirty-one, and of whoſe works he inſerts a catalogue, amongſt which we find no mark of his controverſity with Wimpina. This Martin Melrſtat bore the name of his country which is ſituated, in Franconia, and taught the Philoſophy of the Thomiſts at Leipſic, for the ſpace of twenty years, with great reputation ; after which, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, and being admitted Doctor in that ſcience, became ſo famous, that Frederic, Elector of Saxony, choſe him for his Phyſician (2).

As for the reſt, Wimpina's book de Divinatione is one of his principal works ; but he is charged with ſtealing it from Picus Mirandula (3). Here therefore is another author to be added to Thomaſius's catalogue of Plagiaries. This tract de Divinatione was printed with ſeveral others of Wimpina, at Cologn in the year 1531, in folio. And three tomes of the ſaid author were publiſhed at Francfort on the Oder, in 1528, de Sectis, Erroribus, ac Schiſmatis, together with the treatiſes de Prædeſtinatione & de Fortuna, in folio.

[B] He was one of Luther's antagoniſts.] He was one of the four Divines of Brandenburg, who, in the year 1530, refuted the articles of faith which Luther had publiſhed, and which ſerved for a foundation to the Augſbourg Confeſſion. He was one of thoſe Divines whom the Catholic Princes brought to the Diet that year (4). They choſe the moſt able diſputants (5) ; and finding that the firſt conferences betwixt the deputies on both ſides, did not make way for an accommodation, and ſupecting that the multitude of diſputants, on each ſide, kept them at a diſtance from the ways of peace, they reduced the whole number of Divines to three of each ſide only. Thoſe of the Romiſh party were Eccius, Wimpina, and Cochlæus (6) : whence we may conclude that Mr Konig is miſtaken in placing Conrad Wimpina's death in the year 1529.

(1) At Helmſtadt in the year 1660, in 4to.

(2) Ex Centuria Scriptor. inſignium, in lucem edita à Joach. Joh. Madero.

(3) Toto clam opere ex Pico plurima. Mart. del Rio, Diſq. Magic. lib. iv, cap. ii, Quæſt. vii, §. ii, pag. m. 247.

(4) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. ii, pag. 152.

(5) Adducti erant à variis principibus in Comitia pugnaciſſimi ex adverſariis Lutheri. Seckendorf. ibid. pag. 171, num. 1.

(6) Id. ib. pag. 177, num. 16.

WINDECK (JOHN-PAUL) Doctor of Divinity, a German by nation (a), and Canon of the Collegiate Church of Marchdorff, publiſhed at Cologn in the year 1603 a book wherein he pretended to prove by forty-two demonſtrative reaſons, that the Proteſtant religion would ſoon be deſtroyed [A]. His motive for undertaking this work, was that a Lutheran not long before had publiſhed a book concerning the preſages of the approaching ruin of Popery [B]. The event has ſhewn that theſe two authors were both equally

(a) He was born in Alſace, as he ſays himſelf in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Prognoſticon.

[A] He publiſhed a book wherein he pretended to prove . . . . . that the Proteſtant religion would ſoon be deſtroyed.] It is a book in 4to of 423 pages. The whole title of it runs thus : Prognoſticon futuri ſtatus Eccleſiæ, oppoſitum inſulſi cujuſdam per Sueviam Lutherologi libro ; ab hinc bimeſtri edito, de ſignis ruituri Papatus, aliiſque ſectariorum jactabundis mendaciis. in quo duabus & quadraginta rationibus Apodicticis demonſtratur, Lutheranorum, Calvinianorum, aliaſque ſectas, contra Romano-Catholicam Eccleſiam longè latèque ac dirè graſſantes, brevî eſſe perituras : illam verò ſtabili conſtantia permanſuram. Eiſdem totidem etiam Cauſæ continentur, cur ad unicum Ovile redire debeant ſectarii, & in eodem permanere Catholici. Item Chriſtiana Deliberatio, de optimo Religionis ſtatu continendo, ſeu quibus remediis, à Catholicorum provinciis ſectæ omnes arceri, aut ubi nidificârunt, funditùs evelli queant. The author dedicated this book to Maximilian of Auſtria, Grand Maſter of the Teutonic Order.

[B] A Lutheran, not long before-hand, had publiſhed a book concerning the preſages of the approaching ruin of Popery (1).] He was not the only one that had diſperſed the like prophecies. Windeck remembred ſeveral other prognoſticators. Demiratus ſum effrontem Pſeudo-Evangelicorum impudentiam : è quorum caterva multos ejuſmodi fanatica, prodigioſæque vanitatis vaticinia, in vulgus ſparſiſſe memineram (2). He takes notice that Luther often boaſted of his being the man appointed to deſtroy the Church of Rome, and that, according to Peucer, this had actually come to paſs. Per doctrinam Lutheri Pontificatum Romanum corruiſſe (3). He adds, that there hardly paſſes a year without ſome Engliſh prognoſtication, that ſuch a Pope ſhould die, and that no body ſhall ſucceed him. He does not forget the Calviniſts of France, who, as he ſays, hand about the prediction of one Peter Clement, a Huguenot, who was burnt at Paris forty years before, whereupon they alledge an inſcription found amidſt a heap of rubbiſh. ‘ Calviniſtæ in Galliis . . . . ſplendidè nugantur de vaticinio cujuſdam Petri Clementis Hugonotæ, ante ‘ XL annos Pariſiis combuſti. Aiunt enim in ultima ‘ obſidione Pariſienſi, cùm tormentis muri quaterentur, inter rudera lapidem inventum, cui artificiosè ‘ vaticinium hoc fuerit inſculptum : Pontificem Roman. ‘ exterminandum,

(1) De Signis brevi interituri Papatus. See Windeck's Epiſtle Dedicatory.

(2) Windeck. Epiſt. Dedicat. folio (:) 2 verſo.

(3) Id. ibid. fol. (:) 3 : he quotes book v, Chron. Carion.

equally mad [C]. Windeck added to his book a ſecond part wherein he propoſes to the Sectaries forty-two motives for their reuniting to the Church of Rome. He ends with a Chriſtian conſultation upon the means of extirpating the ſects. He adopts the moſt rigid principles of the enemies to Toleration, and he reaſons ſometimes ad hominem, that is to ſay, he alledges the Penal Laws eſtabliſhed againſt the Roman Catholics in ſeveral Proteſtant ſtates, and the perſecutions which ſome of the new ſects ſuffered from the reſt. He does not forget the hardſhips which the fugitives of England ſuffered from the Lutherans, as I have obſerved elſewhere (b). He publiſhed at Cologn in the year 1604 a book de Theologia Juriſconſultorum. His treatiſe on the Electors was printed in 1616 (c). The Proteſtants made uſe of his maxims as a handle to throw the blame of the wars in Germany upon the Court of Vienna; but it was ſaid in anſwer to them, that this Author had done no more than followed his own private notions, and that he never had ‘ exterminandum, & ejus Doctrinam radicitus eradicandam: viciſſim verò Calviniſmum ubique recipiendum, & regnaturum eſſe (4). - - - The Calviniſts in France . . . . talk mightily about the prediction of one Peter Clement, a Huguenot, who was burnt at Paris forty years ago. For they ſay that in the laſt ſiege of Paris while the canons played upon the walls, a ſtone was found amidſt the rubbiſh, with this prophecy artfully engraved on it: That the Pope of Rome was to be deſtroyed, and his doctrine utterly extirpated: on the other hand, that Calviniſm was to be received, and to prevail in all places.’ He concludes that all this proceeds from a peeviſh jealouſy, which makes people greatly expect what they vainly wiſh for (5).

[C] The event has ſhewn that theſe two authors were both equally mad.] The Roman Catholics and Proteſtants have continued ever ſince that time to the preſent year 1704, almoſt in the ſame condition in which they were then. I do not know what were the reaſons that made the Lutheran Miniſter prognoſticate the downfal of Popery: they could not be otherwiſe than falſe, ſince the event has belied them; but without conſulting experience I can affirm, that Windeck's reaſons are extreamly weak.

Among other things, he grounded his predictions upon the diviſions among the Proteſtants, of which he gives an odious deſcription, and particularly (6) he relates what happened to Hunnius, who had preached at Ratiſbon, in the year 1594, with extreme warmth againſt thoſe who accuſed the Reformed of quarrelling among themſelves. It is a groſs calumny, ſaid he, for I and my colleagues, in the univerſity of Wittemberg, keep up a good harmony both among ourſelves and elſewhere. Scarce was he returned to his lodgings when he received an order from the adminiſtrator of Saxony, to make a ſpeedy return to Wittemberg, to the end that he might remedy the Theological diſſenſions which Samuel Huber had raiſed concerning the doctrine of Predeſtination. This is a weak motive for preſaging the near ruin of the Proteſtants; for ſince the quarrels which had diſturbed them from their very birth had not been able to prevent their arriving to ſuch a remarkable pitch of greatneſs (7), there was no juſt reaſon for being ſure that they would hinder them from ſupporting themſelves. Windeck ought to have been perſuaded that all their ſects would forget their mutual differences, and act in concert againſt Popery, when their common intereſt ſhould require it. The Lutheran and Anabaptiſt, the Socinian and Quaker, the Epiſcopalian and Puritan, the Calviniſt and Independant, the Arminian and Browniſt, join their forces together as often as the queſtion turns upon ſecuring themſelves againſt Popiſh machinations. We have ſeen an example of it in England, when King James II was driven out of his dominions, in the year 1688.

This prognoſticator likewiſe grounds his aſſertion upon the care Providence has taken that Hereſies ſhould be of a ſhort continuance. He gives ſeveral inſtances of this; but how came he not to conſider that the Greek Church ſubſiſts ſtill, notwithſtanding it be ſuch a long time ſince it broke with that Church on which he beſtows the name of Catholic. Was he ignorant that Hereſies (8) anathematiſed by the firſt general Councils, had preſerved a ſteady and extenſive footing to the age in which he wrote? beſides that, he ſhould have conſidered that it had been a much eaſier thing to extirpate the Albigenſes, and ſuch other little ſects as were incloſed within the narrow bounds of one country, than it would be to deſtroy the Proteſtants, who are diſperſed in ſeveral warlike nations, and ſupported by ſeveral Princes. It would have been a chimerical fancy to think of extirpating them otherwiſe than by an open war. Now it is folly to depend upon the good ſucceſs of a war (9). Fortune ſports with prudence and valour, and ſhifts the victory from one ſide to the other, at a time when ſuch a thing is leaſt expected (10): it equally fruſtrates our hopes and fears, it ſupplies the weak ſide with unforeſeen reſources; and when theſe laſt ſee themſelves in their turn capable to obtain the moſt compleat triumph, new misfortunes happen to them, which revive the courage of the enemy. This is what people felt, to their ſad experience, in the war of Germany, from the year 1618, to the peace of Munſter. In a word, if thoſe who pretend to gueſs what the event will be of ſuch or ſuch a war, are generally deceived from month to month (11), what can we think of thoſe who flatter themſelves with the hopes that a war which is not yet begun will prove the ruin of ſeveral nations? Experience ſhould have taught Windeck that he was a raſh prognoſticator. Did not he know that the Roman Catholic Princes had ſuccoured the Proteſtants (12)? And was it poſſible for him to doubt but that, conſidering the ſituation of affairs in Europe, the ſame thing would happen upon all ſuch occaſions? He had, in a peculiar manner, foretold the total ruin of the Heretics in the United Provinces, and promiſed that great exploit to the Houſe of Auſtria. ‘ Auſtria propago, acerrima Catholicæ fidei propugnatrix, ſeſe ceu murum opponit pro Domo Dei, ad profligandos immanes ejus hoſtes, Turcas & Hæreticos; adeò ut ſpes certa nos foveat, faventi potenti Numine, Heroicis veſtris facinoribus utroſque tandem ac præſertim infelices ſectarios in Belgio radicitus evulſum iri. Quod hoc Opuſculo, proxima fœtura apud me nato, evincere conor (13). - - - - The Houſe of Auſtria, the zealous defender of the Catholic faith, ſtands faſt, like a bulwark, for the Houſe of GOD againſt it's fierce enemies the Turks and Heretics: which gives us ſure ground to hope, that by your heroic exploits and the powerful aſſiſtance of the Deity, both theſe, particularly the unhappy ſectaries in Holland, ſhall be utterly extirpated; as I endeavour to prove in the ſecond edition of this treatiſe.’ Ignorant fool that he was, did he not know that France protected the Dutch. Had he ſeen into futurity, he muſt have known that this crown would continue to be the chief inſtrument of their riſe, and a very powerful obſtacle to the Houſe of Auſtria; and that the Houſe of Auſtria, in her turn, would become their ſtrongeſt bulwark, and ſave them from the ruin which ſhould threaten them from France. It is certain that the Houſe of Auſtria was one of the principal cauſes of their preſervation in the war of 1672 (14); for France did not abandon her conqueſts till ſuch time as the Emperor and Spain declared war againſt her in favour of that Republic. Spain ſtood in the breach to cover the Dutch, and choſe to become the ſeat of the war, in order to eaſe them of it; and beſides, it was Spain that paid the coſt. The United Provinces recovered all that had been taken from them; but Spain loſt Franche-Comté, and ſeveral towns in the Low-Countries.

It would be eaſy to ſhew the invalidity of all the other reaſons of this prognoſticator. He could not have found ſo many as forty-two if he had not divided one and the ſame into ſeveral branches, and if, to multiply his numbers, he had not turned the ſame common-place into ſeveral ſhapes, in order to preſent it in different views. It is proper to obſerve, that he has grounded ſeveral of them upon falſe facts, or upon facts which he proves very ill.

[D] The

(b) In the remark [I], of the article WESTPHALUS.

(c) Konig. Bibl. pag. 870.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Ita deploratiſſimi iſti homunciones improbo livore tabeſcentes quod vaniſſime optant, ſtulte ſperant & augurantur. Id. ibid. verſo.

(6) Windeck, Prognoſt. pag. 27, 28.

(7) See the remark [C], of the article MORLIN.

(8) Thoſe of the Neſtorians, Eutychians, &c.

(9) See Bernegerus, in Tuba Pacis, pag. 6, & ſeq, & 19, & ſeq.

(10) Quondam etiam victis redit in præcordia vertus,
Victoreſque cadunt Danai. . . .
Not only Trojans fall but in their turn,
The vanquiſh'd triumph and the victors mourn.
DRYDEN.
Virgil, Æneïd. lib. ii, ver. 367.

(11) See the Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, pag. 151, & ſeq.

(12) See the remark [R], of the article ELIZABETH; the remark [P], of the article FRANCIS I; and the remark [R], of the article HENRY II.

(13) Windeck, in Epiſt. Dedicat. fol. (:) (:) 2 verſo.

(14) Theſe are the words of a famous Proteſtant Profeſſor at Hall in Saxony: Certe niſi imperator noſter atque Hiſpanus tum (anno 1672) advolaſſent jam pridem ſub Gallorum jugo gemeret priſtinam fruſtra requirens libertatem, Belgium. - - - It is certain that unleſs the Emperor and the King of Spain had ſuddenly interpoſed, then (in the year 1672) Holland had been long ago ſubjected to the French yoke, and might have wiſhed for her antient liberty in vain. Jo. Franciſc. Buddæus, Select. Juris Nat. & Gent. pag. 623.

had any place in the Emperor's councils [D].

[D] The Proteſtants made uſe of his maxims as a handle . . . . but it was ſaid in anſwer to them that, &c. . . . .] The author of the Cancellaria Bavarico-Anhaltina (15) had maintained that the Proteſtant league had not hitherto been able to alledge any particular whereby it could appear that the Roman Catholics had formed deſigns againſt the States which adhered to the confeſſion of Augſbourg. He was anſwered, that the project formed againſt all the Proteſtants in general, was ſufficiently diſcovered by Paul Windeck's book. Quis in Proteſtantes omnes Generalis . . . . . . In the printed book from Cancellar. Anhault. Appendix, pag. 1. as far as (16) Ut excluſ.

(15) See, remark [C], of the article KELLER.

(16) Pleſſius, in Reſponſ. ad præcipua Capita Cancellariæ Bavarico-Anhaltinæ, init.

It was replied that Windeck and Scioppius were private men, whoſe opinions and writings were of no authority. Duos neſcio cujus Martii Spiritus . . . . . . in the printed book from pag. 2. as far as (17) Quid enim excluſ.

The Proteſtant author replied, that the Roman Catholics alledged the very fragments of letters to convict the Proteſtants, and that there was much more reaſon for reproaching them with the books of Windeck, who had an eccleſiaſtical poſt, and with thoſe of Sciοppius, who was Counſellor to his Imperial Majeſty (18).

(17) Appendix Cancellariæ, pag. 2.

(18) See Reſponſio Apologet. ad Fab. Hercynianum, pag, 12, 13.

WITTICHIUS (CHRISTOPHER) Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, made himſelf famous among other things by introducing the Carteſian Philoſophy into the ſchools of Divinity. He was born in Sileſia on the ſeventh of October 1625. His father, who had been originally a Lutheran, turned Calviniſt at the Duke of Brieg's Court, and was Miniſter there in quality of Vice-Superintendant of the whole country of Brieg. His ſon, of whom we ſpeak here, was ſent to ſtudy the Civil-Law at Bremen in the year 1642; but he ſoon quitted that ſtudy and applied himſelf to Divinity in which he made great progreſs, as well at Bremen as at Groningen, and Leyden. The firſt poſt he enjoyed in the univerſities was given him in the year 1651. He was made Mathematical Profeſſor in ordinary at Herborn in the county of Naſſaw, with leave to give private lectures to ſtudents of Divinity. He found that poſt ſo little to his liking, that he ſoon quitted it, and went to teach in the college of Duiſburgh in the Duchy of Cleves, where he likewiſe diſcharged the office of Miniſter from the year 1653. As that college was erected into an univerſity in the year 1655, Wittichius received there the degree of Doctor in Philoſophy and Divinity, and went from thence to Nimeguen to be Profeſſor of Divinity, in which poſt he continued ſixteen years. The books which he had publiſhed, and which turned in a manner all upon ſubjects that were partly Theological and partly Philoſophical in the Carteſian way, procured him a great number of opponents: but that only ſerved to make him the better known; ſo that he was judged worthy to teach Divinity at Leyden, the principal univerſity of the United Provinces in the Low-Countries. He entered upon that office in the month of November 1671, and continued in it to his death, having a very numerous auditory, to which not only the clearneſs of his ideas contributed, but likewiſe his attachment to the doctrine of Des Cartes and Cocceius, which is indeed the leaſt in favour with the great and powerful in Holland, but is moſt to the reliſh of young people, and of thoſe who ſet up for men of wit. Wittichius died the ninteenth of May 1687. His principal books are theſe, Conſenſus veritatis in Scriptura divina & infallibili revelatæ cum veritate philoſophica à Carteſio detecta. Theologia Pacifica. Exercitationes Theologicæ. Cauſa Spiritus Sancti. Commentarius in Epiſtolam ad Romanos. After his death, his brother, an advocate at Aix la Chapelle, publiſhed the Anti-Spinoza, and ſome notes upon the meditations of Mr Des Cartes (a).

(a) Gronovius, in Orat. funebr. Chriſt. Wittichii.

WOUWER (JOHN DE) one of the learned men of the XVIth century, and author of ſome books [A], was of Hamburgh, and the ſon of a Refugee in Germany on account of Religion (a). He was born on the tenth of March 1574, and having gone through his Claſſical ſtudies in his native country, he was ſent to Leyden in 1592, where he ſpent five years in an intimate familiarity with the moſt learned men, and even with the great Scaliger. From thence he went to France where he acquired the friendſhip of Claudius Puteanus, Francis Pithæus, and ſeveral other great men. He afterwards ſpent two years in Italy, and received a great many civilities there from ſome Prelates and ſome Cardinals. He had even acceſs to the Pope, who ſhewed great affection to him, and offered him a very honourable penſion. Being returned to Germany, he accepted the poſt of Counſellor to the Count of Eaſt-Frieſland, and was his envoy at the Hague in the treaty for the Pacification of Embden, as he was afterwards at the court of John Adolphus, Duke of Holſtein. That Duke was ſo pleaſed with him at the firſt converſation, that he obliged him to bind himſelf by an oath, to engage in his ſervice. He was firſt honoured with the place of his counſellor, and then advanced to the government of Gottorp. But after he had continued three years in that office, he fell into a diſeaſe which waſted him by ſlow degrees, and of which he died on the thirtieth of March 1612, to the extreme regret of his maſter, who cauſed him to be pompouſly interred

(a) See the remark [C].

[A] Author of ſome books.] He publiſhed, with notes, the works of Sidonius Apollinaris, Petronius, Firmicus de errore profanarum Religionum, Minutius Fælix, and Apuleius; beſides ſeveral notes on Tertullian, a treatiſe de Polymathia, a diſſertation de cognitione veterum novi orbis. Dies æſtiva ſeu de Umbra. A panegyric interred in the great church at Sleſwic (b). He held an epiſtolary correſpondence with the moſt learned men of Holland, and of ſeveral other countries [B]. He neither wanted learning, nor other good qualifications; but we are told that his faults were not leſs than his virtues (c). Being born a Proteſtant he embraced the Romiſh religion in Italy [C]; or at leaſt it was reported ſo. He is ranked amongſt the Plagiaries [D]. He was too fond of flattery, as appears by his teſtamentary legacy to thoſe who ſhould write on Chriſtian IV, King of Denmark. We have alſo two centuries of his Latin letters, and a Syntagma de Græca & Latina Bibliorum Interpretatione (1).

[B] He held an epiſtolary correſpondence with the moſt learned men . . . . of ſeveral . . . . countries.] This appears by the collection of his letters printed with his Syntagma de Græca & Latina Bibliorum Interpretatione. See Mr Morhof's opinion of them. ‘ Variæ ‘ hîc inſtitutæ ſunt de multis rebus literariis conſulta‘ tiones & judicia : nam multa, quæ agitabantur illo ‘ tempore inter viros literatos, his in epiſtolis recen‘ ſentur. Scriptæ illæ ſunt ad illuſtres ejus temporis ‘ viros, Scaligerum, Meurſium, Heinſium, Gruterum, ‘ Scriverium & plures alios, cum quibus non niſi eru‘ dita tractari poterant. Epiſtolas ejus multas ineditas ‘ ſervat illuſtris Gudius, latitant & aliquæ inter MSta ‘ Bibliothecæ Hamburgenſis (2). - - - Several literary ‘ conſultations and deciſions are found here ; for many of ‘ the diſputes which then employed the learned, are men‘ tioned in theſe letters. They are written to the famous ‘ men of that age, Scaliger, Meurſius, Heinſius, Grute‘ rus, Scriverius, and ſeveral others, with whom he ‘ could only correſpond upon learned ſubjects. Many of ‘ his letters remain unpubliſhed in the hands of the famous ‘ Gudius, and ſome of them lie concealed amongſt the ‘ the manuſcripts of the Hamburgh library.’

[C] Being born a Proteſtant he embraced the Romiſh religion in Italy.] Nicholas Wouwer, his father, a perſon deſcended from an antient and noble family (3), left his country on account of the perſecution of the Proteſtants there, and ſettled at Humburgh : a manifeſt proof that the perſon who is the ſubject of this article was born a Proteſtant. Baudius s letters inform us that he changed his religion. ’ Illud pro certo habe‘ tur, eum Romæ publicitus religionem abjuraſſe, nullo ‘ metu qui in virum conſtantem cadere poſſit, ſed con‘ temptu & inſcitia pietatis, vel (quod his potentius ‘ eſt apud mentes præcipiti ambitione afflatas) ſpe con‘ ſequendæ alicujus opimæ largitionis. Sed, ut audio, ‘ eſca elapſa eſt, ſolum hamum retinuit (4). - - - It is ‘ believed, for certain, that he publickly abjured his re‘ ligion at Rome, not from any motive of fear that could ‘ work upon a reſolute man, but from a contempt and ig‘ norance of piety, or (which has ſtill a greater influence ‘ upon minds that are hurried away by ambition) from ‘ the hopes of obtaining ſome large reward. But, as far ‘ as I hear, the bait ſlipt off and he retained nothing but ‘ the book.’ In the ſecond tome of the Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum (5), there is a letter from one Francis Broccard (6), in which our John Wouwer (7) is ranked amongſt the learned men who having apoſtatized, favoured the deſigns of the Inquiſition at Rome. But read the letter which he wrote to Baudius, and you will there find him denying this abjuration of his religion ; and only owning that he diſliked ſeveral things in the Reformation of Luther and Calvin. ‘ Non ego profecto eos, qui religionem ‘ reformandam ſuſceperunt, multa, quæ fortaſſe diſ‘ ſuenda erant, pio ſed improvido zelo tota reſcidiſſe, ‘ hoc me ſerio improbare aperte fateor : neque illa ‘ ſententia heri aut hodie mihi nata, ſed ex illo tem‘ pore quo aliquem veri guſtum ſenſus communis mi‘ hi ſuggeſſit, hoc ſi omnes in me improbant, ne iraſ‘ cor quidem. Mihi vero ita ſentire liberum erit, & ‘ oſtendere ſuam cuique ſponſam eſſe pulchram (8). - - ‘ I do not, indeed, deny, that thoſe who undertook the ‘ Reformation of religion, did, with a pious but unwary ‘ zeal, cut off at once many things which, perhaps, it ‘ would have been much better to have unript by degrees. ‘ This, I freely own, was a method which I ſeriouſly diſ‘ approved of : neither did I conceive this opinion to day or ‘ yeſterday, but ever ſince common ſenſe taught me to have ‘ the leaſt reliſh for truth. If all the world ſhould cenſure ‘ me for this, it will not offend me. But I ſhall ſtill be ‘ at liberty to think ſo, and to ſhew that every one reckons ‘ his own bride the handſomeſt.’

[D] He is ranked amongſt the Plagiaries.] The learned Mauſſac, after having told us that ſince Caſaubon could not finiſh his book of the ſtudies of the Antients, he would one day treat of that ſubject himſelf if he had leiſure, adds that Wouwer interfered with Caſaubon, without publiſhing any thing but what he had taken from that Critic. It is ſuppoſed that Wouwer appropriated this rich treaſure to himſelf when he was at Montpellier with Caſaubon. De Iſaaco Caſaubono loquor, in cujus meſſem falcem injecit Joannes Wouer vir certe ingenii non vulgaris, ſed qui opus imperfectum reliquit, quamvis omne quod edidit à Caſaubono habuerit, dum una cum eo agebat Monſpelii (9). The book out of which I cite theſe words was printed at Toulouſe, in the year 1615 ; that of Wouwer which Mauſſac means, is intituled, de Polymathia Tractatio, and was printed in 1603 (10). Several reports, to the diſadvantage of Wouwer, had been ſpread about before Mauſſac publiſhed this accuſation. Wouwer proteſted his innocence, in a letter which he wrote in the year 1605 (11). And Baudius, to whom it was addreſſed, writ to him in anſwer, that thoſe rumors were vaniſhed, and that he ought not to aſcribe their riſe to Caſaubon. Refrixit jam ſermo leviſſimorum hominum, qui Polymathiam tuam Plagii ſuſpicione infamabant. Caſaubonus vir melior & candidior eſt, quam ut hujus culpæ inſimulandus eſſe videatur (12). He ſent him beſides a fragment of a letter of Caſaubon, by which it appears, that without ever complaining of any theft, that learned Critic very much commended Wouwer's book. See alſo what Baudius wrote to the brothers Puteani the ſame year (13) ; but above all ſee Thomaſius's Preface to the new edition of the treatiſe de Polymathia, which ſtrenuouſly refutes Mr Mauſſac. Mr Morhof mentions this particular, and cites Schoockius, who ſays that this reproach of Mauſſac proceeded from envy, and that Voſſius was guilty of ſtealing from Wouwer. Ex invidiâ profectum hoc Mauſſaci judicium Martinus Schockius Confutatione Fab. Hamel. p. 2. c. 4. exiſtimat. Ex ipſo autem Wouwerio multa cepiſſe, ſuppreſſo ejus nomine, Voſſium etiam Schockius loco laudato, & Joannes Jonſſius, lib. 1. deſcrip. Hiſt. Phil. c. 10. p. 49. teſtatur (14). Scaliger affirmed the ſame thing in converſation which Mauſſac did in print (15). He generally called Wouwer a great Plagiary, and retailer of traſh. Notwithſtanding this he highly compliments him in his letters (16).

Lindenbroch was enraged againſt him. He accuſes him of a thouſand plagiariſms, particularly in his little book de Umbra (17). He tells us, that Wouwer finding that tract among Gulielmius's papers, only altered the form of it, and interwove ſome Latin verſes which were made by another hand. ‘ Lindenbrogium ‘ neſcio quomodo is ſemper infenſum habuit : ſuper‘ ſunt enim Lindenbrogii tum in Bibliothecâ Ham‘ burgenſi, tum in Gudianâ, Epiſtolæ, quibus illi ‘ acerbè inſultat. Vocat illum hominem cum latrante ‘ nomine (à baubando). Multa in illo plagia notat, ‘ ac in aliquâ epiſtolâ hæc de illo habet, ejus de Um‘ brâ Tractatum inter plagia recenſens : Quem noviſſi‘ mè edidit librum tenebricoſum umbratilis ille, inter ‘ doctiſſimi optimique viri Jani Gulielmi ſchedas repertum ‘ ajunt : in quo id tamen præſtitit, quod aliam illi veſtem ‘ induit, & ſuo more turpavit. Nam & carmina, quæ ‘ paſſim intermixta, non adulteri hujus fuerunt, ſed Scho‘ læ Schleſwicenſis Rectoris, viri eruditi & probi, qui ‘ etiam nunc vivit, & id aperte fatetur. Epiſtola hæc ‘ ſcripta eſt Hamburgi an. 1613. Gravis hæc in illum ‘ virum injuria eſt, & neſcio quid acerbitatis ſapit. In ‘ aliis epiſtolis paſſim in eum invehitur, ac plura ejus ‘ plagia notat (18). - - - - Lindenbroch was, I know ‘ not for what reaſon, always an enemy to Wouwer : for ‘ there are extant, both in the library of Hamburgh, ‘ and that of Gudius, ſome letters written by Linden‘ broch, in which he bitterly inſults him. He calls him ‘ the man with the barking name (Wower). He takes ‘ notice of many of his plagiariſms, and in one of his let‘ ters writes thus of him, reckoning his book de Umbra ‘ among plagiary pieces. It is reported that the book ‘ de Tenebris, which that cloudy author has lately ‘ publiſhed, was found among the papers of the learn-

---

(b) Taken from Henningus Witte, in Memoria Woweriana, pag. 79, & ſeq. of the Memoriæ Philoſophorum.

(c) See the remark [E].

(1) Taken from Henningus Witte, Memor. Philoſoph. pag. 81, 82.

(2) Morhofius, Polyhiſt. lib. i, cap. xxiv, pag. 304. He ſays that edition was publiſhed at Hamburgh, in 1608. But how can this be reconciled with what Mr Witte ſays, ubi ſupra, pag. 82, that Elmenhorſt publiſhed that Syntagma, in the year 1618.

(3) Illuſtri Baronum ſtirpe oriundus. Id. ibid. cap. i, pag. 7.

(4) Baudius, Epiſt. lxix, centuriæ i, pag. m. 101. It is dated the 18*th of February* 1603.

(5) Page 875.

(6) See concerning this man, the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. i, pag. 374, & ſeq.

(7) He is there called wrong Johannes Wourenius Amburgenſis.

(8) Joh. Wouwer, Epiſtola ad Baudium, pag. 110. It is the lxxiid, of the firſt century of Baudius's letters.

(9) Philippus Jacobus Mauſſacus, Notis in Plutarchum de Fluviis, p. 149.

(10) The edition I make uſe of is of that year, ex Bibliopolio Frobeniano. Thomaſius de Plagio Literario, p. 261, mentions only that of Hamburgh 1604.

(11) The viith of the ſecond century of Baudius's Letters, in the Leyden edition, 1650.

(12) Baudius, Epiſt. ix, Centur. ii, pag. 165.

(13) Monui vos jampridem diſſipatum fuiſſe rumorem de Wouwerio noſtro quaſi plagio domeſtico ſublegerit potiſſimam partem ſuæ Polymathiæ. Baudius, Epiſt. iii, Cent. ii, pag. 155.

(14) Morhofius, Polyh. lib. i, cap. i, pag. 7.

(15) See the Scaligerana, at the word Wouwerius.

(16) See Scaliger's Letters, particularly that which I have mentioned above, citation (1), of the article ELMENHORST.

(17) It is intituled Dies æſtiva, ſive de Umbra Paegnion. It was printed in 1610. My edition is that of Oxford 1636, in 12mo.

(18) Morhof. ubi ſupra, cap. xxiv, p. 304.

write a panegyric on him, after his death [E]. The letters which Baudius wrote to him, are an inſtance of the little ſincerity to be met with in the compliments uſually made to authors [F]. Some writers confound our John Wouwer with another

‘ed and excellent Janus Gulielmus; and that the pretended author did no more than alter the form of it, and ſpoil it after his own faſhion. The verſes, which are interſperſed in it every where, are not the compoſure of this Plagiary, but of the rector of the ſchool of Sleſwic, a man of learning and probity, who is ſtill living, and publickly owns them. This letter is dated at Hamburgh, in the year 1613: It is highly injurious to him, and betrays very much rancour againſt him. In the reſt of his letters, he every where inveighs againſt him, and points out many of his plagiariſms.’

[E] He was too fond of flattery, as appears by his . . . legacy, &c. . . . .] This teſtamentary promiſe took effect; for in hopes of the promiſed ſum ſeveral Panegyriſts ſtarted up, who extolled Wouwer above the ſkies. But if we had his life written by Lindenbroch, we ſhould find a great many particulars different from their relations. ‘Felicior & aliis Eruditis, & ipſo Principe ſuo, Johan. Adolpho, nullos, uti ſupra † monuimus, Encomiaſtas Poſthumos nacto, fuit Joh. Wowerius, Miniſter Aulæ Gottorp. Primarius. Biographias enim, & Sermones Panegyricos, memoriæ illius ſacros, publicarunt Gev. Elmenhorſtius, Ad. Olearius, Nic. Johann. Cruſius, aliique complures, ſpe potius Nummi doloſi (Præmii ſc. LX. Joachimicorum, quod cuilibet, Laudationem ſibi poſthumam ſcripturo, in Tabulis ultimæ Voluntatis Wowerius deſtinavit,) ipſis affulgente invitati, quam ſincero in virum Virtutibus pariter atque Vitiis magnum ducti affectu. Alio haud dubie fine, ut Animo ſc. ſuo, in Wouwerium ob ſtudiorum Æmulationem iniquiori, morem gereret, Vitæ illius Hiſtoriam ⸸ ſcribere in Animo habuit Frid. Lindebrogius, Civis ipſius, quo rigidiorem Vitiorum ejus Cenſorem hactenus obſervavi neminem (19). - - - - - - John Wouwer, prime Miniſter of the Court of Gottorp, was more fortunate than other learned men, and even than his own Prince John Adolphus who, as we ſaid before, had no encomiums written upon him after his death. But to Wouwer's memory, deſcriptions of his life, and Panegyrical diſcourſes were dedicated and publiſhed by Elmenhorſt, Olearius, Cruſius, and ſeveral others. Theſe authors were rather prevailed upon by the bewitching temptation of money, (for Wouwer in his laſt will, had ordered a reward of ſixty Joachims to any one that ſhould write an encomium upon him after his death) than moved with a ſincere regard to the man himſelf, who was equally remarkable for his virtues and vices. Lindenbroch, his countryman, and the moſt rigid cenſor of his vices that I have ſeen, intended to write his life. But certainly it was with a quite different view, viz. that he might gratify his own humour, for he was ſomewhat prejudiced againſt Vonwer on account of a mutual emulation in their ſtudies.’ The author from whom I have borrowed theſe words, obſerves elſewhere that Wouwer was a little vain, and frequently talked of himſelf (20). Baudius alſo obſerved a great preſumption in him. Read the following lines: ‘De Wouwerio eadem ad nos fama pervenit, eum id ætatis hominem admiratione doctrinæ (vide & ride ludibria judiciorum) cooptatum in collegium Senatorum ſacræ Cæſareæ Majeſtatis, ſed certiſſimo argumento perſuadeor rem ita ſe non habere (21), quod cum à reditu ſuo bis terve ſcripſerit ad Scaligerum, ad Scriverium, ad Franciſcum Douſam etiam, cum perhonorifica noſtri mentione, tamen ubique miſerabiliter inſectatur fortunæ ſuæ malignitatem, nec homo ſui oſtentator magnificus, quidquam de ſuperbo illo titulo adjicit, quem proculdubio non fuit omiſſurus, niſi prorſus ab ingenio deſciſcere vellet. Detepuit jam mucro iracundiæ noſtræ adverſus eum, quod ex pluribus indiciis apparet eum non tam nocendi animo, quam ſui extollendi vanitate ſolitum detrahere famæ & meritis laudibus amicorum. Dempto certe hoc vitio, multa habet ingenii naturæque dona, quibus ſupra vulgus ſapit, & illuſtrium virorum amicitiam meretur (22). - - - - - - The ſame report concerning Wouwer reached me, viz. that on account of his being ſo much admired for his learning, (behold, and laugh at the ridiculous judgments of men) he was at ſuch an age, made one of his Imperial Majeſty's Counſellors. But I have a very certain proof for believing, that it was not ſo: for whereas after his return he wrote two or three letters to Scaliger, Scriverius, and Francis Douſa, in which he makes very honourable mention of me, he does at the ſame time moſt piteouſly complain of his own ill fortune, and takes no notice at all of that proud title, which certainly a man of his vanity and oſtentation would never have omitted, unleſs you can ſuppoſe that he acted in a manner that was quite contrary to his natural diſpoſition. Nevertheleſs the edge of my reſentment is taken off, ſince I have found by ſeveral manifeſt proofs, that in detracting from the reputation of his friends and from their due praiſes he is not ſo much influenced by the deſire of hurting them as by the vanity of extolling himſelf. Setting that vice aſide, we muſt own he has many qualities and endowments which ſet him above the vulgar, and give him a title to the friendſhip of great and learned men.’

[F] Of the little ſincerity to be met with in the compliments uſually made to authors.] Wouwer publiſhed a panegyric on Chriſtian IV King of Denmark in the year 1603. Baudius writing to the author loads him with praiſes, but in a letter to another he ſpeaks of this work as of a preformance full of faults. What follows will prove the truth of theſe two particulars: In Dominici Baudii ἀλλοπροσαλλȣ Epiſtola ad Wowerium ‡ haud parem obſerves ἐλευθεροστομίαν. Illic ‘enim non tantum Generoſos Wouverii impetus, & ardua felicis Ingenii tentamenta, laudem apud Doctos, Amorem apud Honeſtos, admirationem apud peritos Rerum Æſtimatores, cenſet mereri, ſed Ironice etiam eundem laudat, quod, vividarum & Erectarum mentium exemplo, Eloquentiam ſuam in Panegyrico Præceptiunculis Magiſtellorum non circumſcribat, ſed, Artium repagula fidenter perrumpens, libero curſu feratur. In Epiſtola contra ad Corn. Mylium * Scaligero ὁμόψηφος, majori, quam ille, παῤῥεσία, quid in Oratione hac deſideret, ſignificat: Affectavit Wowerius, inquit, in Panegyrico ſublime & floridum ſimul genus dicendi. Laudandus ob generoſum conatum, etſi interdum langueſcit, & pellucet nimis Æmulatio Antiquorum. Multa ſunt, quæ non Ignavo Lectori placere poſſunt. Si currum interdum non bene moderatur, magnis tamen excidit auſis. Generoſiores Animi, dum vitant humum, ſæpe nubes & inania captant. Ætas & poſteræ curæ, limabunt, & depaſcent luxuriem agnatam melioribus Ingeniis (23). - - - - Dominic Baudius, in his letter to Wouwer, does not uſe the ſame freedom of ſpeech; for there he not only allows that Wouwer's noble flights, and the courageous attempts of his happy genius deſerves the praiſe of the learned, the eſteem of honeſt men, and the admiration of the judicious, but he likewiſe ironically commends him, for that after the example of lively and daring minds he ſcorns to circumſcribe his eloquence in panegyrics by the narrow rules of little maſters, but boldly breaking through the barriers of art roams at large. On the contrary, in his letter to Cornelius Mylius, he is of the ſame opinion with Scaliger, and, with more freedom than he, declares what he thinks faulty in that oration. Wouwer, ſays he, in his panegyric, affected both the ſublime and the florid ſtile. He is to be commended for his noble attempt, tho' ſome times he flags, and diſcovers an affected imitation of the Antients. There are many things in it which may pleaſe an attentive reader. If ſometimes he does not govern his chariot well, it muſt nevertheleſs be owned that he fails in a bold undertaking. Generous minds, while they avoid being low and mean, are often loſt in the clouds, and run into bombaſt. But age and new application will poliſh and correct the luxuriancy that is peculiar to the beſt genius's.’ Wouwer himſelf knew the defects of his performance, and made a great many excuſes on account of the hurry he wrote it in, and deſired that the world would not judge of his ability by this eſſay. Obſerve, that this panegyric was compoſed on occaſion of the homage which the city of Hamburgh paid to his Daniſh Majeſty; but as ſomething had eſcaped the author's pen which might redound to the prejudice of the liberties of another of the ſame name, who ſtudied under Lipſius, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in one of the remarks [G].

---

† P. I. c. 13. §. 3. pag. 198, 199.

⸸ Promiſit eam A. 1613. in Epiſt. quadam MSta, cujus Autographum Gudius ὁ μακαρίτης aſſervabat. Conf. Morhofii, Polyhiſt. lib. i, cap. xxiv, pag. 304.

(19) Joh. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, Part. ii, pag. 209, 210.

(20) Satis alias arrogans & περιαυτόλογος. Id. ibid. Part. i, pag. 188.

(21) Wouwer, in a letter of a later date written to Baudius affirms the truth of it: Me Conſiliarium Cæſaris electum vera fama fuit. See Baudius's Letters, num. lxxxiii Cent. i.

(22) Baudius, Epiſt. lxix, Cent. i, pag. m. 100, 101, this letter is dated on the 18th of February 1603.

‡ Cent. iii. Ep. iii, pag. 490, 491.

* Cent. i. n. 66, pag. 157.

(23) Joh. Mollerus, ubi ſupra, Part. i, pag. 187, 188. His edition of Baudius's Letters, does not agree with mine.

of that city. The Senate prohibited the ſale of it, till the firſt pages were corrected (24).

[G] Some writers confound our John Wouwer with another of the ſame name . . . . of whom I ſhall ſpeak in a remark.] This other JOHN WOUWER (25) was born in the year 1576, at Antwerp, where he began his ſtudies under the Jeſuits, and afterwards went to Louvain, and lived with Lipſius, who had ſuch an affection and high eſteem for him, that he appointed him one of the executors of his laſt will, and recommended the care of his manuſcripts to him alone. This Wouwer having ſpent three years in travelling into France, Spain, and Italy, was no ſooner returned but he was promoted to the dignity of a Counſellor in his own country, and aftewards became a member of the Council of Finances and the Council of War. The Infanta Iſabella Clara Eugenia deputed him to Philip IV, King of Spain, who dignified him with the honour of knighthood. He publiſhed ſome books, and died on the twenty-third of September 1635. The world expected from him the publication of two hundred letters, written to Lipſius (26). Father Schottus confounds this Wouwer with that of Hamburgh, as Mr Morhof obſerves. 'Duo monenda nobis ſunt, ſaith he (27), in quibus erratum à viris doctis eſt. Primum eſt, quod duo confundantur ejus nominis, Antwerpianus & Hamburgenſis Polymathiæ Autor. Andreas Schottus hunc Belgam facit in notis ad Proverbia Græca p. 68. ſed falſo. Lipſius in Epiſtolâ 8 Kal. Novembr. 1599. ad Antwerpianum illum ſcriptâ (28), utrumque probè diſtinguit: Janus Wouwerius, inquit, cognominis tuus, ſi non Gentilis, quam bona tecum fœderatio! Optimum par, nec vel Dii dederint magis ex uſu aut voto. Modeſtiam & probitatem in eo adoleſcente ſemper amavi, & ut vidi primùm (Hamburgi id fuit, ante annos novem) unà laudatum illam indolem ivi. Vivat, creſcat, & lampada à nobis in hoc curſu jam feſſis accipiat: me libenter & judicia tradente. - - - - We are to obſerve two things here, concerning which learned men have been in a miſtake. The firſt is, that two of the ſame name are confounded, viz. the Wouwer of Antwerp, and the Wouwer of Hamburgh, who was the author of the Polymathia. Andrew Scotus calls the latter Dutchman, in his notes on the Greek proverbs, but he is wrong. Lipſius, in his letter to the Wouwer of Antwerp, dated the 25th of October 1599, diſtinguiſhes them very well. Your nameſake, John Wouwer, ſays he, if he is not your countryman, yet how well may he be confederated with you! An excellent couple, than which it is impoſſible to wiſh for a better or more uſeful. For my own part, I was always in love with the modeſty and virtue of that young man, and the firſt time that I ſaw him, (which was at Hamburgh nine years ago) I could not help launching forth in praiſe of his genius. Let him live and proſper, and take our places, and relieve us who are already worn out in this career. As for me, I ſurrender very willingly.' Konig (29) is guilty of the ſame miſtake, for when he is ſpeaking of our Wouwer, he cites Swertius (30), who mentions only the other. Mr Mollerus hath collected ſeveral miſtakes on this head (31).

---

(24) See Mollerus, ubi ſupra.

(25) Or rather Vandan Wouwere, according to Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 587.

(26) Taken from Valerius Andreas, ubi ſupra.

(27) Morhof, ubi ſupra, pag. 7. See alſo Colomies cap. ii, Κειμηλ. Liter.

(28) It is the xliſt, of the firſt century ad Belgas.

(29) Konig, Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 875.

(30) Page. 487, and the book he means, is Athenæ Belgicæ.

(31) Johannes Mollerus de Scriptoribus Homonymis, pag. 733, & ſeq.

X.

XENOCRATES, one of the moſt illuſtrious Philoſophers of Antient Greece, was born at Chalcedon (a), and very early placed himſelf under the direction of Plato, to whom he always gave great proofs of his reſpect and fidelity [A]. He ſtudied under this great maſter, at the ſame time with Ariſtotle, but was not endowed with the ſame parts; he wanted a ſpur, and the other a bridle (b). This was Plato's judgment of them, who farther added, that in ſetting them together he matched a horſe with an aſs (c). But if his ſlow capacity rendered him far inferior to Ariſtotle (d), he very much ſurpaſſed him in Practical Philoſophy: the purity of his manners had in it ſomething extraordinary; his gravity, ſeverity, or rather auſterity, were of ſuch a nature, that a Divine who at preſent ſhould reſemble him would infallibly paſs for a Janſeniſt or a Rigoriſt. He had acquired ſuch an abſolute command of his paſſions, that a moſt beautiful courtezan, who laid that ſhe would ſubdue his virtue, loſt her wager [B], though ſhe had the liberty to lie by him, which afforded her an opportunity of uſing all her artifices to allure him to enjoy her. This is a triumph as remarkable as that of St Aldhelme (e), and ſome other canonized Saints who have eſcaped untainted from the like temptations, as we are told. Chaſtity was not the ſole virtue of this Philoſopher; all the other parts of temperance ſhone in his conduct [C]. He

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. vi.

(b) Compare with this, what is ſaid above, in the remark [B], of the article THEOPOMPUS.

(c) Ex Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) See, above, the remark [C], of the article FRANCIS of Aſſiſe.

[A] He always gave great proofs of his reſpect and fidelity to Plato.] He accompanied him in his voyage to Sicily, and was with him at the court of Syracuſe. (1) Dionyſius, the tyrant, one day in diſcourſe with Plato, telling him, ſome body will cut off your head; no man ſhall do it, replied Xenocrates, before he hath cut off mine (2). Obſerve that the tyrant's expreſſion imported the ſame thing, as if he had ſaid, I will cut off your head (3): which gives a greater idea of the generoſity of Xenocrates. We have ſeen above (4), what is reported of his zeal for Plato's honour, when he was injuriouſly treated by Ariſtotle. I add, that he very patiently bore Plato's reprimands; and when he was excited to defend himſelf, he made no other anſwer than this, he treats me ſo for my advantage. Ξενοκράτης (5) ὁ Χαλκηδόνιος ὑπὸ τοῦ Πλάτωνος. εἰς τὸ ἄχαρι (6) σκωπτόμενος, οὐδέπω ἠγανάκτει φησίν, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρὸς τὸν παροξύνοντα αὐτὸν, ὑπὲρ τούτου, ἵνα τι ἀποκρίνηται τῷ Πλάτωνι, ὅδε καὶ πάνυ ἐμφρόνως καταςιγάζων τὸν ἄνδρα, ἔφατο· ἀλλὰ τοῦτο ἐμοὶ συμφέρει. Xenocrates Chalcedonius, quum à Platone propter mores inurbanos reprehenderetur, nunquam indignatione irave commotus eſt: ſed & illi, qui ipſum ad reſpondendum Platoni inſtigaret, Hoc, inquit, mihi bonum atque commodum eſt: & prudentiſſime homini ſilentium impoſuit. But inſtead of this we are told the quite contrary by a Latin writer: where we find, 1. That Plato was told that Xenocrates had ſpoken ill of him. 2. That Plato would not believe it. 3. That the informer, with an audacious air, aſked why he did not believe it? 4. That Plato anſwered, it is not to be believed that a perſon, whom I love ſo well, ſhould not love me alſo. 5. That the informer offered to ſwear it. 6. That Plato would not ſuffer it to go ſo far, but ended the diſpute by the following words; Xenocrates would never have ſaid that, had he not believed that it was for my advantage (7). Poſtremò cùm ad jusjurandum inimicitias ſerentis malignitas confugiſſet; ne de perjurio ejus diſputaret, affirmavit nunquam Xenocratem illa dicturum fuiſſe, niſi ea dici expedire ſibi judicaſſet (8). This ſtory in Valerius Maximus ſeems to me to be but that which we find in Ælian, maimed and reverſed, and it confirms the text of this remark.

[B] A moſt beautiful courtezan, who laid that ſhe would ſubdue his virtue, loſt her wager.] I mention this elſewhere (9); but I add here what Valerius Maximus ſaith: 'Phryne nobile Athenis ſcortum juxta 'eum (Xenocratem) vino gravem in pervigilio accubuit, pignore cum quibuſdam juvenibus poſito, an 'temperantiam ejus corrumpere poſſet: Quam nec 'tactu, nec ſermone aſpernatus, quoad voluerat in 'ſinu ſuo morari, irritam propoſiti dimiſit. Factum 'ſapientia imbuti animi abſtinens; ſed meretriculæ 'quoque dictum perquam facetum, Deridentibus enim 'ſe adoleſcentibus, quia tam formoſa, tamque elegans 'poti ſenis animum illecebris pellicere non potuiſſet, 'pactumque victoriæ pretium flagitantibus: de homine ſe cum iis, non de ſtatua pignus poſuiſſe, 'reſpondit. Poteſtne hæc Xenocratis continentia à 'quoquam magis vere, magiſque proprie demonſtrari, 'quam ab ipſa meretricula expreſſa eſt? Phryne pulchritudine ſua, nulla ex parte conſtantiſſimam ejus 'abſtinentiam labefecit (10). - - - Phryne, a famous 'courtezan at Athens, lay down by Xenocrates in a night-'revel, when he had drank a great deal of wine. She had 'laid a wager with ſome young men that ſhe would de-'bauch him. He declined not her careſſes, and ſuffered 'her to embrace him as long as ſhe pleaſed; but he diſap-'pointed her expectation. As this was a proof of his 'abſtinence and wiſdom, ſo what the courtezan ſaid upon 'it was very witty; for when the young men laughed at 'her, becauſe with all her beauty and charms ſhe had 'not been able to raiſe the paſſion of an old man warmed 'with wine, and deſired her to pay her bet, ſhe an-'ſwered, that ſhe had laid a wager about a man, and 'not about a ſtatue. Could any thing more truly and 'properly deſcribe the continence of Xenocrates than this 'expreſſion of the courtezan. Phryne, beautiful as ſhe 'was, could not make the leaſt impreſſion upon his conſtant 'chaſtity.' You ſee this author ſuppoſes ſeveral particulars which raiſe the glory of the victory: it was entire tho' all the circumſtances favoured the enemy. He will have it that the courtezan took hold of an opportunity when Xenocrates had drank plentifully; and adds, that the Philoſopher did not refuſe the careſſes of her hands and voice, and that Phryne had leave to ſtay with him as long as ſhe pleaſed.

[C] All the other parts of temperance ſhone in his conduct.] His having drank plentifully when Phryne tempted him may be objected againſt this. They may likewiſe object againſt it the ſtory of Athenæus, who relates that Xenocrates won the crown of gold, which the Syracuſan tyrant promiſed to the perſon that ſhould firſt drink off a certain meaſure of wine (11). It will be ſaid that a man, who gets the prize appointed for the greateſt drinker in the court of a drunken Prince, is not ſober. But Xenocrates carried off this prize; therefore he was not ſober. Conſider this expreſſion of Diogenes Laërtius: Χρυσῷ ςεφάνῳ τιμηθέντα ἐπ' ἄθλῳ πολυποσίας, Corona aurea donatum in PRÆMIUM LARGIORIS COMPOTATIONIS (12).

2 Remember

(1) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 6.

(2) Id. ibid. num. 11.

(3) See Kuhnius's Notes, in Diog. Laërt. ad. lib. iv, num. 11.

(4) In the remark [E], of the article ARISTOTLE.

(5) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. xiv, cap. ix.

(6) See Plutarch, in Vita Marii, init. pag. 407.

(7) Valer. Maximus, lib. iv, cap. i, num. 2, in Ext. pag. m. 351.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) In the remark [R], of the article LAIS.

(10) Val. Max. lib. iv, cap. iii, in Ext. num. 3, pag. 376.

(11) Athenæus, lib. x, pag. 437. He quotes the Hiſtorian Timæus.

(12) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 8.

He loved neither pleaſures, riches, nor praiſes (f). He never could be corrupted by preſents [D], and he acquired ſuch a great reputation with regard to ſincerity and probity, that he was the ſole perſon whom the magiſtrates of Athens exempted from confirming

Remember alſo that Ælian inſerts Xenocrates in that chapter, where he gives us a catalogue of thoſe who loved drinking, and could drink a great deal (13). The firſt in this liſt is the Syracuſian tyrant, who promiſed a golden crown to him who could drink moſt, and Xenocrates won the prize. Προὔκειτο ἆθλον τῷ πιόντι πλέον ϛέφανος χρυσοῦς· καὶ ἐνίκησε Ξενοκράτης ὁ Χαλκηδόνιος; Præmium ordinatum eſt ei, qui PLUS BIBISSET, aurea corona, quam meritus eſt Xenocrates Chalcedonius (14). Thus you have the objection fortified with all neceſſary proofs. It would be in vain to anſwer that Xenocrates was admired on this occaſion (15), for the Hiſtorian who ſaith ſo adds another particular, which is really laudable, I mean, that the victor did not keep this golden crown, but placed it on a ſtatue of Mercury, as he was going home. He uſed, on other days, to crown that ſtatue with flowers, but that evening he fixed on it a golden crown. This was a proof of a diſintereſted mind; this was ſhewing that for the honour of the gods he could as eaſily part with what was moſt precious as with a noſegay. If the objectors ſhould be ſo opinionative as to affirm that Athenæus's meaning is, that Xenocrates was admired both on this account, and becauſe he drank more than the reſt, they would be but ſmall gainers: for every thing that is admired is not a good moral quality: ſeveral things are admired by reaſon of their ſingularity, and upon this foot a Philoſopher might be admired for carrying off the prize from all the drinkers of Syracuſe. He ſhould have been vanquiſhed; he ought to have avoided ſuch an engagement; and if he had been temperate he had never entred theſe liſts. Let us then ſee whether we can think of any other way of juſtification.

It muſt be owned that ſome very ſober people, may be of ſuch a conſtitution as to drink a great deal without loſing their reaſon. Socrates, whoſe ſobriety and auſterity of life are inconteſtable, did not love drinking, and yet when he was forced to it by company, no body could hold out againſt him; and what was admirable in him, was, that he never was indiſpoſed on theſe occaſions, and that there was no difference betwixt Socrates faſting, and Socrates at his departure from a feaſt and merry-making (16). If ſuch a man on ſome extraordinary occaſion as that feſtival, which was celebrated at Syracuſe, when Dionyſius the tyrant promiſed the golden crown to the drinker, makes a trial of his ſtrength, and wins the prize, it ought not to be concluded from thence that he is intemperate. He does not thereby loſe the character of a ſober man: this virtue ought to be conſidered in the ſame manner with other habitual qualities. They conſtitute a character which is not loſt by any ſingle act of the oppoſite quality. Mr Daillé made this remark when he was charged with calling Mr Cottiby an extravagant viſionary. ‘Sometimes the ‘want of attention, replied he (17), and frequently an ex‘ceſs of paſſion, ſtarts a fooliſh or extravagant notion ‘in the mind of a wiſe man. But you do not therefore ‘call him a fool. If you believe Horace, the excel‘lent Homer nods ſometimes. Will you from thence ‘accuſe Horace of railing at that incomparable author, ‘whom he elſewhere ſo highly eſteems and admires? ‘Will you ſay that he calls him a ſluggiſh, dull, and ‘ſtupid Poet? No. For theſe names, as well as thoſe ‘of detractor, and viſionary are only beſtowed on ſuch ‘as are habituated to theſe vices, and not on thoſe ‘from whom ſuch actions barely eſcape, and that very ‘ſeldom, either through human weakneſs, or by the ‘force of ſome extraordinary cauſe: One ſwallow does ‘not make the ſpring, as the Philoſopher * hath it on ‘a like occaſion.’ This is ſufficient to juſtify what I have affirmed concerning Xenocrates.

I ſhall ſay by the bye, that two very learned Critics (18) are of opinion, that he was not at Syracuſe when he carried this prize, and even was at Athens when he won it. I own, indeed, that their opinion is probable, tho' to me it ſeems leſs ſo, than that which I have followed. It is undeniable that Xenocrates was at the court of Dionyſius, and that he was then very young. Is it not therefore more likely that he ſhould indulge himſelf to drink on that occaſion, than in the city where he ſtood upon the foot of a thorough auſtere Philoſopher?

What more authentic proof can we have of his great ſobriety than the proverb of the Antients, Xenocrates's cheeſe, which they made uſe of to expreſs that a thing laſted a long time? The author of this particular (19) adds, 1. That when he had pierced a caſk, it was ſo long before it was empty that the wine quite loſt it's virtue. 2. That Xenocrates ſeveral times threw away his proviſions by reaſon they grew ruſty or muſty; which would not have happened to a leſs frugal perſon.

[D] He never could be corrupted by preſents.] The Macedonian court uſed theſe means to corrupt a great many perſons in the neighbouring Republics, and ſuch perſons who refuſed their preſents did thereby ſufficiently declare that they never intended to take any meaſures prejudicial to the intereſt of their country. Xenocrates took this courſe. He refuſed King Philip's preſents; whence that Prince deſpairing to gain him, treated him uncivilly, and did not admit him to the conferences which he held with the other Ambaſſadors of the Republic of Athens, whom he had ſoftened by his generoſity, by feaſting and cajolling. But Xenocrates continued inflexible, and preſerving his integrity inviolable, never appeared at the audience and feaſts as his colleagues did. They complained that he did no ſervice in his embaſſy, for which he was very near being fined: but he diſcovered the whole ſecret, and warned the Athenians to have a watchful eye upon the public good, ſince the other Ambaſſadors were corrupted by preſents. This procured him double honour (20). He would not receive the money which Antipater ſent him (21), and when he accepted a ſmall part of the ſum which Alexander's Ambaſſadors brought him, it was only that he might not ſhew any contempt for that great Monarch. ‘Xenocrates quum ‘legati ab Alexandro quinquaginta ei talenta attuliſ‘ſent, quæ erat pecunia temporibus illis Athenis præ‘ſertim maxima, adduxit legatos ad cœnam in Aca‘demiam. Iis appoſuit tantum quod ſatis eſſet, nullo ‘apparatu. Quum poſtridie rogarent eum, cui nu‘merari juberet, quid vos heſterna inquit cœnula non ‘intellexiſtis me pecunia non egere? Quos quum tri‘ſtiores vidiſſet, xxx minas accepit, ne aſpernari re‘gis liberalitatem videretur (22). - - - Xenocrates, when ‘Alexander's Ambaſſadors brought him fifty talents, ‘which in thoſe days was a very conſiderable ſum, eſpe‘cially at Athens, carried them to ſup with him in the ‘Academy, where he ſet before them no more than was ‘juſt ſufficient, and that too in the plaineſt manner. The ‘next day, when they aſked him, into whoſe hands he ‘would order the money to be paid: Could you not ſee, ‘ſaid he, by laſt night's ſupper, that I have no need of ‘money? But upon obſerving them troubled at this, ‘he accepted of thirty minæ, purely that he might not ‘ſeem to deſpiſe the King's generoſity.’ Obſerve, in this Latin paſſage, the conſequence he draws from the mean ſupper with which he treated Alexander's Envoys. Doth not this, ſaid he, give you to underſtand that I have no need of money? Another Hiſtorian tells us (23), that having accepted part of the preſent, he ſent back the reſt to Alexander, He hath more need of it than I, ſaid he, for he ſubſiſts a greater number of men. This is excellent morality; it points out the true ſource of avarice, and of the contempt of riches. Let us obſerve that Valerius Maximus, who could not be ignorant of what Cicero relates, hath left out a circumſtance, which was not convenient for his purpoſe. He aimed at a jingle of antitheſes and parallels: he reſolved to connect the triumph over Phryne to that over Alexander's money. Having told us that Xenocrates, in Phryne's judgment, was a ſtatue; he takes it to be very witty to ſay that this Philoſopher was no leſs a ſtatue, with regard to the charms of gold, than thoſe of a courteſan (24); and to add, that a great Prince would have bought the friendſhip of a Philoſopher, but the Philoſopher would not ſell it to that great Prince (25). All theſe witty turns would have been ſpoiled, if it had been ſaid that Xenocrates took part of the preſent. Wherefore he ſuppreſſed this circumſtance.

(f) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 11.

(13) Φιλοπόται τινὲς καὶ πολυπόται. De quibuſdam qui & libenter & multum bibebant. This is the title of the xliſt chapter of the iid book of Ælian.

(14) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xli.

(15) Ἐπὶ τούτῳ ἐθαυμάσθη. Quamobrem in admiratione ſumma fuit. Athen. ubi ſupra.

(16) Charpentier, Vie de Socrate, pag. m. 100.

(17) Daillé, Replique à Adam, & à Cottiby, Part. iii, ch. iii, pag. m. 157.

* Ariſt. en ſes Mor. à Nicom. lib. i, cap. vii, towards the end.

(18) Kuhnius in Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 8. Perizonius, in Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xli, but obſerve that Mr Perizonius is not ſo poſitive in this opinion as the other.

(19) Stobæus, de continen. & ſobr. Serm. xv, fol. m. 69.

(20) Ex Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 8, 9.

(21) Id. ibid. num. 8.

(22) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. v, fol. m. 277, B.

(23) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 8.

(24) Quid rex Alexander? an divitiis eum quatere potuit? ab illo quoque ſtatuam & quidem æque fruſtra tentatam putes. Valer. Maxim. lib. iv, cap. iii, num. 3, in Ext.

(25) Ita rex philoſophi amicitiam emere voluit: Philoſophus regi ſuam vendere noluit. Id. ibid.

confirming his evidence with an oath [E]. A diſcourſe, which he made about temperance, ſo moved the moſt diſſolute debauchee of that time, that he took an immediate reſolution to renounce voluptuouſneſs, and apply himſelf to wiſdom [F]. This converſion was ſteady; for the convert, afterwards, became a very grave Philoſopher. This great alteration ought not to be attributed to the charms of eloquence, but rather to the auſtere gravity of Xenocrates. There was nothing charming, or graceful in his behaviour; but a ſolid gravity and ſeverity were inſeparable from his manners; whence it was that Plato frequently adviſed him to ſacrifice to the Graces (g). This want of politeneſs ſet off the glory which he had acquired by his auſterity (h). It is not to be wondered that with this dry genius, he ſhould have been ſo ſtrongly inclined to the Mathematics, that he would not admit any ſcholars who were ignorant of that ſcience (i). We ought more to admire that with this great character of rigid ſeverity, he (h) Audivi . . . illum, (Scipionem Naſicam) qui T. Gracchi conatus perditos vindicavit, nullam comitatem habuiſſe ſermonis: ne Xenocratem quidem, ſeveriſſimum philoſophorum, ob eamque rem ipſam & magnum & clarum fuiſſe. - - - - I have heard . . . . that Scipio Naſica, who puniſhed the wicked attempts of Tiberius Gracchus, had no ſort of Politeneſs in his converſation. I have heard the ſame thing of Xenocrates, the ſevereſt of all the Philoſophers, and that for this very reaſon he was eſteemed great and famous. Cicero, de Officiis, lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. m. 120, 121.

(g) Id. ibid. num. 6.

(i) Laërt. ibid. num. 10.

Such is the exact fidelity of this, and ſeveral other writers; they enlarge or curtail facts as they find it convenient, in order to adjuſt them to their own conceits.

Father Abraham cites a paſſage of Themiſtius, where this action of Xenocrates is aſcribed to Xenophanes (26). He ſhould have corrected that miſtake.

[E] He was the ſole perſon whom the magiſtrates of Athens exempted from . . . . an oath.] He could not have a greater honour done him than this. Valerius Maximus is very judicious on this head: ‘Quantum porro honoris Athenis Xenocrati ſapientia pariter ac ſanctitate claro tributum eſt? Qui cum teſtimonium dicere coactus ad aram acceſſiſſet, ut more civitatis juraret, omnia ſe vere retuliſſe; univerſi judices conſurrexerunt, proclamaruntque ne jusjurandum diceret: Quodque ſibimetipſis poſtmodum dicendæ ſententiæ loco remiſſuri non erant, ſinceritati ejus concedendum exiſtimarunt (27). - - - - How great an honour was done at Athens to Xenocrates, a man equally famous for his wiſdom and virtue? Who when he was obliged to give in his evidence, and came up to the altar, in order to confirm what he had ſaid with an oath, as the cuſtom of the city was, all the Judges roſe up, and told him not to ſwear. Thus what they themſelves did not deſire to be excuſed from, when afterwards they gave judgment, they diſpenſed with in him, as thinking it was due to his ſincerity.’ Cicero mentions this in one of his epiſtles to Atticus (28).

[F] A diſcourſe on temperance . . . . made one take an immediate reſolution to renounce voluptuouſneſs, and apply himſelf to wiſdom.] If the ſermon of a Capuchin ſhould at this time cauſe ſuch an alteration, the world would acknowledge it to be a particular operation of the Holy Ghoſt, and admire the influence of Grace, which, according to the Janſeniſts, would be ſelf-efficacious to the higheſt degree; for the perſon who was prevailed upon by this diſcourſe, to change his courſe of life, was not an ordinary voluptuous man, but a ring-leader in that kind, who gloried in his debaucheries: his wife alſo accuſed him before a court of juſtice for neglecting her, and brutally debauching with boys; ſhe brought the indictment againſt him called, Malæ Tractationis. Φυγεῖν δὲ τὸν Πολέμωνα καὶ δίκην κακώσεως, ὑπὸ τῆς γυναικὸς, ὡς μειρακίοις συνόντα. Et in judicium vocatum Polemonem ab uxore nequitiæ inſimulatum, quod adoleſcentibus congrederetur (29). He was not aſhamed to ſhew his exceſſive drunkenneſs in the moſt public place of Athens, being accompanied with a ſinging-woman, and ſeveral players on inſtruments. He was drunk almoſt every time that he appeared in the ſtreets (30), and his leudneſs was not leſs than his drunkenneſs. He went always well provided with money, and even concealed it in ſeveral parts of the city, that he might be ſupplied at all times, and in all places, with ſufficient ſums for his expences, in order to gratify his vicious appetite (31). In ſhort, he was the moſt famous debauchee in Athens. One day when he had drank plentifully, and run, as uſual, through the ſtreets with his cuſtomary equipage, and leud companions (32), he entred the auditory of Xenocrates, with a deſign to ridicule him, and to play ſome inſolent tricks.. When all the audience took offence at his behaviour, Xenocrates was not in the leaſt diſcompoſed (33), but more vigorouſly purſued the diſcourſe which he had begun concerning temperance. Some authors ſay, that he was not treating that ſubject, but leaving that which he was upon, he turned the diſcourſe to this virtue; on which head he ſpoke ſo excellently and gravely, that all of a ſudden he created an affection for modeſty and wiſdom in the mind of this hardened ſinner (34). Polemo, (for that was the name of this drunkard) from that very moment became a diſciple of virtue, and an exact imitator of the gravity of Xenocrates (35), whom he ſucceeded in his profeſſor's chair. He gave over his drinking wine, and drank nothing but water (36). The Latin deſcription of his converſion, which I ſhall tranſcribe here, is pretty enough: ‘Perditæ luxuriæ Athenis adoleſcens Polemo, neque illecebris tantummodo, ſed etiam ipſa infamia gaudens; cum è convivio non poſt occaſum ſolis, ſed poſt ortum ſurrexiſſet, domumque repetens, Xenocratis Philoſophi patentem Januam vidiſſet: vino gravis, unguentis delibutus, ſertis capite redimito, pellucida veſte amictus, refertam turba doctorum hominum ſcholam ejus intravit: Nec contentus tam deformi introitu, conſedit etiam, ut clariſſimum eloquium, & prudentiſſima præcepta temulentiæ laſciviis eluderet. Ortâ deinde, ut par erat, omnium indignatione; Xenocrates vultum in eodem habitu continuit, omiſſiſque de quibus diſſerebat, de modeſtia ac temperantia loqui cœpit. Cujus gravitate ſermonis reſipiſcere coactus Polemo, primum coronam capite detractam projecit, paulò poſt brachium intra pallium reduxit, procedente tempore oris convivalis hilaritatem depoſuit; ad ultimum, totam luxuriam exuit, uniuſque orationis ſaluberrima medicina ſanatus, ex infami ganeone maximus philoſophus evaſit. Peregrinatus eſt hujus animus in nequitia, non habitavit (37). - - - Polemo, a young man at Athens, of a very debauched life, who not only loved pleaſures, but alſo gloried in his wickedneſs, one day, as he was returning home from a feaſt, not at night, but in the morning, ſaw Xenocrates the Philoſopher's door open: upon which, drunk as he was, perfumed, having a garland of flowers on his head, and covered with a very thin robe, he entered his ſchool, which was crowded with learned men: and not contented with ſuch an indecent intruſion, he ſat down on purpoſe to ridicule his eloquence, and his moſt judicious precepts, with the wanton flights of drunkenneſs. While all that were preſent expreſſed a proper indignation at this, Xenocrates alone did not alter his countenance, but, quitting the ſubject he was upon, he began to ſpeak of modeſty and temperance. The gravity of his diſcourſe was ſuch that it wrought a ſudden repentance in Polemo; and firſt he ſtripped off the garland from his head, next he pulled back his arm under his gown, and afterwards he laid aſide the cheerfulneſs of his looks; at laſt he renounced his luxury, and being cured by the wholſome medicine of one diſcourſe, of an infamous rake that he was, he became a very great Philoſopher. This man was a ſojourner in the territories of vice, not an inhabitant.’ To this may be added the following lines of Horace.

. . . . Faciaſne, quod olim
Mutatus Polemon? ponas inſignia morbi
Faſciolas, cubital, focalia: potus ut ille
Dicitur ex collo furtim carpſiſſe coronas,
Poſtquam eſt impranſi correptus voce magiſtri (38).

. . . . . For let me aſk thee this,

(26) See Abraham's Commentary, in Orat. Ciceron. pro Sextio, p. 181.

(27) Valer. Max. lib. ii, cap. ult. in fine. pag. m. 234.

(28) The xvth, of the firſt book. See alſo the ſame author, in Orat. pro Balbo, pag. 657, where he mentions the thing without naming Xenocrates.

(29) Diog. Laërt. Ibid. num. 16.

(30) Lucian, in bis accuſato, pag. m. 321, 323, Tom. ii.

(31) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 16.

(32) Origen. ubi infra.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) Valer. Maxim. ubi infra.

(35) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 17, & ſeq. Origen. contra Celſum, lib. iii, pag. 152.

(36) Athen. lib. ii, cap. vi, pag. 44.

(37) Valer. Maximus, lib. vi, cap. ix, num. 1, in Ext. pag. 581, 582.

(38) Horat. Sat. III, lib. ii, ver. 253.

he had a heart very ſuſceptible of compaſſion, not only towards his neighbour, but alſo towards animals. Of which it is affirmed he gave ſeveral proofs (k), and particularly this: he hid a ſparrow which flung herſelf upon him in her flight from a ſparrow-hawk, and releaſed her when the danger was over (l). He recommended to Polyſperchon a man whom he ſcarce knew, and who proved unworthy of his recommendation; which was the cauſe of his being cautioned to examine the character of people better another time (m). This miſtake ſhews his indulgent nature. He wrote ſeveral books which are loſt (n). He did not want leiſure to write, for he loſt ſcarce any time in viſits: he was very fond of cloſe retirement; he thought much, and was ſeldom ſeen in the ſtreets, and when he appeared there, the debauched youth turned out of the way to avoid meeting him [G]. He was the head of the academy for twenty-five years (o); in the ſecond year of the CXth Olympiad, he had ſucceeded Speuſippus whom Plato had choſen for his ſucceſſor. It is ſurprizing that a Philoſopher of ſo much merit ſhould receive ſuch ill treatment from the Athenians as to be ſold by them, becauſe he could not pay the capitation impoſed upon ſtrangers. Demetrius Phalereus did a very generous action upon that occaſion. He bought Xenocrates, immediately ſet him at liberty, and payed the debt to the Athenians (p) [H]. This Philoſopher's Theology was very contemptible [I], as we ſhall ſee

(k) See Ælian, in lib. xiii. Var. Hiſtor. ch. xxxi, which is intituled, ὅτι Ξενοκράτης φιλοικτίρμων ἦν, quod Xenocrates fuerit miſericors.

(l) Ælian, ibid.

(m) Plut. de vitioſo pudore, pag. 533.

(n) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 11, & ſeq.

(o) Id. ibid. num. 14.

(p) Id. Laërt. ibid.

Canſt thou, like Polemon reclaim'd, remove Thy foppiſh dreſs, thoſe ſymptoms of thy love,
As he, when drunk, with garlands round his head,
Chanc'd once to hear the ſober Stoic read,
Aſham'd, he took his garlands off, began
Another courſe, and grew a ſober man?

CREECH.

Obſerve, that Plutarch aſſures us, that one look of Xenocrates was ſufficient to convert Polemo (39).

[G] He thought much, and was ſeldom ſeen in the ſtreets; and when he appeared there, the debauched youth turned out of the way to avoid meeting him.] Let us cite Diogenes Laërtius: Πολλάκις ἑαυτῷ τῆς ἡμέρας διεμελέτα, καὶ ὥραν μίαν φασὶν ἀπένεμε σιωπῇ. Sæpe interdiu meditationi inſerviebat, atque unam ſilentio diſtribuebat horam (40). The French tranſlator (41) hath rendred theſe Greek words thus: He was ſo well pleaſed with a ſolitary life, that he ſpent the whole day in meditation; but commonly he allowed himſelf but one hour for relaxation. This verſion ſeems to me to be good, tho' he doth not literaly follow the original. The Latin tranſlation is more literal, and leſs judicious; for it diſtinguiſhes betwixt the time when a Philoſopher meditates, and the time when he doth not ſpeak. What a diſtinction is this? Are thoſe who meditate obliged to ſpeak? Are they not commonly in a profound ſilence? But we ſhall ſee another place wherein the French tranſlator is groſsly miſtaken (42). Διῆγέ τε ἐν Ἀκαδεμίᾳ τὰ πλεῖστα· καὶ εἴποτε μέλλοι ἐς ἄστυ ἀνιέναι, φασὶ τοὺς θορυβώδεις πάντας καὶ προυνίκους ὑποστέλλειν αὐτοῦ τῇ παρόδῳ. Vixit autem ut plurimum in Academia. Si quando verò ad urbem profecturus eſſet turbas omnes tumultuoſorum ac impudicorum ipſi tranſituro de via decedere ſolitas, ſunt qui tradant (43). That is, according to Mr Fougerolles, he ſpent the greateſt part of his life in the Academy, without ſcarce ever going out; but if by chance he went thence into the city, it is reported that ſome of the rabble followed him, and diſturbed him with their impudence and clamours. This is perverting the Greek author's thought, and robbing Xenocrates of one of the brighteſt parts of his glory. The debauchees dreaded the ſight of ſuch a venerable man, and durſt not appear before a perſon of ſuch rigid morals. Is not this a great encomium on Xenocrates? Doth it not ſurpaſs what is ſaid of Cato, with reſpect to the Floral Games (44)? Add to this, that paſſage of Plutarch concerning the power of a bare look of this Philoſopher (45), and concerning what engaged the Athenians to depute him into Macedonia (46).

I muſt not forget what Plutarch ſaith, that Xenocrates did not come out of the Academy but once in a year, which he did to honour the feaſt (47), that is, to be preſent at the new tragedies which were acted during the feaſt of Bacchus.

[H] They ſold him .... Demetrius Phalereus bought him .... immediately ſet him at liberty, and paid the debt to the Athenians.] We find all theſe particulars in Diogenes Laërtius (48), and I am ſurprized that Plutarch doth not mention them, ſince he ſpeaks of an adventure ſomewhat like this. 'But we are told that Lycurgus, the Orator, one day ſeeing the farmers and 'receivers of taxes carrying Xenocrates, the Philoſopher, to priſon, for not paying a certain impoſt laid on 'ſtrangers inhabiting the city of Athens, wreſted him 'out of their hands; and beſides, ſo vigorouſly proſecuted them, that he obliged them to pay a fine for 'the injury done to a perſon of his merit; and that 'afterwards, the Philoſopher meeting Lycurgus's 'children in the city, told them: I have rewarded 'your father for the ſervice which he did me, for he 'is extolled every where for what he hath done to 'me (49).' This paſſage of Plutarch cannot prejudice antient Athens, for the ſeverities of the collectors of impoſts are not to be charged on a whole nation. They are a ſort of people who act upon maxims of their own, and ſuch as are not approved of, but rather deteſted: they are inexorable people, who have no regard to parts, virtue, or learning. There is no other way to get out of their hands, than paying down the money. And ſince the action of Lycurgus was applauded, this ſhews that the Athenians in general ought to be cleared upon this occaſion. But as the ſtory is told by Diogenes Laërtius, that nation cannot be acquitted. What! to permit that a Xenocrates, the honour and ornament of the Academy, ſhould be ſo poor as not to be able to pay the tax levied on ſtrangers, is a juſt reaſon of reproach; but to ſuffer him to loſe his liberty, becauſe he was poor to become a ſlave, and to be ſold by auction, like a Cappadocian, is an infamous ſcandal to the Athenians. Was no body ſo generous as to lend or give him the ſmall ſum, which this tax-gatherer demanded? They ſuffered him to run the utmoſt riſk of ſlavery, and to be actually ſold. How could they be ſure that he ſhould not be bought by ſome Slave-merchant, who might ſell him again to a Miller? As good luck would have it, an honeſt man, and a lover of learning, bought him, and ſet him at liberty. But he would have done much better, had he prevented his being ſold, by preſenting him with what would have ſatisfied the collectors. See what has been ſaid upon a parallel caſe (50).

Let us take notice of another paſſage related by Plutarch. 'Phocion .... perceiving that Xenocrates 'paid a certain tribute to the Republic, which was 'paid by all foreign inhabitants of Athens, would 'have procured him the freedom of that city, and en'rolled him amongſt the number of the citizens; but 'Xenocrates refuſed it, ſaying, that he would not have 'any ſhare in that freedom of citizens, to prevent 'which, he had been ſent Ambaſſador (51).' To unſtand this well, you muſt conſult the paſſage which I ſhall cite below (52), relating to the conditions which Antipater impoſed on the Athenians, when Phocion, Xenocrates, and ſome others, were ſent to him as Ambaſſadors from Athens.

[I] This Philoſopher's Theology was very contemptible.] He acknowledged no other gods than the ſeven planets, and the heaven of the fixed ſtars. This made eight Deities; each planet being a god, and all the ſtars together making but one. See how Cicero rejects this doctrine: 'Nec verò ejus (Ariſtotelis) condiſci'pulus Xenocrates in hoc genere prudentior eſt, cujus 'in libris, qui ſunt de naturâ Deorum, nulla ſpecies 'divina deſcribitur. Deos enim octo eſſe dicit: 'quinque eos, qui in ſtellis vagis nominantur: 'unum

(39) Plut. de Diſcrim. Adul. & Amici, p. 71.

(40) Diog. Laert. ubi ſupra, num. 11.

(41) Francis de Fougerolles, Doctor of Phyſic.

(42) His miſtake is the ſame with that of Oliverius, in Valer. Maximum, ubi ſupra, where he ſays, ſi quando ad urbem proficiſcebatur (Xenocrates) turba omnis impudicorum ejus tranſitum obſervabat, ejus inquietandi gratia.

(43) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 6.

(44) See, above, citation (8), of the firſt article FLORA.

(45) See the end of the foregoing remark.

(46) See, the remark [L], citation (67).

(47) Plut. de Exilio, pag. 603.

(48) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 14.

(49) Plut. in Vita Flaminii, pag. 375, 376. He relates the ſame thing in the lives of the ten Orators, p. 842.

(50) Above, in the article TYRANNION, remark [C].

(51) Plut. in Vita Phocion. pag. 755.

(52) In the remark [L], citation (67).

ſee below. He lived to the age of eighty-four, if we believe Lucian (q). Others ſay he died in his eighty-ſecond year, having, through inadvertency, hit his forehead againſt a kettle in the night-time (r). Some authors pretend that he lived one hundred and three years [K]. He had a ſhare in the friendſhip and eſteem of Alexander the Great (s), and at

---

(q) Lucian. in Macrobiis, pag. m. 640, Tom. ii, Oper.

(r) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 14, 15.

(s) See, remark [D].

‘ unum, qui ex omnibus ſideribus, quæ infixa cœlo ſunt, ex diſperſis quaſi membris ſimplex ſit putandus Deus: ſeptimum ſolem adjungit, octavumque lunam, qui quo ſenſu beati eſſe poſſint, intelligi non poteſt (53). - - - Nor was Xenocrates, Ariſtotle's condiſciple, more judicious in this reſpect: In his books of the nature of the gods, there is no account of a divine ſpecies. For he ſays there are eight gods, five of whom inhabit the planets, and bear their names; and one is compoſed of all the fixed ſtars, and is to be reckoned a pure and ſimple god, tho' made up of ſo many diſperſed members. He adds the ſun as the ſeventh, and the moon as the eighth. In what ſenſe theſe gods can be happy, it is impoſſible to underſtand.' This opinion of Xenocrates will be found abſurd, not only if examined by the light of Revelation, but, even compared with the light of Nature; for without the aſſiſtance of the Bible, we conceive diſtinctly, that the idea of GOD is neither that of a ſpecies, nor of a genus, and conſequently cannot comprehend any thing under it but an individual Being. It is therefore acting againſt reaſon, to admit more than one Deity. It is another fault againſt reaſon, to acknowledge any gods compoſed of matter; this neceſſarily ſubjects them to imperfection, limits them with regard to place and power, and, in a word, diſtinguiſhes them from the moſt infirm creatures, barely by the difference of more or leſs. How great was the inconſiſtence of our Philoſopher? How unconſequentially he argues? He would have the moon a diſtinct deity from all the reſt; he ſaid the ſame thing of every planet, but not of each of the fixed ſtars, to which he allowed no other advantage than that of being parts of a Deity. The objection urged againſt him in the Latin paſſage which I have cited, is juſt, tho' perhaps he might have eluded it, by aſſerting that a planet is a god, in the ſame manner as Socrates is a reaſonable creature. He is not reaſonable as compoſed of fleſh and bone, &c. but as poſſeſſed of a ſoul which knows and reaſons. The ſun, for example, is not a deity, conſidered as compoſed of that luminous matter which imparts it's rays and heat to the earth; but as the ſeat of an intelligent power, which moves that vaſt body. What hinders this power from the enjoyment of pleaſure and felicity? This is what he might have anſwered to the objection; but it is a very ill reſolution of the point: for this intelligent power not being numerically the ſame with that of the other planets, will be fixed and centred in the ſun by a natural neceſſity; and conſequently, will depend on the matter of the ſun, and follow it's ſtate and alterations, like thoſe ſlaves called ſerviglebæ, or glebæ aſcriptii; - - - ſlaves who were bought and ſold with the land. We cannot conceive any real happineſs in ſuch a dependance. The doctrine of the ſoul of the world is not ſo repugnant to right reaſon as this is; it doth not divide the Deity into ſeveral individuums really ſeparated from each other.

(53) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xiii.

A Confutation of thoſe, who ſaid that each planet was a god.

Here is, I think, a contradiction in Xenocrates's doctrine. He took the planets to be gods, he therefore ſuppoſed the matter of them to be an eſſential part of the gods; for it would be abſurd to affirm, that Socrates is a man, and that the body of Socrates is not eſſential to that man. But, on the other ſide, Xenocrates admitted a diſtinction betwixt the gods and certain genii, which ſuppoſes that he did not believe matter to be a part of the ſubſtance of the gods. Was this arguing conſiſtently? Let us cite Plutarch, who obſerves (54), that Pythagoras, Plato, Xenocrates, and Chryſippus, according to the opinions of the antient Divines, acknowledged that there were ſome great dæmons, who were neither gods nor men, and who ‘ were ſtronger and more robuſt than men, and highly ſurmounted our nature in power; but had not the pure and unmixed Divinity, but were agents compounded of the corporeal and ſpiritual nature, capable of pleaſure and pain, and of other paſſions and affections which accompany thoſe mutations, diſcompoſing ſome more, others leſs; for there is a diverſity in vice and virtue, amongſt demons, as well as amongſt men . . . . . (55) Plato attributes to the olympic and celeſtial gods whatever is right and odd; and whatever is left and even, to the demons: and Xenocrates held, that the unfortunate days, and feaſts, wherein fighting, ſtriking of the ſtomach, faſting or any ſcandalous or baſe cuſtom obtains, do not appertain to the good gods, or good demons; but that there are in the air ſome great and mighty beings, but malicious and ill-natured, who find ſuch things done on their account pleaſant to them, and when they have obtained them, they ceaſe to do any more evil to the perſons.' A commentator on Cicero, hath made a note on this opinion of Xenocrates. He ſaith that the evil angels may be well pleaſed with the obſcene diſcourſes of men, and that if any thing was capable to appeaſe them, it were thoſe diſcourſes; but that faſts, macerations, and flagellations, with which the penitents labour to expiate their faults, infinitely diſpleaſe thoſe unfortunate genii: Longe fallitur Xenocrates, cùm miſeros illos Genios mortalium planctu, verberibus, jejuniis, aliiſque id genus corporis afflictationibus delectari putat: nihil enim perinde averſantur, atque oderunt, ut voluntaria, & ſancta ejuſmodi ſupplicia, quibus debita flagitiis exolvitur pœna, ac Divinæ Nemeſis placatur. At ſi quo modo leniri poſſent hoſtes crudeliſſimi, non dubium quin malè ominoſis obſcœniſque vocibus, quæ impuriſſimorum Geniorum pollutas ad aures jucundiſſimæ ſemper accidunt, ſinerent ſe mulceri (56). I do not know where the French tranſlator of Diogenes Laërtius took the following words: ‘ Xenocrates . . . . . compared the nature of triangles with that of intelligences: for, ſaid he, the Divine Nature is like an equilateral triangle, the nature of man like a triangle, whoſe ſides are all unequal; and that of demons, like a triangle, with one ſide unequal, and the other two equal (57).'

(54) Plut. de Iſide & Oſiride, pag. 360.

(55) Id. ibid. pag. 361.

(56) Leſcaloperius, in Ciceron, de Nat. Deor. lib. i, pag. 57, col. 1.

(57) Fougerolles, Additions to the life of Xenocrates, in Diogenes Laërtius, pag. 260. Note that he adds, ‘ he calculated the number of ſyllables, which the Greek letters can make by their combinations and tranſpoſitions, which amounts to 100200000, I do not know where the tranſlator had read this.

I omit Xenocrates's aſſertion, that the ſoul is a ſelf-moving number (58). Several illuſtrious perſons approved of this definition (59); but I cannot tell whether we can any way underſtand it at this time: for, I believe, the Greeks annexed to the word ἀριθμὸς, an idea which we do not fix to the word number; and that from thence may ariſe the obſcurity which we find in this definition of the ſoul.

Let us obſerve that the Dominican Doctor who wrote a letter to Father le Comte, concerning the Chineſe ceremonies, was not well informed of the doctrine of Xenocrates; for after having ſpoken of the Philoſophers who admitted no more than one GOD, whom they acknowledged to be the principle and author of all beings, a ſpirit diffuſed throughout, who governed all things . . . . A pure ſpirit, the love and enjoyment of which rendred man happy; he adds, that ‘ Xenocrates, Heraclides, and Theophraſtus, Ariſtotle's diſciples, had the ſame ſentiments of the Deity (60).' And yet theſe are the three Philoſophers whom Cicero ranks together (61), when he refutes the erroneous opinions concerning the nature of GOD. I would fain know why they are all three put together as orthodox in this Doctor's letter. Remember that the two former were not Ariſtotle's diſciples.

(58) Plut. de procreat. Animæ, p. 1012.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Lettre d'un Docteur de l'Ordre de S. Dominique, ſur les Cérémonies Chinoiſes, p. 17. Cologne, 1700.

(61) Cicero, ubi ſupra.

[K] . . . . pretend that he lived one hundred and three years.] Meurſius maintained this opinion. His reaſons are theſe: Xenocrates was born in the firſt year of XCIſt Olympiad. He began to teach in the ſecond year of the CXth Olympiad, and taught twenty-five years; he muſt therefore have died in the ſecond year of the CXVIth Olympiad, at the age of one hundred and two (62). This is Meurſius's concluſion in the ninth chapter of the third book of the Athenian Archontes. But in the twelfth chapter of the fourth book, he computes his life at one hundred and three years, and founds his calculation on the ſame facts. He is in the right to conclude, that Xenocrates died in third year of the CXVIth Olympiad, and reckons better than he did before; but betwixt that year and the firſt of the XCIſt Olympiad, he ought to have found at his requeſt wrote a treatiſe of the art of reigning (t). He was ſent Ambaſſador more than once [L]. It muſt not be forgotten, that, according to his opinion, the true Philoſophers are the only perſons who do chearfully, and of their own accord, what others are moved to do by the fear of the Laws (u), and that caſting an eye on one's neighbour's houſe, is as great a ſin as ſetting foot into it (x). This laſt thought condemns the coveting of another's goods, and a prying humour. He had a good maxim for the education of children [M]. He is praiſed for not being diſcouraged in the courſe of his ſtudies by the ſlowneſs of his capacity [N].

(62) Meurſius, de Arch. Athen. lib. iii, cap. ix, pag. 113, 114.

found no more than one hundred and two years. Let us come to the main point. I think we ought not to rely, as he hath done, on the authority of the anonymous author, who deſcribed the Olympiads, and placed the birth of Xenocrates in the firſt year of the XCIſt Olympiad. I have two reaſons for believing that he is miſtaken. The firſt is, that Xenocrates was very young when he became Plato's diſciple (63). But Plato being advanced in years when he began to teach, it could not be poſſible for Xenocrates to enter his ſchool very young, if he was born in the firſt year of the XCIſt Olympiad, for he would not have been above twelve years younger than Plato. In the ſecond place, I obſerve that he was deputed to Antipater, in the ſecond year of the CXIVth Olympiad (64): at that time he muſt have been ninety-three years of age, according to the computation of the anonymous author. But it is not eaſy to imagine, that the authors who mentioned this embaſſy, ſhould have taken no notice of the extraordinary age of the Ambaſſador.

[L] He was ſent Ambaſſador more than once.] I have already ſaid (65), that he was one of the Ambaſſadors whom the Republic of Athens ſent to King Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. 'Being alſo ſent on an embaſſy to Antipater, for the deliverance of the priſoners of war taken at the battle of Lamia, he was by that Prince invited to ſupper, to whom he anſwered in the following words:

O Circe *, _thy allurements tempt in vain_
The man whoſe virtue prudent thoughts ſuſtain;
For who can come with pleaſure to a feaſt,
Before he ſee his captive friends releas'd.

'Intimating by theſe words, that he would never eat till he obtained his requeſt, meaning the liberty of his captive citizens and friends. The King perceiving the addreſs of the man, freely condeſcended to his ſuit, and immediately ſet the priſoners free (66).' Antipater was not ſo juſt in the following juncture. He exacted from the Athenians that they ſhould ſend him full power to act as he ſhould think fit, and refer the conditions of the treaty of peace to his pleaſure. 'They ſent to him Phocion, with other Ambaſſadors, and amongſt the reſt Xenocrates the Philoſopher, whoſe reputation for prudence and wiſdom was ſo great and univerſal, that they ſaid, no man could be ſo arrogant, ſo cruel, or paſſionate, but that the mien and aſpect of Xenocrates would ſoften him, and even inſpire him with reverence and reſpect. Notwithſtanding this, ſuch was the malignity of the nature of Antipater, who was an enemy to virtue, that the contrary happened: for at firſt when he embraced all the reſt of his companions, he paſſed by Xenocrates, not vouchſafing to take any notice of him: upon this occaſion Xenocrates ſaid, Antipater may well be aſhamed to ſee me a witneſs of the ill-uſage he would give the Athenians. Afterwards when he began to ſpeak, Antipater had not patience to hear him, but thwarted and interrupted him on every ſubject, and at laſt enjoined him ſilence: but when Phocion had declared the purport of their embaſſy, he replied, that he would make a peace and alliance with the Athenians, provided they would deliver up to him Demoſthenes and Hyperides, and govern their Republic, according to the antient form of government inſtituted by their anceſtors; according to which, none but people of fortune were admitted into public employments, &c. . . . All the Ambaſſadors, except Xenocrates, were content with, and accepted, theſe conditions as mild and indulgent, but Xenocrates ſaid, that if the Athenians were ſlaves, Antipater treated them mildly enough; but if a free people he treated them too harſhly (67).'

Some will think, perhaps, that Antipater uſed Xenocrates ſo roughly, in order to revenge the incivility with which this Philoſopher had received him. We are told (68), that going to Athens he made a viſit to Xenocrates, who would not vouchſafe to interrupt his lecture, and made him no anſwer before he had finiſhed it. But as every body knew that this Philoſopher affected not to appear a courtier, and that the eſteem which the world had for him was founded on his Philoſophical gravity, it is not at all probable that Antipater ſhould have taken it amiſs that he was received in ſuch a manner.

[M] He had a good maxim for the education of children.] 'He was of opinion, that children rather ought to have a defence fitted to their ears, than fencers, or prize-fighters; becauſe the ears only of the latter ſuffered by the blows, but the morals of the former were hurt and corrupted by words. Not that he thereby recommended deafneſs, or forbad that they ſhould be ſuffered to hear at all; but he adviſed them not to liſten to wicked diſcourſe, that debauchery might be kept out, till better principles (like ſo many guardians appointed by Philoſophy) had taken charge of that part, which is ſo liable to be drawn aſide and corrupted by diſcourſe (69).' Plutarch greatly approves of this advice (70).

[N] He is praiſed for not being diſcouraged in the courſe of his ſtudies by the ſlowneſs of his capacity.] Plutarch made uſe of this example to encourage thoſe of ſlow parts. 'Let us bear with patience the jeſts of thoſe who are, or who fancy they are, more lively and quick of apprehenſion than we. This courſe was taken by Cleanthes and Xenocrates, who being ſomewhat duller than their ſchool-fellows, did not however give over learning nor deſpond; but prevented the jeſts of others, by comparing themſelves to narrow-mouthed veſſels and copper-plates; becauſe, though they received learning with difficulty, yet they retained it ſurely (71).' One of theſe two compariſons hath been employed in one of Moliere's Comedies (72).

(t) Plut. adv. Colot. circa fin. pag. 1126.

(u) Plut. de Virtute morali, pag. 446.

(x) Plut. de Curioſit. pag. 521. See alſo Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. xiv, cap. xlii.

(63) Ἐκ νέȣ Πλάτωνος ἤκȣσε. A primis ferme annis Platonis auditor fuit. Diogen. Laërt. lib. iv, num. vi.

(64) See the following remark.

(65) In remark [D].

* Some verſes of Homer in the xth book of the Odyſſey.

(66) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 9, 10.

(67) Plut. in Vita Phocion. pag. 753.

(68) Diog. Laert. ubi ſupra, num. 11.

(69) Plut. de auditione, init. pag. 38.

(70) Compare with this what is above in remark [G], of the article LYCURGUS.

(71) Plut. de auditione, pag. 47.

(72) See, above, remark [E], of the article ERASMUS.

XENOPHANES, a Greek Philoſopher, born at Colophon, was a diſciple of Archelaus, as ſome ſay (a). According to this account, he ſhould have been cotemporary with Socrates (b). Others will have it that he learned of himſelf all that he knew (c), and lived at the ſame time with Anaximander (d). According to this account, he muſt have flouriſhed before Socrates, and about the LXth Olympiad, as Diogenes Laërtius affirms (e). He lived very long; for ſome verſes are cited in which he declares, 1. That his ſtudies had been applauded in Greece ſixty-ſeven years: 2. That he began to meet with applauſe at the age of twenty-five (f) [A]. He wrote ſeveral poems on Philoſophical

[A] He lived very long; for ſome verſes are cited, &c.] It appears by thoſe verſes that he was ninety-two years old when he made them; and as we have no reaſon for believing that he died in a ſhort time after, we may hence the more certainly know the error of Lucian, who allows him to have lived no longer than ninety-one years (1). Cenſorinus beſtows on him above one hundred years (2). Scaliger is inclined

---

(a) Diogen. Laërtius, lib. ix, num. 18.

(b) He was a diſciple of Archelaus.

(c) Diog. Laert. ubi ſupra.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid. num. 20. See remark [A].

(f) Laërtius, ibid. num. 19.

(1) Lucianus, in Macrobiis, pag. m. 640, Tom. ii, Oper.

(2) See Scaliger, in Euſeb. pag. m. 96.

Philoſophical ſubjects: beſides two thouſand on the foundation of Colophon (g), and on that of the Colony of Elea (h). His opinion concerning the nature of God, is very little different from Spinoziſm [B]. He wrote ſome verſes againſt Homer and Heſiod (i), on the idle ſtories which they ſung of the gods. He held a maxim which entirely overturned clined to believe that he lived at leaſt one hundred and four years (3). From this long life we may reconcile thoſe who make him flouriſh in the LVIth Olympiad (4), or the LXth (5); and thoſe who place him under the XLth Olympiad (6); for we may ſuppoſe that the latter do not point out the time when he flouriſhed, but that of his birth. Obſerve, that even on this ſuppoſition, it is not poſſible to reconcile them with thoſe, who tell us that he lived till the time when the Perſians were driven out of Greece. We have ſtill ſome verſes where it is pretended that he mentions their flight. Athenæus quotes them (7). If you underſtand by this the time when they loſt the battle of Marathon, it was in the LXXIId Olympiad. If you underſtand the battle of Salamis, or that of Platæa, it was the LXXVth Olympiad. Suppoſe in the next place, not with Caſaubon, that he made theſe verſes fifteen or twenty years after the defeat of the Perſians (8), but the very year of that great event, and you will find it impoſſible for him to have been born in the XLth Olympiad, ſince in that caſe it muſt be ſaid that he lived at leaſt 126 years. What ſhall we then think of a paſſage of Clemens Alexandrinus, which informs us that he was born in the XLth Olympiad, and lived to the time of Darius? Τῆς Ελεατικῆς ἀγωγῆς, Ξενοφάνης ὁ Κολοφώνιος κατάρχει. ὅν φησι Τίμαιος κατὰ Ἱέρωνα τὸν Σικελίας δυνάστην, καὶ Επίχαρμον τὸν ποιητὴν, γεγονέναι. Απολλόδωρος δὲ, κατὰ τὴν τεσσαρακοστὴν Ολυμπιάδα γενόμενον, παρατετακέναι ἄχει τῶν Δαρείου τε καὶ Κύρου χρόνων: Eleaticæ diſciplinæ princeps fuit Xenophanes Colophonius, quem dicit Timæus fuiſſe tempore Hieronis, qui in Sicilia obtinuit dominatum, & Epicharmi Poetæ. Apollodorus autem eum, cùm natus eſſet quadrageſimâ Olympiade, perveniſſe uſque ad tempora Darii & Cyri (9). - - - Xenophanes of Colophon was the head of the Eleatic Philoſophy: Timæus affirms, that he lived in the time of Hiero, who reigned in Sicily, and of the Poet Epicharmus. But Apollodorus ſays that he was born in the XLth Olympiad, and lived down to the times of Darius and Cyrus. Muſt we believe that an error crept into the Greek text, and that inſtead of Δαρείου we ought to read Κροίσου? My anſwer is, there is no neceſſity to ſuppoſe it. For a life of one hundred years, which is allowed to Xenophanes, is ſufficient to fill up the ſpace betwixt the XLth Olympiad and the LXVth, which was the beginning of Darius's reign. I do not deny that it is a little ſtrange to ſee, that ſo good an author as Apollodorus, ſhould ſay that Xenophanes lived to the time of Darius and Cyrus. It would have been much more regular to have ſaid to the time of Cyrus and Darius, as Mr Menage obſerves (10). Beſides, it is certain that in pointing out the times, the Antients uſually joined Crœſus and Cyrus together, which ſerves to ſupport the correction I have mentioned; but at the bottom there is neither any abſurdity nor any falſity in Apollodorus's opinion, that Xenophanes lived from the XLth Olympiad till the time of Darius. Yet I ſhould rather chooſe to place his birth much lower, ſince, according to Timæus (11), he flouriſhed in the time of Hiero, who did not begin to reign before the LXXVIth Olympiad. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that I take their opinion to be ill founded, who ſay that he was a Diſciple of Archelaus. This is Lucian's opinion (12).

(g) Idem, ibid. num. 20. Note, that Moreri reduces all the verſes of Xenophanes to that number. Athenæus often quotes verſes of that Philoſopher. (h) A town in Italy. (i) Diog. Laërtius, ibid. num. 18. See Sext. Empiricus adv. Math. pag. 57, 341.

[B] His opinion concerning the nature of God, is very little different from Spinoziſm.] If we had all his works, we ſhould be much better able to give a preciſe and diſtinct account of his ſyſtem: and if we knew his opinions only by ſome ſmall and very obſcure fragments cited by Cicero, it were impoſſible to avoid confuſion: ‘ Xenophanes qui mente adjuncta ‘ omne præterea quod eſſet infinitum Deum voluit eſſe, ‘ de ipſa mente item reprehenditur ut cæteri: de infi‘nitate autem vehementius, in qua nihil neque ſentiens ‘ neque conjunctum eſſe poteſt (13). - - - - Xenophanes, ‘ who was of opinion that God is all that is infinite united ‘ with a mind, is likewiſe refuted with the reſt, as to that ‘ mind. But he is yet more abſurd with regard to infinity, ‘ in which there can be nothing that has any ſenſation or con‘junction.’ Theſe words of Cicero ſhew that Xenophanes taught that the intellect is God, and that all that is infinite is God. As for the firſt part of this doctrine, Cicero forbears the repetition of what he had ſaid before to refute thoſe who held the Divinity of the intellect; he ſuppoſes that the ſame refutation falls alſo upon this firſt point of the opinion of Xenophanes. With regard to the ſecond part, he advances what he thinks capable of refuting it; for he obſerves, that infinity, as it contains nothing that has any ſenſation or conjunction, cannot be God. I ſhall not examine the weak ſide of this argument, it being wholly unneceſſary: Every body will clearly apprehend that ſince there is ſomething cogitative, connected with finite extenſion, as in man, ſuch things alſo are not incompatible with an infinite extent. I might eaſily believe that Cicero did not apprehend the opinion he mentions; he divides it into two parts, when perhaps it ought not to be divided. It is more probable that Xenophanes meant, that God was nothing but the infinity of nature, accompanied with an intellect. ‘ Xenophanem notum eſt om‘ne infinitum cum mente, Deum tradere (14). - - - - ‘ It is known that Xenophanes affirmed that God was all ‘ that is infinite, accompanied with a mind.’ It would be a very ſtrange doctrine to aſſert, on one hand, that every infinite is God; and, on the other, that the human intellect is God: this would be multiplying the Deity in a diſcordant manner, and erring inconſiſtently. I very well know that the antient Philoſophers do not appear to us exact, in the fragments we have of their opinions concerning the principles of all things: but what particularly obliges me to believe that Xenophanes did not make that diviſion aſcribed to him, is, that even according to the teſtimony of Cicero, he taught that there was but one ſole Being, and that this Being was immutable, eternal, and the true God: (15) Xenophanes paulo etiam antiquior unum eſſe omnia, neque id eſſe mutabile & id eſſe verum Deum, neque natum uſquam quicquam & ſempiternum conglobata figura (16). This is more diſtinct than what Ariſtotle relates of Xenophanes's opinion. Ξενοφάνης δὲ πρῶτος τούτων ἑνίσας (ὁ γὰρ Παρμενίδης τούτου λέγεται μαθητὴς) οὐδὲν διεσαφήνισεν, οὐδὲ τῆς φύσεως τούτων οὐδετέρας ἔοικε θίγειν. ἀλλ᾽ εἰς τὸν ὅλον οὐρανὸν ἀποβλέψας, τὸ ἓν εἶναί φησι τὸν θεόν. Xenophanes autem, quanquam prior iſtis, unum poſuerat, (nam Parmenides ejus auditor fuiſſe dicitur) nihil tamen clarum dixit, & neutrius horum naturam attigiſſe videtur: ſed ad totum cœlum reſpiciens, ipſum unum ait eſſe Deum (17). Theſe words of Ariſtotle inform us, that Xenophanes took up with confuſed notions, and that he did not examine in particular whether unity belonged to the Deity, with reſpect to the intellect, or with reſpect to matter, and that he aſſerted in general, what is One is God. Others ſay he maintained that nature had no beginning, and ſhall have no end, and that ſhe is always like her ſelf; but that he ſpoke of the gods in the plural number. Οὔτε γένεσιν, οὔτε φθορὰν ἀπολείπει· ἀλλ᾽ εἶναι λέγει τὸ πᾶν ἀεὶ ὅμοιον. Nullum penitus vel ortum vel interitum relinquit, ſui ſemper ſimile hoc univerſum eſſe ratus (18). It is true he rejected the common opinion, that the gods ſtood in need of, and gave commands to one another (19). Dependance ſeemed to him incompatible with the Divine Nature. He added, that the gods ſaw and heard in general, but not particularly this or that thing. Thus I would underſtand theſe words of Euſebius, ἀκούειν δὲ καὶ ὁρᾷν καθόλου καὶ μὴ κατὰ μέρος, in univerſum audire ac cernere, non verò per partes (20). This ſavours of Spinoziſm; for Spinoza affirmed that God, as a ſubſtance, is barely endued with thought in general, and that the particular knowledge of every object does not unite in one ſole mind, in order to repreſent all things to the ſubſtance of God. I own it may be pretended that Xenophanes

(3) Scaliger, ibid.

(4) Euſeb. in Chron. pag. m. 127.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 128. Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 20.

(6) Sext. Empir. adverſ. Mathem. pag. 51.

(7) Athen. lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. 54.

(8) Caſaub. in Athen. pag. 110.

(9) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. i, p. 301, C.

(10) Menag. in Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 20.

(11) See, above, citat. (9).

(12) Lucian. ubi ſupra.

(13) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xi.

(14) Theſe words of Minucius Felix, pag. m. 151, favour my opinion. Some Philoſophers deprived God of an intellect. See the article SPINOZA, remark [A].

(15) Cicero, Academic. Quæſtion. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(16) Conſult Sextus Empericus, Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. i, cap. xxxiii.

(17) Ariſtoteles, Metaphyſ. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 648, E. Note, that another tract of Ariſtotle, which I quote in the remark [K], informs us much better of the whole ſyſtem of Xenophanes.

(18) Euſeb. de Præparat. Evangel. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 23, ex Plutarchi Stromatis.

(19) Euſeb. ibid.

(20) Ibid.

turned the Pagan religion; viz. that it is not leſs impious to aſſert that the gods were born than to affirm that they die, ſince in either caſe it would be equally true that their exiſtence is not eternal (k). This maxim is very true and not at all contrary to the doctrine nophanes meant, that by a ſingle act of the mind God ſees all things, and not every one of them by a particular idea. He might explain himſelf if he was to return into the world: he would not be a little puzzled to remove the difficulties propoſed to him concerning his contradictions, and inconſiſtencies. He admitted an infinity of invariable worlds, and four elements of all things (21). But to what purpoſe is this infinity of worlds, ſince he taught that all things were but one being, and that this ſole and only being was God? Was not this ſpeaking of the world, like the people who call America the new world, and who give the name of world to mankind, and in France even to a great Lord's footmen, &c (22). He aſſerted that God was of a round figure, and yet made him infinite (23). He ſaid that God did not in any thing reſemble man, and that he heard and ſaw all things without reſpiration (24). A fine exception indeed! Was it neceſſary to expreſs it? If the Deity hath nothing common with men, is it not evident, that he has no lungs and doth not breathe? Why did he not alſo at the ſame time except the eyes, the ears, and the face, &c. as well as the act of reſpiration? Xenophanes ſpoke more properly in the verſes which Clemens Alexandrinus cites (25), for he ſaid no more there than that God is not like man either in body or ſoul; and that if brutes could paint, they would repreſent the Deity in the ſhape of their own ſpecies. He continually returned to his unity. Σύμπαντά τε εἶναι, νȣ̃ν καὶ φρόνησεν, καὶ ἀΐδιον, ſimulque (Deum) eſſe OMNIA, mentem, prudentiam, æternitatem (26). That God is ALL, a mind, prudence, eternity. The whole Eleatic ſect alſo believed the unity of all things (27), and the immobility of all things (28). And perhaps I ſhould not be miſtaken, if I ſhould venture to ſay, that from thence aroſe the doctrine ſo much extolled by the Sceptics, I mean, that our ſenſes deceive us, and that we ought not to rely on their evidence. For when it was objected againſt thoſe Philoſophers that new generations continually happen in the world; which ſuppoſes that there are two principles, one active and the other paſſive, or at leaſt that the ſole ſubſtance of nature is not immutable; they found no better expedient to ſolve this difficulty, than to deny that there was any generation. They were therefore obliged to aſſert, that nature continues always the ſame, and that the alterations which we believe ſhe undergoes are nothing but meer illuſions of our ſenſes, and meer appearances. Euſebius informs us that Parmenides taught, that the univerſe being eternal and immovable, and one ſole being, remained always the ſame with regard to the reality of things, and that the generations were only founded on a falſe judgment of the ſenſes (29): Ἀΐδιον μὲν γὰρ τὸ ϖᾶν, καὶ ἀκίνητον ἀποφαίνεται, καὶ κατὰ τὴν τῶν ϖραγμάτων ἀλήθειαν. εἶναι γὰρ αὐτὸ μόνον. μȣνογενές τε καὶ ἀτρεμὲς, ἠδ᾽ ἀγένητον. γένεσιν δὲ τῶν καθ᾽ ὑπόληψιν ψευδῆ δοκȣ́ντων εἶναι. καὶ τὰς αἰσθήσεις ἐκβάλλει ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας. Etenim ſempiternum eſſe orbem hunc univerſum, omnique motu carere; ipſiuſque naturæ veritatem omnino conſtare defendit (30); ſingularem enim illum & unigenam, ſtabilem ac quietum, nec certo aliquo tempore generatum eſſe: Generationem porro ad ea rejicit, quæ falſa quadam opinione putentur eſſe, adeoque ſenſus omnes communione veritatis excludit. Let us alſo conſult the ſame Euſebius, if we would ſee thoſe Philoſophers driven from this ſubterfuge. Ariſtotle clearly evinced to theſe defenders of immutability, or ingenerability, that the refuge which they had choſen betrayed them; for ſince they durſt not deny the mutation of appearances, that is, that we do feel the earth at one time cold, and hot at another, it follows that nature is not immovable; and that ſhe muſt of neceſſity change in the ſubject which produces, or receives our ſenſations. Perception is paſſive, and therefore the alteration of it ſuppoſes an efficient cauſe and a paſſive principle: and thus your unity of all things is overturned. Beſides, this alteration is incompatible with your pretended immobility, or incorruptibility. Ὥςε ϖρῶτον εἴη ἂν τὸ λεγόμενον ἕτερον. . . . . ἔπειτα δὲ ἓν τὸ ὂν ȣ̓κ ἔςαι καὶ μὴν ȣ̓δὲ ἀκίνητον. ἡ γὰρ αἴσθησίς ἐςι κίνησις. Habemus ergo primum id eſſe, quod diverſum vocatur . . . . deinde quicquid eſt, non eſſe, quid unum. Adde ne immobile quidem illud eſſe, cum ipſa ſentiendi ratio motus quidam ſit (31). I ſhall return again to this ſubject in the remark [K].

(k) Οἷον Ξενοφάνης ἔλεγεν ὅτι ὁμοίως ἀσεβȣ̃σιν οἱ γενέσθαι φασκοντες τȣ̀ς θεȣ̀ς τοῖς ἀποθανεῖν λέγȣσιν. ἀμφοτέρως γὰρ συμβαίνει μὴ εἶναι ϖοτε τȣ̀ς θεȣ́ς. Ut Xenophanes dicebat ſimiliter eſſe impios qui naſci affirmant Deos, & qui mori dicunt. Utroque enim modo contingit, ut non ſint aliquando Dii. Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. 446, B.

I ſhall obſerve by the way that there is a great deal of probability that the author of the Art of Thinking cenſures Ariſtotle unjuſtly in favour of Parmenides. 'It were to be wiſhed, ſaith he (32), that Ariſtotle, who took care to acquaint us of this ſophiſm (33), had taken as great care to avoid it. For it is too evident that he hath attacked ſeveral antient Philoſophers, by citing their opinions not very fairly. He refutes Parmenides and Meliſſus, for having admitted but one principle of all things, as if they had meant the principle of which they are compoſed, whereas they meant, the ſole and only principle from which all things derive their original, which is GOD.' The author of the Art of Thinking does Parmenides and Meliſſus more honour than they deſerve. He repreſents their opinions concerning the origin of created beings as orthodox; and yet they are as impious as thoſe of Spinoza, or very nearly ſo: theſe Philoſophers acknowledged no difference betwixt the principle of which all things are compoſed, and that which produced them. They admitted but one ſole Being, and pretended that all things were eternal. This is what is imputed to them in Euſebius, as we have ſeen above. Ariſtotle doth not charge them with all this in every reſpect: he owns that Permenides teaching on one ſide that in reality there is but one Being; and, on the other ſide, that according to appearance, there are ſeveral Beings, accommodated himſelf to appearance, and ſuppoſed two other principles, which are heat and cold, fire and earth: Ἀναγκαζόμενος δ᾽ ἀκολȣθεῖν τοῖς φαινομένοις, καὶ τὸ ἓν μὲν κατὰ λόγον, ϖλείω δὲ κατὰ τὴν αἴσθησιν ὑπολαμβάνων εἶναι, δύο τὰς αἰτίας, καὶ δύο τὰς ἀρχὰς τίθησι ϖάλιν, θερμὸν καὶ ψυχρὸν, οἷον ϖῦρ καὶ γῆν λέγων. Τȣ́των δὲ τὸ μὲν, &c. Coactus vero illa, quæ apparent, ſequi, & unum ratione, plura verò ſecundum ſenſum putans eſſe, duas cauſas rurſum, ac duo principia ponit, calidum, & frigidum, velut ignem & terram dicens. Horum autem alterum, &c (34). It is hard to apprehend by what turn of thought, ſuch a great number of the antient Philoſophers could believe that there is but one ſubſtance in the univerſe (35). But it is very eaſy to apprehend that this being granted, they were then obliged to aſſert that the univerſe perpetually continues in the ſame ſtate: for a being which neceſſarily exiſts, and which alone is all things, muſt of neceſſity be perfectly immovable. No external cauſe can change it, nor can it alter itſelf. It hath, independently on it's own will, both it's exiſtence and all the attributes of it's nature. Whatever it hath once, it ought to poſſeſs continually; for what had no beginning is not liable to deſtruction. This alſo proves that it cannot acquire any thing new, ſince the production of one new quality would be the deſtruction of ſome other (36). Thus far the ſyſtem of Xenophanes and Parmenides was well ſupported. But as experience convinced them that changes do happen in nature, ſuch as muſt be internal and effectual with regard to our thoughts, even tho' ſuch changes were ſuppoſed to be meer illuſions of the ſenſes, theſe Philoſophers ſhould have acknowledged that they had built upon a falſe ſuppoſition, and ſhould have admitted two principles, one active and the other paſſive. This being granted, we may believe that the active principle remains always in the ſame ſtate amidſt the continual variations of nature (37). It's uniform and invariable action impreſſed on different ſubjects, muſt neceſſarily produce all the viciſſitudes in the world. Do not we ſee that the motion of the air, without altering in itſelf, produces different effects,

(21) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 19.

(22) See Furetiere's Dictionary at the word Monde.

(23) Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. v, pag. 601, & ex eo Euſebius, ubi ſupra, lib. xiii, cap. xiii, gap. 678, 679.

(26) Laërt. ubi ſupra. See alſo Euſebius, ibid. lib. xiv, cap. xiv, p. 725, B.

(27 Euſeb. ibid.

(28) Idem, lib. xiv, cap. xvii.

(29) Euſebius, ubi ſupra, lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 23. C, ex Plutarcho.

(30) This paſſage ſeems to be ill tranſlated: I had rather ſay: motu carere ſecundum rerum veritatem, or ſecundum id quod revera eſt: and perhaps καὶ after ἀποφαίνεται, ſhould be left out, ſince it is certain the author means that motion does not really exiſt, but only according to appearance or the deluſion of the ſenſes.

(31) Euſeb. de ubi ſupra, lib. xiv, cap. xvii, pag. 756, D. ex lib. viii, Ariſtotelis de Philoſophia.

(32) Art. de penſer, Part. iii, ch. xviii, pag. m. 316.

(33) That is, the ſophiſm called ignoratio elenchi, to prove a different thing from that in queſtion.

(34) Ariſtoteles, Metaphyſicæ, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 648. F. See alſo cap. iii.

(35) I think they were led into ſuch an opinion by this ſuppoſition, that ſince nothing can be produced out of nothing, whatever exiſts has a neceſſary exiſtence, and is therefore eternal and infinite, and that infinite can be but one.

(36) From hence we may draw a ſtrong proof that our ſouls and matter are not uncreated beings. See the remark [K].

(37) Stabiliſque manens dat cuncta moveri. Boët, Conſolat. Philoſ. lib. iii, Metro ix.

doctrine of the Incarnation. He believed that the Moon is an inhabited country [C], and that it is impoſſible to predict future events (l); and if the conjecture of a learned Critic is well grounded, he aſſerted that there is in nature more good than evil [D]. He would effects, according as it meets with a wind-mill, a ſhip, ſcattered ſtraw, or a heap of leaves, &c?

[C] He believed that the Moon is an inhabited country.] Cicero informs us of this; and he is not the only author, who aſcribes this opinion to him. ‘Habitari ait Xenophanes in Luna, eamque eſſe terram multarum urbium & montium (38). --- Xenophanes ſays that the moon is inhabited, and a country having ſeveral towns and mountains in it.’ Lactantius greatly ridicules this opinion, and repreſents Xenophanes believing, not that the ſurface of the moon was inhabited, but that it contained within it's boſom an earth, peopled with a race of men. He juſtly blames him for having aſſerted that this planet is eighteen times bigger than the earth: ‘Xenophanes dicentibus mathematicis orbem lunæ duodeviginti partibus majorem eſſe, quam terram, ſtultiſſime credidit: & quod huic levitati fuit conſentaneum, dixit, intra concavum lunæ ſinum eſſe aliam terram, & ibi aliud genus hominum ſimili modo vivere, quo nos in hac terra vivimus. Habent igitur illi lunatici homines alteram lunam, quæ illis nocturnum lumen exhibeat, ſicut hæc exhibet nobis. Et fortaſſe noſter hic orbis alterius inferioris terræ luna ſit (39). ---- Xenophanes was fooliſh enough to believe the Mathematicians, when they ſaid that the moon's orb is eighteen times greater than the earth: and, what was conſiſtent with this credulity, he ſaid that the moon contained in it's boſom another earth, inhabited by a race of men, who live in the ſame manner, as we do here. So theſe men in the moon have another moon to enlighten them in the night, as theirs enlightens us, and, perhaps, this globe of ours is a moon to that other earth.’ I would not engage that he has rightly underſtood this Philoſopher's opinion; but ſeveral very great men of theſe latter ages would laugh at him for making a jeſt of it. This opinion of Xenophanes does him honour: it is the opinion of ſeveral famous Mathematicians. See what Dr Wilkins, Biſhop of Cheſter (40), ſaith on this head. His treatiſe of the World in the Moon was tranſlated into French, by the Sieur de la Montagne, and printed at Rouën, in the year 1656, in 8vo. See alſo Mr Huygen's Coſmotheoros. Mr Baſnage de Bauval gave us an extract of it in his Journal for the month of May 1698. For the reſt, the opinions of Xenophanes, concerning the motion of the ſun and moon, and concerning the cauſe of eclipſes, are very pitiful. He ſays that ‘the ſun is eclipſed, by being extinguiſhed, and that it recovers it's light next morning when it riſes: he gives an account of an eclipſe of the ſun, which continued for a whole month, and alſo of a total eclipſe ſo that the day ſeemed to be night . . . that there are ſeveral ſuns and ſeveral moons, according to the various climates of the earth, and at a certain time the orb of the ſun falls upon ſome part of the world which is not inhabited; and thus moving as in a vacuum, it undergoes an eclipſe. The ſame perſon affirms, that the ſun moves ſtrait forward in infinitum, but appears to us to move orbicularly by reaſon of it's great diſtance (41).’

[D] He aſſerted that there is in nature more good than evil.] Diogenes Laërtius reckons among the chief opinions of Xenophanes τὰ πολλὰ ἥττω νοῦ εἶναι, that moſt things are worſe than, or inferior to, the mind (42). It ſeems unworthy of a Philoſopher to ſpeak thus; for the meaneſt peaſant knows very well, and no body needs be taught, that the mind of man is better than metals, water, or air, &c. We therefore ought to believe that Xenophanes meant ſomething greater. The following is the conjecture of Meric Caſaubon. He pretends that this Philoſopher taught that the Divine mind, which made the world, endeavoured to endow all creatures with a ſtate of perfection; but that having met with ſtrong obſtacles in matter, he could not always compaſs his deſigns; and therefore, on ſome occaſions, he was forced to produce evil things (43). This is ſaying, that in this conflict he was ſometimes vanquiſhed, but oftener vanquiſher; that the greateſt part of things were ſubmitted to the deſires and power of the Divine mind, and conſequently ἥττω νοῦ εἶναι, doth not mean worſe than the mind, but ſubjected to it, and the matter of it's triumph. Caſaubon confirms his conjecture by a paſſage in Plato, where it is ſaid, that neceſſity and the mind concurred in the production of the world, and that neceſſity was perſuaded to conſent that things for the moſt part ſhould be governed for the beſt (44). Μεμιγμένη γὰρ οὖν ἡ τοῦδε κόσμου τοῦ γένεσις, ἐξ ἀνάγκης τε καὶ νοῦ συστάσεως ἐγενήθη· νοῦ δὲ ἀνάγκης ἄρχοντος, τῷ πείθειν αὐτὴν τῶν γιγνομένων τὰ πλεῖστα ἐπὶ τὸ βέλτιστον ἄγειν, ταύτῃ κατὰ ταῦτα διʼ ἀνάγκης (45) ἡττωμένης ὑπὸ πειθοῦς ἔμφρονος, οὕτω κατʼ ἀρχὰς ξυνίστατο τόδε τὸ πᾶν. Mundi enim hujus generatio ex neceſſitatis mentiſque coitu mixta eſt. Nam cùm mens neceſſitati dominaretur, propterea quòd perſuadendo eam ad optimos ut plurimum rerum eventus induceret, ipſaque hac ratione cedens ſapienti perſuaſioni pareret, mundi hujus exordia conſtiterunt. Cauſabon obſerves (46) that Homer, on a particular occaſion, having ſaid that evil exceeds good, it was converted into a general maxim (47); as if, univerſally ſpeaking, the miſeries of human life overbalanced the happineſs of it. The ſame Critic obſerves, that thoſe who ſpoke of this ſubject with the greateſt modeſty, excuſed Providence on account of the fatal neceſſity which conſtrained it to open a gate to ſeveral evils. ‘Qui parciſſime loquebantur Deum excuſabant qui Bonus non niſi bona in operibus ſuis & omni adminiſtratione ſua propoſuiſſet, ſed materiæ obluctantis vel deficientis neceſſitate coactus, etiam malis non paucis invitus locum reliquiſſet. --- Thoſe who ſpoke of this ſubject with the greateſt modeſty, excuſed GOD, who, as a good Being, had propoſed nothing but what was good, both in his works and providence; but that, being forced by the neceſſity of the matter which reſiſted or was deficient, he had unwillingly left room for ſeveral evils.’ He adds, that Euripides hath ſtrenuouſly refuted the common opinion, that evil ſurpaſſes good, and he cites the beginning of that confutation.

Ἔλεξε γάρ τις ὡς τὰ χείρονα
Πλείω βροτοῖσιν ἐστὶ τῶν ἀμεινόνων.
Ἐγὼ δὴ τούτοις ἀντίαν γνώμην ἔχω
Πλείω τὰ χρεστὰ τῶν κακῶν εἶναι βροτοῖς.

Some ſay that there is in nature more evil than good: but I hold a contrary opinion to others, viz. there is in nature more good than evil.

The ſubſequent words of Euripides ſeemed to Caſaubon to be written by an inſpired pen (48). Pliny differs from this Poet's opinion; for tho' he doth not ſay that it plainly appears nature behaves to us rather like a cruel ſtep-mother, than a tender indulgent parent, yet he intimates that he is of ſuch an opinion: ‘Principium jure tribuetur homini cujus cauſa videtur cuncta alia genuiſſe natura; magnâ ſæva mercede contra tanta ſua munera: non ſit ut ſatis æſtimare parens melior homini, an triſtior noverca fuerit (49). --- The chief place will be juſtly allowed to man, for whoſe ſake nature ſeems to have produced all other things. Great are the bounties of nature, and purchaſed with many evils, and purchaſed with many afflictions: ſo that it is hard to judge, whether ſhe acts the part of a tender and indulgent parent, or that of a cruel ſtep-mother to mankind.’ She ſets the preſents ſhe makes us, ſaith he, at the price of a thouſand afflictions. To this purpoſe he gives a long deſcription of human infirmities, and oppoſes them to the advantages of animals; nor doth he forget the vices in which men exceed the brutes: ‘Uni animantium luctus eſt datus, uni luxuria, & quidem innumerabilibus modis, ac per ſingula membra: uni ambitio, uni avaritia, uni immenſa vivendi cupido, uni ſuperſtitio, uni ſepulturæ cura, atquæ etiam poſt ſe de futuro. Nulli vita fragilior, nulli rerum omnium libido major, nulli pavor confuſior, nulli rabies acrior. Dentque cetera animantia in ſuo genere probe degunt: congregari videmus, & ſtare contra diſſimilia: Leonum feritas inter ſe non dimicat: ſerpentium morſus non petit ſerpentes: ne maris quidem belluæ ac piſces, niſi in diverſa genera, ſæviunt. At hercules homini plurima ex homine ‘ ſunt (l) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i, init.

---

(38) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. ii, cap. xxxix.

(39) Lactant. lib. iii, cap. xxii, pag. m. 207.

(40) He married a ſiſter of Cromwell, by whom he had a daughter, who was married to Dr Tillotſon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

(41) Plut. de Placitis Philoſoph. lib. ii, cap. xxiv, pag. 901.

(42) Plurima deteriora mente eſſe. Diogen. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 19.

(43) Meric. Caſaubon. in hæc verba Diogen. Laërtii.

(44) Plato, in Timæo, pag. m. 1058, D.

(45) Meric. Caſaubon reads τῆς ἀνάγκης.

(46) Mericus Caſaubonus, ubi ſupra.

(47) Τὰ χερείονα νικᾶν.

(48) Cætera quæ bene multa talia, quæ θεόπνευστον pectus ſpirare videantur. Mericus Caſaubon. ibid.

(49) Plinius, lib. vii, init. p. m. 3.

would not be ſingular in this opinion: but it is probable that he was of a very different ſentiment; and if the queſtion was only about evil morally conſidered [E], I do not believe he would find one opponent. Every body owns that good and honeſt men are very rare, and ſunt mala (50). - - - Of all animals man alone is ſubject to ſorrow, to luxury, and that in numberleſs reſpects, and through all his ſenſes: man alone is addicted to ambition, to avarice, and an immoderate and exceſſive deſire of life: he alone is concerned for his burial, and even for what ſhall happen after his death. No animal is more frail, none more luſtful, none more liable to conſternation, none more furious. In fine, other animals live friendly with their reſpective ſpecies. We ſee them flock and herd together, and only oppoſe others of a different kind. A lion, however furious, does not attack a lion. A ſerpent does not ſting a ſerpent. Nor do the ſea-monſters and fiſhes deſtroy any but thoſe of a different kind from themſelves. But men bring numberleſs evils upon each other.' He doth not forget the reflexion which ſeveral people have made, that it would be beſt for a man not to be born, or to die quickly (51). He affirms, in another book, that the greateſt bleſſing that GOD has beſtowed upon men amongſt ſo many pains and troubles of life, is the power of killing themſelves: Nec ſibi poteſt (Deus) mortem conſciſcere, ſi velit, quod homini dedit optimum in tantis vitæ pœnis (52). He had enumerated ſeveral of the follies of Paganiſm, and concluded, that of all theſe things there is but one certain, which is, that all things are uncertain, and that man is the moſt miſerable and vaineſt part of the whole creation: Quæ ſingula improvidam mortalitatem involvunt, ſolum ut inter iſta certum ſit, nihil eſſe certi, NEC MISERIUS QUIDQUAM HOMINE, AUT SUPERBIUS. Ceteris quippe animantium ſola victus cura eſt, in quo ſponte naturæ benignitas ſufficit: uno quidem vel præferendo cunctis bonis, quod de gloria, de pecunia, ambitione, ſuperque de morte non cogitant (53). - - - All theſe things diſcover the weakneſs of our underſtanding; ſo that this alone is certain, that nothing is certain, and that MAN IS OF ALL ANIMALS THE MOST VAIN AND MISERABLE. For other living creatures take no care for their food, which is abundantly ſupplied to them by the voluntary produce of nature. But this advantage of theirs is greater than all the reſt, that they have no thoughts of glory, riches, ambition, or even death.'

Plautus hath ſo naturally expreſſed an opinion contrary to Euripides's maxim, that I think myſelf obliged to tranſcribe his words:

Satin' parva res eſt voluptatum in vitâ,
Atque in ætate agundâ,
Præquàm quod moleſtum'ſt! ita cuique comparatum
Eſt in ætate hominum.
Ita Dîs eſt placitum, voluptatem ut mœror comes conſequatur:
Quin incommodi plus malique ilico adſit, boni ſi obtigit quid (54).

How few are the pleaſures in every age of life, when compared with the troubles of it: This is the fate of all men, and the will of the gods, that pain and ſorrow ſhould accompany our pleaſures. But let me immediately have more pain, and more ſorrow, if it is attended with any pleaſure.

Diphilus, the Poet, thought that fortune obliges us to drink a liquor compoſed of three evils, and only one good.

Ὥσπερ κυαθίζουσ' ἐνίοθ' ἡμῖν ἡ τύχη,
Ἓν ἀγαθὸν ἐπιχέασα τρί' ἐπαντλεῖ κακά.

Fortuna nobis, tanquam cyathos exſiccantibus,
Si unum bonum infundat, tria mala affundit (55).

[E] If the queſtion was only about evil morally conſidered.] Many things might be obſerved upon the queſtion, Whether Euripides is rather to be believed than Pliny, and ſo many other great men, who have maintained that the evils of human life ſurpaſſes the good things of it. Let us conſider this ſubject a little, and ſay in the firſt place that if the diſpute is only about vicious evil, it will ſoon be decided in favour of Pliny. For where is the man who dares maintain that the virtuous actions, compared with the crimes of mankind, are in proportion as ten to ten thouſand? In the ſecond place, if the diſpute is about painful evil, Euripides will have ſeveral adherents. As to the ſecond point, I ſhall refer it to the following remark, and offer ſomething there on the firſt.

How deteſtable ſoever the opinion of two principles hath conſtantly appeared to all Chriſtians (56), they have neverthele ſs acknowledged a ſubaltern principle of moral evil. Divines teach us that a great number of angels having ſinned, made a party in the univerſe againſt GOD. For brevity ſake this party is denoted by the name of Devil, and he is acknowledged as the cauſe of the fall of the firſt man, and as the perpetual tempter and ſeducer of mankind. The Devil having declared war againſt GOD from the moment of his fall, hath always continued in his rebellion, and there was never any peace or truce. He continually applies himſelf to uſurp the rights of his Creator, and debauch his ſubjects, in order to make them rebels and engage them to ſerve under his banner againſt their common maſter. He ſucceeded in his firſt hoſtilities with regard to man: In the Garden of Eden he attacked the mother of all living, and vanquiſhed her; immediately after he attacked the firſt man, and defeated him. Thus he became maſter of mankind. GOD did not abandon this prey to him, but delivered them out of their bondage, and recovered them out of that ſtate of reprobation by virtue of the ſatisfaction which the ſecond Perſon of the Trinity undertook to pay to his juſtice. This ſecond Perſon engaged to become man, and to act as a Mediator between GOD and mankind, and as a Redeemer of Adam and his poſterity. He took upon him to combat the Devil's party; ſo that he was the head of GOD's party, againſt the Devil, who was the head of the rebellious creatures. The deſign was not to conquer all the poſterity of Adam; for they were all, by birth, in the power of the Devil, but to preſerve, or recover the country which had been conquered. The deſign of JESUS CHRIST, the Mediator, and Son of GOD, was to recover it; that of the Devil was to hold it. The victory of the Mediator conſiſted in leading men into the paths of truth and virtue; that of the devil in ſeducing them into the road of error and vice. So that in order to know whether moral good equals moral evil among men, we need only compare the victories of the Devil with thoſe of JESUS CHRIST. Now in hiſtory we find but very few triumphs of JESUS CHRIST: Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto (57); and we every where meet with the triumphs of the Devil. The war between theſe two parties is a continual, or almoſt continual, train of ſucceſſes on the Devil's ſide; and if the rebellious party made annals of their exploits, there is not one day in the year, but what would be there marked with ſome ample ſubject for bonfires, ſongs of triumph, and ſuch other ſigns of victory. The Annaliſt would have no occaſion for hyperboles and flattery, to ſhew the ſuperiority of that faction. Sacred hiſtory tells us of but one good in Adam's family (58), and reduces to one good man the family of that good man, and ſo on in the other generations to Noah, in whoſe family we find three ſons whom God ſaved from the deluge with their father, mother, and wives. Thus at the end of ſixteen hundred fifty-ſix years, all mankind, except one family of eight perſons, were ſo deeply engaged in the intereſt of the Devil, that the enormity of their crimes rendered it neceſſary to extirpate them. The deluge, that terrible monument of the juſtice of God, is a lofty monument of the Devil's victories; and ſo much the rather as that general puniſhment did not deprive him of his prey: the ſouls of thoſe who periſhed in the deluge went to hell: This is the Devil's aim and intention, and therefore his triumph. Error and vice, ſoon after the deluge, lifted up their heads in Noah's family: his deſcendants plunged themſelves into idolatry, and all manner of debaucheries; that is to ſay, the Devil preſerved his uſurped power over them. There was no more than a handful of people, confined in Judæa, that eſcaped him with reſpect to Orthodoxy; nay, it muſt be owned, that among that people the ſucceſs of the good party was very variable, and that nothing is more common than men who depart from the rules of virtue. But, without doubt, Xenophanes intended to ſpeak of Phyſical evil; and his ſenſe was, that

---

(50) Id. ibid. pag. 5. Compare with this the paſſage of Arnobius, cited in the article TULLIA, citation (82).

(51) Multi extitere qui non naſci optimum cenſerent aut quam ocyſſime aboleri. Id. ibid. pag. 4. See, above, the article TULLIA, citat. (86). See this ſentence in Greek verſes in Sextus Empiricus. Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. iii, cap. xxiv, pag. 157.

(52) Plin. lib. ii, cap. vii, pag. m. 146.

(53) Id. ibid.

(54) Plaut. in Amphitr. Act. ii, Sc. ii, init. pag. m. 25.

(55) Diphilus, apud Stobæum.

(56) For the Marcionites, the Manichees, &c. do not deſerve to be called Chriſtians.

(57) Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 118.

(58) Compare with this remark [G], of the article OROSIUS

ble, with reſpect to Orthodoxy, ſince that very nation ſuffered it ſelf to be ſeduced to idolatry from time to time; inſomuch, that their conduct was a continued ſhifting between true and falſe worſhip. But as for vice it never ſuffered a real interregnum amongſt the Jews, any more than in other countries: and conſequently the Devil continually kept a footing in the ſmall conqueſts which the good party recovered. There happened a happy revolution at the birth of Jeſus Chriſt: his miracles, his goſpel, and his Apoſtles, made glorious conqueſts. Then it was that the empire of the Devil received a very great check, and a conſiderable part of the earth was wreſted out of his hands; but he was not ſo driven out that he did not preſerve ſeveral correſpondents, and a great many creatures there; he maintained himſelf there by the abominable Hereſies which he ſowed: vices were never entirely driven out of it, and ſoon after entred into it again, as it were, in triumph. Errors, ſchiſms, diſputes, and cabals, introduced themſelves, together with the fatal train of infamous paſſions, which generally accompany them. The Hereſies, ſuperſtitions, violences, frauds, extorſions, and impurities, which have appeared all over the Chriſtian world for ſeveral ages, are things which I ſhould only be able to deſcribe imperfectly, though I was maſter of more eloquence than Cicero. What Virgil ſaid is true in the moſt literal ſenſe.

> Non, mihi ſi linguæ centum ſint, oraque centum, > Ferrea vox, omnes ſcelerum comprendere formas,
> . . . . poſſim (59).
>
> Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
> And throats of braſs, inſpired with iron lungs,
> I could not half thoſe horrid crimes repeat:
>
> DRYDEN.

Thus whilſt the Devil reigned uninterrupted without the limits of Chriſtendom, he ſo ſucceſsfully diſputed the ground in Chriſtendom, that the progreſs of his arms was beyond compariſon greater than that of truth and virtue. A ſtop was put to this progreſs, and he was forced to give ground in the XVIth century; but what he loſt on one ſide he regained on the other; and what he does not effect by lies, he brings to paſs by the corruption of manners. There is no azylum, no fortreſs where he does not make men feel the effects of his power in this reſpect. Leave the world, ſhut your ſelf up in a monaſtery; he will follow you, he will bring into it intrigues, envy, factions, or, if he can do no worſe, leudneſs; this laſt reſource is almoſt infallible; Diaboli virtus in lumbis eſt, - - - The power of the devil lies in the loins, ſaith St Jerom (60). A modern author affirms, That in thoſe places where Popery is yet predominant, there is no true piety . . . and that Italy and Spain are places where there is ſcarce any more true virtue than in Turkey (61). He ſaith in another book (62), That it is a notorious and acknowledged truth, that all the convents of Spain and Portugal are places of proſtitution; and that when chance draws the curtain, to give us an opportunity of ſeeing what paſſes in the French monaſteries, we diſcover that they take a little more care of external appearances, but at the bottom are as leud as others. He ſpares the Proteſtants a little more; but yet he ſays (63) that corruption runs very high amongſt them, and is become ſo general, that it is not only amongſt the Reformed in France, but alſo thoſe of England, the northern kingdoms, and the provinces of Germany; that the Princes and Sovereigns of thoſe places think of nothing but their political intereſts; that the people are void of piety, and the paſtors remiſs; that a prodigious indifference for religion reigns every where, generally ſpeaking; that Princes take no care of the truth (64); that the women of England are debauched to the laſt degree, and that the Proteſtant countries in Germany, are plunged into ſuch a debauchery, as debaſes them, and makes them brutiſh. You may ſay, if you pleaſe, that this author's deſcriptions are overſtrained; but it will neverthleſs be true, that there prevails among Chriſtians a deplorable corruption of manners.

Theſe two things require our reflexion. War reigns at leaſt for as long a time as peace amongſt the Chriſtians: I confine my ſelf to Chriſtianity, becauſe it is unneceſſary for me to ſpeak of the Infidel nations; they are continually in the ſervice of the Devil, and ſubject to his empire; and the uſurper reigns there unmoleſted. It is undeniable that war is the Devil's time, or, if I may ſo expreſs my ſelf, his turn of reigning; for without mentioning the violences and debaucheries committed in it, every ſoldier is obliged to profeſs that he will ſuffer no injuries; he muſt either quit the employment, or revenge an affront: but this is manifeſtly denying our allegiance to the empire of Jeſus Chriſt, and deſerting to the enemy. Times of peace do not ſeem ſo favourable to the empire of the Devil, and yet they are very much ſo; for as people grow rich, they grow more voluptuous, and plunge themſelves deeper in luxury and voluptuouſneſs.

> Nunc patimur longæ pacis mala, ſævior armis
> Luxuria incubuit, victumque ulciſcitur orbem (65).
>
> We ſuffer all th' invet'rate ills of peace,
> And waſtful riot; whoſe deſtructive charms
> Revenge the vanquiſh'd world of our victorious arms.
>
> DRYDEN.

My other remark is more deciſive. The Papiſts and Proteſtants agree, that very few people eſcape damnation. They allow none to be ſaved but only the Orthodox who lead good lives, and repent of their ſins at the point of death. They do not indeed deny but that habitual ſinners may be ſaved upon a ſincere deathbed repentance, but withal they maintain, that nothing is more rare than ſuch a repentance. According to which it is plain, that for one man ſaved, there are perhaps a million damned. Now the war which the Devil wages with God, is about the conqueſt of ſouls; and therefore it is certain that the victory is on the Devil's ſide: he gains all the damned, and loſes only the very few ſouls who were predeſtinated to be ſaved. He is therefore victor prælio, & victor bello. - - - victorious in the battle, and victorious in the war. For having inſpired men with an infinitely greater number of wicked actions, than Jeſus Chriſt has inſpired them with good ones, he has been ſuperior in the battle; and as he makes almoſt all men die in impenitence, he keeps all he had conquered (66). Death puts an end to the war. Chriſt doth not combat in order to releaſe the dead from the power of the Devil. We muſt therefore ſay that this war ends in the Devil's advantage, what he claimed is yielded and abandoned to him. I know he will ſuffer eternal puniſhment for his victories: But this, far from obſcuring my poſition, that moral evil is greater than moral good, ſerves to make it more indiſputable: For the Devils amidſt the flames will eternally curſe, and make all the damned eternally curſe the name of God. There will therefore be more creatures who will hate, than who will love God. Beſides, in this remark, the queſtion is properly about the ſtate of things in this life.

I have an Italian book intituled Monarchia del noſtro Signor Gieſu Chriſto, printed at Venice 1573, and written by Giovann' Antonio Panthera Parentino. The author of this book gives the hiſtory of the battles of Lucifer with Jeſus Chriſt, from the beginning of the world down to the times of Mahometaniſm. He paſſes ſlightly over ſome of the attempts in which Lucifer ſucceeded; but gives a full account of every attempt in which he failed; ſuch as the Deſign of deſtroying the poſterity of Abraham in Egypt, his enterpriſes againſt David, againſt the Maccabees, againſt Jeſus Chriſt, &c. This is like a man who ſeeing people gaming, ſhould only take an account of the loſſes (67): it would appear by ſuch a computation that he who had won the moſt had loſt all his money. This is an image of the conduct of ſeveral Hiſtorians. Their nation appears always victorious: for they relate only thoſe events which were proſperous.

(59) Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 625.

(60) Montagne, Eſſais, livr. iii, chap. v, pag. m. 134.

(61) Jurieu, Vrai Syſteme de l'Egliſe, pag. m. 262.

(62) Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. ii, pag. 592.

(63) See the Abbot Richard, Critique des Prejugez de Mr Jurieu, pag. 234. He quotes the Avis aux Proteſtans de l'Europe. This Avis, is prefixed to the Prejugez légitimes contre le Papiſme.

(64) Id. ibid. pag. 258, quoting the ſame Avis aux Proteſtans.

(65) Juvenal, Sat. VI, ver. 291.

(66) That is to ſay, all he conquered when he made the firſt man fall, whereby all his poſterity became ſlaves to the Devil.

(67) Mr Fouquet in the firſt tome of the continuation of his Defence, uſes this thought with regard to thoſe, who only computed what he had expended, but not what he had received.

that the ſweets of life do not equal the bitter potions which it obliges us to ſwallow [F]. Several Obſerve, that all I have been ſaying is every day preached, and that without any deſign of derogating from the almighty power of Jeſus Chriſt. No more is meant by it than (what is alſo my opinion) that man is naturally ſo prone to evil, that except the ſmall number of the elect, all other men live and die in the ſervice of the evil ſpirit, and render the paternal love of God to remedy their wickedneſs, or bring them to repentance, of no effect.

[F] His ſenſe was that the ſweets of life do not equal the bitter potions which it obliges us to ſwallow.] Thoſe who hold the contrary opinion, chiefly inſiſt upon a parallel betwixt diſeaſes and health. There are very few perſons, whatever age they be of, but can reckon up, incomparably more days of health than of ſickneſs; and there are a great many, who, in the ſpace of twenty years, have not been afflicted with diſeaſes that will take up in all fifteen days. But this compariſon is fallacious (68); for health conſidered alone is rather an indolence than a ſenſe of pleaſure; it is rather a bare exemption from evil, than a good, whilſt ſickneſs is worſe than a privation of pleaſure: it is a poſitive ſtate which plunges the mind into a ſenſe of ſuffering, and loads the patient with pain. Somebody (69) judiciouſly ſays, that when health is alone, it is a good which is not much perceived, and ſometimes only ſerves to make us the more ardently deſire all the other pleaſures which we cannot have. Let us make uſe of a compariſon taken from the ſchoolmen: they ſay that rare, i. e. porous, bodies contain but very little matter under a great extent; and that denſe bodies contain a great quantity of matter in a ſmall compaſs (70). According to this principle we muſt ſay, that there is more matter in three feet of water than in two thouſand five hundred feet of air; this is a lively image of ſickneſs and health. Sickneſs reſembles the denſe bodies, and health the rare. Health laſts many years ſucceſſively, and yet contains but a ſmall portion of happineſs. Sickneſs continues but a few days, and yet comprehends a vaſt load of miſery. If we had a ſcale adapted to weigh both a diſeaſe of fifteen days, and the health of fifteen years, we ſhould obſerve the ſame difference that we find in the balance betwixt a bag of feathers and a piece of lead. In one ſcale we ſhould ſee a body which takes up a great deal of room, and in the other, one which lies in a very ſmall compaſs; and yet one of them is not heavier than the other. Let us then beware of the illuſion which the extenſion of health may draw us into, when it is parallelled with ſickneſs. But you will ſay that health is conſiderable, not only by reaſon it exempts us from a very great evil, but alſo by the liberty it affords us, to enjoy a thouſand lively and very ſenſible pleaſures. I grant all this, but it ought to be farther conſidered, that there being two ſorts of evils to which we are ſubject, it only ſecures us from one, and leaves us wholly expoſed to the other. We are ſubject to pain and ſorrow, two ſuch terrible afflictions, that it is not to be decided which is moſt dreadful. The moſt vigorous health doth not ſecure us from grief. For grief flows in upon us through a thouſand channels, and is of the nature of denſe bodies: it comprizes a great deal of matter in a very ſmall compaſs; evil is heaped up, crowded and preſſed cloſe in it. One hour's grief contains more evil, than there is good in ſix or ſeven pleaſant days. The other day I was told of a man who killed himſelf, after an anxious melancholy of three or four weeks. Every night he had laid his ſword under his bolſter, in hopes that he ſhould have courage enough to end his life, when darkneſs ſhould increaſe his grief: but his reſolution failed for ſeveral nights ſucceſſively. At laſt, not being able to reſiſt his uneaſineſs, he cut the veins of his arm. I affirm, that all the pleaſures which this man had enjoyed in thirty years, would not equal the evils which tormented him the laſt month of his life, if both were weighed in the balance. Look back to my parallel of denſe and rare bodies, and remember this, that the good things of this life are a leſs good, than the evil things are an evil. Evils are generally more pure and unmixt than good things; the lively ſenſe of pleaſure doth not continue long, it immediately grows flat and dull, and is followed with a diſguſt.

Πάντων μὲν κόρος ἐστὶ καὶ ὕπνου, καὶ φιλότητος
Μολπῆς τε γλυκερῆς, καὶ ἀμύμονος ὀρχηθμοῖο.

Omnium quidem ſatietas eſt, & ſomni & amoris
Cantuſque dulcis & egregiæ ſaltationis (71).

The beſt of things beyond their meaſure cloy;
Sleep's balmy bleſſing, love's endearing joy;
The feaſt, the dance . . . . .
Mr POPE.

What appeared to us a great good when we did not poſſeſs it, ſcarce affects us in the enjoyment: ſo that we acquire, with a thouſand troubles, and a thouſand uneaſineſſes, what we poſſeſs with no more than a moderate pleaſure; and very often the fear of loſing the good we enjoy, ſurpaſſes all the pleaſures of the fruition of it.

There has been pointed out to me a very fine paſſage of Pliny, and a very proper one to confirm the thoughts which I have juſt now offered. ‘Si verum ‘facere judicium volumus, ac repudiata omni fortunæ ‘ambitione decernere, mortalium nemo eſt felix (72). ‘Abunde igitur, atque indulgenter fortuna decidit ‘cum eo, qui jure dici non infelix poteſt. Quippe ‘ut alia non ſint, certe, ne laſſeſcat fortuna, metus ‘eſt: quo ſemel recepto, ſolida felicitas non eſt. Quid ‘quod nemo mortalium omnibus horis ſapit? utinamque ‘falſum hoc, & non a vate dictum quam plurimi ‘judicent! Vana mortalitas, & ad circumſcribendum ‘ſeipſam ingenioſa, computat more Thraciæ gentis, ‘quæ calculos colore diſtinctos, pro experimento ‘cujuſque diei in urnam condit, ac ſupremo die ſeparatos ‘dinumerat, atque ita de quoque pronunciat. ‘Quid quod iſte calculi candore illo laudatus dies, originem ‘mali habuit? Quam multos accepta afflixere ‘imperia; quam multos bona perdidere, & ultimis ‘merſere ſuppliciis? iſta nimirum bona, ſi cui inter ‘illa hora in gaudio fuit. Ita eſt profecto, alius de ‘alio judicat dies, & tamen ſupremus de omnibus: ‘ideoque nullis credendum eſt. Quid quod bona ma‘lis paria non ſunt, etiam pari numero: nec lætitia ‘ulla minimo mœrore penſanda? Heu vana & imprudens ‘diligentia! numerus dierum comparatur: ubi ‘quæritur pondus (73). - - - If we would make a true ‘judgment of things, without being biaſſed by the allurements ‘of fortune, we muſt determine that no man is ‘happy. Fortune is bounteous and indulgent to the man ‘who may juſtly be ſaid not to be unhappy. For as to ‘thoſe who are called happy, their condition is always ‘attended with a fear leſt fortune ſhould change and forſake ‘them: and where this fear takes place, there can ‘be no ſolid happineſs. What ſhall we ſay of this obſervation, ‘that no man is wiſe at all times? I wiſh this ‘was falſe, and that a great many people did not juſtly ‘account it an oracle. Man is vain, and ingenious in ‘circumſcribing himſelf, and computes his happineſs after ‘the manner of the Thracians, who every day put into ‘an urn either a black or a white peeble, to denote the ‘good or bad fortune of that day: at laſt they ſeparated ‘theſe peebles, and upon comparing the two numbers ‘together, they formed their judgment of the whole of ‘their lives. Shall that very day which is diſtinguiſhed ‘by the white peeble give riſe to evil? How many ‘have been afflicted by the power which they have accepted? ‘How many undone and reduced to the greateſt ‘miſery by good things, and the ſame good things which ‘were the cauſe of their former rejoicing. Thus it ‘actually happens, one day judges of another, and the ‘laſt judges of all the reſt; ſo that no particular day can ‘be relied upon. What ſhall we ſay of this obſervation, ‘that the good things of this life are not equal to the ‘evil, not even in number? And that the leaſt affliction ‘is not to be compenſated by any joy? Alas! how vain ‘and imprudently diligent is man, who compares his fortunate ‘with his unfortunate days by their number, when ‘the queſtion is concerning the weight and nature of ‘them.’ I have found another paſſage which gives a lively deſcription of the ill ſide of felicities, I ſpeak of thoſe common to all men, I mean corporeal pleaſures. ‘Quid autem de corporis voluptatibus loquar, ‘quarum appetentia quidem plena eſt anxietatis, ſatietas ‘verò pœnitentiæ? Quantos illæ morbos, quam ‘intolerabileis dolores, quaſi quendam fructum nequi‘tiæ

---

(68) See the article PERICLES, remark [K].

(69) I think it is Madam de Scuderi.

(70) Rarum eſt quod ſub magna dimenſione parum continet materiæ: denſum quod ſub parva dimenſione multum continet materiæ.

(71) Homer, Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 636. See, above, a like thought of Pindar, in citation (4), of the laſt article BERENICE.

(72) Euripides, in Medea, ver. 1228, & 1230, pag. 327, ſays the ſame thing.

(73) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xl, pag. m. 62. Mr du Rondel has acquainted me of this paſſage.

Several people are perſuaded of the truth of this, and do not want plauſible reaſons for it,

'tiæ fruentium ſolent referre corporibus! . . . Triſteis 'verò eſſe voluptatum exitus, quiſquis reminiſci libi'dinum ſuarum volet, intelliget . . . .

Habet omnis hoc voluptas,
Stimulis agit fruenteis,
Apiumque par volantum,
Ubi grata mella fudit,
Fugit, & nimis tenaci
Ferit icta corda morſu (74).

'What need I ſpeak of bodily pleaſures, the purſuit of which is full of anxiety, and the enjoyment followed by diſguſt and repentance. How great diſeaſes, how intolerable pains do they bring upon the body, as the fruits of wickedneſs. . . . But that the iſſue of pleaſures is diſagreeable and painful, whoever reflects on his own luſts, muſt eaſily underſtand . . . .

If pleaſures e'er invade the heart
They ſtimulate through every part:
But when th' enjoyers happy made,
And when their grateful honey's ſhed,
Their ſweet allurements ſoon decay,
They leave a ſting and flie away.

Thus Boëtius introduces Philoſophy ſpeaking to him. It appears by this diſcourſe, that if anxiety precedes the enjoyment of pleaſures, diſguſt and repentance follow cloſe after it. A vaſt number of authors obſerve this unhappy concomitance, or, to ſpeak more intelligibly, this connexion of pleaſure and uneaſineſs. The two following were cited in my firſt edition:

. . . . uſque adeo nulli eſt ſincera voluptas,
Sollicitique aliquid lætis intervenit (75).

But mortal bliſs will never come ſincere;
Pleaſure may lead, but pain brings up the rear.

TATE.

. . . . medio de fonte leporum
Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipſis floribus angat *.

. . . for ſtill ſome bitter thought deſtroys
His fanſy'd mirth, and poiſons all his joys.

CREECH.

And now I add a third, who is Antiphanes.

Ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ δέ γε τȣ́τῳ, ἔνθα τὸ
Ἡδὺ ἔνεϛι, πλησίον πȣ καὶ τὸ λυπηρὸν. αἱ γὰρ ἡδοναὶ Οὐκ ἐπὶ σφῶν αὐτῶν ἐμπορεύονται, ἀλλ' ἀκολȣθȣ͂σ' αὐταῖς
Λύπαι καὶ πόνοι.

Id eſt,

At in eodem ipſo, in quo
Jucunditas ineſt, prope ſanè & moleſtia præſto eſt.
Voluptates enim
Non ipſæ ſolæ ingrediuntur, ſed earum comites ſunt
Dolores ac labores.

Wherever pleaſures and delights are preſent, pain and ſorrow are at hand. For pleaſures never come alone, pain and toil are their conſtant attendants.

Let us alſo obſerve this circumſtance. We are not only in fear of loſing what we poſſeſs, but alſo vexed to ſee other people equal or ſurpaſs us, and that others will ſoon be able to come up to us, and afterwards get before us. Obſerve, that in order to prove that good is not ſo perfectly good, as evil is evil, I have made no uſe of this argument, that it rarely happens that a good uſe is made of the favours of fortune, it rarely happens that they do not lead us to great miſeries, and become not a grace, but a ſnare (76); I ſay, I have omitted this reaſon, becauſe I do not here conſider the cauſes and occaſions of good and evil, but good and evil in themſelves. For the reſt, it would be departing from the ſtate of the queſtion to ſay, that man afflicts himſelf without cauſe. For it is not our buſineſs here to know whether his grief is reaſonable, or the effect of his weakneſs; but the queſtion is, to know whether he grieves. This very thing, that a man vexes himſelf without reaſon, and makes himſelf unhappy by his own fault, is an evil.

We muſt own with Seneca, conſidering the multitude of good things which nature has imparted to us, and the inexhauſtible induſtry with which the wit of man diverſifies pleaſures, and diſcovers the ſources of them; that God, not contented to provide barely for our neceſſities, hath beſides furniſhed us wherewithal to live deliciouſly. 'Unde hæc innumerabilia oculos, 'aureis, animum mulcentia? unde illa luxuriam quoque inſtruens copia? Neque enim neceſſitatibus tantummodo noſtris proviſum eſt: uſque in delicias amamur. Tot arbuſta, non uno modo frugifera, tot herbæ ſalutares, tot varietates ciborum, per totum annum digeſtæ, ut inerti quoque fortuita terræ alimenta præberent. Jam animalia omnis generis, alia in ſicco ſolidoque, alia in humido innaſcentia, alia per ſublime dimiſſa: ut omnis rerum naturæ pars tributum aliquod nobis conferre (77) . . . Unde iſta palatum tuum ſaporibus exquiſitis ultra ſatietatem laceſſentia? unde hæc irritamenta jam laſſæ voluptatis? unde iſta quies, in qua putreſcis, ac marces? Nonne ſi gratus es, dices,

- - - - Deus nobis hæc otia fecit (78).

'Whence proceed theſe numberleſs delights for the entertainment of our eyes, our ears, and mind? Whence that abundance which ſupplies even our luxury? For care is taken not only for our neceſſities, but alſo for our pleaſures, and the gratifying of all our ſenſes and appetites. So many pleaſant trees, fruitful in various manners, ſo many wholſome herbs, and ſuch a variety of meats, in every ſeaſon of the year, that the caſual produce of the earth might ſupply a lazy man with food for his maintenance. Whence all thoſe animals, ſome bred on the earth, ſome in the waters, and others deſcending from the heavens, that every part of nature might be tributary to man? . . . Whence thoſe things which by their exquiſite taſtes, and delicious ſavours, provoke your appetite even after it is ſatiated? Whence thoſe things which awaken your pleaſures when decayed? Whence that quiet and eaſe in which you rot and moulder away? Will you not ſay, if you are thankful, that you owe all this to the bounty of Heaven?' All that Seneca ſaith in this part of his book de Beneficiis is very true; but, on the other ſide, doth not Pliny (79) aſſure us that nature makes us buy her preſents at the price of ſo many ſufferings, that it is dubious whether ſhe deſerves moſt, the name of a parent, or of a ſtep-mother? To reconcile theſe two authors, we ought to conſider what the Scripture teaches us concerning the œconomy of GOD, as a father, and as judge of mankind. Thoſe two relations require that man ſhould feel good and evil: but the queſtion is, whether evil exceeds good? and upon this head I am apt to think that we can go no farther than opinions and conjectures. Several people ſay, that moſt perſons, when a little advanced in years, grow like la Mothe le Vayer, who would have refuſed to paſs again through the ſame good and evil which he had felt in his life (80). If it be ſo, we muſt believe that, upon the whole, every one finds the pleaſures which he has enjoyed, has been unequal to the uneaſineſſes and pains with which he has been afflicted. I do not alledge that no body is content with his condition, for this is no proof that every man believes himſelf leſs happy than unhappy. Theſe verſes of Horace contain a moſt certain fact:

Quî fit, Mæcenas, ut nemo, quam ſibi ſortem
Seu ratio dederit, ſeu ſors objecerit, illâ
Contentus vivat? laudet diverſa ſequentes (81)?

Whence comes, my Lord, this general diſcontent?
Why do all loath the ſtate that chance hath ſent,

---

(74) Boëtius, de Conſol. Philoſoph. lib. iii, Proſa vii, pag. m. 61.

(75) Ovidius, Metam. lib. vii, ver. 453.

* Lucret. lib. iv, ver. 1127.

(76) Munera iſta fortunæ putatis? inſidiæ ſunt. Quiſquis noſtrum tutam agere vitam volet, quantum plurimum poteſt iſta viſcata beneficia devitet, in quibus hoc quoque miſerrimi fallimur, habere nos putamus, habemur. Seneca, Epiſt. viii.

(77) Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. iv, cap. v. Compare what has been ſaid above of Cicero, in citation (90), of the article PERICLES.

(78) Seneca, ibid. cap. vi.

(79) I have cited his words in remark [D], citation (49). See the words of Socrates, in remark [G].

(80) See remark [F], in the article VAYER, and what has been ſaid of Cicero, in the article TULLIA, remark [R].

(81) Horat. lib. i, initio Sat. I.

it, as we ſhall ſee below. Even thoſe who acknowledge that nature hath furniſhed mankind

Or their own choice procur'd? but fondly bleſs
Their neighbour's lots, and praiſe what they poſſeſs?
CREECH.

Four inconveniencies mixed with twenty conveniencies, would make a man wiſh for another condition, I mean ſuch a one as is not charged with any inconvenience, or at leaſt where he ſhould find but one or two of them to forty conveniencies. On the other ſide, it muſt not be alledged againſt me, what Lactantius ſaith (82), that men are ſo nice, that they complain of the leaſt evil, as if it abſorbed all the good things they have enjoyed: for it is to no purpoſe to conſider here what the abſolute quantity of good and evil diſpenſed to man, may be in it ſelf; we are only to conſider their relative quality; or, to expreſs myſelf more clearly, we ought to conſider nothing but the feeling of the mind. A very great good in itſelf, which raiſes but a very moderate pleaſure, ought not to paſs for more than a moderate good; but an evil, tho' very little in itſelf, which gives an uneaſineſs, grief, or pain, that are inſupportable, ought to paſs for a very great evil: ſo that to denote a man leſs happy than unhappy, it is ſufficient that he is afflicted with three evils for thirty felicities which he enjoys, if thoſe three evils, as little in themſelves as you pleaſe, give him more diſturbance than the thirty felicities, as great in their own nature as you pleaſe, afford him pleaſure. The government of a province is in itſelf a much greater good than a ribbon; and yet if a Duke and Peer ſhould feel more joy in receiving a ribbon from his miſtreſs, than in obtaining the government of a province from his King; I affirm that a ribbon would be a greater good to him than the authority of a governor. For the ſame reaſon it would be a greater evil for him to be deprived of this ribbon, than to be deprived of his poſt, if he ſhould be more grieved at the loſs of the ribbon than at that of his poſt. On this account no man is able to judge aright, either of the miſery or happineſs of his neighbour (83). We do not know what another feels, we only know the outward cauſes of evil and good: now theſe cauſes are not always proportioned to their effects; thoſe which ſeem to us very ſmall, frequently produce a lively ſenſe; and thoſe which appear to us great, very often occaſion but a faint one. The following words of Tacitus are really an oracle: ' Neque mala vel bona quæ vulgus ' putet: multos qui conflictari adverſis videantur, ' beatos, ac pleroſque quamquam magnas per opes ' miſerrimos, ſi illi gravem fortunam conſtanter tole' rent, hi proſpera inconſultè utantur (84). - - - Neither ' are theſe things good or evil which the vulgar deems to ' be ſuch. Many who ſtruggle with adverſities, are ' happy, if they bear their afflictions with reſolution, and ' moſt of thoſe who abound in riches are very miſerable, ' if they make an imprudent uſe of their proſperity.' We muſt only extend the ſignification of the word, inconſultè, ſo that it may comprehend the diſpoſition of the temper which makes us poſſeſs the favours of fortune with uneaſineſs or without joy.

All this ſhews that none can determine poſitively whether his neighbour's deſtiny be drawn out of Homer's two veſſels (85), in ſuch a manner, that the doſe of good be as large, or perhaps larger than that of evil. All that can be ſaid with full certainty, is, that no man's fate was ever drawn wholly out of the good veſſel. I ſhall cite an excellent paſſage of Pauſanias on this ſubject; it is the reflexion which he made upon hearing that one Aglaus was happy during the courſe of his life. Ὃν δὲ ἤκουσα ἐν Ψωφῖδι ἐπὶ Ἀγλαῷ λόγον ἀνδρὶ Ψωφιδίῳ κατὰ Κροῖσον τὸν Λυδὸν, ὡς ὁ Ἀγλαὸς τὸν χρόνον τοῦ βίου πάντα γένοιτο εὐδαίμων, οὔ με ἔπειθεν ὁ λόγος. Ἀλλὰ ἀνθρώπων μὲν τῶν ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ κακὰ ἄν τις ἐλάσσονα ἀναδέξαιτο, καθὰ καὶ ναῦς ἧσσον ἂν χειμασθεὶν νεὼς ἄλλης· ἄνδρα δὲ συμφορῶν ἀεὶ στάντα ἐκτὸς ἢ τὰ πάντα οὐρίῳ ναῦν χρησαμένην πνεύματι, οὐκ ἔστιν ὅπως δυνησόμεθα ἐξευρεῖν. Ἐπεὶ καὶ Ὅμηρος κατακείμενον παρὰ τῷ Διῒ ἀγαθῶν πίθον, τὸν δὲ ἕτερον κακῶν ἐποίησεν· ὑπὸ τοῦ ἐν Δηλφοῖς θεοῦ δεδιδαγμένος, ὃς αὐτὸν ποτὲ Ὅμηρον κακοδαίμονά τε προσεῖπε καὶ ὄλβιον, ὡς φύντα ἐπὶ ἀμφοτέροις ὁμοίως (86). Quod vero Pſophide audivi Aglaum Pſophidium, ſicuti & Crœſum (87) Lydorum regem, vitam omni ſuæ ætatis tempore beatam egiſſe, id ego ut credam non facile adducor. Nam ut hominum quis levioribus multo, quam alius quiſquam qui iiſdem vixerit temporibus, incommodis affectus, non difficilimè fortaſſe reperiatur, uti navis adverſis tempeſtatibus minus agitata: ſic propemodum neminem unquam crediderim perpetuò moleſtiarum & calamitatum immunem fuiſſe: quando neque ulla navis memorari poſſit, quæ ſemper ſecundiſſimis uſa fuerit tempeſtatibus. Nam & Homerus id ſenſiſſe videtur, quo loco duo, bonorum unum, alterum malorum, dolia apud Jovem ſtatuit. id enim ille ex Delphico Apolline didicerat; qui ipſum & miſerum ſimul, & beatum dixerat, utpote ad utramque vitæ ſortem genitum. - - - What I have heard at Pſophis, concerning Aglaus, a man of that city, who lived in the time of Crœſus, King of Lydia, that this Aglaus was happy through the whole courſe of his life, ſeemed to me incredible. One man indeed may meet with fewer afflictions than other men, as one ſhip may ſuffer leſs in a ſtorm than another. But that any man ſhould be continually free from troubles and diſtreſſes, is as incredible, and contrary to experience, as that ever there was a ſhip which always enjoyed favourable winds. Homer ſays that there lies by Jupiter an urn containing good things; but he places by him another containing evil things. This he learned from Apollo of Delphos, who pronounced, that Homer himſelf was both an unhappy and a happy man, and was born both to a good and a bad fate. As this Aglaus was living in Crœſus's time, it is no wonder that Solon omitted him, when he named to that Monarch three men who to him ſeemed happy (88), for he believed that to deſerve ſuch a title, one ought to be ſheltered from the inconſtancy of fortune, and that, during this life no man is ſecure from this inconſtancy. If Solon had affirmed that thoſe three men, never felt either grief or pain, he had been miſtaken (89), and had contradicted that profound good ſenſe which made him look for inſtances of happineſs, not at the court of Crœſus, but amongſt men of an ordinary condition.

It is certain that thoſe who would find perſons, who have felt more happineſs than uneaſineſs, will rather meet with them among the peaſants, or the meaneſt tradeſmen, than amongſt Kings and Princes (90). Read theſe words of a great man: ' Do you believe then ' that afflictions and the moſt deadly pains do not ' hide themſelves under the purple, or that a kingdom ' is an univerſal remedy againſt all evils, balm that ' aſſuages them, or a charm which enchants them? ' Whereas, by the courſe of Divine providence, which ' knows how to counterpoiſe the moſt exalted condi' tions, this grandeur which we at a diſtance admire, ' as ſomething more than human, affects leſs thoſe ' who are born in it, or confounds itſelf in it's own ' plenty; and, on the contrary, in grandeur, afflictions ' are more deeply felt; their blow is ſo much the ' heavier on great men, as they are leſs prepared to ' bear it (91).' Theſe are the two ſources of the unhappineſs of Princes: their being continually accuſtomed to the advantages of their condition, renders them inſenſible as to good, and very ſenſible of evil. Let them receive one piece of bad news, and three of good, they ſcarce feel the happineſs of the latter, but are touched to the quick with the misfortune of the former. Can they then want uneaſineſſes? Are their proſperities not thwarted by ſome ill fortune? Read all that Guſtavus Adolphus did in Germany, and you will there find a ſuperiority of fortune, which has very few examples; yet you will obſerve ſo great a mixture of diſadvantageous events, that you will eaſily believe him to have run through a great deal of uneaſineſs (92). Nay, ſuppoſe the victories gained in ſome provinces, do not concur with the loſſes ſuſtained in others, you will have reaſon to believe that the joy is not pure and unmixed. An hundred anxious reflexions diſturb it. People will imagine that the attack was made too ſoon or too late; too many men were loſt, and all advantage was not taken of the diſorder of the vanquiſhed, but they were permitted to recover from their fright; and they believe that by a different conduct the victory had been more compleat. How many Generals are there who have very uneaſy nights after entire victories? They are ſenſible that they are beholden for them to ſome lucky chance, to the PRINCES and great men are not ſo happy as other people.

---

(82) I have quoted his words in the article TULLIA, citat. (83).

(83) Felicitas cui præcipua fuerit homini non eſt humani judicii: cum proſperitatem ipſam alius alio modo & ſuopte ingenio quiſque terminet. Plin. lib. vii, cap. xl, pag. m. 62.

(84) Tacitus, Annal. lib. vi, cap. xxii.

(85) See the article MANICHEES, remark [C].

(86) Pauſanias, lib. viii, pag. 256.

(87) This is not well tranſlated by Romulus Amaſæus. It ſhould be, tempore Crœſi. This fault has not been mended in the Leipſic edition, 1696.

(88) Plutarch. in Solone, pag. 93.

(89) See, above, in citation (86), the words of Pauſanias.

(90) See Horace, Epodon Ode II.

(91) James Benignus Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux, Oraiſon funebre de Marie Tereſe d'Auſtriche, Reine de France, pag. 78, 79. Dutch edition.

(92) He was obliged to publiſh ſome Manifeſto's againſt thoſe who blamed him for not preventing the taking of Magdeburg.

kind with an infinite number of agreeable conveniencies, and appointed all other things for fault of the enemy, and ſometimes even to their own faults. They are ſenſible they have not done all that might have been done. They are apprehenſive of the comments of the experienced, and of the malicious reflexions of their enemies. In a word, they cannot bear a good teſtimony to themſelves, nor interternally applaud the elogies beſtowed upon them. This diſturbs and racks them. Whilſt their conſciences are ſometimes aſleep, with regard to the law of God, they are touched to the very quick with reſpect to the tranſgreſſion of ſome laws in the art of war, and the non-obſervance of ſome rules which an expert General would have followed. Obſerve, that the moſt fortunate Princes, either in gaining of battles, or conquering of towns, are thoſe, whom the defeat of an army, or the raiſing of a ſiege, afflict the moſt ſenſibly. A long train of adverſities hardens others; but theſe grow almoſt inſenſible as to good ſucceſs, and extremely ſenſible of the leaſt diſgraces. Auguſtus is an example of this. On a thouſand occaſions he obtained the moſt important and glorious advantages over his enemies that he could have wiſhed, and ſcarce experienced any of the effects of bad fortune: but the loſs of three legions ſo prodigiouſly afflicted him, that the pain, we may ſay, he ſuffered on this account, was greater than the pleaſure which he had felt by ten victories. Read what follows: 'Graves ignominias cladeſque, ſaith Suetonius, after having made a long enumeration of the ſucceſſes of this Emperor, duas omnino, nec alibi quam in Germania, accepit, Lollianam, & Varianam: Sed Lollianam majoris infamiæ quam detrimenti: Varianam pæne exitiabilem, tribus legionibus, cum duce, legatiſque, & auxiliis omnibus cæſis. Hæc nuntiata, excubias per urbem indixit, ne quis tumultus exiſteret: & Præſidibus provinciarum propagavit imperium, ut & à peritis & aſſuetis ſocii continerentur. Vovit & magnos ludos Jovi Opt. Max. SI REMPUBLICAM IN MELIOREM STATUM VERTISSET: quod factum Cimbrico Marſicoque bello erat. Adeo namque conſternatum ferunt, ut per continuos menſes barba capilloque ſummiſſo, caput interdum foribus illideret, vociferans; Quintili Vare, legiones redde: diemque cladis quotannis mœſtum habuerit ac lugubrem (93). - - - Auguſtus met only with two diſgraces, viz. the overthrow of Lollius and that of Varus, both in Germany. The former was attended with more infamy than loſs. The latter was almoſt fatal, for in it were ſlain three legions, with their General, the Ambaſſadors, and all their auxilliaries. Upon the arrival of this news, Auguſtus ſet a guard in ſeveral parts of the city, to prevent tumults, and enlarged the authority of the governors of the provinces, that they might keep the allies from making commotions. He likewiſe made a vow of inſtituting ſolemn games to Jupiter, IF HE BROUGHT THE REPUBLIC INTO A BETTER CONDITION: This was done in the war with the Cimbrians, and the Marſi. It is reported that Auguſtus was ſo much affected with this diſgrace, that having, for ſeveral months, neglected his beard and hair, he would ſometimes knock his head againſt the wall, and cry out, Varus, reſtore my legions; and he annually held the day of that overthrow as a day of ſadneſs and mourning.' I cannot better prove, than by the example of Auguſtus, that we ought not to look for happy people upon the throne; for, if any monarch was ever fortune's favourite, it was Auguſtus; and yet the liſt of his griefs (94) is ſo large, that no one will deny, that at leaſt he felt as much evil as good. See what I obſerve concerning Charles V (95), Queen Elizabeth (96), Lewis XI (97), and Lewis XIII (98). Mr Silhon ſaith judiciouſly, that the whole lives of the Emperors, Ferdinand, Charles V, and Philip II, were nothing but a mixture of good and evil; that in them we ſee proſperities without number, and misfortunes without meaſure; wounds covered with laurels, and triumphs adorned with mourning . . . . Look upon Ferdinand, proud of the reduction of the kingdom of Granada, and of obtaining the title of Catholic: ſee him triumphing in the conqueſt of Naples, and over the fortune of France: behold, a caprice gives him Navarre, and chance guides him to the diſcovery of an unknown world, and new riches . . . But let us conſider the other ſide of his life, and turn the tables. We ſhall ſee a prince ill treated by fortune, and a diadem broken by her blows. We ſhall ſee a father burying his only ſon, and ſolemnizing the funeral of his eldeſt daughter. A huſband loſing a wife, who had been his glory, and more the companion of his fatigues than of his bed. A maſter forſaken by his ſervants and creatures: An old man driven from his houſe, and a father-in-law deſpoiled and ſtripped by his own ſon-in-law (99). Add to this, that he could not bear the reputation of a great Captain. And this jealouſy was not the leaſt of his uneaſineſſes. See in the original what Mr Silhon ſaith of Charles V (100), and Philip II. And ſee what Plutarch relates of a great Prince who was eſteemed happy (101).

The Abbot Regnier had great reaſon to ſay (102),

Qu'ont ils d'ordinaire,
Qu'ont ills au deſſus
Du deſtin vulgaire
Ceux qu'un ſort proſpére
Eleve le plus?
Une montre vaine
De grandeur humaine,
Qui marche avec eux,
Des dehors pompeux,
Brillants agréables,
Des ſoins devorants,
Des beins apparents,
Des maux véritables.
Les grands en un mot
N'ont pas le bon Lot.

The man whom fortune raiſes high
In pow'r, or wealth, or dignity,
Say what has he above the fate
Of other men in humble ſtate?
What but a pageant outſide ſhow
Of human grandeur does he know?
Devouring cares, apparent bliſs,
Not one degree of happineſs:
Whilſt anxious thoughts, and miſery
Lie hid beneath the pageantry.
In ſhort, the truly happy ſtate
Is not the portion of the great.

The following words of the Count de Buſſi ſtruck me the firſt time that I read them: 'When you and I ſhall no longer have upon our hands the expence of the war for our children, we ſhall meet with other troubles in time of peace; for, in ſhort, we muſt have ſome. Hear our friend Comines talking on this ſubject of the croſſes of human life. No creature is exempt from trouble, all eat their bread in pain and ſorrow; our Lord promiſed it when he made man, and hath faithfully performed it to all ſorts of people (103).' If Philip de Comines had been aſked, Do you believe that Kings have a larger ſhare in the execution of this promiſe of our Lord than other men? I am throughly perſuaded that he would have anſwered, Yes, I believe it (104).

What I have been ſaying of Kings, may, in proportion, be ſaid of all thoſe whom providence raiſes to eminent poſts, and who ſhare in any kind of grandeur. Their lot is a mixture, in which evil is for the moſt part predominant. Great knowledge and a ſublime genius do not exempt men from this fatality. No, look rather amongſt the moſt ignorant rabble, than among illuſtrious learned men for happineſs: the glory that ſurrounds authors and celebrated orators, doth not ſecure them from a thouſand troubles. It expoſes them to envy two ſeveral ways, which are very inconvenient. They have rivals who perſecute them, and are jealous, in their turn, of the praiſes which others deſerve; a Typographical error gives them more diſturbance, than four letters full of elogies can afford them pleaſure. The glory which they have acquired diminiſhes the pleaſure they take in being praiſed, and increaſes their uneaſineſs for the want of praiſe, for cenſure, ſharing of fame, &c. Beſides, the more learning they have, the more they know for their uſe, conſider man in another reſpect as an unhappy being [G]. That kind of neceſſity to which ſo many people are reduced, of ſeeking a remedy for their uneaſineſs among

---

(93) Suetonius, in Auguſto, cap. 23.

(94) You will find it in Pliny, lib. vii, cap. xlv.

(95) In the remark [L], of his article.

(96) In the remark [S], of her article.

(97) In the remark [T], of his article.

(98) In the remark [B], of his article.

(99) Silhon, Miniſtre d'Etat, livr. ii, Diſcours iii, pag. 135, Dutch edition.

(100) He is in the wrong to call him Ferdinand's nephew. He was deceived by ſome Latin book, wherein he found that Charles V, was nepos, that is, grandſon to Ferdinand.

(101) It is Agamemnon. See Plutarch, de tranquillitate animi, pag. 466, 471. Read the whole Diſſertation of la Mothe le Vayer, upon Proſperity, in the eighth volume of his Works.

(102) In a piece of Poetry, prefixed to Mr Leti's Critique ſur les Loteries.

(103) Buſſi Rabutin's xviith letter of the firſt Part, pag. 281, Dutch edition.

(104) See the laſt chapter, and the concluſion of his Memoirs.

---

that their works are imperfect. If they guard againſt the weakneſs of prejudices, and the irregularities of a hundred mean paſſions, and are willing to conform their language and conduct to this temper of mind, they become odious, and muſt renounce all external advantages. If they externally conform to the depraved taſte of the world, they reproach themſelves a hundred times a day with this ignominious hypocriſy, and thereby diſturb their quiet. There are very few who, like Democritus, can know the extravagance of humours, and divert themſelves with it: that Philoſopher was maſter of this talent. Read Hippocrates's letter to Damagetes, and add to it the paraphraſe upon it which an author of the XVIth century (105) publiſhed. He elegantly and particularly unfolds what the Greek author had ſaid in general. He diverted himſelf with this cenſure, one may perceive that he was vexed, and that if he had been aſked,

> Quelle humeur ſombre
> Fais tu voir à contretems ?
>
> What puts you ſo much out of humour ?

He might have ſaid

> C'eſt que je ne ſuis point du nombre
> Des Auteurs qui ſont contens (106).
>
> I am not a contented author.

Pauſanias (107) mentions the oracle which was delivered to Homer, You are happy and unhappy. Apollo could not anſwer better.

It is time to put an end to theſe common-places. Give me leave then to conclude with four remarks. The firſt is, that if we conſider mankind in general, it ſeems that Xenophanes might have ſaid, that pain and grief prevail over pleaſure. II. That there are ſome private perſons, who we may preſume, taſte in this life much more good than evil. III. That there are others of whom we may believe, that they have a much larger ſhare of evil than good. IV. That my ſecond propoſition is more eſpecially probable, with reſpect to thoſe who die before their declining age; and that the third appears chiefly certain in thoſe who arrive to a decrepit old age. When Racan ſaid,

> Que pour eux ſeulement les Dieux ont fait la gloire,
> Et pour nous les plaiſirs (108).
>
> For them alone the gods have glory made,
> And for us pleaſures.

Doubtleſs he conſidered only the flower of our age; it is then that pleaſures are predominant; and that good turns the ſcale (109): it is then that the Pagan Nemeſis makes advances, and gives credit: ſhe is then willing that accounts ſhould be ſettled without any deduction; but ſhe reimburſes her ſelf in old age.

> Multa ſenem circumveniunt incommoda, vel quòd
> Quærit, & inventis miſer abſtinet, ac timet uti:
> Vel quòd res omnes timide gelideque miniſtrat,
> Dilator ſpe longus, iners, aviduſque futuri:
> Difficilis, querulus, laudator temporis acti
> Se puero, cenſor caſtigatorque minorum.
> Multa ferunt anni venientes commoda ſecum,
> Multa recedentes adimunt (110).
>
> An old man's character is hit with eaſe
> For he is peeviſh, and all one diſeaſe:
> Still covetous, and ſtill he gripes for more,
> And yet he fears to uſe his preſent ſtore:
> Slow, long in hope, ſtill eager to live on,
> And fond of no man's judgment but his own:
> On youth's gay frolics peeviſhly ſevere,
> And oh! when he was young, what times they were!
>
> The flow of life brings in a wealthy ſtore,
> The ebb draws back whate'er was brought before,
> And leaves a barren ſand and naked ſhore.
>
> Creech.

This Poet hath not ſaid all, nor was it neceſſary for him to touch on the diſadvantage of old age which Juvenal diſplays.

> Ut vigeant ſenſus animi, ducenda tamen ſunt
> Funera natorum, rogus aſpiciendus amatæ
> Conjugis, & fratris, plenæque ſororibus urnæ.
> Hæc data pœna diu viventibus, ut renovata
> Semper clade domus, multis in luctibus, inque
> Perpetuo mœrore, & nigra veſte ſeneſcant (111).
>
> Well, yet ſuppoſe his ſenſes were his own,
> He lives to be chief mourner for his ſon:
> Before his face his wife and brother burns,
> He numbers all his kindred in their urns.
> Theſe are the fines he pays for living long,
> And dragging tedious age in his own wrong:
> Griefs always green, a houſhold ſtill in tears,
> Sad pomps: a threſhold throng'd with daily biers
> And liveries of black for length of years.
>
> Dryden.

Add to this that paſſage of Virgil:

> Optima quæque dies miſeris mortalibus ævi
> Prima fugit: ſubeunt morbi, triſtiſque ſenectus;
> Et labor, & duræ rapit inclementia mortis (112).
>
> In youth alone unhappy mortals live;
> But ah! the mighty bliſs is fugitive.
> Diſcolour'd ſickneſs, anxious labour come,
> And age and death's inexorable doom.
>
> Dryden.

Obſerve, that Racan advanced a maxim which contradicts the greateſt of the antient Poets, for ſee what Homer ſaith:

> Ὡς γὰρ ἐπλεκώσαντο θεοὶ δειλοῖσι βροτοῖσι,
> Ζώειν ἀχνυμένους· αὐτοὶ δέ τ᾽ ἀκηδέες εἰσί.
>
> Sic enim fato tribuunt dii miſeris mortalibus,
> Ut vivant triſtes: ipſi vero ſine curis ſunt (113).
>
> . . . . man is born to bear,
> Such is, alas! the gods ſevere decree
> They, only they are bleſs'd, and only free.
>
> Mr Pope.

[G] Even thoſe who believe that nature . . . appointed all other things for their uſe, conſider man . . . as an unhappy being.] Have we not ſeen, above (114), that Pliny, after a prologue which allows the ſuperiority to our ſpecies, places it in a worſe condition than all other animals, with regard to diſadvantages? Could Seneca, who ſo well repreſents the favours which God beſtows on men (115), have denied Pliny's obſervation? Could Socrates, who ſo advantageouſly deſcribed the prerogatives of human nature, have denied them? ‘ Thou thinkeſt,’ ſaid he to a diſciple who denied Providence, ‘ that the gods take no care ‘ of man, they who have allowed him alone the privilege of going erect, which is of great advantage ‘ to him in diſcovering things at a diſtance, in conſidering things above at his eaſe, and avoiding many ‘ inconveniencies. In the next place, all animals ‘ which walk have indeed feet; but they ſerve them ‘ for no other uſe than barely to walk. Whereas the ‘ gods, beſides this, have given hands to man, which ‘ render him the happieſt animal in the world. All ‘ animals have tongues; but there is none beſides that ‘ of man, that can form words, to explain his ‘ thoughts, and communicate them to others. And ‘ to

(105) Alardus Amſtelredamus. This paraphraſe upon the Epiſtle of Hippocrates was compoſed in the abbey of Egmond in Holland, in the year 1526. The edition I make uſe of was printed Salingiaci apud Joannem Soterem, 1539, in 8vo.

(106) Theſe verſes are in one of Quinaut's Operas. I only change the word Amans into that of Auteurs.

(107) See his own words above, in citation (86).

(108) See his letter to Balzac, in the ſecond tome of the Recueil de Lettres nouvelles, printed at Paris in 1634, pag. 300.

(109) This is not contrary to that paſſage of the Pſalmiſt: Even the flower of this life is ſuch; that we are always in pain and ſorrow: for Moſes only repreſented the ſtate of the Jews at that time.

(110) Horat. de Arte Poëtica, ver. 169.

(111) Juvenal. Sat. X, ver. 240.

(112) Virgil. Georgic. lib. iii, ver. 66.

(113) Homer. Iliad. lib. xxiv, ver. 525.

(114) Remark [D], at the beginning.

(115) See, above, citations (77), (78).

among forbidden pleaſures, is no ſmall part of the ſeverity of their fate [H]. However, we may here alledge the authority of Ariſtotle; for that great genius, who philoſophized with ſo much application, and penetration, acknowledged that there was in nature more evil than good, and that therefore Empedocles diſliked the hypotheſis of the unity of a principle, and firſt ſuppoſed two principles, one of good, the other of evil [I]. The Holy Scripture ſo emphatically repreſents the miſeries of this life (m), that it is ſufficient to afford a demonſtrative argument on this controverſy. I wonder Rabbi Maimonides, a man of great learning and judgment, and a good Philoſopher, could think that he had fully refuted the doctrine I mention [K]. It is not improbable that Xenophanes believed the

‘ to ſhew that the gods have provided even for our pleaſures, they have not determined the ſeaſon for the amours of men, who may continually enjoy, till their extreme old age, a pleaſure which the brutes taſte only at a certain ſeaſon of the year. Laſtly, not content to beſtow ſo many advantages on the body of man, they have endowed him with a ſoul, tranſcendently excellent, and ſurpaſſing all others. For which, amongſt the ſouls of other animals hath any knowledge of the eſſence of the gods, the works of whoſe creation are ſo ſtupendous? Is there any other ſpecies, beſides that of man, that ſerves and adores them? What animal like him can defend it ſelf from hunger, thirſt, cold, and heat? Which of them like us can diſcover remedies againſt diſeaſes, or exerciſe his ſtrength? Which of them is ſo capable of learning, or ſo perfectly retains the things which he hath ſeen, heard, or known? In a word, it is clear that man is a god in compariſon with other living ſpecies, conſidering the advantages of body and mind, which he naturally hath over them (116).’ It is very likely that after this beautiful deſcription, he would have owned the deplorable condition of man, if he had been deſired to examine the matter throughly.

[H] Of ſeeking a remedy for their uneaſineſs among forbidden pleaſures.] Is not this removing a Phyſical evil by a moral one? Is not ſuch a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe? And is not the man very miſerable, who can have recourſe to no other remedy than this? It is very certain that a great many people find no other. Domeſtic brawls, and the ſight of an ill management at home force men out of doors to gaming, or to drinking at the tavern. Without that they cannot drive away their melancholy; and that is the ſole diverſion which they oppoſe againſt uneaſineſs. Some even get drunk on purpoſe to avoid uneaſy thoughts at night, the time when they are moſt troubleſome. They have found that ſuch thoughts keep them from ſleeping, and make them too cruelly attentive to their miſery. Therefore by wine they procure themſelves a perfect drouzineſs. This is ſo much gained from ill fortune; this is ſecuring the moſt formidable part of the whole day. Generally ſpeaking, women cannot make uſe of this antidote to anxiety, and therefore their condition is more deplorable than that of men. Whence Medea declares in Euripides, that a woman ill married is in ſuch a miſerable condition, that it is better for her to die than continue in it; ſhe cannot, like the men, go abroad in queſt of neceſſary conſolations.

Κἂν μὲν τάδ᾽ ἡμῖν ἐκπονουμέναισιν εὖ
Πόσις ξυνοικῇ, μὴ βίᾳ φέρων ζυγὸν,
Ζηλωτὸς αἰών εἰ δὲ μὴ, θανεῖν χρεών.
‘ Ἀνὴρ δ᾽ ὅταν τοῖς ἔνδον ἄχθηται ξυνὼν,
‘ Ἔξω μολὼν ἔπαυσε καρδίας χόλον,
‘ Ἢ πρὸς φίλων τιν᾽, ἢ πρὸς ἥλικα τραπείς.
‘ Ἡμῖν δ᾽ ἀνάγκη πρὸς μίαν ψυχὴν βλέπειν.

Et ſi nobis hæc quidem peragentibus bene
Cohabitaverit maritus, non violentum nobis imponens jugum,
Beata eſt vita: ſin minus, ſatius eſt mori.
‘ Vir vero cum dolet propter res domeſticas,
‘ Foras egreſſus ſedat cordis bilem,
‘ Converſus aut ad aliquem amicum, aut coætaneum,
‘ Sed nos oportet ſpectare ad unam animam (117).

. . . . . If, when
The careful conſort rules her houſhould well,
Her huſband governs with a gentle ſway,
And courts her lov'd embrace; what home-felt joy,
What inward comforts ſeize her raptur'd breaſt!
But if, he, ſcornful, ſlights her converſe ſweet,
'Tis better for her far to die than live.
Man when oppreſs'd with black domeſtic cares,
Ranges abroad to ſeek relief, and meets
The healing comforts of a faithful friend,
Or fellowſhip of ſome companion dear.
But helpleſs, hapleſs, woman, when denied
Thoſe tender joys which from her huſband's love
She juſtly claims, muſt ſeek it no where elſe.

[I] Ariſtotle . . . acknowledged that there was in nature more evil than good, and that therefore Empedocles . . . firſt ſuppoſed two principles, one of good, the other of evil.] Before I cite his words, I muſt obſerve, that he takes the liberty of unravelling Empedocles's opinion, and explaining it according to the ſpirit, rather than the letter of it; but after all he takes for granted, that good is the cauſe of all good, and evil the cauſe of all evil. The two principles of Empedocles, were amity and diſcord: Ἐπεὶ δὲ καὶ τἀναντία τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἐνόντα ἐφαίνετο ἐν τῇ φύσει, καὶ οὐ μόνον τάξις, καὶ τὸ καλὸν, ἀλλ᾽ ἀταξία, καὶ τὸ αἰσχρὸν, καὶ πλείω τὰ κακὰ τῶν ἀγαθῶν, καὶ τὰ φαῦλα τῶν καλῶν. οὕτως ἄλλός τις φιλίαν εἰσήνεγκε, καὶ τὸ νεῖκος, ἑκάτερον ἑκατέρων αἴτιον τούτων. εἰ γάρ τις ἀκαλουθοίη, καὶ λαμβάνοι πρὸς τὴν διάνοιαν, καὶ μὴ πρὸς ἃ ψελλίζεται λέγων Ἐμπεδοκλῆς, εὑρήσει τὴν μὲν φιλίαν εἶναι τῶν ἀγαθῶν, τὸ δὲ νεῖκος τῶν κακῶν. ὥστ᾽ εἴτις φαίη τρόπον τινὰ καὶ λέγειν, καὶ πρῶτον λέγειν τὸ κακὸν καὶ τὸ ἀγαθὸν ἀρχὰς Ἐμπεδοκλέα. τάχ᾽ ἂν λέγοι καλῶς. εἴπερ τὸ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἁπάντων αἴτιον, αὐτὸ τὸ ἀγαθόν ἐστι, καὶ τῶν κακῶν, τὸ κακόν. Cùm autem contraria quoque bonis ineſſe naturæ apparerent, nec ſolùm ordo, & pulchrum, verùm etiam inordinatio, & turpe, pluraque mala, quàm bona, & turpia quàm pulchra, ideò alius quidam amicitiam introduxit, & contentionem, utrunque utriuſque horum cauſam. Si quis enim ſequatur, & ſecundùm ſententiam accipiat, non ſecundùm ea, quæ balbutiens Empedocles dicit, inveniet amicitiam quidem bonorum cauſam eſſe, contentionem verò malorum. Quare ſi quis dicat quodam modo dicere, & primum Empedoclem dicere malum, & bonum eſſe principia, fortaſſe bene inquiet: ſiquidem bonorum omnium cauſa, ipſum bonum, ac malorum, ipſum malum eſt (118). - - - As there appear in nature things which are contrary and oppoſite to good ones, and we obſerve not only order and beauty, but alſo diſorder and deformity, and more things evil than good, more things deformed than beautiful; ſo there muſt be two diſtinct principles, one the cauſe of amity, and the other of diſcord. For if you take the ſenſe and ſpirit of this opinion, and not the inaccurate expreſſions of Empedocles, it will appear that amity is the cauſe of good, and diſcord of evil. Therefore, if any one ſhould ſay that Empedocles affirmed, in ſome reſpect, and was the firſt who affirmed that there are two principles, one good, the other evil, perhaps he would be in the right: for the principle of all good things is a good principle, and that of all evil things, is an evil one. Obſerve that he elſewhere (119) cenſures this opinion of Empedocles, and that he did not believe that there was any eternal principle of evil; for he affirms (120), that there is nothing but good in the eternal Beings.

[K] I wonder Rabbi Maimonides . . . . could think that he had fully refuted the doctrine I mention.] He confeſſes that the Heathens, and even ſome of the Rabbins, made declamations on the ſuperiority of evil, and he treats them as ridiculous and ſenſeleſs men. ‘ Sæpiſſime, ſaith he (121), ſolent in cordibus hominum imperitorum iſtiuſmodi cogitationes exſurgere, ac ſi longè plura eſſent in mundo Mala quam Bona: ‘ ita

---

(m) See particularly the book of Job, and that of the Pſalms in ſeveral places.

(116) Xenophon. de memorab. Socrat. lib. i.

(117) Euripid. in Medea, ver. 241, pag. m. 276.

(118) Ariſtoteles, Metaphyſ. lib. i, cap. iv, pag. m. 646.

(119) Id. ibid. lib. xii, cap. x, pag. 745.

(120) Id. ibid. lib. ix, cap. ix, pag. 717.

(121) Moſes Maimonides in More Nevochim, Part. iii, cap. xii, pag. m. 354, 355.

the incomprehenſibility of all things [L]. He gave the Egyptians good advice, when he ſaw them lamenting in the celebration of their feſtivals: if the objects of your worſhip, ſaid he (n), are gods, do not weep: if they are men, offer no ſacrifices to them.

Others

ita ut in multis poëmatis & cantilenis Gentilium hæc & ſimilia reperiantur; Miraculi inſtar eſſe, quando in Tempore boni aliquid invenitur: Mala autem eſſe multa & perpetua. Atque hic error non ſolùm in Vulgo obtinuit, verùm etiam apud eos, qui Sapientes haberi volunt, & apud ipſum Alraſi in libro illo celebri, quem Sepher Elohuth h. e. Theoſophiam nominavit, in quo multa ex deliriis & ſtoliditatibus ſuis congeſſit, è quibus & iſtud eſt, quòd plura exiſtant Mala quàm Bona; eò quòd, ſi comparationem inſtituas inter recreationes & voluptates Hominis, quas tempore tranquillitatis percipit, cum doloribus, cruciatibus, perturbationibus, defectibus, curis, ſollicitudinibus, & afflictionibus, deprehendatur, vitam Hominis illorum bonorum reſpectu, eſſe Vindictam magnam & Malum magnum. - - - There ariſe very frequently in the minds of ignorant men ſuch thoughts as this, that there is far more evil than good in the world; and accordingly in the poems and ſongs of the Heathens, we very often meet with theſe and the like expreſſions; It is as it were a miracle, if good things continue for any time: but evil things are numerous and laſting. This error prevailed not only among the vulgar, but even among thoſe who deſired to be thought wiſe men, and was held by Alraſi himſelf, as appears from that famous book of his called The wiſdom of God, where he has collected together a great many of his own delirious and fooliſh conceits, and this among others, that there is in the world more evil than good, becauſe if you compare the recreations and pleaſures of any man, ſuch as he enjoys in times of health and peace, with his pains, torments, diſorders, wants, cares, anxieties, and afflictions, it will appear that his life, compared with theſe good things, is a great puniſhment, and a great evil.’ He ſays that the cauſe of their extravagant error is (22), that they fancy nature was made only for them, and do not mind that which has no reference to their perſons, from whence they infer that if any thing goes ill with them, all is amiſs in the univerſe. He adds, that if we would conſider the ſmallneſs of man, with reſpect to the univerſe, we ſhould be ſoon convinced that the ſuperiority of evil has no place among the angels or the celeſtial bodies, nor among the elements and the mixt inanimate beings, nor among ſeveral ſorts of animals. This obſervation of Maimonides doth not come home to the queſtion; for thoſe whom he refutes mean nothing elſe but that among men evil ſurpaſſes good. What doth it avail then in order to convince them of their error, to ſay that evil doth not ſurpaſs good in the reſt of nature? All inanimate bodies are incapable of good and evil; they muſt not therefore be put into the account when this queſtion is in diſpute: and there is no body but may maintain, that all in which we place the order, beauty, and perfection of the celeſtial bodies, &c, being changed, it would be no evil with reſpect to the univerſe, though man, or ſome other particular creatures, ſhould ſuffer damage by it. If the ſun and the planets, had the ſame variation as the ſhips, which go and come between Marſeilles and Naples, ſometimes in fewer and ſometimes in more days, without any fixed rule, could not one pretend, that, with reſpect to the univerſe, it is not an evil, an imperfection and a diſorder?

After this Maimonides ſays that the evils of mankind may be reduced to three claſſes: the firſt comprehends thoſe which proceed from man's having a body: the ſecond, thoſe which proceed from the machinations of men againſt each other: the third are thoſe which a man brings on himſelf by his own fault. He makes fine remarks on all this, but they are foreign to the queſtion; for the diſpute is not about the cauſe of man's unhappineſs, but whether this be matter of fact, that the evils which he ſuffers ſurpaſs the good things he enjoys. It ſignifies nothing to tell us that we our ſelves are the cauſe of our misfortunes, that we often afflict our ſelves without any reaſon; and that the pleaſures of life are numberleſs, and ſometimes very long; for all this is incapable of ſolving the difficulty. A grain of evil, as I may ſay, ſpoils an hundred pound of good (123); a little piece of iron hot in the ſeventh degree, burns more than an hundred feet hot in the fourth degree. No evil is ſmall when it is felt and conſidered as a great one, and nothing troubles an uneaſy man more than to know, that he has no reaſon to be uneaſy. ‘There is, ſays Mr de St Evremond, a ſort of uneaſineſs of which I cannot imagine the cauſe; and as one does not know how to find the true reaſon of it, I think it very difficult to allay, or to avoid it . . . . Uneaſineſſes of this kind are common to all men: they are ſuch as make us fall out with our ſelves, and ſhewing us that we have no reaſon to be uneaſy, force us, in ſpite of ſelf-love, to confeſs, that we are unjuſt and unreaſonable to our ſelves (124).’

[L] Xenophanes believed the incomprehenſibility of all things.] Let us begin this remark with a paſſage of Diogenes Laërtius: Φησὶ δὲ Σωτίων πρῶτον αυτὸν εἰπεῖν ἀκατάληπτα εἶναι τὰ πάντα, πλανώμενος, that is, Sotion, who ſays that Xenophanes maintained that all things are incomprehenſible, is miſtaken (125). We cannot judge by theſe words whether Diogenes Laërtius denied that Xenophanes held the incomprehenſibility of all things; for he might not deny it, and yet charge Sotion with an error. This accuſation would be juſt, if before Xenocrates others taught that all the objects of our mind are beyond our comprehenſion. There are a thouſand ſuch places in Diogenes Laërtius; they do him but little honour: for an exact genius would avoid theſe ambiguities and obſcurities. I conjecture he intended to ſay that Xenophanes did not teach the incomprehenſibility of all things (126); but at the ſame time I think he is to blame to ſpeak thus of this Philoſopher. All appearances engage us to believe that Xenophanes taught, that we could not comprehend any thing in the nature of things. Plutarch charges him with ſaying, that our ſenſes and reaſon are fallacious faculties. Ἀποφαίνεται δὲ καὶ τὰς αἰσθήσεις ψευδεῖς, καὶ καθόλου σὺν αὐταῖς, καὶ αὐτὸν τὸν λόγον διαβάλλει. Senſus fallaces eſſe contendit, unaque cum illis ipſam quoque rationem in omnibus criminatur (127). Others will have it that he denied the evidence of the ſenſes in order to conclude that nothing ought to be relied upon but reaſon, and they tell us that he was the firſt author of this doctrine. Οἴονται δεῖν τὰς μὲν αἰσθήσεις καὶ τὰς φαντασίας καταβάλλειν, αὐτῷ δὲ μόνον τῷ λόγῳ πιστεύειν. Τοιαῦτα γάρ τινα πρότερον μὲν Ξενοφάνης, καὶ Παρμενίδης . . . . . . ἔλεγον. Senſus viſaque omnia funditus repudianda, rationi uni fidem habendam opinantur. Ac primum quidem Xenophanes, & Parmenides . . . . . in ea ſunt doctrina verſati (128). I believe Plutarch repreſents the ſyſtem of Xenophanes more faithfully than Ariſtocles. I believe Xenophanes relied no more upon reaſon than upon his ſenſes. This is what induces me to think ſo. He was the firſt who taught that whatever has been made is corruptible. Πρῶτος ἀπεφήνατο ὅτι πᾶν τὸ γινόμενον φθαρτόν ἐστὶ. Primus definivit omne quod fiat corruptioni obnoxium eſſe (129). He alſo taught that all things were but one ſole being, that there was neither generation nor corruption; and that this ſole being continued always the ſame, and could not be ſubject to any change (130). Ὅθεν ἠξίουν οὗτοί γε τὸ ὂν ἓν εἶναι, καὶ τὸ μὴ ὂν ἕτερον εἶναι, μηδὲ γεννᾶσθαί τι, μηδὲ φθείρεσθαι, μηδὲ κινεῖσθαι τὸ παράπαν. Hi quicquid eſſet, unum duntaxat eſſe: quod ab eo diverſum eſſet, id non eſſe: generari nihil: nihil corrumpi, moveri omnino nihil ſtatuebant (131). But the following is a more exact account of the principles of Xenophanes, in their natural connexion. Firſt of all he affirmed (132) that nothing is made out of nothing, that is, to remove all ambiguity, that a thing which has not always exiſted can never exiſt. From thence he concluded that whatever is, hath always exiſted: but, added he, what hath always exiſted is eternal; what is eternal is infinite; what is infinite, is but one, for if it contained ſeveral beings, one would terminate the other, and it would not therefore be infinite. Beſides, ſaid he, what is but one, is throughout like it ſelf; for if it comprehended any difference, it would

---

(n) Plutarchus de Superſtit. in fine, pag. 171.

(122) Cauſa erroris fatui illius Hominis & omnium ipſius ſociorum eſt quod, &c. Id. ibid. pag. 355.

(123) The ſea water, whoſe bitterneſs is intolerable, contains 40, or 42, times more ſweet particles than ſalt ones.

(124) Saint Evremond in his diſcourſe of vexations and diſpleaſures. I quote him from the extract of an anonymous writer, who criticiſed that author, pag. 137; for my edition, (Tom. iv, pag. 45) which is the Dutch one, in 1693, contains but part of what that Critic mentions. [(§ a) This piece was falſely aſcribed to Mr de St Evremond. Rem. Crit.]

(125) Diog. Laërtius, lib. ix, num. 20.

(126) See, below, in citation (142), the paſſage of Sextus Empiricus.

(127) Plutarch. in Stromatis, apud Euſebium Præparat. Evangel. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 23, B.

(128) Ariſtocles, de Philoſophia, lib. viii, apud Euſebium, ubi ſupra, lib. xiv, cap. xvii, pag. 756, B.

(129) Diogen. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 19.

(130) See Plato, in Sophiſta, pag. m. 170, C.

(131) Ariſtocles, apud Euſebium, ubi ſupra.

(132) See Ariſtotle's Treatiſe, de Xenophane, Zenone, & Gorgia, init. in the firſt tome of his works, pag. 939; Edit. of Geneva, 1605.

Others ſay (o) that he made uſe of this thought, when the Eleates deſired to know of him whether they ought to ſacrifice to Leucothea, and ſhed tears for her or not. I muſt not be one, but ſeveral beings. Laſtly, this ſole, eternal and infinite being, ought to be immovable, and immutable; for if it could change its place, there would be ſomething beyond it, it would not therefore be infinite: and if it could ſuffer any alteration without changing of place, ſomething that did not always exiſt would begin to be produced, and ſomething which had always exiſted would ceaſe to be. But that is impoſſible; for every thing which not having eternally exiſted ſhould begin to exiſt, muſt be produced out of nothing, and every thing which never had a beginning hath a neceſſary exiſtence; and therefore cannot ever ceaſe to be. Theſe were his principles, if we believe Ariſtotle (133). I do not doubt but they appeared evident to him, and that he was perſuaded they were a gradation of conſequences neceſſarily drawn from an inconteſtable principle. The orthodox Divines would deny him, that nothing can have a beginning; but would grant him that the being which never had a beginning is one only, infinite, immovable, and immutable, and that no being, whoſe exiſtence is neceſſary, can be deſtroyed. They teach, and with reaſon, that God is not ſubject to any alteration? for if any change ſhould happen to him, he would acquire, and loſe ſomething. What he ſhould acquire would be either diſtinct from his ſubſtance, or a mode identical with his ſubſtance. If it was a diſtinct being, God could not be a ſimple being; and, what is worſe, would be compoſed of an increated nature, and, created one (134). If it was a mode identical with his ſubſtance, God could not produce it without producing himſelf: but as he exiſts independently of his own will, and did not give himſelf his exiſtence at the beginning, it follows that he can never do it. Beſides, nothing that neceſſarily exiſts can ever ceaſe to be: from whence it muſt of neceſſity follow, that God never can loſe what he once had. Now what is called a modification, or ens inhærens in alio, is of ſuch a nature that it cannot be produced but by the ruin of another modality; juſt as a new figure is neceſſarily the deſtruction of the old one. Wherefore if God acquired ſomething new, he muſt neceſſarily loſe ſome other thing; for this new acquiſition would not be a ſubſtance, but an accident, or an ens inhærens in alio. Since therefore nothing which neceſſarily exiſts can ceaſe to exiſt, it follows that God can never acquire any thing new. Thus the immutability of God is ſupported by evident notions. Xenophanes added to his maxims the following one, viz. that nothing is made out of nothing; now every accident produced a new, and diſtinct from the divine ſubſtance, would be produced out of nothing. He was therefore obliged to deny that the eternal being could acquire any new mode diſtinct from its own ſubſtance. But he found himſelf very much perplexed when the continual generations in nature were objected to him. They prove both that the univerſe is not one ſole being, and that it contains ſomething mutable, ſince it actually changes. In order to remove this objection, he excepted againſt the evidence of the ſenſes; he urged that they deceive us, that it is not true that there happen any generations in nature, and that they are but falſe appearances. But he was doubtleſs anſwered, that the appearances of the ſenſes would not change at all, if our mind continued always the ſame, and if the beings without us did not change; and therefore at leaſt, what in us is the paſſive ſubject of perceptions, which you call the fallacies of the ſenſes, muſt be mutable and variable: Therefore what you aſſert that there is no change in the univerſe, is not true. I cannot ſee that he could make any other reply than this; our reaſon is as fallacious as our ſenſes, and every thing is incomprehenſible to reaſon. For if when it is grounded even on evidence, which is her ne plus ultra, ſhe doth not hit on truth, it is a ſign that truth is a thing incomprehenſible, and impenetrable. Now relying upon evident notions, I had aſſerted that nothing is made out of nothing; whence it neceſſarily follows that nothing can begin, and that every thing that once exiſts, exiſts always, which evidently proves the immobility, and immutability of all things; I had, I ſay, clearly comprehended this, and yet the experience of my ſenſations and paſſions, convinces me that I am mutable: I had not therefore comprehended any thing with certainty, I have not therefore a faculty adequately proportioned to truth. Thus we may ſuppoſe he reaſoned, and thence we might conclude that the ſect of the Acataleptic (135), and that of the Sceptics, owed their birth ſolely to the principle of the immutable unity of all things maintained by Xenophanes. I do not affirm, that he was in the right in the conſequences juſt mentioned. The only reaſon why I alledge this, is to ſhew that I do not contradict the writer of this Philoſopher's life without juſt reaſons (136). Firſt I have on my ſide the evidence of Sotion (137), Cicero (138), Plutarch (139), and ſome verſes of Xenophanes (140) which were not unknown to Diogenes Laërtius (141). In the ſecond place I may affirm that Xenophanes held ſome principles, which, as I have juſt now given ſeveral proofs of it, neceſſarily engaged him to aſſert the incomprehenſibility of all things. Let us here cite the verſes in which he declares his opinion.

(o) Ariſtot. Rhetoric. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 447, C.

---

> Καὶ τὸ μὲν οὖν σαφὲς οὔτις ἀνὴρ ἴδεν, οὐδέ τις ἔσται
> Εἰδὼς ἀμφὶ θεῶν τε, καὶ ὅσσα λέγω περι πάντων.
> Εἰ γὰρ καὶ τὰ μάλιστα τύχοι τετελεσμένον εἰπὼν
> Αὐτὸς ὅμως οὐκ οἶδε, δόκος δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσι τέτυκται.

> Nullus aperte vir ſcit, ſed neque vir ſciet unquam
> De Diis & cunctis à me quæ dicta fuerunt.
> Namque licet ſit perfectum quod dixerit ille,
> Ille tamen neſcit, cunctis & opinio in his eſt (142).

We ſee plainly in theſe words, that Xenophanes declared it impoſſible for any perſon to arrive at the clear and certain knowledge of the truth; and that even if a man ſhould meet with the truth, yet he cannot know that he has met with it: he adds, that there is nothing but opinions within our reach. Sextus Empiricus (143) ranks him amongſt thoſe, who deny a criterium veritatis, a rule or meaſure of truth. I own that he diſagrees (144) with thoſe, who place him among the Acataleptics; but withal he aſcribes to him the opinion, that we do not comprehend things to that degree of certainty which amounts to ſcience, and that our determinations never go beyond likelihood and probability. Is not this at bottom to aſſert Acatalepticiſm, or the incomprehenſible nature of things? Φαίνεται μὴ πᾶσαν κατάληψιν ἀναιρεῖν ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐπιστημονικὴν τε καὶ ἀδιάπτωτον. ἀπολείπειν δὲ τὴν δοξαστήν. τοῦτο γὰρ ἐμφαίνει τὸ, δόκος δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσι τέτυκται. ὥστε κριτήριον γίνεσθαι κατὰ τοῦτον τὸν δοξαστὸν λόγον τουτέστι τὸν τοῦ εἰκότος, ἀλλὰ μὴ τὸν τοῦ παγίου ἐχόμενον. Videtur non omnem tollere comprehenſionem, ſed eam quæ eſt ex ſcientia, & quæ non poteſt aberrare. Relinquit ergo opinabilem, hoc enim indicat illud cunctis & opinio in his eſt: quo ſit ut ex ejus ſententia id quod judicat ſit ratio opinabilis, hoc eſt ratio ejus quod eſt probabile, non autem ea quæ ſequitur id quod eſt firmum ac ſtabile (145). So that I do not think Mr Menage was much in the right to ſay, that Sextus Empiricus in this place favours Diogenes Laërtius againſt Sotion (146). And I am the more confirmed in this becauſe that learned commentator ſays juſt before, that Cicero and Origen are favourable to Sotion (147): 'Sotioni 'adſtipulatur Cicero in Lucullo: Parmenides, Xeno-'phanes, minus bonis quamquam verſibus, ſed tamen illis 'verſibus, increpant eorum arrogantiam quaſi irati, qui, 'cum ſciri nihil poſſit, audeant ſe ſcire dicere. Item 'Origenes in Philoſophicis: Οὗτος ἔφη πρῶτος 'ἀκαταληψίαν εἶναι πάντων, εἰπὼν οὕτως, Εἰ γὰρ 'καὶ τὰ μάλιστα τύχοι τετελεσμένον εἰπὼν, 'Αὐτὸς ὅμως οὐκ οἶδε, δόκος δ' ἐπι πᾶσι τέ-'τυκται. Cicero in his Lucullus favours the opinion 'of Sotion. Parmenides and Xenophanes in theſe verſes, 'however indifferent, reprehend and ſeem to be angry 'with thoſe men, who, though we can know nothing, 'are however ſo bold as to pretend to know the truth. 'And likewiſe Origen, in his Philoſophics, favours the 'ſame

(133) Ubi ſupra.

(134) When a being is diſtinct from another, it is not a part of it; and therefore a being diſtinct from any other being is made out of nothing, and conſequently created.

(135) Thoſe, who taught the incomprehenſibility.

(136) See what I have ſaid of Diogenes Laërtius at the beginning of this remark.

(137) See, above, citation (125).

(138) See, below, citat. (147).

(139) See, citation (127).

(140) See, in citation (142), the paſſage of Sextus Empiricus.

(141) He cites the beginning of them in Vita Pyrrhonis, lib. ix, num. 72.

(142) Xenophanes, apud Sextum Empiricum adverſus Mathematicos, pag. 146, 157, 280. See alſo Plutarch, de audiend. Poët. pag. 17, E.

(143) Ibid. pag. 146.

(144) Ibid. & pag. 156, 157.

(145) Id. ibid. pag. 157.

(146) Menagius, in Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 20.

(147) Menagius, ibid.

muſt not forget that he was baniſhed his country, that he retired to Sicily (p), and lived at Zancle (q), and Catana, that he founded the Eleatic ſect (r), that Parmenides was his diſciple,

'ſame opinion. Xenophanes was the firſt who affirmed that all things are incomprehenſible; ſaying that though a man ſhould meet with truth, yet he cannot know if that be the truth which he has met with, and that there is nothing but opinions within our reach.' As for the particular queſtion whether this Philoſopher was the firſt, who held the incomprehenſibility of all things, as Sotion affirms, there is more reaſon to continue in ſuſpence, ſince Plato ſaith that before Xenophanes others had believed the unity of all things (148); an opinion which ſeems to me the broad way to incomprehenſibility. Nothing is more curious, than the verſes of Timon recited by Sextus Empiricus (149). I do not know why the interpreters have not tranſlated that paſſage into Latin.

The reaſons which led Xenophanes to the unity of all things, are probably the ſame with thoſe of Meliſſus and Parmenides, according to Ariſtotle's account (150). They ſeem very ſubtile, though, according to the manner of great Genius's, Ariſtotle hath deſcribed them a little obſcurely, becauſe he affected brevity. Thoſe arguments are doubtleſs Sophiſms, as well as thoſe which may be read above (151), nevertheleſs they might have impoſed upon the readers, and I do not know whether Ariſtotle hath always well refuted thoſe two ancient Philoſophers. Conſult the Jeſuits of Coimbra (152), who have repreſented one of the reaſons of Meliſſus and Ariſtotle's anſwer in their full force; and you will find that nothing can be weaker than this anſwer, and that Meliſſus is not guilty of falſe argumentation in this propoſition, if every thing, that was made, hath a principle, that which never was made hath no principle. This Ariſtotle aſſures us is a manifeſt Paralogiſm. Ὅτι μὲν ἓν παραλογίζεται Μέλισσος, δῆλον· οἴεται γὰρ εἰληφέναι, εἰ τὸ γενόμενον ἀρχὴν ἔχει ἅπαν, ὅτε καί τό μὴ γενόμενον οὐκ ἔχει. Captioſè itaque Meliſſum ratiocinari manifeſtum eſt: ſumpſiſſe enim arbitratur, ſi quidquid ortum eſt principium habeat: id non habere, quod ortum non eſt (153). But, added Meliſſus, nothing has been made, for if any thing had been made, it would have been produced either out of nothing, or from ſomething elſe: if out of another thing, it muſt neceſſarily have pre-exiſted, which ruins your ſuppoſition: if out of nothing, then ſomething might be made out of nothing which is falſe (154). This is a demonſtrative argument againſt Ariſtotle, who denied creation properly ſo called. And as for his diſtinction betwixt a principle of ſubſtance, and a principle of forms and qualities; it is inſignificant in the hypotheſis of the impoſſibility of the creation: for every ſubſtance which never began, and neceſſarily exiſts, muſt be immutable. It would be therefore in vain for you to ſeek after the principles of generations and corruptions; for there would be none, if all things were uncreated, as they are according to Ariſtotle, who never oppoſed the axiom, ex nihilo nihil fit - - - - nothing is made out of nothing. But after owning that this objection of Meliſſus, which it is impoſſible to ſolve any other way than by the Orthodox Chriſtian hypotheſis concerning the creation, ſurpaſſed all Ariſtotle's ſtrength, it muſt be acknowledged that the other ſubtilties of Meliſſus and Parmenides were leſs puzzling to him, and when applied to experience, that is, to the variety of things which the univerſe expoſes to our view, they could not appear any thing better than puerilities.

I obſerve by the way, that the Jeſuit, who commented on Cicero de Natura Deorum, takes Xenophanes's part againſt Ariſtotle ſomewhat raſhly. 'Dubio procul, ſaith he (155), exciderit illi (Velleio) convitium illud quod in Xenophanem contorquet Ariſtoteles lib. primo Metaphyſicorum, capite quinto, ubi & obſcurum illius, vel ingenium, vel dicendi genus notat, & hominem quaſi agreſtem magnâ quadam negligentiâ deſpectat, & ab toto Philoſophorum ſenatu relegandum cenſet. Eam tamen Xenophani de Deo ſententiam aſcribit quæ minimè agreſte ingenium ſapiat: nempe τὸ ἓν εἶναι τὸν Θεόν. i. id quod eſt unum, eſſe Deum: vel ut Theophraſtus habet apud Lilium: unum, & univerſum, & omne eſſe Deum. - - - - Certainly Velleius dropped that reproach which Ariſtotle threw upon Xenophanes, in his book of Metaphyſics, where he takes notice of his being a man of a low genius, or of mean elocution, and ſhews a great neglect and contempt of him, as being a ruſtic, who deſerved to be baniſhed the company of Philoſophers. But he aſcribes to Xenophanes an opinion concerning God, which does not at all ſavour of a low and ruſtic genius, viz. that what is one is God; or, as Theophraſtus has it, that unity, the univerſe, and all things are God.' This Father is very much to blame for aſcribing to Xenophanes a reaſonable opinion concerning the nature of God: the ſentiments of that Philoſopher on this head are abominably impious, and amount to a more dangerous Spinoziſm than that which I have refuted in the article of SPINOZA: for Spinoza's hypotheſis carries its antidote along with it, by the mutability or continual corruptibility which he attributes to the divine nature with reſpect to modalities. This corruptibility is contrary to common ſenſe, and at once ſhocks thoſe of mean parts and thoſe of the greateſt capacities: but the immutability in all reſpects attributed to the infinite and eternal Being by Xenophanes, is a principle of the pureſt Theology; wherefore it is more liable to ſeduce us in favour of the reſt of his hypotheſis. On the other ſide, the pernicious fall of this Philoſopher may prove more contagious than Spinoziſm. For not being able to maintain the poſt to which his reaſon had led him, he fell into a precipice; and found fault with his reaſon which had perplexed him, and thrown him into nets which he could not break: he accuſed it of being incapable of comprehending any thing. Several others would be reduced to the like extremities, if they had not recourſe to an aſſiſtant ſuperior to reaſon. But the Jeſuit whom I refute is not wholly to blame: he had juſt reaſon to cenſure Ariſtotle's contempt of Xenophanes's genius; for though a true greatneſs of mind and a ſolid force of argumentation would not ſuffer a man to ſink at this rate, yet it is true that a mean capacity, can never fly ſo high as Xenophanes, nor fall like him. He argued more conſequentially than Ariſtotle, who denying a creation, admitted an Eternal matter, ſucceſſively ſuſceptible of an infinity of forms. If the elephants need not fear theſe cobwebs, much leſs need the flies. It is not a meanneſs of capacity which makes men doubt (156), that they are not arrived at a juſt certainty (157); it rather fills with confidence, than inſpires them with diffidence. Ἀμαθία μὲν θράσος, λογισμὸς δὲ ὄκνον φέρει. Imperitia audaciam, ratiocinatio vero metum affert (158). - - - Ignorance begets boldneſs, but reaſoning begets fear; and we may very well ſay that the Acataleptics, Faciunt næ intelligendo ut nihil intelligant (159). They fall into the doctrine of incomprehenſibility not by an utter ignorance of things, but by knowing them much better than the greateſt part of the world; though they do not know them according to the juſt repreſentation of them. Beſides, there are ſome who direct their hypotheſis to the glory of God, as if from a ſenſe of our own weakneſs, and of the infinity of God, we ought not to aſpire to that knowledge which is a portion of the Divine nature. We have ſpoken before of a Poet, who ſaid that the gods reſerved glory for themſelves, and pleaſures for us; but theſe tell us, that God keeps knowledge to himſelf, and beſtows opinions on us. Diogenes Laërtius reckons Plato among the Sceptics, for ſaying, Τὸ μὲν ἀληθὲς θεοῖς καὶ θεῶν παισὶν ἐγχωρεῖν, τὸν δὲ εἰκότα λόγον ζητεῖν: Se veritatem quidem Diis Deorumque filiis relinquere, id autem quod ſit veriſimile indagare (160). - - - - - That he left truth to the gods, and to their offspring, and only inquired after what is probable. This, puts me in mind of a thought of Plutarch, which ſeems to me very excellent. 'Wiſe men ought to pray to the gods for all good things, but what we ought chiefly to deſire of them: is the knowledge of them in as great a degree as is proper for us; becauſe there is no gift either greater for man to receive, or more magnificent and worthy of the gods to beſtow, than the knowledge of the truth. For God gives to men all other things which they want,

---

(p) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 18.

(q) The ſame town with Meſſena, now Meſſina.

(r) Cicero, Acad. Quæſt. lib. iv. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i, pag. 301.

(148) Plato, in Sophiſta, pag. 170.

(149) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. i, cap. xxxiii, pag. 46, Edit. Genev. 1621.

(150) Ariſtoteles, Phyſicor. lib. i, cap. iii.

(151) In the article STILPO, remark [H].

(152) Conimbricenſes, in the paraphraſe upon the third chapter of the firſt book of Ariſtotle's Phyſics.

(153) Ariſtot. ubi ſupra.

(154) See the Conimbricenſes, ubi ſupra.

(155) Leſcalopier, in Cicer. de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, num. 28, pag. 44.

(156) Socrates, Zeno of Elea, Arceſilaus, Carneades, and ſuch like impugners of certainty, were ſome of the greateſt genius's of antiquity.

(157) Qui plura novit, eum majora ſequuntur dubia. - - - The more a man knows, the more matter he finds for doubting. Naudé, Addit. à la Vie de Louïs XI, pag. 38, quotes theſe words, as being Ariſtotle's in Rhetor. but others quote them as thoſe of Æneas Sylvius.

(158) Thucydid. lib. ii, pag. m. 126, A.

(159) Terence ſays this upon another occaſion, in his prologue to the Andria.

(160) Pyrrhone, lib. ix, num. 72.

diſciple, and that the complained of poverty [M]. The anſwer he gave a man with whom he refuſed to play at dice, is very worthy of a Philoſopher. This perſon calling him a coward; yes, replied he, I am extremely ſo, with reſpect to ſhameful actions (s).

(s) Ὡμολογεῖ καὶ πάνυ δειλὸς εἶναι πρὸς τὰ αἰσχρὰ καὶ ἄτολμος. Faſſus eſt ad res inhoneſtas ſe timidiſſimum etiam eſſe. Plutarchus, de vitioſo Pudore, pag. 530.

'want, but hath reſerved this for himſelf, and makes uſe of it: he is not at all happy in the poſſeſſion of vaſt quantities of Gold, nor powerful by holding the thunder and lightning in his hand, but rather by his wiſdom and knowledge; and this is one of the beſt and wiſeſt things which Homer ſaid, ſpeaking of Jupiter and Neptune:'

Ἦ μὰν ἀμφοτέροισιν ὁμὸν γένος ἠδ' ἴα πάτρη,
Ἀλλὰ Ζεὺς πρότερος γεγόνει καὶ πλείονα ᾔδη.

Eſt ambobus idem ſane genus & patria una,
Sed Jupiter natu prior erat, pluraque noverat (161).

Both of one line, both of one country boaſt;
But royal Jove's the eldeſt, and knows moſt.

'He affirms that the preference and the precedence of Jupiter was more venerable and worthy, becauſe he was more wiſe and intelligent. And as for me, I am of opinion, that the beatitude and felicity of eternal life, which Jupiter enjoys, conſiſts in that he is ignorant of nothing, and that of all things which ever were, none eſcapes him: I believe that an immortality deprived of the knowledge of all things which exiſt and have exiſted, would not be a life, but a ſpace of time only. So that we may ſay, that the deſire of underſtanding truth is a deſire of the Deity, eſpecially the truth of the nature of the gods: the ſtudy and acquiſition of which ſcience, is, as it were, the entring, or being initiated into a religion, and a more holy work than a vow of chaſtity, or cloiſtering one's ſelf within a temple (162).' Add to this, that the Chriſtians, with reſpect to whatever conſtitutes the character of ſpeculative Chriſtianity, make public profeſſion of the incomprehenſibility of things, and look upon thoſe as owls and Turks, who refuſe to believe what ſurpaſſes the extent of their underſtanding. Such is the myſtery of the Trinity, which, as Mr Nicolle owns (163), 'confounds reaſon, and prompts it to revolt. If there be any viſible difficulties, they are thoſe which are contained in that myſtery, that three perſons really diſtinct have only one and the ſame eſſence, and this eſſence being the ſame thing in each perſon with the relations that diſtinguiſh them, may be communicated without the communication of the relations which diſtinguiſh the perſons. If human reaſon conſults herſelf, ſhe will revolt againſt all thoſe inconceivable truths. If ſhe pretends to make uſe of her own light to penetrate into them, it will only furniſh her with arms againſt them. Wherefore in order to believe them, ſhe ought to blind herſelf, to ſtifle all her ratiocinations and perceptions, and to depreſs and ſink herſelf under the weight of Divine authority.' The Socinians themſelves in ſome reſpects are Acataleptics; they cannot ſay, with any ſincerity, that it is an incomprehenſile thing, that a ſelf-exiſtent nature ſhould be mutable. Wherefore, in ſome reſpects, their raſhneſs ſurpaſſes that of Xenophanes. The latter, at laſt, thought fit to ſay, that he did not comprehend either that an eternal nature is mutable, or that it is immutable; but as to the former, they decide that it is mutable: whence it follows that a being which neceſſarily, and from all eternity exiſts, is liable to deſtruction (164); which is the moſt contrary opinion in the world to our clear and diſtinct ideas.

I cannot conclude without obſerving two things: one is, that the evidence of Xenophanes's principles, with reſpect to the immutability of what is eternal, is as conſpicuous as the cleareſt ideas of our mind; ſo that it being inconteſtable, on the other hand, by what paſſes within us, that there are alterations and changes, the beſt courſe that our reaſon can take, is to aſſert, that all things had a beginning, GOD alone excepted. This is the doctrine of the creation; for to pretend to explain the generations of nature, by ſuppoſing ſeveral eternal principles, the action and reaction of which diverſifies what would remain uniform, if nothing external intervened, is to avoid one inconvenience, and fall into a much greater. My ſecond obſervation is, that the evidence of Xenophanes's principles furniſhes us with an excellent demonſtration againſt Spinoza; for if whatever had no beginning is immutable, Spinoza's God is incapable of any change: he is not therefore the immanent cauſe of all the alterations in the univerſe (165). An immanent cauſe produces ſomething in itſelf: that thing is either a mode identified with the ſubſtance which it modifies, or elſe an abſolute quality, and really diſtinct from it's ſubject of inheſion. If an identified mode, GOD cannot produce it; for ſince the Divine ſubſtance neceſſarily exiſts, it cannot depend on any efficient cauſe. If it is a diſtinct quality, GOD can therefore create beings diſtinct from himſelf; and then there is no longer room for Spinoza's hypotheſis. Add to this, that the production of one mode or accident (166), is the deſtruction of another. Whence it follows, that if GOD was the immanent cauſe of the changes of nature, ſome eternal modalities would have periſhed: for Spinoza cannot, without contradicting himſelf, affirm that what he calls GOD, had not always modalities. Examine his diſtinction betwixt Natura naturans and Natura naturata, and you will find a heap of contradictions in it.

[M] He complained of poverty.] I am ſo poor, ſaid he once to (167) Hiero King of Syracuſe, that I am not able to maintain two ſervants. How, replied Hiero, Homer, whom you commonly blame and cenſure, tho' dead, maintains above ten thouſand.

(161) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 354.

(162) Plutarch, at the beginning of his treatiſe concerning Iſis and Oſiris.

(163) Nicolle, Perpetuité de la Foi, pag. 118, 119, Edit. 1666.

(164) They ſay that God beſtowed upon matter what form he pleaſed, when he made the world. He therefore deſtroyed the eternal form of matter. Whether this form was a mode, or a diſtinct accident, is of no importance to me: It was a real being, which ceaſed to be, tho' it had no beginning, and no efficient cauſe.

(165) Note, that if the Fathers had believed what the miniſter, who wrote the Paſtoral Letters, imputes to them conconcerning the generation of the Word, their opinion concerning the immutability of God, had been almoſt as impious as that of Spinoza. See Janua cœlorum reſerata, pag. 128, & ſeq.

(166) I mean ſuch an accident as is ens inhærens in alio.

(167) Plut. in Apophth. pag. 175.

XYLANDER (WILLIAM) was born at Augſburg on the twenty-ſixth of December 1532. The inclination he had for the ſciences would have been fruitleſs, by reaſon of his father's poverty, if he had not met with a patron (a), by whoſe means he was maintained at the public expence, till ſuch time as he had made progreſs enough to enter into the colleges where the city (b) furniſhed a ſubſiſtence to a certain number of ſtudents. He afterwards ſtudied in the univerſity of Tubingen, and then in that of Baſil [A]: and having given proofs of his learning, he was called to Heidelberg to ſucceed

(a) Wolffgangus Relingerus nobilis patricius Auguſtanus. Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philoſophorum, pag. 289.

(b) That of Augſburg. Moreri was in the wrong to ſay after Mr Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 448, that the Magiſtrates of Straſburg maintained him at the univerſities.

[A] And afterwards in that of Baſil] Melchior Adam affirms, that he there ſolemnly received the degree of Maſter of Arts, in the year 1556 (1). I ſuſpect this date; for how is it probable that a man who had ſtudied with ſo great application, and ſo many fine talents, ſhould have received this little degree only at the twenty-fourth year of his age? Add to this, that he made his Latin verſion of Dion Caſſius in the year 1557. He was already ſo learned, that he only ſpent ſeven months in writing that work, for the truth of which he appeals to the perſon to whom it is dedicated. It was dedicated to his Mecenas, John-Henry Herwart, Senator of Augſburg, at whoſe houſe he had been maintained for ſome time, and who had encouraged him to make that verſion, 'Tu, Patrone optime, cum me in familia tua aliquandiu commode & liberaliter habitum, autoritate, hortatu, officiis inſuper & beneficiis eò adduxeris ut optimum Rom. hiſtoriæ conditorem Dionem Caſſium de Græco Latinum facerem, &c (2). - - - As you, my worthy patron, after having for ſome time kindly and liberally maintained me in your own family, have, by your authority, exhortations,

(1) Melchior Adam. in Vitis Philoſophorum, pag. 289.

(2) Xyland. Epiſt. Dedicat. Dion. Caſſii.

ſucceed Mycillus (c) who died Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue in the year 1558. Not long before that time Xylander had publiſhed at Baſil his Latin verſion of Dion Caſſius (d). He acquaints us in his epiſtle dedicatory that indigence had made him undergo ſeveral uneaſineſſes [B]. In the year 1559 he gave a Latin verſion of the book of Marcus Aurelius; and becauſe a great many errors had crept into it (e), he cauſed it to be reprinted more correctly in the year 1568, with the Latin verſion of ſome Greek writers [C].

‘exhortations, and even by your good offices and favours, prevailed upon me to tranſlate from the Greek into Latin, that excellent writer of the Roman Hiſtory, Dion Caſſius, &c.’ This Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated at Baſil, November the firſt, 1557: the impreſſion was finiſhed by Oporinus in the month of March 1558. Xiphilin was joined with Dion Caſſius, but Xylander did not tranſlate that book, and contented himſelf with giving a tranſlation of it which had been done by William le Blanc, a native of Albi (3), and with correcting ſome paſſages in it. His notes on Dion Caſſius and Xiphilin are good enough to perſuade us that in the year 1556 the univerſity of Baſil would have honoured him with a higher degree than that of Maſter of Arts.

[B] He acquaints us . . . . . that indigence had made him undergo ſeveral uneaſineſſes.] This muſt ſurely be his meaning in theſe words: ‘Ego cum ab ineunte ætate bonas literas flagranti amore eſſem perſecutus, earumque cauſa adverſiſſima & acerbiſſima quæque perpeſſus, &c (4). - - - As I have had the moſt paſſionate deſire after learning ever ſince my earlieſt years, and for the ſake of that, have ſuffered the greateſt hardſhips and vexations.’ He ranks himſelf amongſt thoſe whom poverty obliges to cultivate learning: ‘Meæ conditionis hominum, quorum honeſtos conatus in hoc genere anguſtia vitæ ſuſtentandæ & paupertas quaſi inſtigat. - - - Men in my condition, whoſe commendable endeavours toward the improvement of learning are owing to their indigence, and as it were prompted by poverty.’ See eſpecially the elogy which he placed at the end of the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Dion Caſſius. There he owns that, when he was eighteen years of age, he ſtudied for the ſake of glory; but that at the age of twenty-five, the low ſtate of his fortune obliged him to ſtudy for the ſake of a ſubſiſtence.

Te mala pauperies, pulcriſque graviſſima ceptis,
Conatu indignor plus potuiſſe meo.

. . . .
. . . .

Utcumque excidimus præclaris protinus auſis
Jam quærant, quibus hoc fata dedere decus
Et mea cum fortuna ſolo me afflixerit, atque
Abjectum cogat ſerpere præter humum.

. . . .
. . . .

Ergo, divinis quantumvis æger inhærens
Artibus, & ſtudiis deditus ingenuis:
Et TOLERARE QUEAM VICTUM, & ſuſtenter honeſte
Non aſpernandi fruge laboris alor.

Accurſed want, thou deadly foe
To brave attempts, my greateſt woe,
Whilſt eager after fame I preſs,
Why doſt thou ſtill oppoſe my bliſs?
Tho' fortune far below the great
Has plac'd me, and in humble ſtate,
Yet fir'd with love of ev'ry art
That lights the mind, or mends the heart,
I've in this bold attempt prevail'd,
Or, like Prometheus, nobly fail'd.
Tho' poor, yet arts are my delight,
Arts my employ both day and night:
Theirs are my labours: they relieve
My wants, and by their bounty I ſhall live.

[C] With the Latin verſion of ſome Greek writers.] That is, of Antony Liberalis, of Phlegon de mirabilibus & longævis, & de Olympiis, of Apollonius Hiſtoriæ memorabiles, and of Antigonus mirabilium Narrationum Congeries. All this, with Marcus Aurelius, makes a pretty large octavo: the Greek and Latin are in it, but each by itſelf. The few notes which Xylander added are neither conſiderable, nor contemptible.

(c) Taken from Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory, to the Baſil edition 1568.

(3) It was dedicated to Cardinal d'Armagnac, at Rome in the month of February 1550.

(4) Xylander, ubi ſupra.

Z.

ZABARELLA, or DE ZABARELLIS (Francis) Archbiſhop of Florence, and a Cardinal, was one of the moſt celebrated Canoniſts of his age. He was born at Padua, in the year 1339 (a). He ſtudied the Canon-Law at Bologna, and taught it at Padua with great applauſe. That city was then ſubject to Francis Carrari: it was attacked by the Venetians in the year 1406, and deputed Zabarella to the King of France to deſire his aſſiſtance, which he not obtaining, Padua was obliged to ſubmit to the Republic of Venice. The act of their ſubmiſſion was very ſolemn: Zabarella, at the head of fourteen other deputies, delivered the banner of Padua to the Senate in the great place at Venice, and made an eloquent ſpeech on that occaſion [A]. Some time after he went to Florence to teach the Canon-Law, and was there ſo loved and eſteemed, that the Archiepiſcopal ſee becoming vacant, he was choſen to fill it: but this election proved ineffectual, for the Pope being more diligent, had already beſtowed it on another. Zabarella being invited to Rome by Boniface IX, ſtayed there ſome time, and gave his opinion on an important queſtion propoſed to him, concerning the methods of putting a ſtop to the ſchiſm. He afterwards returned to Padua, and was honoured with ſeveral deputations. He wiſely refuſed the biſhopric of that city which was offered to him, becauſe he would not expoſe himſelf to the indignation of the Senate, which had nominated another to that dignity. Pope John XXIII, reſolving to ſtrengthen his party with learned men, made him come to his court, and gave him the Archbiſhopric of Florence. He did not confine his liberality to that alone, but created him Cardinal (b) in the year 1411. He ſent him on an embaſſy (c) with another Cardinal (d), and with Emanuel Chryſoloras, to the court of the Emperor Sigiſmund, who demanded a council, as well on account of the hereſies in Bohemia, as of the Anti-Popes. This Pope ordered his Ambaſſadors to chuſe ſuch a town for the holding of the council as might be in his intereſt. It is ſaid that he gave them in writing the names of thoſe towns which he liked, but at the moment of their departure, tore the paper on which he had written them [B], and gave them full powers on that head. For this reaſon they left it to the choice of his Imperial Majeſty. The city of Conſtance was pitched upon. Francis Zabarella diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the council held there, and adviſed the depoſing of Pope John XXIII, who was charged with forty notorious crimes. If the right of election had been left to the Cardinals, it is highly probable that Zabarella would have ſucceeded the depoſed Pope; but they were obliged to divide this right between themſelves and the other members of that council [C]. It was divided into five claſſes, each of which nominated ſix Perſons, who,

(a) His epitaph imports that he died at the age of 78 years, in 1417.

(b) He made him Cardinal Deacon (and not Cardinal Prieſt, as Geſner aſſerts in his Biblioth. fol. 261.) by the title of St Coſmus and St Damianus.

(c) In the year 1413.

(d) It was Antony de Chalant. See Spondanus, ad ann. 1413, num. 5.

[A] And made an eloquent ſpeech.] He was not only a learned Civilian, but alſo a good Orator (1). He pronounced an eloquent oration on the fourth of July 1397, on the nuptials of Nicolas d'Eſte with Giliola, the daughter of Francis Carrari, the ſecond of that name, Lord of Padua. Seven years after he made a ſpeech to the Lady Belflora, who was married to the ſon of the ſame Carrari, when ſhe made her entry into Padua, and was received under a canopy; I ſay, he made a ſpeech to her, in the name of the univerſity (2). He alſo made the funeral orations of Francis Carrari, and Arcuanus Buzacharinus (3).

[B] At the moment of their departure he tore the paper on which he had written them.] Panzirolus, whom I have faithfully followed in the text of this article, aſcribes this alteration of the Pope to a ſudden inſpiration (4). But that we may ſee this affair in it's full extent, which is too briefly related by him, I will cite a French author. (5). ‘It never appeared more clearly than on this occaſion, that the providence of God at once frequently overthrows all the deſigns of human prudence, in order to accompliſh it's own. This Pope, as Leonard Aretin, his ſecretary and confident, aſſures us, had, in appearance, given full power to his Legates to agree with the Emperor on theſe two points (6), as they ſhould think proper; but becauſe on the other hand he would not be at the Emperor's diſcretion in a city where that Prince was maſter, he had noted, in a private paper, certain cities of Italy, and expreſsly charged them not to agree to any other; and yet when he diſmiſſed them, as he was exhorting them faithfully to acquit themſelves of their duty, and was juſt going to deliver them this paper, which he held in his hand, all of a ſudden he changed his mind; and after having expreſſed himſelf in their praiſe, with great tranſports of tenderneſs and affection, proteſting that he had a full and entire confidence in their fidelity; he told them, that, contrary to his former reſolution, he would not limit their power, he ſhewed them the writing, and immediately tore it before their eyes. But, he was not long without altering his mind a ſecond time; for, underſtanding that his Legates had at laſt conſented, in compliance with Sigiſmund's deſire, that a general Council ſhould be ſummoned to aſſemble on the firſt of November, the following year, at Conſtance, a city of Germany, ſubject to the Emperor; he was like to go diſtracted, and a thouſand times curſed his fortune, or rather imprudence, in changing his reſolution ſo eaſily, and delivering himſelf up, as it were, bound hand and foot to a Prince, who would always have it in his power to put in excution whatever it ſhould pleaſe the Council to order againſt him. But he was obliged to diſſemble his reſentments, for fear of rendring himſelf ſuſpected, &c.’

[C] Zabarella would have ſucceeded the depoſed Pope, but, &c.] Panzirolus's relation is not very exact; for it

(1) See Thomaſin, Elog. Part. i, pag. 3.

(2) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 443.

(3) Tomaſin. Elog. Part. i, pag. 10.

(4) Quod divino impulſu factum eſſe videtur. Panzir. ibid. pag. 445.

(5) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du grand Schiſme d'Occident, livr. iv, pag. 106, Dutch edition. He quotes Saint Antoninus, Archbiſhop of Florence, Part. iii, Tit. xxii.

(6) That is the time and place of he council.

who, in conjunction with the Cardinals, elected Otho Colonna Pope, who took the name of Martin V. This happened in the year 1417. Zabarella died at Conſtance (e) on the fifth of November, in the ſame year (f). His funeral was celebrated with great magnificence; the Emperor and all the council were preſent at it: the funeral oration was pronounced by Poggius; the corps was carried to Padua, and interred in the cathedral church on the left ſide of the altar of the Holy Virgin. Our Zabarella wrote a great many books [D], and deſerved the eſteem of the public, as much by his virtuous life [E], as by his learning. He appointed for his heir BARTHOLOMEW ZABARELLA his nephew (g), of whom I ſhall ſpeak in a remark [F]. I muſt not forget that he had among other diſciples Peter Paul Vergerio, who wrote an excellent and very exact letter, on the life and death of his profeſſor (h).

(e) And not in his own country, as Forſterus affirms, Hiſt. Juris Civil. Rom. lib. iii, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 515.

(f) Therefore he did not flouriſh in the year 1418, as Geſner affirms in Bibl. fol. 261.

(g) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 443, & ſeq.

(h) Panzirol. ibid. pag. 444. Mr Teiſſier ſays nothing of it in the Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum.

---

it tends to perſuade us, that Zabarella was living when they entred into the conclave to elect a Pope. This is falſe. The electors entred on the eighth of November (7), and Zabarella, according to Panzirolus, died on the fifth, others ſay on the ſixth of that month (8). So I find that Tomaſinus conforms himſelf better to the circumſtances of time: Zabarella, according to him, would have arrived at the Papal dignity, by the unanimous conſent of the electors, if death had not tranſported him to heaven. He alſo tells us that this Cardinal ſupplied the Pope's place in the Council. Concilio convocato Pontificis vices geſſit. Unde omnium conſenſu ſummus Pontifex dictitatus, re quoque ipſa deſignatus, fuiſſet, ni Deus Opt. Max. ipſum in Cœlum, ibi ſatius Eccleſiæ ſuæ profuturum evexiſſet (9). Panzirolus miſled Doujat, who aſſures us that Zabarella died after the election of Martin VI (10).

[D] He wrote a great many books.] Six volumes of commentaries on the Decretals and Clementines. One volume of Counſels. A volume of Orations and Letters. A treatiſe de Horis canonicis. De Felicitate libri tres. Variæ Legum Repetitiones. Opuſcula de Artibus liberalibus. De natura rerum diverſarum. Commentarii in naturalem & moralem Philoſophiam. Hiſtoria ſui temporis. Acta in Conciliis Piſano & Conſtantienſi. In vetus & novum Teſtamentum. De Schiſmate (11). This laſt treatiſe does not pleaſe the court of Rome. The Proteſtants have publiſhed it ſeveral times (12) with other pieces of the ſame nature, in which the juriſdiction of Princes is maintained without ſubjecting it to the power of the Popes. Read the following words of Bellarmin: 'Occaſione longiſſimi ſchiſmatis ſcripſit etiam librum de ſchiſmate, in quo ſunt aliqua corrigenda: quare in indice librorum prohibitorum, liber ejus de ſchiſmate cum præfationibus, Argentinæ impreſſus ab hæreticis, prohibitus eſt, donec corrigatur (13). - - - On occaſion of the long ſchiſm, he alſo wrote a book on ſchiſm: There are ſome things in this book to be corrected: for this reaſon in the catalogue of prohibited books, Zabarella's treatiſe on ſchiſm with the prefaces to it, printed by the Heretics at Straſburgh, is prohibited till it is corrected.' Obſerve, that Zabarella is cited under the name of Cardinal without any addition (14).

[E] He deſerved the eſteem of the public .... by his virtuous life.] He not only ſlept but little, and was extremely careful not to loſe any time, but was endowed with a particular probity and chaſtity: being an enemy to luxury, his domeſtic affairs were managed with the utmoſt frugality, in order to diffuſe his wealth abroad amongſt the poor. He never connived at his neighbour's faults, but always exhorted his friends and diſciples to a virtuous life. 'Somni parciſſimus, & ne quàm temporis jacturam faceret, valde ſollicitus. Vir recti animi, ſuaviſſimæ conſuetudinis, & integerrimæ, caſtiſſimæque vitæ fuit, familiares & diſcipulos ad bonos mores hortari ſolitus ab ipſis non ſecus ac pater diligebatur. Domi parcus, foris fortunas inter pauperes dividebat (15). - - - He ſlept very little, and was extremely careful not to loſe any time. He was an upright man, his behaviour was moſt engaging, and his whole life moſt chaſte and unblamable: he uſed to exhort his friends and diſciples to lead a virtuous life, and was loved by them like a father. In his domeſtic affairs he was exceeding frugal, but diffuſed his wealth abroad among the poor.' One of the things which made him thought worthy of the biſhopric of Padua, was, I believe, his charity to the poor, when he was Arch-prieſt of the cathedral church (16). I have mentioned (17) the reaſon which induced him to refuſe that Biſhopric. That refuſal acquired him the admiration of the Paduans, and obliged them to reſign to him a very rich abbey which had belonged to ſome Monks. This he held but a very ſhort time; he ſoon reſtored it to its antient poſſeſſors; they accepted it with the utmoſt gratitude, which they perpetuated as much as poſſible; for to this day his ſacerdotal veſtments are preſerved in their monaſtery: and his arms are ſet up there in ſeveral places (18). It was on account of his holy life, as well as learning, that he was choſe Archbiſhop of Florence, when he was only Profeſſor of the Canon Law (19).

I have alſo given (20) the reaſon why this choice was ineffectual at that time.

[F] BARTHOLOMEW ZABARELLA, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in a remark.] He was the ſon of ANDREW ZABARELLA, brother to our Francis; and profeſſed the Canon-Law at Padua with great applauſe. He was afterwards called to Rome, where he diſcovered a great deal of learning, as well in his diſputations as conſultations. He was firſt raiſed to the Archbiſhopric of Spalato, and then advanced to that of Florence, and at laſt to the dignity of Referendary of the Church by Pope Eugenius IV. It is thought he had riſen yet higher, if he had not died before he arrived at old age, in the year 1445. His body was carried to Padua, and interred in his uncle's tomb (21). I am ſurprized that his name doth not appear in the epitaph of our Francis, and that inſtead of it we ſee Joannes Jacobi viri clariſſimi Filius id monumenti ponendum curavit. - - - This monument was erected by John the ſon of James, who was an illuſtrious man. Panzirolus and Tomaſin give the whole epitaph; the latter obſerves, that the author of the Patavina Felicitas, and Swertius (22), have given it with ſome faults. The ſame thing may alſo be charged on Panzirolus; for in his book we read Obiit Conſtantiæ MCCCCVIII, which ought to have been MCCCCXVII. An infinite number of tranſcribers and Printers of inſcriptions are guilty of the like negligence. But to return to our Bartholomew. He died at the age of forty-ſix years, on the twelfth of Auguſt 1445, being then on the embaſſy with which Eugenius IV honoured him to the Kings of Spain and France. It is affirmed that the Pope had declared his deſign to make him a Cardinal (23).

(7) See Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, lib. vi, p. 264.

(8) Conſtantiæ extinctus eſt anno cIↄ. cccc. xvii. viii. Idus Novembris. Tomaſin. ubi ſupra, pag. 5. Freberus, in Theatro, pag. 17, has not rightly tranſcribed this; for he ſays extinctus eſt Idib. Nov.

(9) Tomaſin. Elog. Part. i, pag. 5.

(10) Doujat. Prænot. Canonic. pag. 609.

(11) Ex Tomaſino, ubi ſupra, pag. 9. See alſo Oldoini in Athenæo Romano, pag. 258.

(12) For inſtance at Baſil, by John Oporinus, in 1565, in folio. I make uſe of that edition.

(13) Bellarm. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. pag. m. 384.

(14) Tomaſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

(15) Panzirolus, ubi ſupra, pag. 445.

(16) In Cathedrali Patavina Eccleſia Archipreſbyteratus honore inſignitus pauperum incommodis mira ſubveniebat liberalitate. Tomaſin. ubi ſupra, pag. 4.

(17) In the text of this article.

(18) Tomaſin. ubi ſupra.

(19) Florentiam vocatus jus Canonicum explanavit ibique ob vitæ SANCTIMONIAM ac doctrinæ præſtantiam ab illius Reip. proceribus ad Archiepiſcopatus dignitatem conclamatus eſt. Tomaſin. ubi ſupra, pag. 3.

(20) In the text of this article.

(21) Panzir. ubi ſupra, pag. 446, 447.

(22) In Deliciis Orbis.

(23) Taken from Riccobonus, in Deſcriptione Gymnaſii Patavini, apud Freherum, in Theatro, pag. 19.

ZABARELLA (JAMES) one of the greateſt Philoſophers of the XVIth century, was born at Padua on the fifth of September 1533. Having learned Rhetoric and the Greek tongue under very learned profeſſors (a), he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Logic, and to that of the Mathematics, in both which he made great progreſs. He extremely delighted in Aſtrology, and amuſed himſelf in drawing a great many Horoſcopes, and it is reported, that he many times made true predictions. He acquired a profound knowledge of Ariſtotle's Phyſics and Ethics; ſo it is no wonder that the univerſity of Padua made him one of its profeſſors, in the year 1564. He taught Logic there

(a) John Faſeolus, and Francis Robortellus.

there for the ſpace of fifteen years, and afterwards Philoſophy to the time of his death. He publiſhed ſeveral commentaries on Ariſtotle, which ſhewed that his genius was capable of clearing the greateſt difficulties, and comprehending the moſt obſcure queſtions [A]. Having been frequently deputed to Venice on important affairs, he harangued the Senate with great ſucceſs. He refuſed the offers of Sigiſmund King of Poland, who invited him into his kingdom. He died at Padua in October 1589, and and was buried in St Antony's church, where his funeral oration was pronounced by Riccobonus. He had bore the title of Count Palatine [B]. He had by his marriage with Elizabeth Cavacia, ſix ſons and three daughters [C], and calculated the nativities of each of them. I know not how he ſucceeded in theſe calculations, nor for inſtance, whether he fore-told that the Senate of Venice ſhould give him a thouſand crowns, for the marriage of his youngeſt daughter (b). Authors differ in certain particulars concerning him, which ought not to be matter of diſpute. Some ſay he was a handſome man, others, that he was ugly [D]. Some aſſert, that he had a very lively, quick, and ready wit; others, that he could not ſolve the objections of his diſciples without aſking time to conſider them [E]. He is accuſed of holding ſome impious opinions

(b) Taken from James Philip Tomaſin, Part. i. Elogior. pag. 136, & ſeq.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral commentaries on Ariſtotle, which ſhewed, &c.] He publiſhed ſome Logical treatiſes in the year 1578. In theſe he treated copiouſly of method; and it was believed, eſpecially in Germany, that on Logic he was the beſt guide that could be had (1). The following encomium is beſtowed on the commentary which he publiſhed in the year 1582. ‘ Anno 82. edidit illa admirabilia commentaria in ‘ poſt. Annal. Ariſtotelis quibus omnibus Græcis, ‘ Arabibus, Latinis palmam in hoc divino Ariſtote‘ lici ingenii opere illuſtrando præripuit (2). - - - - In ‘ the year 1582, he publiſhed his admirable commentary ‘ on Ariſtotle's Analytics, in which he has illuſtrated that ‘ divine work, worthy of the genius of Ariſtotle, far be‘ yond all the Grecian, Arabian, and Latin commenta‘ tors.’ Francis Piccolomini, his colleague, and rival, attacked him on the doctrine of Method. Zabarella publiſhed his reply in the year 1584. Imperialis obſerves, that Zabarella was inferior to Francis Piccolomini, in the faculty of diſcourſing (3); but when he took pen in hand, exceeded him in the force of argument: when he had occaſion to ruin his adverſaries hypotheſis, he brought a multitude of arguments which cruſhed them: when he was obliged to maintain his own opinions, he did it with great ſkill and ſucceſs. He ſcarce had his equal, either for overthrowing the adverſe ſide, or defending his own. ‘ Neminem facile quis dixerit æquare Zabarellæ Scrip‘ torum venuſtatem atque elegantiam, quibus accedit ‘ incredibile argumentandi robur & opinionum firmi‘ tas, quo nomine vix alius in evertendis aliorum pla‘ citis uberior, in aſtruendis propriis fœlicior unquam ‘ eſt habitus (4). - - - It may well be ſaid that no au‘ thor ever wrote with more beauty and elegance than ‘ Zabarella. Add to this his incredible force of reaſon‘ ing, and his great talent in ſupporting his opinions. In ‘ this reſpect ſcarce any writer has been eſteemed more co‘ pious in confuting the opinions of his adverſaries, or ‘ more ſucceſsful in maintaining his own.’ His book De Rebus naturalibus Libri XXX, quibus Quæſtiones, quæ ab Ariſtotelis Interpretibus hodie tractari ſolent, accurate diſcutiuntur, was printed in the year 1589. He dedicated it to Pope Sixtus V: the Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated at Padua, on the firſt of October, the ſame year. He had before publiſhed a ſmall ſpecimen of it in 1586, and dedicated it to that Pope's nephew. His commentaries on the three books of Ariſtotle de Anima, did not appear till after his death. His ſon Francis Zabarella publiſhed them in the year 1604.

[B] The title of Count Palatine.] One JAMES ZABARELLA obtained the title from the Emperor Maximilian: his ſon JULIUS was continued in this quality by the Emperor Ferdinand I, who, beſides, entailed the honour on the eldeſt ſons of the family. Accordingly Julius Zabarella, his ſon, bore that title, and tranſmitted it to our James, his eldeſt ſon (5).

[C] Six ſons and three daughters.] The eldeſt was called JULIUS, and was a good Mathematician. You will find in Moreri that he gave himſelf up to debauchery with women, to that exceſs, that he contracted a great weakneſs in his nerves, which confined him to his bed for five years before his death (6). Mr Moreri makes him author of ſeveral books, of the moſt conſiderable of which he mentions the titles; but he is miſtaken, for all thoſe pieces were written by James Zabarella, and not by Julius, his ſon.

[D] Some ſay he was a handſome man, others, that he was ugly.] His effigies in Tomaſin repreſents his air to be very agreeable, and admirably confirms theſe words Vultu ſpectabilis (7): - - - of a graceful aſpect: But in Imperialis, the print of him expreſſes a gloomy, ſurly, and mean look, and very effectually proves the truth of theſe words, ‘ Nec ſubhæſitantis linguæ nota ‘ vel TETRICA forte ORIS SPECIES ullas unquam ſuæ ‘ gloriæ maculas aſpergere potuerunt (8). - - - Nor ‘ could a ſtammering he had in his ſpeech, nor ſomething ‘ ſour which he had in his looks ever blemiſh his glory.’ Is it poſſible, that in things expoſed to every body's view, authors ſhould differ as much as white and black, as well in the ſtrokes of their pens, as in thoſe of the Painter's pencil? If the queſtion was about the inclinations of the mind, I ſhould not be ſurprized at this diverſity of relations, for it is eaſy to fall into contrary determinations, with reſpect to thoſe inviſible objects, which only diſcover themſelves by equivocal indications; but the queſtion relates to the face: ought it not to be out of diſpute whether his face was handſome or ugly?

[E] Some aſſert that he had a very lively . . . . wit . . . . that he could not ſolve the objections, &c. . . . .] This is another ſubject on which Hiſtorians ought not to oppoſe one another. They ought to agree on the queſtion, whether Zabarella's genius acted in a quick or ſlow manner. He was Profeſſor about twenty-five years in one of the moſt famous univerſities of Europe. This gave him a thouſand opportunities of publickly diſcovering whether, when a difficulty was propoſed, he wanted time to conſider of it, or could ſolve it immediately. Why then ſhould Tomaſini expreſs himſelf in this manner: ‘ Nactus eſt Mercurium ‘ feliciter ſtantem, quam ob cauſſam CELERES ingenii ‘ motus, & ad quævis excogitanda FACILES ET EX‘ PEDITOS, habuit in omni vita (9): - - - He is hap‘ pily gifted with a ready wit, and accordingly his genius ‘ has during all his life been QUICK, EASY, and PE‘ NETRATING:’ and Imperialis, on the contrary, tells us? ‘ Carpebant in te plurimi memoriæ labem, ‘ & quendam in agendis TORPOREM, quibus ad pri‘ vata vel publica negotia minus reddebaris idoneus: ‘ SEGNIOREM te pariter quam ferret ingenii claritas ‘ in quæſtionibus inopinate ſolvendis prædicabant, cum ‘ te Scholarium Theſibus nonniſi per INTERPOSITAS ‘ HORAS reſpondere ſolitum dicerent (10)? - - - Many ‘ people blamed you for your want of memory, and for a ‘ certain SLUGGISHNESS in acting, both which defects ‘ diſqualified you for public and private affairs. They ‘ likewiſe ſaid, that in ſolving difficulties, you was ‘ SLOWER than was conſiſtent with a clear genius; ‘ and that you did not anſwer the theſes of your ſtudents, ‘ till you had taken AN INTERVAL OF SOME HOURS ‘ to conſider of them?’ Some pages after he obſerves, that Zabarella ſtuttered, and that his words and deportment were rough and unpoliſhed. ‘ In eo præſti‘ tit Jacobo Zabarellæ Collegæ ſuo (Franciſcus Piccolo‘ mineus) quod ipſe facilitate quadam dicendi præditus ‘ juncta comitati morum ac eximiæ humanitati, alter ‘ ſermone durior, blæſus, incomptus, civilibus in ſtu‘ diis inops potius quam redundans (11). - - - - Francis ‘ Piccolomini had the advantage of his colleague James ‘ Zabarella in this, that the former had a certain fa‘ cility of expreſſing his thoughts, together with a mild, ‘ a humane, and winning behaviour; whereas the

‘ expreſſions

---

(1) Keckerman. Præcognit. Logicor. Tract. ii, cap. v, pag. m. 184. See alſo Tomaſin. Elog. Part. i, pag. 137.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) See the remark [E].

(4) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtor. pag. 115.

(5) Ex Tomaſino, Elogior. Part. i, pag. 139.

(6) Moreri had this from Mr Teiſſier's addition to the Elogies, Tom. ii, p. 124.

(7) Tomaſ. ubi ſupra, p. 138.

(8) Joh. Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtor. p. 117.

(9) Tomaſ. ib.

(10) Imperial. ubi ſupra.

(11) Id. ibid, pag. 115.

opinions [F], as not believing the immortality of the ſoul; but he is praiſed for having led an exemplary life (c). I ſhall ſpeak of the treatiſe in which he maintained

‘expreſſions of the latter were harſh, blunt, and unpoliſhed, and he was rather deficient than officious in paying civilities and doing kindneſſes.’

[F] He is accuſed of holding ſome impious opinions.] On this head Mr Moreri is faulty. He is accuſed by Imperialis, ſaith he (12), of having oppoſed the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, and of having given ſeveral marks of impiety and Atheiſm in his writings. The laſt part of this accuſation is not in Imperialis; and if the firſt is, it is not expreſſed as a thing affirmed by that author, but rather as a very uncertain rumour, which he in ſome ſort refutes. His words run thus (13): ‘Præterea impenſius te aliquanto impugnaſſe immortalitatem animæ, deterrimam Alexandreorum ſententiam palam profeſſum: quos tamen, de te rumores ut forte ab exulceratis animis excitos, ita vel eluſit poſteritas, vel admirabilis ac prope divina tuarum virtutum fama compenſavit (14): præaltæ ſiquidem mentis lumen in ſcriptis diffuſum tuis, nullam debet luem temporis nullamque livoris noxam vereri. - - - - Beſides, they ſaid that you too warmly attacked the immortality of the ſoul, and openly profeſſed the abominable tenet of the Alexandrians: but theſe rumours concerning you, as they were, perhaps, raiſed by invidious perſons, ſo they have either been neglected by poſterity, or deſtroyed by the admirable and almoſt divine fame of your virtues: and that exalted underſtanding which ſhines through your writings ought to fear no injury, either from time or envy.’ This calumny, if I am not miſtaken, was only grounded upon this. There reigned in Italy, and chiefly at Padua, for above an age, a famous diſpute about this queſtion, whether it was poſſible to prove the immortality of the ſoul from Ariſtotle's principles. Some Profeſſors who were looked upon as favourers of Alexander Aphrodiſienſis defended the negative. Others maintainted the affirmative. Pomponatius, our Zabarella, Cremoninus, &c. took the firſt ſide, whence a great number of ſuch perſons as are incapable of uſing diſtinctions when they are moſt neceſſary, peremptorily charged theſe Philoſophers with teaching the mortality of the ſoul. This is the Sophiſm, à dicto ſecundum quid ad dictum ſimpliciter: - - - From a particular caſe to draw a general inference. In a word, this is an injuſtice and wickedneſs which ſociety ought not to tolerate: for there is a prodigious difference betwixt abſolutely affirming that the ſoul is mortal, and maintaining that, according to the hypotheſis of ſuch a Philoſopher, it is impoſſible to prove that it is not mortal. See the article of POMPONATIUS. The Inquiſitors acted on a principle of equity towards Zabarella; for they contented themſelves with his declaration, that by the power of the Divine grace, he was fully perſuaded of the truth of the orthodox opinion, tho' natural reaſon, and Ariſtotle's principles ſeemed incapable of forming in him this excellent perſuaſion. He publiſhed a book, in which he maintained, that the exiſtence of a firſt mover ſeparate from the bodies which compoſe the univerſe, could be no otherwiſe proved than by ſuppoſing the eternity of motion. This was declaring, that a Chriſtian Philoſopher cannot produce any proofs of the exiſtence of a firſt mover, whoſe nature is ſpiritual; for it is a doctrine of the Chriſtian faith, that motion is not eternal. Zabarella aſſerted, that in order to believe this exiſtence, which no natural reaſon can demonſtrate, the grace of the Holy Ghoſt was neceſſary. The holy office found nothing unreaſonable in this aſſertion, and gave their approbation to this Philoſopher's book. This emboldened Berigardus to take the liberty of maintaining the ſame opinion. It is true he did not do it ſo bluntly; for he introduced an Interlocutor oppoſing this theſis. Let us cite a pretty long paſſage out of his preface: ‘Denique ut conſtet ea que dicuntur in noſtris Circulis permiſſa jam fuiſſe à S. Officio, libet pauca ſubjicere, maximè ne cui durum videatur quòd introduco Ariſtæum defendentem ſententiam Jacobi Zabarellæ viri in hoc Lyceo celeberrimi. Hæc ſententia libro de inventione æterni motoris approbato ſæpius à S. Officio, docet unicum medium philoſopho naturali ad demonſtrandum dari primum motorem à materia abjunctum eſſe motus æternitatem, quæ quia non datur, ut fide divina certi ſumus, ſequitur primum motorem demonſtrari non poſſe naturaliter, ſed ad hoc opus eſſe Dei contactu peculiari. Neque propterea Zabarella putat eam quam vocat demonſtrationem primi motoris ex motu æterno, eſſe veram demonſtrationem, utpote cujus medium falſum eſt, ſed loquitur ex falſis principiis Ariſtotelis, nempe ſi verus eſſet motus æternus, inde ſolùm oſtendi poſſe primum motorem. Hanc Zabarellæ opinionem jam permiſſam ſi tuerer, id fortaſſe tutò facere poſſem; verùm contrariam exiſtimo magis eſſe conſentaneam pietati, propterea illi oppono Charilaum qui Circ. II. & XVIII. contendit Deum verum cognoſci poſſe naturaliter, & licet rationes ille ſeorſum acceptæ non videantur ſufficere ad convincendos pertinaces Epicuræos, ut concludit ultimis verbis, omnibus tamen ſimul inſtructis, ait intellectum rectè diſpoſitum poſſe elevari ad hanc cognitionem naturaliter, ſed abſque merito gratiæ & gloriæ, ut ſic inexcuſabiles verè dicantur à Divo Paulo qui contemptis his rationibus ad falſas & irreligioſas opiniones delapſi ſunt. Zabarellam tamen ſequi videtur Campanella cap. 9. n. 2. ubi ait religionem veram (ac proinde Deum) citra fidem cognoſci non poſſe: quin etiam apud Philoſophos plus valere fidem quàm rationem (15). - - - To make it appear that what is advanced in the following work has already been permitted by the holy office; let us add a few things, eſpecially leſt it ſhould ſeem ſtrange to any perſon that I introduce Ariſtæus defending the opinion of James Zabarella, a famous man of this univerſity. You will find this opinion in his book on the Inveſtigation of the firſt Mover, a book that hath been often approved by the holy office, in which it is aſſerted, that a Natural Philoſopher can demonſtrate the being of a firſt Mover ſeparate from matter, upon no other ſuppoſition than that motion is eternal; and as we know, by revelation, that motion is not eternal, it follows, that the being of a firſt Mover cannot be demonſtrated by natural reaſon, and that the ſupernatural aſſiſtance of GOD is neceſſary for that purpoſe. Nor does Zabarella therefore think that what he calls a demonſtration of the being of a firſt Mover, is a real demonſtration; as the ſuppoſition upon which it is built, is falſe; but he argues from the principles of Ariſtotle, that if motion was eternal, from thence only would it follow that there is a firſt Mover. As this opinion of Zabarella has already been permitted, I might poſſibly defend it with ſafety. But I think the contrary opinion is more agreeable to piety; wherefore to oppoſe it I bring in Charilaus, who maintains, that we may know the true GOD by the light of nature: and tho' natural reaſons taken ſingly ſeem too weak to convince an obſtinate Epicurean, as Charilaus concludes, yet when taken altogether, he ſays, a well diſpoſed underſtanding may, by the light of nature, riſe to the knowledge of the true GOD, tho' without meriting thereby the grace of GOD and eternal felicity; ſo that they may truly be ſaid, by St Paul, to be inexcuſable, who deſpiſing the light of nature, turn aſide to falſe and ungodly opinions. However this opinion of Zabarella ſeems to be followed by Campanella, when he ſays that the true religion (and therefore GOD) cannot be known without the help of revelation; but that revelation is even to Philoſophers more valuable than reaſon.’

A REFLEXION upon the conſequences from the eternity, or the beginning of motion, with reſpect to the exiſtence of God.

Till I can come at this book of Zabarella, which is very hard to be met with in this country (16), I ſhall make one reflexion. I am not ſatisfied with my conjectures on this Philoſopher's way of reaſoning. He aſſerted (17), that the conſequence is right from the eternity of motion, to the exiſtence of a firſt ſpiritual Mover, but that a motion which had a beginning is no manner of proof that there is a firſt Mover diſtinct from matter. In order to reaſon upon this matter, it is neceſſary to ſuppoſe it impoſſible that a material principle ſhould act eternally (18), tho' it may be capable of acting for ſeveral ages. But I do not ſee on what this aſſertion can be grounded; for if Zabarella grants me that a material principle could produce motion, which, according to Moſes's hypotheſis, did not begin till ſix days before Adam, he muſt believe that this (c) Quibus omnibus (filiis & filiabus) .... facem prætulit incorruptæ gloriæ, & virtutis veræ, ſuo cunctis exemplo prælucens. Tomaſ. ibid. pag. 138.

---

(12) Theſe words of Moreri are taken from Mr Teiſſier, ubi ſupra.

(13) Imperial. ubi ſupra, pag. 117.

(14) Compare Tomaſin's words at the end of the text of this article.

(15) Claudius Berigardus, in proœmio Circuli Piſani, pag. 5, 6.

(16) The ſchoolmen are ſo much deſpiſed in this country, that one would be aſhamed to buy their books, or even to enquire whether they are to be found in a library.

(17) Thus Berigardus makes him reaſon.

(18) Berigardus, in Circulo i, pag. 5, advances this propoſition, Nulla virtus materiata æternum motum ciere poteſt.

tained that the proof of a God drawn from the exiſtence of a firſt mover, is defective, unleſs we ſuppoſe motion to be eternal [G]. I ſhall occaſionally ſay that there this principle having been at reſt from all eternity, was at laſt moved by itſelf, and that it ſhall once return to reſt, ſince it's materiality will never ſuffer it to do any thing eternal. But who doth not ſee the abſurdity of this hypotheſis? Every one clearly apprehends. 1. That all bodies which have been at reſt from all eternity, would for ever continue ſo, unleſs they were put in motion by ſome external power. 2. That all bodies which might begin to move, and had continued in motion as long as the world has laſted, according to the Scripture, might alſo perſevere eternally in that ſtate. 3. That all bodies which might begin to move one hundred ages ago, might have began twenty thouſand years, an hundred thouſand years, &c, ſooner; for there is no more reaſon to fix the beginning of motion to one hour rather than another, unleſs we have recourſe to the good pleaſure of a ſpiritual cauſe: but if a body might have began to move before any term aſſigned, it would follow that it might have been always in motion, and conſequently motion might have been eternal without being produced by a cauſe diſtinct from matter. What I have juſt been ſaying ſhews, that we may very reaſonably conclude, the exiſtence of a firſt ſpiritual Mover, from this, that the motion of matter had a beginning, and that we could not make this concluſion, if we ſhould once grant, that a motion which began might proceed from a material cauſe. Conſequently I do not find that Zabarella reaſoned well on this head.

Beſides, it ſeems to me much eaſier to prove, that there is a firſt Mover diſtinct from matter, if we ſuppoſe motion to have had a beginning, than if we ſuppoſe it eternal. Let us ſuppoſe it had a beginning, and it will neceſſarily follow, either that all bodies began to exiſt, or that having exiſted from all eternity, they continued during an eternity in a ſtate of reſt. If all bodies began to exiſt, they muſt neceſſarily have been produced by a ſpiritual cauſe; and this is the firſt Mover which we are in queſt of; for the ſpiritual principle, author of the exiſtence of all bodies, will alſo be the principle of their motion. If all bodies are eternal, and yet their motion is not eternal, it follows that they have not in themſelves the motive virtue; for if they had, they would have moved eternally. That motive virtue therefore does not reſide in matter, it is therefore in a ſpiritual ſubject; and this again is the firſt Mover which we are in queſt of. If it be the efficient cauſe of bodies (19), ſo much the better, for with much more reaſon will it be the efficient cauſe of motion. If it is not their efficient cauſe, if matter exiſts by itſelf, yet it will be the cauſe of their motion, ſince it is viſible that a nature which hath been at reſt during an eternity, does not begin to move itſelf, but muſt be drawn out of this ſtate of reſt by an external principle. On the other ſide, if we ſuppoſe that motion is eternal, it will be more difficult to maintain that it proceeds from an immaterial cauſe; for it may be urged, that the ſame neceſſity whereby matter hath eternally exiſted without having been created (20), hath made it move eternally without the help of an external principle, or ſpiritual mover. I cannot therefore comprehend the manner of arguing which Zabarella took; for whatever I conjecture on this head, tends to make me believe, rather that he diverted himſelf by broaching a paradox, than that he ſuffered himſelf to be ſeduced by ſpecious reaſons. Was he afraid that it ſhould be urged againſt him that a ſpiritual Mover would not have left matter in a ſtate of inactivity through all eternity, and that therefore the beginning of motion is a proof that the firſt Mover is not a ſpiritual being? But this objection is ſtronger againſt thoſe who ſhould maintain the materiality of the firſt Mover. Is it not more difficult to comprehend that a corporeal cauſe ſhould act with liberty, and begin it's actions at pleaſure, than to comprehend the ſame thing of a ſpiritual nature?

[G] I ſhall ſpeak of the treatiſe in which he maintained, that the proof of a GOD, drawn from the exiſtence of a firſt Mover, is defective, unleſs we ſuppoſe motion to be eternal.] All the former part of this article, and what is contained in the remark [H], was written in the month of March 1697. I read it over again in Auguſt 1701, in order to ſend it to the preſs; and whilſt I was peruſing it, I remembred that for two or three years paſt I had Zabarella's works by me. I therefore believed that I ought to examine what he ſaith, and compare with that the conjectures which I had made when I had no other guide than a citation of Berigardus. This examination made it appear to me, that my conjectures do not come home to the point, and that the ſtate of the queſtion is different from what I imagined. Notwithſtanding, I have publiſhed them without any alteration; they may afford matter of reflexion, and, at all events, they may ſerve as a proof of my ingenuity, and make it appear that I uſe no manner of artifice. There are a great many authors who, on the like occaſions, would have corrected their manuſcript, and yet would ſay, This is what we conjectured before we ſaw the book, and after we have read it, we have found our conjectures exactly conform to it. But I will act with more ſincerity, I am willing that the reader ſhould know the difference between what I thought of Zabarella's book before, and what I ought to ſay of it after I have read it. Accordingly I ſhall give a ſhort analyſis of that treatiſe.

It is intituled, De Inventione æterni Motoris, and contains but eight pages and a half in my edition (21). The author's firſt theſis is, that it is impoſſible to diſcover any otherwiſe than by motion that there is an immaterial ſubſtance; but he proteſts that he confines himſelf to the knowledge which may be acquired by the light of nature, and that he excepts revelation. ‘Hæc præmiſſa proteſtatione, nos hac de re ſecundum principia philoſophiæ Ariſt. eſſe loquuturos, & illam tantum ſubſtantiarum à materia abjunctarum notitiam, quam via naturali adipiſcimur, conſideraturos, omiſſa penitus earundem cognitione, quam revelatione divina & lumine ſupernaturali accepimus; veriſſimam illam quidem, ſed Ariſt. cujus dicta interpretanda ſuſcepimus, prorſus abſconditam (22). - - - I firſt declare that I am to ſpeak on this ſubject only according to the principles of Ariſtotle, and to conſider that knowledge of ſubſtances abſtracted from matter, which we attain by reaſon and the light of nature, ſetting aſide entirely that knowledge of them which we have received from Divine revelation, and by ſupernatural light, which knowledge is indeed moſt true, but was utterly hidden to Ariſtotle, whoſe principles I have undertaken to explain.’ He embraces the opinion of Averroës, who rejected the other proofs which Avicenna pretended to find in Ariſtotle's books, theſe for inſtance: there is one being dependant on another, therefore there is a firſt being which doth not depend on any thing whatſoever; for otherwiſe we ſhould be obliged to admit a progreſs in infinitum. But this firſt being is GOD, therefore, &c. there is one perfection and one goodneſs greater than another; there is therefore a ſupreme perfection and goodneſs. But the being which hath this perfection and this goodneſs is GOD, wherefore there is a GOD. Averroës anſwers, that all this proves only the exiſtence of a nature independent of, and more perfect than, others, but not it's immateriality. He adds, that the antient Philoſophers, who admitted nothing but matter, would ſay that this independent and moſt perfect nature, is nothing elſe but Heaven (23). Zabarella concludes, that in order to come naturally to the notion of an immaterial ſubſtance, we ought to argue thus: Heaven hath an inceſſant motion; every thing which moves is moved by another; whatever is corporeal is movable, and there is no progreſs in infinitum betwixt the movers and the things moved; wherefore there is a firſt mover diſtinct from matter.

He afterwards enquires whether motion, whatever it be, affords a proof of the exiſtence of ſuch a mover, and declares for the negative; for he concludes, that nothing but the eternity of motion can prove the exiſtence of a Mover ſeparate from matter. He examines the opinion of thoſe who pretend that Ariſtotle maintained (24), that even motion, which had a beginning, is able to lead us to the knowledge of a firſt ſpiritual Mover. This Philoſopher, ſay they, argued thus: Whatever moves, is moved by another, and there is no ſuch thing, as a progreſs in infinitum; wherefore there

(19) Note, that ſeveral great Orthodox Philoſophers maintain that a creature may be eternal.

(20) I ſuppoſe that Zabarella argued againſt ſome men, who did not believe the creation.

(21) It is that of Francfort ſumptibus hæredum Lazari Zetzneri, 1618, in 4to.

(22) Jacobus Zabarella, de Rebus naturalibus, pag. m. 253.

(23) Quare illi philoſophi, quorum mentionem facit Plato in Sophiſta, qui præter res corporeas & ſenſiles nil aliud exiſtere concedebant, dicerent illud ſummum & optimum, & perfectiſſimum, non eſſe niſi Cœlum, nec ullum præter illud dari alium Deum. Id. ibid. pag. 254.

(24) In lib. viii. Phyſic. auſcultationis.

there are more ambiguities than are imagined in the controverſy concerning the eternity there is a firſt Mover, which is immovable, and conſequently incorporeal, for if he were a body, he muſt of neceſſity be movable. Zabarella anſwers, that this argument of Ariſtotle can only lead us to the exiſtence of a Mover that is immovable in no other than a general ſenſe, which may comprize the ſouls of beaſts. Thoſe ſouls, continues he, are immovable ſo far as they are not movable in themſelves, but only by accident. But tho' they are accidentally movable, they are called the firſt movers, according to the order eſſential to moving things. Si hunc Ariſtotelis diſcurſum conſideremus, maniſeſtum eſt, per eum nos non duci ad alium motorem immobilem, quam late acceptum, qui animas quoque animalium mortalium complectatur ; immobiles enim ſunt, quatenus non ſunt per ſe mobiles, quum incorporeæ ſint, ſed tamen ſunt per accidens mobiles : neque per id fit, quin dicantur motores primi juxta ordinem moventium eſſentialem (25). He adds, that thoſe whom he oppoſes being very ſenſible of the lameneſs of this argument, have ſupplied the defect of it, in this manner : Heaven moves ; it is therefore moved by ſomething elſe ; therefore there is a firſt immovable Mover. But is this Mover eternal, or not ? If it is, we have what we enquire for : the motion of Heaven, be it what it will, be it but of two days, leads us to the exiſtence of a God. But if this Mover is not eternal, it will one day periſh, wherefore there is ſomething, which will deſtroy it ; it is not therefore the firſt Mover, we muſt therefore deny it that quality, and transfer it to another being, who ſhall deſtroy that pretended firſt Mover. Yet we were come ſo far as the firſt Mover, and we argued on that hypotheſis : what abſurdity more ridiculous than to offer in anſwer what is contradictory to a ſuppoſition, of the truth of which the contending parties are agreed ? But that thing, which ſhall occaſion ſooner or later the deſtruction of that, which we have conſidered as the firſt immovable Mover, muſt it not be the firſt Mover ? And to be ſo, ought it not to be in ſuch a ſtation as nothing can be above it, which is able to produce any alteration in it ? It is therefore eternal, it is therefore what we were to find by following the track of Ariſtotle's argument. Let us hear Zabarella's anſwer which turns ſolely on the ſolution of the following dilemma : The firſt Mover is or is not eternal ; if it is, we have gained our point : if it is not, there is then another Mover which can deſtroy it, there is therefore a Mover ſuperior to this firſt Mover. But this is abſurd, and contrary to the ſuppoſition to which both parties agreed. He anſwers (26), that the firſt Mover which his adverſaries have hit on is not eternal, but of the ſame nature with the ſoul of brutes, that it is the form of Heaven, and that Heaven being compoſed of four elements oppoſite to each other, had a beginning, and ſhall have an end, in like manner with other parts of the world ; that from the deſtruction of Heaven will neceſſarily reſult the deſtruction of it's moving ſoul (27) ; that it ſhall not periſh by the act of a firſt Mover ; and that therefore tho' it ſhall be deſtroyed it doth not follow from thence that there is a ſuperior agent or efficient cauſe above it ; it is ſufficient that it be united to a body naturally corruptible, for the corruption of that body neceſſarily draws on the corruption of it's form or of the ſoul, which in it performed the functions of a firſt Mover. Quando igitur hi dicunt, ſi primus motor univerſi eſt corruptibilis, ergo non eſt primus, negandum eſt conſequens : ad probationem autem, quum dicunt, corrumpetur à motore priore, hoc quoque eſt negandum ; non enim ex eo quod eſt corruptibilis, requiritur motor prior, à quo corrumpatur, ſed quum ſit incorporeus, & forma corporis, ſatis cauſa eſt ad ipſum interimendum corruptibilitas corporis, cujus eſt forma ; corpus autem ipſum, quum ſit elementare, à ſuo contrario lædi & interimi poteſt (28). Wherefore, concludes he, motion in general proves no more, than the exiſtence of a firſt Mover immovable in the ſame manner as the ſouls of brutes, are immovable and nothing but an eternal motion can prove an eternal Mover. Ex motu igitur abſolute accepto abſque conſideratione æternitatis nil aliud oſtenditur, quam dari primum motorem univerſi immobilem eo modo, quo animæ animalium brutorum ſunt immobiles, hoc eſt, non per ſe mobilem : quod autem nec per ſe, nec per accidens mobilis ſit, proinde à materia abjunctus : & impartibilis, & infatigabilis, & ſempiternus, id ea ratione non oſtenditur ; quapropter nullum aliud philoſopho naturali medium relinquitur ad demonſtrandum primum motorem æternum, niſi motus æternus ; quando enim ſumimus motum univerſi unum & eundem numero æternum eſſe, ſtatim inferimus, eum ab uno tantum motore totum produci ; quare neceſſe eſt, motorem illum eſſe infatigabilem, & ſempiternum (29).

It would not be eaſy for the Peripatetics to refute Zabarella's reaſons : for he argues ad hominem againſt them ; he makes his advantage of their doctrine of ſubſtantial forms, and the motive and primitive virtue of the ſouls of animals. Moſt of the antient Philoſophers believed that ſelf-motion was the eſſential character of the ſoul (30). Πᾶν γὰρ σῶμα, ſays Plato, ᾧ μὲν ἔξωθεν τὸ κινεῖσθαι, ἄψυχον· ᾧ δὲ ἔνδοθεν αὐτὸ ἐξ αὐτοῦ, ἔμψυχον. Omne enim corpus cui motus extrinſecus incidit inanime eſt. Cui vero intus ex ſeipſo ineſt animatum *. The Moderns, who have juſtly rejected theſe principles, might confute him without any difficulty, and find nothing intricate in his objections. Obſerve, by the by, how pernicious and dangerous the conſequences may prove of the Ariſtotelian hypotheſis about the internal activity of forms diſtinct from matter. It is a principle which admits of almoſt an infinite number of firſt Movers, from whence it is eaſy to proceed ſo far as to reject a firſt univerſal Mover, or to aſſert that he is ſubject to death. The ſoul of each man and each brute is, in it's kind, a firſt mover. It moves itſelf, and imprints motion on the body, of which it is the form. We may, in proportion, find the ſame principle in inanimate bodies. The form of heavy bodies hath no need of any external Mover to preſs them towards the center, nor that of light bodies to drive them from it ; but is itſelf their firſt Mover in this reſpect. Now if this Ariſtotelian hypotheſis be once admitted, an univerſal Mover of the Heavens will be no longer neceſſary, every planet will be moved by it's form, the heavens and fixed ſtars will be moved by theirs, and none of theſe movers will be accounted incorruptible, but will be liable to the common deſtiny of forms, which cannot ſubſiſt after the diſſolution of the matter united to them (31). Zabarella very clearly apprehending this conſequence, aſſerted that the ſoul of the Heavens would one day periſh, ſince the matter of the Heavens was compoſed of principles which claſh with each other. It is ſo evident that matter is changeable, that the antient Philoſophers who believed that the genii were not entirely ſeparated from matter, believed them mortal, not excepting the greateſt of them all. An evidence of this is Plutarch's ſtory, The great Pan is dead (32). If Zarabella has been able to penetrate into the conſequences of the common doctrine of the ſchools, he was not leſs in the right, when he aſſerted that in order to find a firſt eternal Mover, it was neceſſary to ſtop at one only cauſe which produced all motion. It is an advantage which we meet with in the Carteſian Philoſophy ; it aſcribes to God all the moving and immediate power of the univerſe, and doth not divide it betwixt the Creator and the creatures. The multitude of Movers may inſenſibly lead to the moſt dangerous atheiſm, and from hence doubtleſs proceeds the atheiſm of the Chineſe Philoſophers (33). They firſt of all believed a ſuperior, immaterial and infinite Deity ; but attributing great natural powers to bodies, and chiefly to the celeſtial, they, by little and little, forgot the immaterial Divinity, and ſtopped at material principles. The viſible and material Heaven is at preſent their great God (34).

Facts which prove that the Orthodox are allowed to diſpute on the arguments for the exiſtence of a God.

For the reſt, we ought not to be ſurprized that the Italian Inquiſition permitted Zabarella to follow Averroës, in rejecting ſome proofs of the exiſtence of a God. This ſort of liberty is very great every where ; and provided a man owns that this exiſtence may be proved by other means, they give him leave to cenſure this or that particular proof. The Carteſians are not more annoyed on any head, than on Mr Des Cartes's demonſtration of the exiſtence of God. He was obliged to anſwer a vaſt number of objections. And we every day ſee the moſt orthodox people renewing this diſpute. Mr Werenfels, Profeſſor at Baſil, maintained, in a printed tract, that this argument of Des Cartes is a meer paralogiſm. Mr Swicer, Profeſſor at Zurich, anſwered eternity of the world [H].

---

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 255.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 256.

(27) Dicam itaque, ex interitu Cœli neceſſario fieri ut anima quoque motrix intereat, quia licet hæc contrarium non habeat, tamen ex ſubjecti corporis interitu ex neceſſitate deficeret, quum ſit forma materialis, quales ſunt animæ animalium ; animam humanam ſemper excipio. Id. ibid.

(28) Id. ibid.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 257.

(30) See Ariſtotle de Anima, lib. i, cap. ii.

* Plato, in Phædro, pag. m. 1221, D.

(31) See, above, the compariſon made in remark [I], of the article XENOCRATES, between the gods of Xenocrates, and the ſlaves called Servigleba.

(32) Plut. de Oracul. defectu, pag. 419. See alſo the remark [I], in the article CHRYSIPPUS.

(33) See the remark [X], in the article SPINOZA.

(34) See ſeveral proofs of this in the apology for the Dominicans, printed at Cologn in 1699, pag. 79, & ſeq. See alſo the article SPINOZA, remark [X].

anſwered him; as did alſo Mr Jaquelot, a Miniſter at the Hague, whoſe anſwer is inſerted in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (35) Mr Brillon, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, ſaw this anſwer, but not being ſatisfied with it, he publiſhed (36) a memoir to prove that Des Cartes's argument was a ſophiſm, and not a demonſtration. Father Francis Lami, a Benedictine Monk, refuted this memoir (37). Mr Jaquelot replied for himſelf (38). Mr l'Herminier, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, has lately publiſhed a book, in which he not only rejects Des Cartes's demonſtrations concerning the exiſtence of G O D, but alſo moſt others. 'Of 'five offered by St Thomas, which are alſo commonly 'made uſe of by Philoſophers and Divines, this Doctor 'rejects four, and allows only one of them to be valid 'againſt the Atheiſts, for he looks upon it as a para'logiſm to prove the Deity by any of the following 'reaſons. That all that exiſts cannot be contingent, 'and that there muſt be ſome being which neceſſarily 'exiſts of itſelf. That we cannot admit an infinite 'number of cauſes mutually ſubordinate, and that it is 'abſolutely neceſſary to acknowledge a firſt cauſe on 'which all others are dependent. That matter can'not move itſelf, but that a firſt incorporeal Mover 'muſt neceſſarily exiſt, from which it mediately or 'immediately received it's moving impulſe. That in 'thoſe beings which exiſt, there appearing ſeveral de'grees of perfection, as goodneſs, beauty, power, &c. 'there muſt undoubtedly exiſt a Being infinitely per'fect, with reſpect to which they may be ſaid to be 'leſs or more perfect in proportion to their approach'ing more or leſs to it's perfection. After having 'ranked theſe four demonſtrations among the ſo'phiſms, the fifth which Mr l'Herminier looks upon 'as a real demonſtration of the exiſtence of God, is 'that drawn from the ſtructure of the univerſe and the 'manner of its ſubſiſting in ſuch an excellent order of all 'it's parts, and with ſuch a conſtant regularity of their 'motions (39).' This is what we find in the journal of Trevoux, in the extract of Mr l'Herminier's book (40). It is long ſince a very famous ſchool-man (41) declared, that all the proofs which reaſon can afford of the exiſtence of God are only probable. This Doctor of the Sorbonne does not go ſo far.

[H] There are more ambiguities than are imagined in the controverſy concerning the eternity of the world.] All Chriſtians (42) are agreed, that nothing beſides God hath eternally exiſted; but ſeveral aſſert that he might have actually created the world as ſoon as he formed the decree in order to it's production; from whence they conclude, that the world might have exiſted from all eternity, ſince the decree for it's production is undoubtedly eternal. Several alſo affirm that it is impoſſible for a creature to be eternal. Each of theſe parties is ſtronger in objections than ſolutions. But this diſpute which is rendred ſo tedious and difficult, would ſoon ceaſe, if the diſputants of each ſide would but explain themſelves clearly, and remove the ambiguities about eternity. The queſtion ought to be put thus: Is it poſſible that G O D and his creatures may have always exiſted together. And then one would not ſo boldly take the negative ſide; for this term, the eternity of the world, a term which ſtartles ſo many people, would not here make ſuch an impreſſion on the mind. And the better to remove this ſtumbling-block, it ſhould be ſaid that a creature which had always co-exiſted with God would not be eternal, for which this reaſon ought immediately to be alledged, that the duration of creatures is ſucceſſive, and that eternity is a ſimple duration which eſſentially excludes the time paſt, and the time to come. By this eſſential difference betwixt the duration of God, and that of the creatures, we ſhould put an end to almoſt all the diſpute, and each party would find their account in it. We ſhould grant to thoſe who deny that a creature can be eternal, that they are in the right, and ſhould not deny that it is poſſible for God and the creature to have always exiſted together, ſince it is certain that a cauſe doth not comprehend in it's idea a priority of time with reſpect to it's effect, and that this is eſpecially true with reſpect to an omnipotent cauſe which needs only will in order to produce actually whatever it pleaſes. Mr Poiret hath very clearly apprehended the ambiguities which perplex this controverſy, and render it in a manner a diſpute about words. He judiciouſly obſerves that it is not true that the creatures would be eternal, if their exiſtence had no beginning, and tells us that thoſe who affirm it have a wrong notion of eternity. 'Aſſerentibus (Platoni ut ajunt & Ariſtoteli) 'mundum exiſtentiæ initio carere, fuit objectum, ſi id 'ita ſe haberet, mundum igitur æternum fore. Ecce, 'homines iſti ſibi imaginantur Æternitatem, quaſi 'eſſet infinitorum momentorum ordo principio atque 'fine carens, quæ vera æternitatis ignorantia eſt. 'Falſum eſt, mundum ſtatui æternum ſi dicatur vel 'ſemper exſtitiſſe, vel non poſſe affirmari in eo eſſe ali'quod momentum quod ab alio non fuerit præceſſum: 'quamvis enim hoc eſſet, nihilominus mundus tem'porarius eſſet & dependens; neque hoc quicquam 'Dei Æternitati aut Potentiæ detraheret (43). - - - 'It was objected to thoſe (Plato and Ariſtotle, as it is 'ſaid) who maintained, that the world is without a 'beginning; that if it was ſo, the world would be eter'nal. They who made this objection muſt have imagined 'that eternity is an order of ſucceſſion of infinite moments 'of time, without beginning or end: but this ſhews that 'they know not what eternity is. It is falſe that the 'world would be accounted eternal, if we ſay either that it 'always exiſted, or that there is not any moment of it's 'time which is not preceded by another: for even if this 'was ſo, the world would only be temporary and de'pendent, neither would this derogate from the eternity, or 'the power of G O D.' Obſerve by the by that this author doth three things. We have juſt now ſeen the firſt, which is the falſe conſequence that the world would be eternal if it never began. In the ſecond place he owns that the arguments commonly alledged againſt thoſe who ſay that the world had no beginning are weak. He excuſes thoſe who not having the light of revelation, did not believe the beginning of the univerſe. He tells us that when he was writing that chapter he was perſuaded it was not poſſible to find any good reaſons againſt thoſe of that opinion, tho' he had long ſearched after better proofs than all thoſe which he had read, and which appeared weak to him. Poſtquam aliorum quæ occurrerunt rationes infirmas deprehenderem, alias diu in mente mea quæſieram, putavi ſepoſita revelatione non poſſe ex lumine naturæ demonſtrari Mundum ſic eſſe, ut prius non fuerit (44). 3. At laſt he brings a proof which offered itſelf to his mind whilſt he was writing, he brings it, I ſay, againſt theſe people. But obſerve, that an objection was made to him (45), to which he gave an anſwer (46), which doth not take off the force of it.

Here are other quibbles which prevail in this diſpute. Thoſe who ſay that the creatures did not always co-exiſt with God, are obliged to own that God exiſted before them. There was therefore ſuch a thing as before, when God exiſted alone; it is not therefore true that the duration of God is an indiviſible point: Time therefore preceded the exiſtence of the creatures. Theſe conſequences make thoſe gentlemen fall into a contradiction. For if the duration of God is indiviſible, and without either time paſt or time to come, it follows that time and the creatures began together, and if ſo, how can we ſay that God exiſted before the exiſtence of the creatures? That phraſe is improper and contradictory. And the following are no leſs ſo, God might have created the world ſooner or later than he did create it; he might have done it one hundred thouſand years ſooner, &c.

They do not attend to this, that by making eternity one indiviſible inſtant, the hypotheſis of the beginning of the creatures is weakened. How do you prove that the world did not always exiſt? Is it not from the argument, that there was an infinite nature which exiſted while the world did not exiſt? But can the duration of that nature ſet bounds to that of the world? Can it hinder the duration of the world from extending its ſelf beyond all the particular beginnings which you would aſſign for it? You ſay that the creatures want only a point of indiviſible duration to be without a beginning; for, according to you, they were only preceded by the duration of God, which is an indiviſible inſtant. You will be anſwered, that they did not therefore begin, for if a ſtick wanted only one point (I mean a Mathematical point) to be four feet long, it would certainly have the whole extent of four feet. This is an inſtance that may be founded on the common definition of the duration of God (47), a definition much

---

(35) For May 1700, pag. 199, & ſeq.

(36) In the ſecond Journal des Sçavans, for the year 1701.

(37) See the Journal of Trevoux, for January and February 1701, pag. 104, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

(38) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for May 1701, pag. 226, & ſeq.

(39) Journal of Trevoux, for May and June, 1701, pag. 317, Dutch Edit.

(40) It is intituled, Summa Theologiæ ad uſum Scholæ accommodata.

(41) Gabriel Biel in Magiſtrum Sententiarum, Diſtinct. ii, Quæſt. x, Art. iii.

(42) Except ſome Heretics, who acknowledge the eternity of matter.

(43) Petrus Poiret, Cogitat. Rationales de Deo, Anima, & Malo, lib. iii, cap. xvi, num. ix, pag. 438, Edit. 1685.

(44) Id. ibid. pag. 439.

(45) You will find it in page 674, 675, of this book of Mr Poiret.

(46) You will find it in p. 678, of the ſame book.

(47) It is taken from Boëtius, who ſays, lib. v, de Conſol. Philoſ. Proſa vi, pag. m. 135, that eternity is interminabilis vitæ tota ſimul & perfecta poſſeſſio.

much more incomprehenſible than the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation; for if it is impoſſible to conceive that all the members of a man ſhould be contained diſtinct from each other within the compaſs of a Mathematical point; how ſhall we conceive that a duration without beginning or end, and which co-exiſts with the ſucceſſive duration of all creatures, is comprized in an indiviſible inſtant (48)?

This hypotheſis raiſes another difficulty in favour of thoſe who aſſert that the creatures had no beginning. If the decree of the creation doth not comprehend a particular moment, it never exiſted without the creatures; for it ought to be underſtood under this phraſe, I will that the world exiſt. It is viſible that by virtue of ſuch a decree the world muſt have exiſted at the ſame time with this act of the will of God. But ſince this act had no beginning, neither had the world any. Let us ſuppoſe then that the decree was conceived thus; I will that the world exiſt in ſuch a moment. But how can we ſuppoſe that, if the duration of God is an indiviſible point? Can this or that moment be choſen rather than any other in ſuch a duration? It ſeems therefore, that if the duration of God is not ſucceſſive, the world could not have a beginning. This objection was propoſed to Mr Poiret in the year 1679 (49). He returned an anſwer (50) which no ways removes the difficulty, and even takes away all means of doing it; for he ſuppoſeth that it is not poſſible there ſhould be any moments before the exiſtence of the creatures: nay, he ſeems to ſuppoſe that the decree of the creation was only made at the very moment that the creatures exiſted. Let us cite his words: ‘Nec poterat exiſtere mundus, nec momenta ulla, ſine alio decreto, nempe eo cùm dixit Deus, Volo mundum exiſtere; & tunc, (ut ait Scriptura,) dixit, & facta ſunt, tunc exſtitit extemplo mundus: Et hoc fuit primum ejus momentum, & ante hoc nullum fuit de facto poſſibile momentum; eſtque contradicens concipere ante mundum plura momenta ex quibus unum eligatur ad exiſtentiam primam mundi, cæteris partim ſine mundo prælapſis: nam momentum eſt modus creaturæ quà exiſtentis (51). - - - - Neither could the world, or any moment of time exiſt, without another decree, namely that when God ſaid, I will that the world exiſt, and then (as it is in the Scripture) he ſpoke and the things were made: then the world immediately came into being. This was the firſt moment of its exiſtence; and before this, there was no poſſible moment. And it is contradictory to conceive, that before the firſt exiſtence of the world, there were ſeveral moments of time, and that one of them was ſingled out for the firſt moment of it's exiſtence, while the reſt paſſed away without any world: for time is a mode of a creature, conſidered as exiſting.’ For my part, I make a quite different ſuppoſition, and believe it ſolves the difficulty. I ſuppoſe that among the poſſible beings which God knew, before (52) he made the decrees of the creation, we ought to reckon a ſucceſſive duration without beginning or end; and whoſe parts are as diſtinct from one another, as thoſe of a poſſible extenſion, which God likewiſe knew before his decrees, as a Being infinite, according to the three dimenſions. He left in the ſtate of the things poſſible, part of this infinite duration, and made decrees for the exiſtence of the other. He choſe ſuch a moment as he thought fit in this ideal duration for the firſt which ſhould exiſt, and fixed to it the act, by which he decreed the creation of the world. This is the reaſon why the eternity of that act doth not prove the eternity of the world. Thus we ſee again, that the indiviſibility of the real duration of God, doth not prove that the world did not begin. We have alſo in this ideal or poſſible duration, the true meaſure of time. Others look for it in vain, in the motion of the Heavens. Others yet more chimerically aſſert, that time is an Ens rationis, a manner of conceiving things, and that without motion, or the thought of man, there would be no ſuch thing as time. A groſs abſurdity: for tho' all created ſpirits ſhould periſh, tho' all bodies ſhould ceaſe to move, there would ſtill be a ſucceſſive fixed and regular duration in the world, which would correſpond to the moments of the poſſible duration known to God, and according to which he would preſerve every thing more or leſs, for ſo many years. An extenſion which is at reſt, requires no leſs to be created every moment of it's duration, than an extenſion which moves. The conſervation of creatures is always a continual creation, whether they move, or reſt in the ſame ſituation. The true meaſure of the abſolute quantity of things, either with reſpect to extenſion or time, is only to be found in the ideas of God. Man knows nothing of it; he is only acquainted with relative magnitude or littleneſs. The ſame ſpace of time appears to him ſhort or long, according as he paſſes it with pleaſure or pain. The very hour which ſeems ſhort to one, appears long to another.

(48) The Schoolmen take great pains to make this intelligible. See among others Caramuel, in his Philoſophia rationalis & realis, lib. vii.

(49) It is at pag. 675, 676, of his Cogitat. rationales de Deo, &c.

(50) Ibid. pag. 680.

(51) Poiret, ibid. pag. 680.

(52) This word ought to be underſtood according to our way of apprehending things, and what is called in the ſchools, priority of nature, ſignum rationis.

ZAHURIS, is the common name beſtowed on a certain ſort of men in Spain, who, as it is pretended (a), are ſo ſharp ſighted, as to ſee veins of water, metals, treaſures, and dead bodies under ground. Their eyes are very red. Martin Del Rio tells us that when he was at Madrid in the year 1575, he ſaw a little boy of this ſort. It is remarkable that though this author is very ready to impute extraordinary effects to the devils, yet he doth not believe that the Zahuris diſcover ſubterraneous waters and metals by any magical contract, but believes that the vapours diſcover the water to them, and that they know the mines by the herbs which grow in thoſe places. But as for treaſures and dead bodies, he ſaith the Devil ſheweth them to them; ſince they can mark out what treaſures and corps they ſee, and are able to do it only on Tueſdays and Fridays. He doth not argue very conſiſtently on what is related of theſe people [A]; and all thoſe who cite him do it not much to their honour [B]: either they do not underſtand Latin, or they rely on falſified quotations. Gutierrius, a Spaniſh Phyſician, laughs at what is ſaid of the Zahuris [C].

(a) Del Rio Diſquiſit. Magic. Tom. i, lib. i, cap. iii, Quæſt. iv.

[A] Del Rio doth not argue very conſiſtently, on what is related of theſe people.] For if it be once granted that the Zahuris ſee dead bodies and treaſures, there is no reaſon to pretend that they do not ſee veins of water, and gold and ſilver mines. Why then doth del Rio grant the one, and deny the other? For he denies it, when he ſays that they know by the vapours and herbs, what lies hidden in a certain place of the earth. A knowledge which is acquired after this manner, is not what we call ſeeing. To argue conſiſtently on this head, he ought to deny the facts, or explain them all by the ſame Hypotheſis; for if the Devil is the cauſe of the two laſt, he may very well be ſo of the two former.

[B] All thoſe who cite him, do it not much to their honour.] One of thoſe who wrote concerning the wand of Peter Aymar, alledges Martin del Rio, as an author who on the ſubject of the Zahuris, goes no further than natural cauſes (1). But this is viſibly falſe, ſince of the four performances of theſe people, he aſcribes two to the Devil. Here follows what that author makes him ſay: Del Rio relates that there are certain men in Spain, called Zahuris, by reaſon of their ſharp ſight. He ſaith that he ſaw one of them at Madrid, in the year 1575, and that thoſe Zahuris were reputed to ſee through the thick ſurface of the earth, ſprings of water, treaſures, and metallic mines; and tho' theſe effects ſeemed very ſurprizing, he informs us that he explained them naturally, and that ſeveral Philoſophers alſo referred them to natural cauſes. I. He doth not ſay that thoſe people are called Zahuris from their ſharp ſight (2). II. This author does not mention the ſeeing of buried bodies. III. Del Rio doth not ſay that he naturally explained thoſe three effects; he ſaith, that with reſpect to the two firſt, he perſiſts in the natural explanation which he had given elſewhere (3); but he attributes the other to the Devil.

[C] Gutierrius . . . . . laughs at what is ſaid of the Zahuris.] He calls them Zahories, and ſo much the more blames the popular credulity in this reſpect, be-

(1) See the Mercure Galant, for the month of February, 1693, pag. 235.

(2) Norunt Hiſpaniæ genus hominum quod vocant Zahuris, nos Lynceos poſſumus nuncupare. Mart. del Rio, Diſq. Magic. lib. i, cap. iii, Quæſt. iv, pag. 35.

(3) Commentar. in Medeam Senecæ, ver. 231.

cauſe they ſuppoſe theſe people to be born on Good-Friday, and that they enjoy this miraculous privilege by virtue of their birth-day. ‘ Eo magis iſti damnandi, quia ex ſuperſtitioſa hominum opinione admittantur putantes tali prærogativa hos impoſtores donari, quia nati fuerint die illa ſacra, humano generi ſemper fauſta ac felici, in qua celebratur apud Catholicos memoria Paſſionis Domini Jeſu-Chriſti, feria inquam ſexta Judæorum perfidia crucifixi, & quemadmodum tunc terra commota atque monumentis apertis latitantia, ac ſepulta corpora apparuerunt hominibus illa die, ſic altera in qua recolitur felix illa memoria ſi natalis alicui hominum fuerit, illam virtutem videndi potentiæ tribuit, aut donat quæ ad interanea terrarum pertingere poſſit: Vide quam futile ac irreligioſum commentum (4). - - - - The Zahuris are ſo much the more to be condemned and exploded, as they are admitted only by the opinion of ſuperſtitious men, who imagine that theſe impoſtors are gifted with ſuch a virtue, becauſe they were born on that ſacred day, ever bleſſed and happy to mankind, on which the Catholics commemorate the paſſion of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; the ſixth day of the week, I ſay, on which he was crucified by the perfidy of the Jews: for, as the earth was then ſhaken, and the graves of the dead opened, many hidden and buried bodies, did on that day appear to men, ſo they think that the day on which this is commemorated, if it chances to be the birth-day of any perſon, imparts to him that virtue of ſeeing things which are in the bowels of the earth. What a ſilly and chimerical fancy is this!’

(4) Joan. Lazarus Gutierrius Sepulbedenſis, in Academia Pinciana Medicinæ publicus Profeſſor, Opuſculo de Faſcino, Dubio vi, num. 16, pag. 143.

ZANCHIUS, or ZANCHUS (Basil) one of the learned men of the XVIth century, was of Bergamo. He took the habit of a regular Canon, and applied with an extreme ardour, not only to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Theology, but alſo to that of the Belles Lettres. The works we have of his are proofs of his erudition [A]. He acquired ſuch an extenſive knowledge, that he was thought worthy to be keeper of the Vatican library. He diſcharged that poſt with the greateſt reputation, and to the ſatisfaction of the learned. He died very piouſly at Rome in the year 1560 (a). This I take from Ghilini's Teatro. I am ſorry that I cannot find in it the circumſtances of a particular which I have read elſewhere, I mean that Zanchius being perſecuted and oppreſſed in a cruel manner, ended his days in miſery [B]. He was couſin to Zanchius (b) who is the ſubject of the next article, and had two brothers who were regular Canons as well as himſelf (c).

(a) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, Part. i, pag. 26, 27.

(b) Hieron. Zanchius, Epiſtol. lib. ii, pag. 445.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] The works we have of his are proofs of his erudition.] Ghilini repreſents him as a man who had thoroughly ſtudied the Latin tongue, and had thereby acquired as much glory, as the moſt excellent Profeſſors of that language. S'affaticò molto nell' acquiſto della lingua Latina, dalla quale ne conſeguì la maggior gloria, che dar ſi poſſi al più eſquiſito profeſſore di così neceſſaria favella (1). He improved, adds he, the Dictionary of Marius Galezinus. I believe he ſhould have ſaid that of Marius Nizolius. ‘ Aſſaiſſimo li devono tutti i ſtudioſi, e devono anco in gran parte riconoſcere dal ſuo infaticabile intelletto la perfezione del frutuoſo Dizionario de Mario Galeſino, il quale fu aumentato, e ridotto al termine, che hoggidi ſi vede; che hà per titolo Verborum latinorum ex variis auctoribus, lib. i. Vanno anco attorno con molta commendazione del ſuo nome queſte altre opere. Dictionarium Poeticum, & Epitheta veterum Poetarum: de horto ſophiæ libri duo carmine conſcripti: Adnotationes in divinos libros: Quæſtiones in libros Regum, & Paralipomenon: Poematum libri octo (2). - - - - All men of letters are greatly indebted to him, and ought to own that the uſeful Dictionary of Marius Galezinus, which he enlarged and brought into the form in which it now appears, was perfected in a great meaſure by his indefatigable labour. It is intituled Verborum latinorum ex variis auctoribus, lib. i. There are likewiſe in the hands of the learned, theſe other works of his, which are greatly to his reputation. Dictionarium Poeticum, &c.’ Add to this theſe words of Giraldus (3). Eſt & Petrus Zanchus Bergamas, qui mutato vitæ inſtituto à Sodalibus Bazilius vocitatus eſt: vivit adhuc, à prima ejus adoleſcentia mihi cognitus Romæ in ſtudiis bonarum literarum verſatus, nec minus in ſacris bene eruditus: plurima ad hanc diem tum ſoluta oratione, tum pedeſtri & carmine perſcripſit, inter quæ Romæ publicata in manus peritorum vagantur duo libri verſu heroico elaborati ad Petr. Bembum Card. qui inſcribuntur Hortus Sophiæ, & præterea alia ſimul impreſſa: extat & laborioſum opus, Sylva vocabulorum ex optimis auctoribus linguæ Latinæ, item Nizolii ex Cicerone Paralipomena. - - - - Peter Zanchius of Bergamo, having changed his way of life, was by his companions called Baſil: he is ſtill living, I was acquainted with him at Rome, when he was very young; he has diligently ſtudied the Belles Lettres, and is alſo very learned in Divinity: he writes even till this day, a great many good things, both in proſe and verſe. There are in the hands of the curious, two books of his written in heroic verſe, inſcribed to Cardinal Peter Bembus, and intituled Hortus Sapientiæ, together with other pieces printed at Rome. He has alſo publiſhed a laborious work, intituled, Sylva vocabulorum, a collection of words taken from the beſt Latin authors, and likewiſe Nizolius's Paralipomena, from Cicero.’

[B] Zanchius . . . . oppreſſed in a cruel manner, ended his days in miſery.] Paul Manutius deplores his ſad fate in a letter to Gambara an intimate friend of the deceaſed. ‘ Baſilii Zanchi, ſaith he (4), poetæ ſummi, hominiſque non vulgariter eruditi, miſerabilis & indigniſſimus interitus hilaritatem mihi prorſus omnem eripuit. quem, enim donare ſummis præmiis ob excellentem virtutem; decorare honoribus ob ſingularem integritatem, atque innocentiam æquum fuit; eum tam ignominioſe vexatum, tam acerbè, tam crudeliter extinctum, quis non ferat iniquiſſimè? equidem, ut audivi, etiam dolore tuo vehementer dolui. nam & vixiſtis unà ſemper conjunctiſſimè, alter alteri egregiè carus. - - - - The miſerable and underſerved death of Baſil Zanchius, has been a great affliction to me. He was a great Poet, and a man of uncommon learning. Who would not be deeply concerned, that a man who merited the greateſt rewards for his extraordinary virtue, and the greateſt honours for his ſingular integrity and innocence, ſhould be perſecuted and oppreſſed with ſo much cruelty and ignominy, and end his days in miſery? Indeed, when I heard of it, I greatly mourned on account of the grief it would give you: for you and Zanchius have lived together in the firmeſt union, and with the greateſt mutual friendſhip.’ What follows in this Epiſtle of Manutius, is to be found above (5), look there for the elogies which he beſtows on our Baſil's verſes.

(1) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. i, pag. 26.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Lilius Gregor. Gyrald. de Poëtis ſuor. temporum, Dial. ii, pag. 569, Tom. ii, Oper. Edit. 1696.

(4) Paulus Manutius, Epiſt. xxviii, lib. iv, pag. m. 226.

(5) In the remark [B], of the article GAMBARA.

ZANCHIUS (Jerom) one of the moſt celebrated Proteſtant Divines, was born at Alzano in Italy [A] on the ſecond of February 1516. He entred into the congregation

[A] He was born at Alzano in Italy.] The difference which Mr Teiſſier (1) has diſcovered betwixt Melchior Adam and Thuanus, is really no difference. The former, ſaith he, writes that Zanchius was a native of Alzano, but Thuanus and Verheiden ſay he was born at Bergamo. I own theſe two laſt authors give him the epithet of Bergomas; but ſince it is not leſs proper to thoſe born in the Bergamaſco, than to thoſe that are born in the city of Bergamo, it is by no means juſt to impute to Thuanus and Verheiden the limited ſenſe which is aſcribed to them. We may very well ſuppoſe that they deſigned to ſay in general, that Zanchius was born in the province of Bergamo; and ſo, Melchior Adam differs from them congregation of the regular Canons of Lateran, at the age of fifteen, and continued there about nineteen years. He at firſt applied to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and of ſchool Divinity; but after having heard Peter Martyr's Lectures at Lucca, on the Epiſtle of St Paul to the Romans, and the Pſalms, he engaged himſelf in the more profitable ſtudy of the Scripture and Fathers. Every body knows that Peter Martyr, who was a Canon of the ſame congregation, communicated the Proteſtant doctrines to ſeveral of his brethren before he threw off the monkiſh habit. The impreſſions which he made on them were ſo ſtrong, that in the ſpace of one year, eighteen of the fraternity imitated him in abjuring Popery. Our Zanchius was one of them. He left Italy in the year 1550, and ſtayed ſome time amongſt the Griſons, and afterwards at Geneva, whence he deſigned to go to London, being invited thither by Peter Martyr, who intended to procure him a place of Divinity Profeſſor in England. But being intreated by the directors of the univerſity of Straſburgh, to fill the vacant place of the deceaſed Gaſpar Hedion, Divinity Profeſſor there, he accepted that employment in the year 1553, and exerciſed it almoſt eleven years, reading now and then ſome lectures on Ariſtotle. The univerſity required him to ſign the Augſbourg confeſſion, but did not obtain it without ſome limitations which the directors agreed to. He was admitted one of the Canons of St Thomas in the year 1555. He was a lover of peace [B], and hated Theological civil wars; which nevertheleſs he could not avoid. He was accuſed of ſome errors, he defended himſelf, and this affair was carried on ſo warmly, that it was reduced to the terms either of his voluntarily retiring, or of the directors diſmiſſing him. He did not find his account in this alternative; wherefore he ſtirred very much to maintain his poſt. A thouſand expedients were ſought after, and at laſt they fell upon that of obliging him to ſign a formulary. He ſigned it with ſome reſtrictions [C]: but that did not hinder his adverſaries from triumphing, nor from ſpreading the news of their victory every where. He deſigned to retrieve himſelf, and new propoſals of accommodation were begun, when a favourable opportunity afforded him a handſome pretext to extricate himſelf out of this labyrinth. The church of Chiavenna, in the country of the Griſons invited him to be their miniſter, and he accepted that vocation. He ſurrendred his canonry, them no otherwiſe, than in expreſſing the native place of this great Divine more particularly: He calls it Alzanum (2), and ſaith that it is ſituated in the valley of Seri (3). Now it is certain, that Alzanum, and this valley belong to the Bergamaſco (4). Mr Teiſſier is again miſtaken when he ſays that Alzano is a little town four leagues diſtant from Venice. If inſtead of four leagues he had put forty, he needed not have feared ſaying too much. Melchior Adam deceived him: he had read ſomewhere that our Jerom's father having received the news of his father's death, quitted his ſtudies of the Civil-Law, and married. The care which he was obliged to take of his ſiſters, made him ſenſible that he would do much better to apply to his domeſtic affairs, than to follow the bar; nay, he left the city, and removed to Alzano, which was four miles diſtant (5); This he did like a good œconomiſt (6), that is, as I think, to live at leſs expence. This is what Melchior Adam found in ſome book (7). Upon this he falls to conjecturing, but is not happy in it; he ſays (8) in a marginal note, that in his opinion the city which Zanchius's father left was Venice. If he had been a good Geographer, he would never have entertained that thought, but would have known that the diſtance betwixt Alzano and Venice, is above forty leagues. His conjecture is turned into a downright affirmation by Mr Teiſſier, who beſides, tranſlates quartum lapidem, by four leagues, though in the Latin ſtyle, they contain only four thouſand paces. I take Bergamo, to be the city, from whence Zanchius's father departed, for reaſons of œconomy. Quenſtedt hath committed two groſs faults: he ſays page 276 (9), that Jerom Zanchius was born at Alzano, in the valley of Seri, four miles from Venice; but in page 302, he makes him a native of the city of Bergamo.

(1) Teſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. ii, pag. 160.

[B] Zanchius was a lover of peace.] He was according to Melchior Adam (10), ' litium fugitans, ' concordiæ amans .... Modeſtiæ ſingularis, pacis ' Eccleſiarum ſtudioſiſſimus (11). ---- He ſhunned contention, loved concord, was a man of extraordinary ' modeſty; and ſtudied to promote peace in the churches.' Others ſay (12), that very few ſurpaſſed him in learning, piety, and modeſty. See the remarks in which I examine the narrative of Thuanus and Moreri.

[C] Obliged him to ſign a formulary. He ſigned it with ſome reſtrictions.] We muſt know that there ſoon happened ſome broils betwixt him and John Marbachius, Miniſter, and Divinity-Profeſſor at Straſburgh. They differed on the doctrine of Predeſtination, and its dependencies; but the fire lay hid under the aſhes till the year 1561, when Zanchius induced the magiſtrates to ſuppreſs a book of Tilemannus Heſhuſius, which had been reprinted at Straſburgh, but had the name of Magdeburg in the title as the place where it was printed. This book treated of the Real Preſence in, cum, ſub pane, --- in, with, and under the bread, and had a preface which was injurious to Frederic III, Elector Palatine, to Melanchthon, and ſeveral other excellent Divines. The author of this preface, accuſed of Hereſy and Atheiſm, all thoſe who did not approve his opinion concerning the Real Preſence and Oral Manducation. Zanchius cauſed this book to be ſuppreſſed, not on account of its doctrine, which he left to the judgment of the Church, but for the calumnies of the preface. This diſpleaſed Marbachius, and the other zealous aſſerters of Lutheraniſm, and put them upon trying all ways to remove Zanchius. For this purpoſe they canvaſſed all his lectures, and the manuſcripts he had dictated, and when they had extracted from them whatever they could, they accuſed him of Heterodoxy, with regard to Predeſtination and Perſeverance, &c. The affair was vigorouſly debated; Zanchius conſulted the Divines of ſeveral places of Germany, and offered a verbal conference with his adverſaries. This propoſal was rejected, and in the mean time they declaimed againſt him before the people, with great animoſity (13). At laſt, the affair came to an arbitration; and the following perſons were prevailed on to come to Straſburgh; from Tubingen, James Andreas; from Deux Ponts, Cuman Flinſbach; and from Baſil, Simon Sulcerus, and Ulric Coccius; the arbitrators declared that there was no Hereſy in Zanchius's opinions; but drew up articles which he ſigned in this manner, on the twenty-eighth of March 1563. Hanc doctrinæ formulam ut piam agnoſco, ita etiam recipio (14); that is, in as much as I acknowledge this formulary of doctrine to be pious, ſo I receive it; or, I acknowledge that this formulary of doctrine is pious, and ſo I receive it. The Latin words will bear both theſe ſenſes, and I would not anſwer for Zanchius that he was not ſenſible of this ambiguity, and that he did not intend to take advantage of it ſome time or other. Be that as it will, his adverſaries were yet more artful; they ſo dexterouſly ſlipped ſome ambiguities into the articles of the formulary, that they could explain every thing to their advantage: accordingly they did not fail to interpret every

(2) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. Exter. pag. 148.

(3) In valle Seriana, Id. ibid.

(4) See Leander Albertus, Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 638.

(5) Ad quartum inde diſtans lapidem. Melchior Adam. ibid

(6) Quod rebus ſuis conſultius fore judicaret. Id. ibid.

(7) He might have found it in the ſecond book of Zanchius's Letters, p. 444.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Of his book de Patriis illuſtrium Virorum.

(10) In Vitis Theolog. Exter. pag. 149.

(11) Idem, pag. 152.

(12) Sanderſon, de Obligat. conſcient. Prælect. ii, apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. pag. 541.

(13) Clamoſis ad populum concionibus traduceretur. Henricus Alting. Theol. Hiſtor. pag. 298, 299.

(14) Taken from Henry Altingius, ibid. pag. 299.

canonry, deſired leave to depart, and retired from Straſburgh in November 1563. From that time to the year 1568, he was very ſerviceable to the church of Chiavenna; and met with ſome croſſes there alſo (a). He was offered a Divinity Profeſſor's chair at Heidelberg, which he accepted; and began the exerciſe of that function in February 1568. He was promoted to the degree of Doctor the ſame year, in the preſence of Frederic III, Elector Palatine: at the ſollicitation of that Prince, he wrote a large book againſt the Antitrinitarians; and after the death of that Elector, refuſed the invitations of the univerſity of Leyden, and of the church of Antwerp, chuſing rather to ſtay at the college of Neuſtad, where John Caſimir, Count Palatine, had got together the profeſſors, whom the new Elector, a great favourer of Lutheraniſm, had obliged to leave Heidelberg. Upon the death of this Elector, the adminiſtration of the Palatinate fell into the hands of the ſame John Caſimir, who re-inſtated the profeſſors in their former poſts; but Zanchius, by reaſon of his great age, was declared emeritus. He died at Heidelberg on the nineteenth of November 1590. He loſt his ſight ſome time before his death (b). It doth not appear by Melchior Adam's life of him, that he was ever married; but according to Thuanus, he left a numerous iſſue [D]. He compoſed ſeveral books, which doubtleſs are as good as thoſe of more modern Divines, and yet no body reads them: they are ſold almoſt for nothing in the auctions of libraries; and the Grocers more eagerly take advantage of the low price of them, than the ſtudents in Divinity, or the miniſters. The fate of the works of other Divines, who made ſuch a figure in the XVIth century, is very like this. We may juſtly cenſure Thuanus in ſome particulars [E], and every thing to his prejudice; thus revived the quarrel, but he left them and went to the Griſons (15). Thus Henry Altingius relates the affair. We may add to his narrative ſome particulars which he omits, and Melchior Adam furniſhes us with. The accuſations charged againſt Zanchius turned not only on the doctrines of Predeſtination, and of the perſeverance of the ſaints; but alſo on the Euchariſt, Ubiquity, Images, Antichriſt, and the end of the world. The chapter of St Thomas, of which he was a Canon, tried ſeveral ways of accommodation; afterwards the diſpute was laid before the Council of Thirteen. He went himſelf to conſult the churches and univerſities of Germany, and publiſhed the deciſions which he obtained from them. He deliberated ſome time about ſigning the formulary drawn up by the four arbitrators, and excuſed himſelf out of fear of ſcandalizing the pious ſouls, and confirming erring men in their opinions. At laſt, being reſolved to ſubſcribe it for the ſake of peace, and becauſe he thought it would be of no prejudice to his opinion, he armed himſelf with a precaution in his manner of ſigning it, and meaſured the artifices of his enemies by his own candor (16). This we have from Melchior Adam; but for my part, I confeſs, I cannot diſcover this candor; for Zanchius's ſubſcription is ſo ambiguous, and ſo liable to ſhifts and ſubterfuges, that it doth not appear he drew it up in that manner, without a further proſpect. Is it not owned that he choſe this phraſe, rather than another, out of precaution (17)? If there was any artifice in this, it was of no ſervice to its author, nor did it contribute to eſtabliſh peace. 'Sed 'ne ſic quidem benè coiit gratia: cùm ſtatim poſt adverſarii de victoria jactitare, triumphare, & laureatas in Saxoniam, atque alias regiones literas miſſitare (18). - - - But neither did this eſtabliſh unity 'and peace: for immediately after his adverſaries vainly 'boaſted of their victory, and ſent many triumphant letters concerning it into Saxony, and other parts.'

Thus far I had written without ever thinking of conſulting Hoſpinian's Sacramental Hiſtory. I have now conſulted it, and have found in it a long relation of this diſpute. I ſee there (19) that one of Zanchius's good friends broke with him, and took advantage of a letter which he had communicated to him. I ſee that (20) Marbachius and his adherents forbore ſpeaking to him, and ſo much as ſaluting him after the diſgrace of Heſhuſius's book. But what ſerves moſt to prove the certainty of my conjectures, is, that I there ſee that Zanchius, in his mind, put a very particular ſenſe upon the expreſſions of his ſubſcription. His mental reſervation was this: 'Hanc doctrinæ formulam recipio quatenus illam piam eſſe 'judico (21). - - - I receive this formulary of doctrine, 'ſo far as I believe it to be pious.' His adverſaries ſent copies of what he had ſigned to all parts, without ever mentioning the terms of his ſubſcription (22); they feared their triumph would not appear conſiderable enough to thoſe who were capable of examining the equivocal words of Zanchius.

If we may rely on a letter which he wrote to David Chaillet, on the firſt of November 1563 (23), they made uſe of many frauds. This letter deſerves to be read; he there makes his apology, and labours to prove that he did nothing againſt his conſcience.

[D] According to Thuanus, he left a numerous iſſue] His words are: 'Scripſit multa . . . quorum partem, 'dum vixit, in lucem dedit, partem filii, quos PLURES reliquit, poſt mortem ejus publicarunt (24). 'He wrote ſeveral things . . . ſome of which he publiſhed during his life, and others his ſons, of whom 'there were MANY, publiſhed after his death.' This is ſomewhat hyperbolical; for the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Zanchius's letters ſigned by his heirs, mentions the names of only two ſons, and that of his ſon-in-law. Here follows what I find concerning his marriages. His firſt wife was a daughter of Cælius ſecundus Curio, by whom he had a daughter who did not live long. He afterwards married the ſiſter of a gentleman, named Laurence Lumagius: the two twins of whom ſhe was delivered in the year of her nuptials died ſoon after. The daughter who was born in the following year died at three years old. This is what Jerom Zanchius wrote to Lælius Zanchius, on the ſecond of April 1565 (25). He there tells him that he had then two daughters.

[E] We may juſtly cenſure Thuanus in ſome particulars.] I. Peter Martyr left Italy in the year 1542, and Zanchius in 1550, wherefore the following words of Thuanus are not exact: 'Hieronymus Zanchius '. . . . paulo poſt Petri Martyris . . . diſceſſum ob 'eandem cauſſam Argentinam conceſſit (26). - - - Jerom Zanchius, a little after the departure of Peter 'Martyr, removed to Straſburgh, on the ſame account.' II. They are faulty in another particular; for Zanchius did not go to Straſburgh till after having reſided about nine months in the country of the Griſons, and as long at Geneva (27). III. Vermilio in Angliam evocato Anno 54. in munere ſucceſſit. This Latin may ſignify that Peter Martyr went into England in the year 1554. But this is falſe, he went thither in 1547. However, not to take the expreſſion in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, let us grant Thuanus that the year he mentions concerns only the inſtallation of Zanchius; yet we may juſtly cenſure him, ſince it is certain that Zanchius was inſtalled in 1553, not in Martyr's, but Hedion's place. 'Succeſſit ei (Caſpari Hedioni) in 'profeſſione Hieronymus Zanchius Italus (28). - - - 'Caſpar Hedion was ſucceeded in his profeſſorſhip by 'Jerom Zanchius, an Italian.' 'Cum anno quinquageſimo tertio, in demortui Caſparis Hedionis locum 'Theologus, qui in ſchola ſacras literas doceret, eſſet 'ſufficiendus: ab ampliſſimo illius Reipubl. magiſtratu '& ſcholarchis decretum eſt, Italum quendam, Martyri non abſimilem, vocandum. Itum ergo primùm 'eſt

---

(a) Fructuoſe quidem ſed non abſque cruce. Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. Exter. p. 151.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, ibid. pag. 148, & ſeq.

(15) Quoniam in articulis involuta doctrina, adverſariis omnia pro ſe interpretantibus denuo erupit controverſia: quæ priuſquam componeretur Zanchius diſceſſit Clavennam ad Eccleſiæ miniſterium evocatus. Id. ibid. pag. 299.

(16) Perſuaſus tamen concordiæ cauſa, cum ſine præjudicio doctrinæ ſuæ id factum iri intelligeret, his verbis, ut ſibi caveret, ſubſcripſit: Hanc doctrinæ formulam, ut piam agnoſco; ita etiam recipio; & ſubſcripſit quidem aliorum calliditatem ſua ſimplicitate menſus. Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 150.

(17) See the foregoing quotation.

(18) See the foregoing quotation.

(19) Hoſpin. Hiſtoriæ Sacrament. Part. ii, pag. 536.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 543.

(22) Id. ibid.

(23) It is in the ſecond book of Zanchius's Letters, pag. 81, & ſeq.

(24) Thuan. lib. xcix, pag. 379.

(25) That letter is in the ſecond book of Zanchius's Letters, pag. 444, & ſeq.

(26) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. xcix, pag. 379, ad ann. 1590.

(27) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 149.

(28) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. German. pag. 242.

and Moreri alſo [F]; for the proofs which they bring of Zanchius's moderation, are not good: though it is really certain, that few miniſters have been ſo moderate as he was. He did not believe the Pope to be Antichriſt, and highly condemned the prepoſſeſſion which he thought he obſerved in the writings of ſeveral Proteſtants (c). His conference with the Pope's Nuncio in the year 1561 is very curious. Pallavicini ſpeaks of it at large, in the tenth chapter of the fifteenth book of his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. As for the reſt, there are ſeveral authors named ZANCHIUS, as appears by the ſcene of the writers of the Bergamaſco publiſhed in the year 1664 (d). Among others ‘eſt à Cœlio Secundo Curione, cui ea cura ab Argentoratenſibus demandata, ad comitem illum Martinengum: &, cum hic Eccleſiam Genevæ plantatam deſtituere nollet ad iſtum Zanchium: quem deinde Argentoratum ipſi etiam Scholarchæ, miſſis benevolentiæ plenis literis invitarunt (29). - - - - When in the year 1553 a Divine who might teach Divinity in the ſchools was to be choſen, in the room of the deceaſed Caſpar Hedion, the magiſtrates and the directors of the univerſity of Straſburgh reſolved to invite a certain Italian, whoſe principles were very little different from thoſe of Peter Martyr. Accordingly the Straſburghers appointed Cœlius Secundus Curio to go to Count Martinengo: but he refuſing to leave the church which was planted at Geneva; Curio went to Zanchius, and the directors of the univerſity ſent very obliging letters to him, to invite him to come to Straſburgh.’ It is true, that the letter (30) written to him by James Sturmius, in the name of the directors of the univerſity of Straſburgh, offered him the ſame employment, and the ſame ſalary which Peter Martyr had enjoyed; but that doth not import that he ſucceeded him, properly ſpeaking. IV. He left Chiavenna only to be a Profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg; Thuanus is therefore to blame to aſſign him a poſt at Baſil betwixt his leaving Chiavenna, and his being called to the Palatinate (31). V. He is yet more miſtaken when he ſays that he did not go to the Palatinate till the year 1578, he went thither ten years before. VI. He ſhould not have omitted that Zanchius went thither to teach Divinity at Heidelberg, and that he continued to do ſo in that univerſity, till the troubles which aroſe againſt the Calviniſt doctors, after the death of the Elector Frederic III. He ought not, I ſay, to have directly ſent him from Baſil to Neuſtad, for he did not teach in this laſt city till after he had been a Profeſſor eight years at Heidelberg. To theſe ſix errors in fact, let us add one conſiſting in a falſe reaſoning. VII. ‘A great moderation was obſerved in his writings, and he always diſcovered his ſincere deſire to terminate all the differences occaſioned by religion: FOR at the age of ſeventy years, he dedicated his Confeſſion of Faith to Ulyſſes Martinengo, a noble Venetian, Count of Barco, and publiſhed it as well in his own name as that of his family, for that was the title it bore. Now in this confeſſion he proteſts that he had not abſolutely, and in all particulars renounced the Church of Rome and all her doctrines, but only thoſe which are not conform to the writings of the Apoſtles, and to the doctrine which ſhe her ſelf had formerly taught, and which was believed by the primitive and pure Church: and that when he left the Romiſh communion, it was with a deſign to return to that Church, in caſe, ſhe ſhould correct her errors, and re-aſſume her antient form: that he deſired with all his heart, that this happy change might one day happen; for what can a pious man more ardently wiſh for, than to live to the laſt of his days in the Church, in which he had the advantage to be regenerated by baptiſm, provided by the communion held with her he does not offend God (32).’ Luther, Calvin, and that James Andreas, whom Thuanus immediately mentions as a Divine much more exaſperated againſt the Romiſh Church and the Pope (33), would all very ſincerely have ſigned this confeſſion of Zanchius; wherefore it is not a good proof that Zanchius differed from other Miniſters.

[F] . . . . . and Moreri alſo.] I. When he ſaith that Zanchius was an Apoſtate Monk of London, it is not his fault, but that of his Dictionary. The Printers have put de Londres (of London), inſtead of de l'Ordre (of the order), and I obſerve this to ſhew to what errors they expoſe the readers: for how many readers have believed from hence, that Zanchius ſtole out of a monaſtery at London, when he turned Proteſtant? II. He was not a hermit of the Order of St Auguſtin, as Moreri affirms; thoſe who are ſo called are different from the regular Canons. Suppoſe both have St Auguſtin for the author of their rule, yet we ought to obſerve a diſtinction when we ſpeak of them. III. He had copied from Mr Teiſſier (34) the pretended difference betwixt Melchior Adam and Thuanus concerning the birth-place of Zanchius. IV. And the pretended diſtance of four leagues betwixt Venice and that place. V. He ſhould have called it Alzano and not Azano. VI. He ſays, after Thuanus, that Zanchius went directly to Straſburgh. VII. And he hath increaſed the error of his pretended ſucceeding to Peter Martyr; for a man may ſay, without being guilty of above one falſity, that Zanchius was called to Straſburgh to ſupply the place which Peter Martyr had left void, but one cannot, without redoubling the blunder, affirm that he publickly profeſſed Hereſy at Straſburgh in Martyr's place. Is the public profeſſion of a doctrine made in another's place? VIII. He ſhould not have copied Thuanus with regard to Zanchius's pretended abode at Baſil. IX. Much leſs ſhould he have imputed to him the ſaying that this Miniſter taught at Spire. For he doth not ſay ſo, his Neapolis Nemetum is Neuſtad, a city continually mentioned in the Gazettes for theſe ſeven or eight years paſt (35). Thuanus's tranſlator was to blame to call it Spire. Mr Teiſſier may then, if he pleaſes, allow us to diſapprove the following period of his additions, Zanchius never taught at Baſil, or Spire, as Thuanus believed (36). X. Heidelberg was not the laſt place where Zanchius taught, as Moreri affirms. He was declared emeritus, when his colleagues, the Profeſſors of Neuſtad, were re-eſtabliſhed in Heidelberg. If he died in the laſt-mentioned city, it was by accident; he had made a journey thither to ſee his old friends (37). XI. To prove that Zanchius had more moderation than all other Proteſtants, to prove it, I ſay, by the above-cited words of Thuanus, is an illuſion. XII. To conjecture that Father Labbe went upon the authority of the ſame words, when he ſaid that Zanchius was the moſt ſubtile of his communion, is a thought which does very little honour to that Jeſuit, and which appears ill-grounded when we conſult the original. To allow no capacity and ſubtilty to our adverſaries but in proportion to the regard they have for us, or to the moderation with which they ſpeak of our cauſe, is not to act according to reaſon, but to be blinded with prejudices. However the place where Father Labbe beſtows this encomium on Zanchius, affords us a more probable conjecture than that of Moreri. This Jeſuit cites a paſſage where Zanchius ſpeaks very ill of the Proteſtant writers. Whence it might more probably be inferred that it was rather this Miniſter's reſentment againſt his brethren than his modeſty towards the Church of Rome that occaſioned the praiſes which Father Labbe beſtowed on him. Perhaps it were better to ſay that Father Labbe had no regard to any thing but the parts of Zanchius, which, doubtleſs, were very ſubtile. But to enable the reader to judge the better of it, I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage. It clearly diſcovers the temper of an author, whoſe anger was not intermitting, but continual. ‘Quid de cæteris Lutheri & Calvini Miniſtris dicam, qui dum Conciliorum, Patrum, ſcriptorum antiquorum opuſcula interdum volvunt apertiſſimam hæreſeon ſuarum damnationem legunt, numquid non diſſimulant, numquid non tergiverſantur, nunquid non argutantur? Audi domeſticum teſtem Hieronymum Zanchium omnium Sacramentariorum ſubtiliſſimum: Legi librum (Pſeudo-Evangelici neſcio cujus) ſed non ſine ſtomacho perlegi; cùm nimirum viderem qualiſnam ſit ſcribendi ratio, quâ in Eccleſiis ex Evangelio reformatis (eo nomine Lutheri, Calvini, ſimiliumque ſectas appellat) permulti, ne dicam plerique omnes, utuntur: qui tamen Paſtores, qui Doctores, qui Columnæ Eccleſiæ videri ‘ volunt.

(c) See the quotation out of Father Labbe, in the remark [F].

(d) Donatus Calvus is the author of it: It is intituled Scena Letteraria de Scrittori Bergamaſchi.

(29) Idem, in Vit. Theol. Exter. pag. 149.

(30) It is the firſt of the ſecond book of Zanchius's Letters.

(31) Poſtea Clavennæ, in Rætia, dein Baſileæ uſque ad annum 78 ac poſtremo Neapoli Nemetum docuit. Thuan. ubi ſupra.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Amarior eo Romanæ Eccleſiæ & Pontificii nominis oppugnator Jacobus Andreanus. Id. ibid.

(34) See the remark [A].

(35) I write this in July 1697.

(36) Teiſſier, Additions aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 161.

(37) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 152.

others there was one JEROM ZANCHIUS, who publiſh ſome Law-books. He was ſecond couſin to our Divine (e). It will not be an unacceptable thing to the reader, if I ſay here that our Jerom had a ſervant named Frederic Sylburgius, who became a very learned man. He kept him four years (f), and then recommended him to Lælius Zanchius, that he might procure him a place at Padua (g). His letter of recommendation is dated on the ſecond of April 1565.

(e) Zanch. Epiſtol. lib. ii, pag. 444.

(f) Id. ibid.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 448.

volunt. Statum cauſæ ne intelligant, de induſtria ſæpe numero tenebris involvimus: quæ ſunt manifeſta, impudenter negamus: quæ falſa, ſine fronte aſſeveramus: quæ apertè impia, tamquam prima fidei principia obtrudimus: quæ orthodoxa, hæreſeos damnamus: ſcripturas ad noſtra ſomnia pro libidine torquemus: Patres jactamus, cùm nihilminus quàm illorum doctrinam ſequi velimus: Sophiſticari, calumniari, conviciari, nobis eſt familiare; modò cauſam noſtram, ſive bonam ſive malam, quo jure, quaque injuria tueamur: reliqua omnia ſuſque deque facimus. Hæc ille τὶς ἐξ αὐτῶν ἴδιος αὐτῶν προφήτης, ut de Epimenide Cretenſi dixit Apoſtolus Paulus cap 1. Epiſtolæ ad Titum, ἡ μαρτυρία αὐτη ἐστὶν ἀληθής (38). - - - What ſhall I ſay of the other Miniſters of the Lutheran and Calviniſtical ſects, who while they ſometimes turn over the ſmaller works of the Councils, Fathers, and antient writers, read the cleareſt condemnation of their own Hereſies. What diſſimulation, tergiverſation, and ſhifting are they not guilty of. Hear the words of one of their own witneſſes, Jerom Zanchius, the moſt ſubtile of all the ſacramentarians. I have read the book (written by I know not what Heretic): but I could not peruſe it without ſome indignation, when I obſerved what manner of writing prevails in the Churches reformed according to the word of GOD, (thus he calls the ſects of Calvin, Luther, and the like) and is uſed by a great many, not to ſay almoſt all the Proteſtants; uſed by men who would be thought paſtors, and doctors, and pillars of the church. To confound and perplex the ſtate of the queſtion we frequently involve our ſelves in darkneſs. The moſt manifeſt truths we impudently deny. Things which are falſe we affirm with effrontery. The moſt obvious impieties we intrude upon the people as the fundamentals of faith. Orthodox doctrines we condemn as heretical. The Scriptures we wreſt at pleaſure, in order to accommodate them to our own dreams. We boaſt of the Fathers, whilſt there is nothing we mind leſs than their doctrines. Sophiſtry, calumny, and abuſe, are familar to us. If we do but maintain our cauſe, be it good or bad, no matter by what means: all other things are ſet at nought to ſerve that purpoſe. Theſe are the words of one of themſelves, even a Prophet of their own, As the Apoſtle Paul (chapter firſt of his Epiſtle to Titus) ſaid of Epimenides the Cretan. This witneſs is true.’

(38) Philippus Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. i, p. 807, 808. Note, that he quotes none of Zanchius's tracts, which ſhews that he did not go to the fountain head, but relied upon the quotation of another man.

ZARLINO (JOSEPH) a native of Chioggia (a) Preſident and Director of the chapel of the Seigneury of Venice, was one of the moſt excellent Muſicians of the XVIth century. He compoſed ſome airs which were ſung and applauded at Venice, at the time that rejoicings were made in that city, for the victory of Lepanto, in the year 1571. He publiſhed ſeveral books which maintained and ſpread his reputation (b) [A]. He died at Venice on the fourteenth of February 1599, at the age of fifty-nine years (c).

(a) An Epiſcopal city, in one of the iſles of the gulf of Venice, in Latin Clodia, whence comes the Latin firname Clodienſis, given to Zarlino.

(b) Taken from Mambrino Roſeo, Iſtor. del Mondo, ad ann. 1571, pag. m. 44.

(c) Thuan. lib. 122, in fine.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books which . . : . ſpread his reputation.] The catalogue of Thuanus's library (1) mentions two books of Zarlino, in folio; one intituled, Dimoſtrationi Harmoniche, printed at Venice in the year 1571, and afterwards, with additions, in 1573; the other printed in the ſame city, in the year 1588, and intituled, Supplementi Muſicali. The Oxford catalogue mentions tutte le Opere of Zarlino, in four volumes, printed at Venice in the year 1589, in folio, and beſides that, a Latin treatiſe, De vera anni forma ſeu de recta ejus emendatione, printed at Venice in the year 1580, in 4to. John Albert Bannius has highly commended the writings of this Muſician. ‘Joſephus Zarlinus Clodienſis, ſays he (2), Theoria inſtructiſſimus . . . doctiſſimis inſtitutionibus, demonſtrationibus, ac ſupplementis, linguâ Italicâ editis (apud Venetos, anno 1580.) Muſicam præ cæteris felicius tradidit, & abſolvit. Prolixior nonnihil eſt, ſed eruditione compenſat faſtidium: ex quo verior Muſicæ eruditio haurienda. Ejus Compendium in Tabulas redegit Joannes Maria Artuſius Bononienſis, Italico etiam idiomate: quibus breviter, clare & perſpicue rem ſtudioſis proponit. Scripſerunt & alii; qui an Zarlinum æquent, neſcio: ſaltem non ſuperant. . . . Unus ergo inſtar omnium erit, ſine quo nec veterum ſententiæ expedire poterunt, nec perfecta hujus diſciplinæ notitia facile obtinebitur. Ad perfectionem tamen Muſicæ modernæ non accedit (3). . . . Unum Zarlinum præ cæteris commendavi; non quòd aliorum ſcripta nullius momenti ſint; cum multa præclara eruditaque dogmata contineant: ſed unum Zarlinum coryphæum dixi. Cum enim Muſica ab Authoribus deſcripta, in pleriſque defectum patiatur, magno ſtudio, induſtria, ac lectione varia ſupplendum; unum aliquem commendare nequeo, ex quo hauriant ſtudioſi (pauci etiam totam Muſicam Theoricam ac Practicam ſimul intellexerunt & excuſſerunt) præter Zarlinum. Is, inquam, præ cæteris doctius, feliciuſque, & propemodum ſolus, rem executus, meo judicio, videtur. Ordinariæ Praxi deſervire præcipue poteſt Zarlini Compendium à Joannæ Maria Artuſio Bononienſi, optima methodo doctiſſime confectum (4). - - - Joſeph Zarlino of Chioggia was a great maſter of the theory of Muſic. . . . In his learned inſtitutions, demonſtrations, and ſupplements, publiſhed in Italian at Venice, 1580, he has explained and improved that ſcience, with much greater ſucceſs than any other author. He is ſomewhat prolix. But his learning makes amends for that prolixity. His writings contain the true knowledge of Muſic. John-Maria Artuſius Bononienſis reduced his compendium into tables, which he wrote likewiſe in Italian. In theſe tables he ſets forth the ſcience of Muſic, in a ſhort, clear, and perſpicuous manner. There are others who have written on Muſic; whether they equal Zarlino or not, I do not know, at leaſt they do not ſurpaſs him. . . . So that Zarlino alone will ſerve inſtead of all the reſt: without him the opinions of the Antients cannot be underſtood, nor a perfect knowledge of this ſcience be eaſily attained. But he does not come up to the perfection of the modern Muſic. I have commended Zarlino above all the reſt, not becauſe the writings of other men on this ſubject are of no value; for they contain many excellent and learned inſtructions, but I have called Zarlino the beſt writer on this ſubject. For moſt authors having given but an imperfect account of Muſic, and as this defect muſt be ſupplied by great ſtudy, induſtry, and various reading, I cannot recommend any one of them to thoſe who ſtudy this art, except Zarlino. Beſide few of them have at the ſame time thoroughly examined and underſtood both the theoretical and practical Muſic. Zarlino, in my opinion, has written on this ſubject with more learning and ſucceſs than all the reſt: and he is almoſt the only author who has ſucceeded in it. His Compendium, as it is drawn up by John-Maria Artuſius Bononienſis in an excellent method, and with great learning, may be chiefly ſerviceable in the common practice of Muſic.’

(1) Pag. 55, of the ſecond part.

(2) Joh. Alb. Bannius, Diſſertat. de Muſica, pag. m. 675. Collection. de Sudiis inſtituendis, Edit. Amſterd. 1645.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 676.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 685, 686.

ZENOBIA, one of the moſt illuſtrious women that ever ſwayed a ſcepter, pretended to be deſcended from the Ptolomies and Cleopatras (a). She was married to Odenatus, a Saracen Prince (b), and contributed very much to the great victories which he obtained over the Perſians [A], and which preſerved the eaſt to the Romans, when after the taking of Valerian it was very probable that Sapor would have wreſted all that country from them. Accordingly ſhe was honoured with the title of Auguſta (c), when Gallienus in grateful acknowledgment of the ſervices of Odenatus made him Emperor in the year of Chriſt 264. After the death of her huſband ſhe held the ſupreme power, and reigned in a very courageous and glorious manner. Her ſons, by reaſon of their youth, enjoyed only the imperial name and honours (d). She did not only preſerve the countries ſubject to Odenatus; but alſo conquered Egypt, and was preparing for farther conqueſts when the Emperor Aurelian made war againſt her (e). She loſt two battles (f), and was forced to ſhut her ſelf up in the city of Palmyra, where Aurelian beſieged her. She defended her ſelf very bravely; but ſeeing that in all probability the Emperor would take the city, ſhe ſecretly went out of it. Aurelian being informed of this cauſed her to be ſo diligently purſued, that ſhe was overtaken juſt as ſhe was in the ferry going to paſs the Euphrates (g). This happened in the year 272. The Emperor ſaved her life, and after making her an ornament of his triumph [B], preſented her with a country ſeat near Rome, where ſhe quietly paſſed the remainder of her days [C]. It is reported that upon her evidence Aurelian put many perſons to death (h). She was beautiful, chaſte, learned, valiant, and temperate, though on ſome occaſions out of policy ſhe would drink great quantities of wine [D]. If to theſe excellent qualities ſhe could have added that of a good mother-in-law, ſhe might have been [A] She contributed very much to the great victories which he obtained over the Perſians.] This is teſtified by Aurelian in a letter which he wrote to the Senate. ‘Audio P. C. mihi objici quod non virile munus impleverim, Zenobiam triumphando. Næ illi qui me reprehendunt ſatis laudarent, ſi ſcirent qualis illa eſt mulier, quam prudens in conſiliis, quam conſtans in diſpoſitionibus, quam erga milites gravis, quam larga quum neceſſitas poſtulet, quam triſtis quum ſeveritas poſcat. Poſſum dicere illius eſſe quod Odenatus Perſas vicit, ac fugato Sapore Cteſiphontem uſque pervenit. Poſſum aſſerere, tanto apud Orientales & Ægyptiorum populos timori mulierem fuiſſe, ut ſe non Arabes, non Sarraceni, non Armeni commoverent (1). - - - Conſcript Fathers, I hear it is objected to me, that I did not act a manly part in triumphing over Zenobia. Truly they who cenſure me would greatly commend me, did they know what kind of a woman Zenobia is, how prudent in her deſigns, how conſtant in her reſolutions, with what dignity ſhe behaved towards her army, how bountiful ſhe is upon the neceſſary occaſions, and how auſtere when ſeverity requires it. I can aſcribe it to her, that Odenatus overcame the Perſians, and having put Sapor to flight, reached as far as Cteſiphon. I can affirm that ſhe was ſo formidable to the Eaſtern people, and the Egyptians, that both the Arabians, the Saracens, and Arminians lay quiet.’

[B] Aurelian . . . . made her an ornament of his triumph.] The letter which ſhe wrote to the Emperor Aurelian, in anſwer to that which he had written to her, to ſummon her to ſurrender, ſhews that ſhe deſigned to follow the example of Cleopatra, who choſe rather to put an end to her life than to live without reigning (2); but ſhe changed her reſolution, and ſubmitting to neceſſity, adorned Aurelian's triumph. There ſhe appeared ſo overloaded with jewels, that tho' very ſtrong, ſhe was ſcarce able to ſupport the weight of them. It is true, we muſt make a great allowance for the golden fetters which were faſtened to her feet, and the golden chains which bound her hands. ‘Ducta eſt igitur per triumphum ea ſpecie ut nihil pompabilius populo Rom. videretur. Jam primum ornata gemmis ingentibus, ita ut ornamentorum onere laboraret. Fertur enim mulier fortiſſima ſæpiſſime reſtitiſſe quum diceret ſe gemmarum onera ferre non poſſe. Vincti erant præterea pedes auro, manus etiam catenis aureis: nec collo aureum vinculum deerat, quod ſcurra Perſicus præferebat (3). - - Zenobia was led in triumph with ſo much ſplendor that never any thing appeared more pompous to the people of Rome. She was adorned with exceeding large jewels, and laboured under the weight of her ornaments. For though ſhe was a very ſtrong woman, yet it is reported that ſhe ſtopped very often, and declared that ſhe could not bear the weight of the jewels. Beſides there were golden fetters faſtened to her feet, and her hands were bound with chains of the ſame metal. There was likewiſe a golden collar for her neck, which a Perſian buffoon carried before her.’

Father Pagi affirms that Zenobia was lead in triumph in the year 274, two years after ſhe fell into Aurelian's hands; and refutes ſome very learned Chronologiſts, who have miſplaced the years of theſe two events. See his Diſſertatio Hypatica towards the end.

[C] A country-ſeat, where ſhe quietly paſſed the remainder of her days.] Let us continue to cite Trebellius Pollio. ‘Huic ab Aureliano vivere conceſſum eſt. Ferturque vixiſſe cum liberis, matronæ jam more Romanæ, data ſibi poſſeſſione in Tiburti, quæ hodieque Zenobia dicitur, non longe ab Adriani palatio, atque ab eo loco cui nomen eſt Conche. - - - Aurelian ſaved Zenobia's life. And it is reported that ſhe lived with her children, like a Roman matron, having received a ſeat in the Tiburtine-country: That ſeat ſtill bears the name of Zenobia, and is not far diſtant from Adrian's palace, and the palace called Conche.’

[D] She was beautiful, chaſte, learned, valiant, and temperate, tho', on ſome occaſions, out of policy, ſhe would drink.] Pollio having ſpoken of the exerciſes of hunting, which enured Odenatus to the greateſt fatigues, adds, that Zenobia had acquired the ſame hardineſs, and, according to the report of ſeveral people, was more vigorous than her huſband. ‘Non aliter etiam conjuge aſſueta, quæ multorum ſententia fortior marito fuiſſe perhibetur: mulierum omnium nobiliſſima Orientalium fœminarum, & (ut Cornelius Capitolinus aſſerit) ſpecioſiſſima (4). - - - She was no leſs inured to fatigues than her huſband; and, in the opinion of many people, was much ſtronger than he: ſhe was the nobleſt of her ſex, and, (as Cornelius Capitolinus affirms) the moſt beautiful of all the women of the Eaſt.’ This laſt word would afford me a good proof, if it were certain that the author, who is cited, made uſe of it. But the manuſcripts vary; ſome have it expeditiſſima, inſtead of ſpecioſiſſima: wherefore we ought not to depend upon it: let us look for other evidences. The following deſcription repreſents her of a deep brown complexion, but withal very charming, and as having the fineſt teeth in the world. ‘Fuit vultu ſubaquilo, fuſci coloris, oculis ſupra modum vigentibus, nigris, ſpiritus divini, venuſtatis incredibilis: tantus candor in dentibus, ut margaritas eam plerique putarent habere, non dentes (5). - - - She was of a dark brown complexion, had eyes exceeding ſprightly, black, and divinely bright; ſhe was incredibly beautiful: her teeth were ſo white, that many people thought ſhe had pearls ſet inſtead of teeth.’ ‘Her chaſtity was ſo extraordinary, that ſhe made uſe of the liberty, which marriage allowed her, no farther than was neceſſary for the procreation of of children.’ (6) Cujus ea caſtitas fuiſſe dicitur, ut ne virum ſuum quidem ſciret, niſi tentatis conceptionibus. Nam quum ſemel concubuiſſet, expectatis menſtruis continebat ſe, ſi prægnans eſſet; ſin minus, iterum poteſtatem quærendis

(a) Trebellius Pollio, in triginta Tyrannis, pag. m. 328.

(b) Procopius, pag. 97. Trebellius Pollio, ibid. pag. 298, calls him Princeps Palmyrenorum.

(c) See Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, Tom. iii, pag. 976.

(d) Trebell. Pollio, ibid. pag. 325.

(e) Zoſimus, lib. i.

(f) See Vopiſcus, in Aureliano. Moreri quotes in Annal. that leads into a miſtake; Vopiſcus wrote no Annals.

(g) Palmyra, built by Solomon, was a day's journey diſtant from this river.

(h) Tillemont, ubi ſupra, pag. 1066. He quotes Suidas, in Α'υρελ. pag. 494.

(1) Trebellius Pollio, in triginta Tyrannis, p. 329, Vol. II. Hiſt. Auguſtæ Scriptor. Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1671.

(2) Deditionem meam petis, quaſi neſcias Cleopatram reginam perire maluiſſe, quam in qualibet vivere dignitate. Vopiſcus, in Aureliano, p. 481.

(3) Trebellius Pollio, ubi ſupra, pag. 336.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 299.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 333.

(6) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. iii, pag. m. 1041.

been placed among the moſt accompliſhed perſons; but ſhe was ſo far from having ſuch a quality, that ſhe was ſuſpected of having conſented to the aſſaſſination of her huſband in the year 267, from a reſentment of the tenderneſs which he ſhewed to his ſon Herod [E], whom he had by another wife.

She engaged in diſputes concerning religion, and protected Paulus Samoſatenus [F], who had been condemned by the council of Antioch: and her protection prevented quærendis liberis dabat (7). This is what ſome rigid Caſuiſts would impoſe upon all married people. And thoſe who write for polygamy apply this morality to their pernicious deſign; for they pretend that a man ſhould abſtain from his wife during her pregnancy, and that if he cannot, he ought to have another who is not with child. A learned commentator on Tully's Offices obſerves, that if the age he lived in produced ſuch women as Zenobia, there would be leſs danger in marriage for ſtudious men, or thoſe of a weak conſtitution; a ſort of men, adds he, who have reaſon to fear either diſhonour, continual janglings, or an immature death, with the ſquandring of their eſtates. His maxims are ſomewhat ſevere, read what follows. ‘Cum . . . . ſacræ literæ omnes vagas libidines deteſtentur: in ipſo etiam matrimonio hic finis ab ipſa natura deſtinatus, diligenter conſideretur, & (quantum vel naturæ imbecillitas, vel conjugii ſervitus ſinit) ſervetur ne homo infra beſtias ſeſe abjiciat: quarum pleræque non niſi certo anni tempore ad procreationem incitantur: & femellæ pleræque, concepto fœtu, marem non admittunt. Eadem etiam Zenobiæ Palmyrenorum reginæ continentia celebratur, quæ cum ſe gravidam ſenſiſſet, Odenatum maritum in thalamum ſuum non admiſit. Digna (ut quidam exclamat) quæ ſine omni dolore pareret: cum in matrimonio non voluptatem, ſed procreationem ſobolis ſpectaret. Cujuſmodi matronas ſi noſtra ætas ferret, etiam ſtudioſi homines, & non firmiſſima præditi valetudine, minore periculo uxores ducerent: quibus nunc aut infamia, aut rixæ perpetuæ aut immaturus obitus cum detrimentis rei familiaris ſunt metuenda. Ridentur hæc ſcilicet à laſcivis hominibus, & in luſtris ac ganeis magis verſatis, quàm in Theologia & Philoſophia: quibus nos hæc non præſcribimus. Indulgeant illi genio: ſed probus adoleſcens hominem ſe eſſe, non pecudem meminerit. Quòd ſi verum eſt, quod ἀνώνυμος Ptolemæi ſcribit interpres, Ægyptios ſingulis menſibus ſemel tantum conſuetudine uxorem uſos; quò infantis concepti momentum deprehenderent: quid Chriſtianis facere par eſt propter Deum, ſummam & continentiam & abſtinentiam flagitantem (8). - - - - As the holy Scriptures diſcover the greateſt deteſtation for all manner of luſts, ſo in matrimony the end of procreation, which nature it ſelf hath appointed, ought to be carefully attended to, and as far as the frailty of the fleſh, and the demands of a matrimonial life will permit, we ought to confine our ſelves to the anſwering of that end alone, leſt man ſhould become worſe than the beaſts: for moſt animals are not incited to procreation, but at a certain ſeaſon of the year, and moſt of the females do not admit the male animal, after they have conceived. Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, is celebrated for the like continence, for from the time that ſhe knew ſhe had conceived, ſhe refuſed to admit her huſband into her bed. Behold, a woman, (as ſome perſon ſays in admiration of her) who deſerved to bear children without any pain, ſince, in matrimony, ſhe had no regard to her pleaſures, but only to the procreation of children. If the age we live in produced women of this kind, how many men of learning, and of weak conſtitutions, might venture upon marriage without any danger, who are now in fears, either of diſhonour, or of perpetual wranglings, or an untimely death, with the diſſipation of their fortunes? Wanton men will laugh at all this, men who are more intimate in brothels, than converſant with Divinity and Philoſophy. But I do not write for ſuch perſons. Let them indulge their paſſions; but let the virtuous youth remember that he is a man, and not a brute. If what an anonymous interpreter of Ptolomy wrote, be true, viz. that the Egyptians cohabited with their wives only once every month, for the ſake of knowing the moment when their children were conceived, what doth it become the Chriſtians to do for the ſake of God, who exacts the greateſt continence, and the greateſt abſtinence.’ It would be to no purpoſe to urge againſt Zenobia, that ſhe had but very few maids in her ſervice (9); for the reſt of her domeſticks were eunuchs, advanced in years: ſuch ſervants were much fitter to attend a warlike Queen, than a number of chamber-maids. As for her learning it is ſufficient to ſay that Longinus inſtructed her; that ſhe ſpoke the Egyptian tongue in perfection, and underſtood the Hiſtory of Egypt, and the eaſtern Hiſtory ſo well, that ſhe made an abridgment of it. She read the Roman Hiſtory in Greek, and underſtood Latin, but durſt not ſpeak it. Ipſa Latini ſermonis non uſque quaque ignara, ſed ut loqueretur pudore cohibita: loquebatur & Ægyptiace ad perfectum modum. Hiſtoriæ Alexandrinæ atque Orientalis ita perita ut eam epitomaſſe dicatur: Latinam autem Græce legerat (10). I was willing to excuſe her with reſpect to drinking; by urging that ſhe drank glaſs for glaſs with her Generals and ſtrangers, only to attack them, or bring them over to her ſide; but I own my ſuppoſition is very arbitrary, and the expreſſion of the Hiſtorian (11) ſignifies that ſhe overcame the Perſians and Arminians in drinking. It is true he ſays ſhe was otherwiſe ſober.

[E] She was ſuſpected of having conſented to the aſſaſſination of her huſband, from a reſentment of the tenderneſs which he ſhewed to his ſon Herod.] The Hiſtorian having repreſented the exceſſive complaiſance of Odenatus to Herod, his ſon, by another marriage, adds, that Zenobia being animated with all the ſpirit of a ſtep-mother againſt this young man, increaſed his father's love to him. This ſeems to hint that Odenatus had no great affection for Zenobia; for if he had loved her very tenderly, he would have favoured Herod leſs, than the children he had by her; and not have looked upon Zenobia's hatred as a great motive to redouble his tenderneſs for Herod. Erat circa illum (Herodem) Zenobia novercali animo: qua re commendabiliorem patri eum fecerat (12). This author a little farther, ſpeaking of Mæonius the murtherer of Odenatus, ſays: ‘Hic conſobrinus Odenati fuit: nec ulla re alia ductus niſi damnabili invidia, imperatorem optimum interemit, quum ei nihil aliud objiceretur præter filii Herodis delicias. Dicitur autem primum cum Zenobia conſenſiſſe, quæ ferre non poterat ut privignus ejus Herodes priore loco quam filii, ejus Herennianus & Timolaus, principes dicerentur (13). - - - - This man, who was Odenatus's ſiſter's ſon, prompted by nothing but an abominable envy, murdered that excellent Emperor, though he was charged with no other fault but the tenderneſs he bore to his ſon Herod. Mæonius was ſaid to have beforehand agreed with Zenobia, who could not bear that her ſtep-ſon Herod ſhonld take place of her two ſons Herennianus and Timolaus.’ Judge from hence what perſons of no virtue are capable of doing, ſince Zenobia, endued with ſo many excellent qualities, ſacrificed her huſband to an ambitious tenderneſs for her children, and to the chagrin of a mother-in-law which continually preyed upon her.

[F] She protected Paulus Samoſatenus.] I can ſcarce believe that the reaſon why ſhe favoured him, was that which you are going to ſee in the words I extract from page 1040, of the third volume of Mr de Tillemont's Hiſtory of the Emperors. ‘* S. Athanaſius ſaith that ſhe was a Jew, [by religion without doubt]  which Abulpharagius after him tells us: † but at leaſt ſhe followed many of the Jewiſh opinions; and ſhe is ſaid to have been the cauſe why Paulus Samoſatenus, Biſhop of Antioch, ⸸ of whom ſhe was protectreſs, ‡ fell into the Hereſy of Artemon, whoſe opinions concerning JESUS CHRIST, very nearly reſembled thoſe of the ſynagogue.’ To perſuade the world that ſhe was of the Jewiſh religion, another ſort of evidence ought to be produced. It is eaſy to conceive, that a Pagan Princeſs ſhould take pleaſure in ſtopping the courſe of a ſynodical decree, if it be ever ſo little intimated to her that the condemned perſon is worthy of her protection, and even that the fomenting diviſions amongſt Chriſtians tends prevented his being driven from his church. He was not driven from it till after this princeſs had been overcome by Aurelian. See Father Pagi's Diſſertatio Hypatica towards the end.

---

(7) Treb. Pollio, ubi ſupra, pag. 330.

(8) Hieron. Wolfius, Commentar. in Ciceron. de Offic. lib. i, pag. m. 72, 73.

(9) In miniſterio Eunuchos gravioris ætatis habuit, puellas nimis raras. Trebell. Pollio, ubi ſupra, pag. 335.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Bibit ſæpe cum ducibus, quum eſſet alias ſobria. Bibit etiam cum Perſis atque Armeniis ut eos vinceret. Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 301.

(13) Ibid.

* Ath. ſolit. pag. 857. d.

 Abulf. pag. 81.

† Thdrt. hær. l. 2. pag. 222. c.

⸸ Ath. pag. 857. d.

‡ Thdrt. pag. 222. c.

to the advantage of Paganiſm. Some learned men believe that Paul Samoſatenus was not condemned by the council of Antioch till after the fall of Zenobia; but Father Pagi hath ſolidly refuted them (14).

(14) Pagi, Diſſert. Hypat. pag. 357, & ſeq.

ZENO of Elea, one of the moſt eminent Philoſophers of antiquity, flouriſhed in the LXXIXth Olympiad (a). He was the diſciple of Parmenides, and even according to ſome authors, his adopted ſon (b). He was a very handſome man. And ſome writers pretend that he was loved by his tutor to an unlawful degree [A]. Moreri informs us that he was the inventor of Logic [B]. He ſhould have acquainted us alſo that he attempted to reſtore the liberty of his country, when labouring under the oppreſſion of a tyrant, and that when the enterprize was diſcovered he ſuffered the moſt cruel torments with an extraordinary reſolution. This affair is related with a thouſand

(a) Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 29, pag. 566, Edit. Wetſtein. 1692.

(b) Id. ibid. num. 25.

[A] He was a very handſome man. Some writers pretend that he was loved by his tutor to an unlawful degree.] I mention elſewhere (1) that Apuleius was reproached with being handſome, and with dreſſing too well for a Philoſopher. To which, among other things, he anſwered, that beauty had not always been ſeparated from perſons of his profeſſion, and proved his aſſertion by the inſtances of Pythagoras, and Zeno of Elea. ' (2) Præterea, licere etiam Philoſophis eſſe vultu liberali. Pythagoram, qui primùm ſeſe Philoſophum nuncupârit, eum ſui ſæculi excellentiſſimâ formâ fuiſſe: item Zenonem illum antiquum Veliâ (3) oriundum, qui primus omnium dictionem ſolertiſſimo artificio ambifariam diſſolverit, eum quoque Zenonem longè decoriſſimum fuiſſe, ut Plato autumat. - - - - Beſides, Philoſophers may be allowed to be handſome as well as other men. Pythagoras, the firſt who took the name of a Philoſopher, was the handſomeſt man of his age: and that antient Zeno of Elea, the firſt who explained, with great art and ſubtilty, thoſe expreſſions which bear a double meaning, that Zeno was alſo an exceeding handſome man, as Plato teſtifies.' Plato's citation is right, but there are certain particulars in this paſſage of his which every body doth not approve, and I take him to be juſtly cenſured for it. His words run thus: Ἔφη δὲ δὴ ὁ Ἀντιφῶν, λέγειν τὸν Πυθόδωρον ὅτι ἀφίκοντό ποτε εἰς Παναθήναια τὰ μεγάλα Ζήνων τε καὶ Παρμενίδης· τὸν μὲν οὖν Παρμενίδην, εὖ μάλα ἤδη πρεσβύτην εἶναι, σφόδρα πολιὸν, καλὸν δὲ καὶ ἀγαθὸν τὴν ὄψιν, περὶ ἔτη μάλιστα πέντε καὶ ἑξήκοντα. Ζήνωνα δὲ, ἐγγὺς ἐτῶν τετταράκοντα τότε εἶναι, εὐμήκη δὲ, καὶ χαρίεντα ἰδεῖν· καὶ λέγεσθαι αὐτὸν παιδικὰ τοῦ Παρμενίδου γεγονέναι. Dicebat ergo Antiphon, Pythodorum narraſſe, Zenonem atque Parmenidem veniſſe quondam ad magnorum Panathenæorum celebritatem: & Parmenidem jam ſenem, atque canum, aſpectu decorum fuiſſe, annos ferme quinque & ſexaginta ætatis agentem; Zenonem verò annos penè quadraginta natum; procero inſuper & grato corporis habitu: dicebatur autem in deliciis Parmenidi fuiſſe (4). - - - Antiphon ſaid, that Pythagoras related that Parmenides and Zeno once came to the grand feſtival of Minerva; that the former was already pretty far advanced in years, was grey-haired, and of a beautiful, comely, aſpect, being then about ſixty-five years old; but that the latter, being then about the fortieth year of his age, was tall and handſome; and it is ſaid, that Zeno ſerved Parmenides in his pleaſures. Athenæus blames Plato for having unneceſſarily blemiſhed the manners of theſe two Philoſophers. Thoſe who deſire to ſee his own words may be ſatisfied by the following citation. Παρμενίδῃ μὲν γὰρ καὶ ἐλθεῖν εἰς λόγους τοῦ Πλάτωνος Σωκράτην, μόλις ἡ ἡλικία συγχωρεῖ· οὐχ ὡς καὶ τοιούτους εἰπεῖν ἢ ἀκοῦσαι λύγους τὸ δὲ πάντων σχετλιώτατον, καὶ τὸ εἰπεῖν οὐδεμιᾶς κατεπειγούσης χρείας, ὅτι παιδικὰ γεγόνοι τοῦ Παρμενίδου Ζήνων ὁ πολίτης αὐτοῦ. Parmenidem certè cum Socrate Platonis confabulatum fuiſſe ætas vix permittat, nedum hos vel illos ſermones ediſſeruiſſe, aut audiviſſe. Quod autem indigniſſimum eſt, nullâ compulſus neceſſitate ſcribere is non erubuit Parmenidi Zenonem civem ſuum in amoribus & delitiis fuiſſe (5). - - - That the Socrates of Plato ſhould have converſed with Parmenides, or that ſuch converſation ſhould have paſſed between them is what their reſpective ages will hardly permit. But for Plato to affirm, without the leaſt neceſſity, that Zeno ſerved Parmenides in his pleaſures, was highly unbecoming.

(1) In the article of APULEIUS, remark [H].

(2) Apuleius, Apolog. pag. m. 275, 276.

(3) See Menage in Diogenem Laërt. lib ix, num. 28, where he ſhews that Velia is the ſame town of Italy with Elea.

(4) Plato, in Parmenide, pag. m. 1110, A.

(5) Athenæus, lib. xi, pag. 505, F.

[B] He was the inventer of Logic.] Ariſtotle allows him that honour, as Sextus Empiricus (6), and Diogenes Laërtius (7) obſerve. But Zeno's Logic ſeems deſigned to perplex every thing, and not to clear a ſubject: he uſed it only to diſpute againſt all comers, and ſilence his adverſaries, whether they were right or wrong. Plutarch gives us this idea of him. Διήκουσε δὲ Περικλῆς καὶ Ζήνωνος τοῦ Ἐλεάτου, πραγματευομένου περὶ φύσιν ὡς Παρμενίδης· ἐλεγκτικὴν δέ τινα, καὶ δι᾽ ἐναντιολογίας εἰς ἀπορίαν κατακλείουσαν ἐξασκήσαντος ἕξιν· ὥσπερ καὶ Τίμων ὁ Φλιάσιος εἴρηκε διὰ τούτων.

Ἀμφοτερογλώσσου τε μέγα σθένος οὐκ ἀπάτηλον
Ζήνωνος, πάντων ἐπιλήπτορος.

Audivit Pericles Zenonem quoque Eleatem, de natura, Parmenidis more, philoſophantem: qui impugnans quemlibet, uſum paraverat quemdam refutandi, qui deduceret ad perplexitatem. Quod Phliaſius Timon affirmat quoque, his verbis.

Omnia peſtringens, Zeno diſceptat, utraque
Et parte invictus, ſed non fallax (8).

These verſes of Timon appear leſs mutilated in Diogenes Laërtius; I copy them from the Amſterdam edition.

Ἀμφοτερογλώσσου τε μέγα σθένος οὐκ ἀλαπαδνὸν
Ζήνωνος πάντων ἐπιλέπτορος, ἠδὲ Μελίσσου,
Πολλῶν φαντασμῶν ἐπάνω, παύρων γε μὲν εἴσω (9).

Expreſſitque Plato vires utriuſque periti
Linguæ Zenonis, jurgatoriſque Meliſſi,
Phantaſias, qui aluit paucas, multaſque ſubegit (10).

Theſe verſes repreſent a man who criticiſed every thing, overthrew ſeveral opinions, and kept very few for himſelf. If he was not the Palamedes mentioned by Plato, he perfectly reſembled him. This Palamedes argued ſo ſubtilly, that he rendred the pro and con probable to his auditors: he ſhewed them that the very ſame things were like and unlike, that they were but one thing and different things, and that they reſted and moved at the ſame time. Τὸν οὖν Ἐλεατικὸν Παλαμήδην λέγοντα οὐκ ἴσμεν τέχνῃ, ὥστε δοκεῖν φαίνεσθαι τοῖς ἀκούουσι τὰ αὐτὰ ὅμοια καὶ ἀνόμοια, καὶ ἓν καὶ πολλὰ, μένοντά τε αὖ καὶ φερόμενα. Enimvero Eleatem Palamedem artificio ſuo efficere ſolitum accepimus, ut eadem audientibus ſimilia & diſſimilia, unum & multa, manentia & fluentia viderentur (11). Diogenes Laërtius (12) ſaith that Zeno was called the Palamedes of Elea, in Plato's Sophiſt: but Mr Menage charges him with two errors. He ſhews that this Palamedes is not mentioned in that work of Plato, but in the dialogue intituled Phædrus; after which he proves, by the evidence of Quintilian, that this Palamedes was Alcidamas the Rhetorician. 'Quæ non de Zenone Eleate, verum de Alcidamante intelligenda ſunt, ſi fides Quintiliano. Ita enim ille 'libro

(6) Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathematic. pag. 139.

(7) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 25.

(8) Plutarch. in Pericle, pag. 154. The tranſlation of theſe words may be ſeen below in the remark [E], citation (44).

(9) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra.

(10) This tranſlation was thus made from a copy, in which the Greek had, Ζήνωνός τε Πλάτων ἐπιλήπτορος, inſtead of Ζήνωνος πάντων ἐπιλήπτορος.

(11) Plato, in Phædro, pag. 1231.

(12) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num 15.

thouſand variations [C], as I ſhall ſhew in the remarks. I have only two faults to charge

‘ libro III. inſtitut. Oratoriarum capite I. ubi de Scriptoribus Artis Rhetoricæ: Et Hippias Eleus, & quem Palamedem Plato appellat, Alcidamas Eleates (13). - - - - Theſe things are not to be underſtood of Zeno Eleates, but of Alcidamas, if we rely on Quintilian. For theſe are the words of Quintilian in his Inſtitutions, ſpeaking of the writers on the art of Rhetoric: And Hippias Eleus, and Alcidamas Eleates, whom Plato calls Palamedes.’

[C] This affair is related with a thouſand variations.] The Elean tyrant, whom he deſigned to deſtroy, was Nearchus, according to ſome, and Diomedon, according to other writers (14). Plutarch calls him Demylus, as we ſhall ſee hereafter: Tertullian names him Dionyſius, and doubtleſs by a miſtake in Chronology (15) takes him for the Syracuſan tyrant, who ſo frequently occurs to us in authors, under the name of Dionyſius: ‘ Zeno Eleates, ſaith he, towards the end of his apology, conſultus à Dionyſio, quidnam Philoſophia præſtaret, cum reſpondiſſet, contemptum mortis, impaſſibilis flagellis Tyranni objectus, ſententiam ſuam ad mortem uſque ſignabat. - - - - Zeno of Elea being aſked by Dionyſius what Philoſophy was good for, anſwered, to make a man deſpiſe death: whereupon the cruel tyrant having ordered him to be ſcourged, Zeno confirmed the truth of his anſwer even to death.’ Here is one teſtimony of the admirable conſtancy of this Philoſopher. I believe Tertullian placed the ſcene of all this (16) not at Elea, as he ought to have done, but at Syracuſe. Others lay the ſcene in the iſle of Cyprus, and are beſides miſtaken, both in the perſon tortured, and in the tyrant. ‘ Ducebatur intrepidus (Euſebius) temporum iniquitati inſultans, imitatus Zenonem illum veterem Stoicum qui ut mentiretur quædam laceratus diutius, avulſam ſedibus linguam ſuam cum cruento ſputamine in oculos interrogantis Cyprii Regis impegit (17). - - - Euſebius was ſtill undaunted as he went to the place of execution, and continued to laſh the iniquities of the times, imitating the antient Stoic Philoſopher Zeno, who being interrogated by the King of Cyprus, and kept longer in torture that he might be forced to invent lies, plucked out his tongue, and threw it with the bloody ſpittle in the tyrant's face.’ Valeſius's note on this paſſage of Marcellinus, will diſcover the errors of this Hiſtorian, and if you conſult Mr Menage (18), you will find a very happy conjecture concerning the occaſion of theſe miſtakes. Zeno's action it ſelf is differently reported. Some ſay, that being required to declare his accomplices, he affirmed that all the tyrant's friends had a hand in the conſpiracy. This he did, in order to repreſent him as a perſon abandoned by all the world. After this general declaration he named ſome particular perſons, and told the tyrant that he wanted to ſpeak with him in his ear. The tyrant approaching, Zeno fixed his teeth ſo deep in his ear, and kept his hold ſo faſt, that nothingbut ſtabbing him with pricks could force him to let go. Εἶτα περί τινων εἰπὼν ἔχειν τινὰ εἰπεῖν αὐτῷ πρὸς τὸ οὖς· καὶ δακὼν, οὐκ ἀνῆκεν ἕως ἂν ἀπεκεντήθη, ταὐτὸν Ἀριστογείτονι τῷ τυραννοκτόνῳ παθών. Deinde cùm de quibuſdam dixiſſet, quiddam ſibi ad aurem loqui velle, eam mordicus apprehenſam non ante dimiſit quàm ſtimulis foderetur, idem agens quod Ariſtogiton tyrannicida (19). Others ſay that he did bite off the tyrant's noſe (20). And ſome affirm, that having declared his accomplices (21), and called the uſurper the plague of his country (22), he addreſſed himſelf to the ſtanders-by, telling them that he was aſtoniſhed at their cowardice, if the fear of being treated like him could oblige them to continue in ſlavery: after which, biting off his own tongue, he threw it into the tyrant's face (23); and that this ſo animated the citizens that they immediately ſtoned the uſurper of their liberty. This is what Diogenes Laërtius tells us. Plutarch obſerves, that Zeno, in biting off his tongue, and throwing it in a tyrant's face, practiſed his maſter's maxim, that great men dread diſhonour, but that none but children, women, and cowards dread pain. Ζήνων τοίνυν ὁ Παρμενίδου γνώριμος, ἐπιθέμενος Δημύλῳ τῷ τυράννῳ, καὶ δυστυχήσας περὶ τὴν πρᾶξιν, ἐν πυρὶ τὸν Παρμενίδου λόγον, ὥσπερ χρυσὸν ἀκήρατον καὶ δόκιμον παρέσχε. καὶ ἀπέδειξεν ἔργοις, ὅτι τὸ αἰσχρὸν ἀνδρὶ μεγάλῳ φοβερόν ἐστιν. ἀλγηδόνα δὲ, παῖδες, καὶ γύναια, καὶ γυναίων ψυχὰς ἔχοντες ἄνδρες, δεδίασι. τὴν γὰρ γλῶτταν αὐτοῦ διατρώγων, τῷ τυράννῳ προσέπτυσεν. Zeno Parmenidis diſcipulus, Demylo tyranno inſidiatus, re infeliciter geſta, doctrinam Parmenidis, velut aurum in igne, illæſam ac probam facto oſtendit. Scilicet turpitudinem magno viro metuendam eſſe: dolorem a pueris & mulierculis, ac viris animum muliebrem gerentibus timeri. Linguam enim ſuam dentibus amputatam, in tyrannum expuit (24). Hermippus ſays (25) that Zeno was pounded in a mortar.

Valerius Maximus could not fail to mention the conſtancy of this Philoſopher; but he is guilty of ſome faults: for inſtead of aſcribing to Zeno of Elea what relates to the tyrant Nearchus, he aſcribes it to another perſon; and beſides ſuppoſes, that Zeno deſigning to deliver the Agrigentines from the tyranny of Phalaris, did, and ſuffered, what others relate with reſpect to the tyrant of Elea. ‘ Qui (Zeno Eleates) cum eſſet in diſpicienda rerum natura maximæ prudentiæ, inque excitandis ad vigorem juvenum animis promptiſſimus, præceptorum fidem exemplo virtutis ſuæ publicavit. Patriam enim egreſſus, in qua frui ſecura libertate poterat, Agrigentum miſerabili ſervitute obrutum petiit, tanta fiducia ingenii ac morum ſuorum fretus, ut ſperaverit, & Tyranno & Phalaridi veſanæ mentis feritatem à ſe diripi poſſe. Poſtquam deinde apud illum plus conſuetudinem dominationis, quam conſilii ſalubritatem valere animadvertit; nobiliſſimos ejus civitatis adoleſcentes cupiditate liberandæ patriæ inflammavit. Cujus rei cum indicium ad tyrannum manaſſet, convocato in forum populo, torquere eum vario cruciatus genere cœpit: ſubinde quærens, quoſnam conſilii participes haberet: At ille nec eorum quempiam nominavit, ſed proximum quemque, ac fideliſſimum tyranno ſuſpectum reddidit: increpitanſque Agrigentinis ignaviam ac timiditatem, effecit ut ſubito mentis impulſu concitati, Phalarim lapidibus proſternerent. Senis ergo unius eculeo impoſiti, non ſupplex vox, nec miſerabilis ejulatus; ſed fortis cohortatio totius urbis animum, fortunamque mutavit (26). - - - Zeno of Elea, as he had a great knowledge of the nature of things, and a very ready talent in animating and giving vigour to the minds of youth, ſo he openly confirmed the truth of his precepts by the example of his own virtue. For having left his native country, where he might have ſecurely lived in liberty, he went to Agrigentum, which was then groaning under miſerable ſervitude; relying with ſo much confidence on his own genius and virtuous life, that he hoped to ſubdue the ſtubbornneſs, and tame the outrageous cruelty of the tyrant Phalaris. When he afterwards found that the habit of tyrannizing was ſo prevailing with Phalaris, that the wholſome advice he beſtowed on him had no influence, he inſpired the nobleſt of the youth of Agrigentum with the deſire of ſhaking off his yoke, and ſetting their country at liberty. The tyrant having notice of this, ſummoned the people to the Forum, and began to put Zeno to torture in various manners, inquiring in the intervals who were his accomplices. Zeno named none of them, but rendered one of thoſe ſuſpected who were ſtanding by Phalaris, and were the moſt faithful to him; and by often upbraiding the Agrigentines for their cowardice and fear, he animated them to that degree, that, being rouzed, as it were, by a ſudden impulſe of mind, they ſtoned the tyrant. Thus, it was not the ſupplications of an old man upon the rack, nor his lamentable wailings, but his vigorous exhortations, which changed the temper and fortune of a whole city.’ After which he relates what follows. ‘ Ejuſdem nominis philoſophus, cùm à Nearcho tyranno, de cujus nece conſilium inierat, torqueretur, ſupplicii pariter atque indicandorum conſciorum gratia; doloris victor, ſed ultionis cupidus, eſſe dixit quod eum ſecreto audire admodum expediret: laxatoque eculeo, poſtquam inſidiis opportunum tempus animadvertit, aurem ejus morſu corripuit, nec ante dimiſit quam & ipſe vita, & ille corporis parte privaretur (27). - - - - A Philoſopher of the ſame name, who had entered into a confederacy againſt the life of the tyrant Nearchus, was by his command put to the torture, both for his puniſhment, and in order to diſcover the reſt of his confederates. Being victorious over the pain he endured, but deſirous of revenge, he ſaid that he had an affair to communicate to Nearchus, which it was of ‘ great charge on Mr Moreri [D]. For the reſt, the opinions of Zeno Eleates, were very near the ſame with thoſe of Xenophanes and Parmenides concerning the Unity, Incomprehenſibility, and immutability of all things. I cannot believe he aſſerted that there is nothing in the univerſe [E]; for how could he pretend that he, who maintained that principle, did not exiſt? How could he, who aimed at nothing but by his arguments

---

(13) Menagius, in Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 25, pag. 403, col. 2.

(14) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 26.

(15) Antiquior Zeno Eleates Dionyſio Tyranno centum quinquaginta annis circiter. Menag. ibid. pag. 404.

(16) I mean that he thought the whole matter happened at Syracuſe.

(17) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xiv, cap. ix, pag. 46.

(18) Menag. ubi ſupra, num. 26.

(19) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 26, pag. 565. ex Heraclide in Satyri Epitome.

(20) Laërt. ibid. num. 27, ex Demetrio in Æquivocis.

(21) Id. ibid. ex Antiſth. in Succeſſionibus.

(22) Μετὰ τὸ μηνῦσαι τοὺς φίλους ἐρωτηθῆναι πρὸς τοῦ τυράννου εἴ τις ἄλλος εἴη· τὸν δὲ εἰπεῖν σὺ ὁ τῆς πόλεως ἀλητήριος. Illum quum amicos indicaſſet, rogatum à Tyranno eſſetne alius quiſpiam, dixiſſe, Tu civitatis pernicies, Id. ibid. This will be better underſtood, if it be read in Seneca, at the end of this remark.

(23) Compare what is ſaid in the article PYTHAGORAS, citat. (85).

(24) Plut. adverſus Colotem, circa fin. pag. 1126. Vide etiam de Garrulit. pag. 505.

(25) Apud Diogenem Laërtium, lib. ix, num. 27.

(26) Valer. Maximus, lib. iii, cap. iii, num. 2, in Exter. pag. m. 280.

(27) Id. ibid. num. 3.

pro

great importance that he alone ſhould hear; and the torture being abated for that purpoſe, when he found a proper opportunity for executing his deſign, he fixed his teeth ſo deep in the tyrant's ear, that he did not let him go, till he had loſt his life, and the tyrant a part of his body.’ Oliverius, who commented on Valerius Maximus, finds but one fault in this: he doth not blame Valerius Maximus for any thing but ſaying that Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, was put to death for endeavouring to deſtroy a tyrant. This cenſure is unjuſt; and it will be in vain to ſay that the ſame Zeno voluntarily killed himſelf at the age of ninety years (28), that will not convict Valerius Maximus of any error, ſince he doth not ſay that one of his two Zeno's was the head of the Stoics. Doth not Diogenes Laërtius ſay that there were eight Zeno's (29). It is not therefore neceſſary that he, who is diſtinguiſhed from Zeno of Elea, ſhould be the founder of the Stoics. Henry Valeſius blames Valerius Maximus for making two Zeno's of one Zeno of Elea (30). One of our beſt Critics made the ſame obſervation, and beſides pointed out what might have miſled this antient author (31). He obſerves that John Vorſtius, making the ſame critical remark expoſed himſelf to cenſure, by making Nearchus tyrant of the Liparitans. Vorſtius grounded this opinion on Zeno's being examined concerning the arms, which, by his means, were brought to the iſle of Lipara. He imagined that this Philoſopher, after having delivered the Agrigentines from the tyranny of Phalaris, retired to this iſle, and endeavoured to free it from the tyranny of Nearchus. But Mr Perizonius clearly proves (32) that it was the city of Elea which Zeno attempted to free from the tyranny of Nearchus. But to go further than this; I ſhall take the liberty to obſerve that theſe learned men let the greateſt fault of Valerius Maximus paſs uncenſured. It lies in making Zeno of Elea enter into a plot againſt Phalaris: Chronology will by no means allow this. Let us ſuppoſe that Euſebius is miſtaken in placing the twenty-eight years of Phalaris's tyranny betwixt the ſecond year of the XXXIſt Olympiad, and the ſecond of the XXXVIIIth. And let us prefer his placing this tyrant at the end of the LIIId Olympiad after an uſurpation for ſixteen years. Let us even ſuppoſe with ſeveral learned men (33) that Phalaris ſeized the ſovereign authority in Agrigentum about the LIId Olympiad, and that he held it ſixteen years according to ſome, or twenty eight according to others; it will nevertheleſs appear that he was dead before our Zeno was of age to undertake what Valerius Maximus relates of him. We have ſeen above (34), that Parmenides was about ſixty-five years old when Zeno was but forty. But Parmenides flouriſhed in the LXXXth Olympiad (35): judge then whether Zeno could make any figure in the fifty-ninth. But to deal plainly, I find ſome perplexity in the time when Parmenides is ſaid to have flouriſhed: for ſince Pericles, who died in the LXXXVIIth Olympiad, was Zeno's diſciple, the flouriſhing time of Zeno ought to be placed about the ſeventy-ſixth (36), and that of Parmenides, his maſter, a little higher (37). This is ſufficient for my purpoſe. I ſhould have examined all this more exactly, if I had given the article of Phalaris. I was ready to begin it, when I was informed that a worthy nephew of the moſt illuſtrious Mr Boyle had publiſhed the life of that tyrant. I inquired for that piece every where, but could not find it, and therefore I laid aſide that article; I referred it till ſuch time as I might have the advantage of that author's obſervations, and I do not yet know any more of his book (38) but what is extracted out of it by the journaliſts. However, we may believe that Valerius Maximus did not mention two Zeno's, without ſome ſort of reflexion. He muſt have known that Nearchus lived after Phalaris; ſo that being miſtaken in making the Zeno of Elea (39) cotemporary with Phalaris, he could not perſuade himſelf that the ſame Zeno who deſigned to expel Nearchus, was he who contrived a plot againſt the tyrant of Agrigentum.

Obſerve, that ſeveral Critics will have it, that Seneca meant our Zeno of Elea, when he ſaid, ‘Notus eſt ille tyrannicida, qui imperfecto opere comprehenſus, & ab Hippia tortus, ut conſcios indicaret, circumſtantes amicos tyranni nominavit, quibus quam maxime caram ſalutem ejus ſciebat. Et cum ille ſingulos, ut nominati erant, occidi juſſiſſet, interrogavit: Ecquis ſupereſſet? Tu, inquit, ſolus: neminem enim alium, cui carus eſſes, reliqui. Effecit ira, ut tyrannus tyrannicidæ manus commodaret, & præſidia ſua gladio ſuo cæderet (40). - - - - - That tyrannicide is well known, who being apprehended, before he could execute his deſign, and being put to the torture by Hippias, in order to diſcover his accomplices, named the tyrant's friends who were ſtanding by, and to whom he knew the life and ſafety of Hippias was the deareſt. When the latter had cauſed each of them to be ſlain, in order as they were named, he aſked if there were any remaining: you alone, replied the other, for I have left no other perſon to whom you are dear. Such was the tyrant's anger, that he lent his hands to the tyrannicide, and ſlew his protectors with his own ſword.’ But for all Muretus and Juſtus Lipſius, I am apt to think, that Seneca meant one of thoſe whom Hippias the ſon of Piſiſtratus, cauſed to be tortured. And though Seneca relates what others aſcribe to Zeno of Elea, yet I do not believe that he had him in his eye. It is his cuſtom, and that of ſeveral other authors, to apply to ſome perſons, what has been ſaid of others.

[D] I have only two faults to charge on Mr Moreri.] The firſt is his quoting Diogenes in the ninth book de Hiſt. Græc. & de Sect. Philoſ. Now it is not true that Diogenes wrote books on the Greek Hiſtory, or concerning the Greek Hiſtorians, nor that his book is intituled de Sectis Philoſophorum. It is intituled de Vitis, Dogmatis, & Apophthegmatis clarorum Philoſophorum, Libri X. His ſecond fault is ſaying that Diogenes ſpeaks of ſeven other Zeno's, whoſe lives he hath not given us. For one of them is Zeno of Cittium, the head of the Stoics, whoſe life Diogenes hath written at large.

[E] I cannot believe he aſſerted that there is nothing in the univerſe,] I therefore ſuſpect Seneca, who aſcribes to him this opinion. Juſtus Lipſius alſo diſtruſts the truth of it. ‘Audi, quantum mali faciat nimia ſubtilitas, & quàm infeſta veritati ſit. Protagoras ait, de omni re in utramque partem diſputari poſſe, ex æquo, & de hac ipſa, an omnis res in utramque partem diſputabilis ſit. Nauſiphanes ait, ex his quæ videntur eſſe, nihil magis eſſe, quàm non eſſe. Parmenides ait, ex his quæ videntur, nihil eſſe in univerſum. Zeno Eleates omnia negotia de negotio dejecit, ait nihil eſſe. Circa eadem ferè Pyrrhonii verſantur, & Megarici, & Eretrici, & Academici, qui novam induxerunt ſcientiam, nihil ſcire. Hæc omnia in illum ſupervacuum ſtudiorum liberalium gregem conjice. Illi mihi non profuturam ſcientiam tradunt, hi ſpem omnis ſcientiæ eripiunt: ſatius eſt ſupervacua ſcire, quàm nihil. Illi non præferunt lumen, per quod acies dirigatur ad verum: hi oculos mihi effodiunt. Si Protagoræ credo, nihil in rerum natura eſt, niſi dubium: ſi Nauſiphani, hoc unum certum eſt, nihil eſſe certi: ſi Parmenidi, nihil eſt præter unum: ſi Zenoni, ne unum quidem. Quid ergo nos ſumus? quid iſta quæ nos circumſtant, alunt, ſuſtinent? Tota rerum natura umbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax. Non facile dixerim, utrum magis iraſcar illis, qui nos nihil ſcire voluerunt: an illis, qui ne hoc quidem nobis reliquerunt, nihil ſcire (41). - - - - - - Hear how great evil proceeds from too much ſubtilty, and how obnoxious it is to truth. Protagoras ſays, that a man may diſpute upon any ſubject whatever, and may take either ſide of diſpute with equal advantage; nay, that he may diſpute upon this, whether any ſubject whatever is diſputable on either ſide. Nauſiphanes affirms, that the things which appear to be, nothing is more apparent than that they are not. Parmenides, that of theſe things which are ſeen, nothing exiſts.

(28) Oliverius ſays ſo.

(29) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 29. Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſtor. Philoſ. pag. 116, reckons 15 Zeno's.

(30) Ex uno Zenone Eleate duos perperam facit. Henricus Valeſius, Notis in Amm. Marcellin. lib. xiv, cap. ix, pag. 46.

(31) Ut modo duorum Fabiorum res geſtas uni eum adſignaſſe contra Pighium probavimus, ita contraria plane culpa unius Philoſophi facta, in duos ejuſdem nominis diviſit, lib. iii, cap. iii. Nam quum retuliſſet, quam patientiam Eleates Zeno præſtitiſſet, &c. Jacobus Perizonius, Animadv. Hiſtoric. pag. 85.

(32) Mr Perizonius cites Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. iii, and Diogenes Laërtius.

(33) Car. Boyle, apud Acta Eruditor. Lipſienſ. 1696, pag. 102, 103. In the Abſtract of Phalaris's Letters, printed at Oxford in 1695.

(34) Citat. (4).

(35) Chron. Euſebii.

(36) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Phil. pag. 116, places him in the LXXVIIIth Olympiad.

(37) In the edition of Diogenes Laërtius, of 1692, he is placed in the LXIXth Olympiad.

(38) I write this in the year 1696.

(39) Nay, he ſuppoſes that he was very old at the time of the plot.

(40) Seneca, de Ira, lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 541. See the Commentators upon it.

(41) Seneca, Epiſt. lxxxviii, pag. m. 361.

pro and con to perplex all thoſe with whom he diſputed (c), and confound them ſo, that they ſhould not know which way to turn themſelves, be guilty of ſuch a palpable inconſiſtency? Did not he ſee that it was eaſy to ſilence him, by aſking whether nothingneſs could reaſon? He argued ſtrenuouſly againſt the exiſtence of motion. Some of his objections on that head are preſerved in Ariſtotle's works [F], but it is probable that exiſts. Zeno of Elea throws down every thing, and maintains that there is nothing. Much the ſame opinions are held by the Pyrrhonians, the Megaricians, Eretricians, and Academics, who have introduced a new ſcience, viz. that we know nothing. You muſt throw aſide all theſe tenets into the claſs of ſuperfluous learning. The former ſay that knowledge will be of no uſe to me; the latter take away all my hopes of attaining knowledge: it is better to have an uſeleſs knowledge than none at all. The former do not give me any light for the attaining of truth: the latter put out my eyes. If I believe Protagoras, every thing in nature is doubtful; if Nauſiphanes, this alone is certain, that nothing is certain; if Parmenides, there is in nature but one Being; if Zeno, there is not even one Being. What are we then? What are thoſe things which ſurround us, nouriſh and ſupport us? All nature is a ſhadow, or nothing, or an illuſion. I can hardly tell whether I am more angry with thoſe who pretend that we know nothing, or thoſe who will not even allow that we know nothing.' I have cited thoſe words of Seneca ſomewhat at large, in order to diſplay all the degrees of Scepticiſm, amongſt which there is none ſo extravagant as our Zeno's notion. If he really maintained ſuch a paradox as this, either he meant to divert himſelf, or he did not underſtand the word nothing in the ſame ſenſe as others do, or he was raving. But we do not find the leaſt ſymptom of madneſs in the reſt of his opinions. Wherefore we ought rather to ſolve it by taking it for a witty conceit, or a particular notion of the word nothing. Let us paſs the ſame judgment on Gorgias Leontinus's book, in which he maintained three aſſertions (42): firſt, that there is nothing; ſecondly, that if there is any Being, man cannot comprehend it; thirdly, that though man could comprehend it, he could not expreſs it. Let us ſee Juſtus Lipſius's reflexion on that paſſage of Seneca: ‘Sententia eſt, Zeno Eleates moleſtiâ nos liberavit, & omni inquiſitione: nam ait, Nihil eſſe. Sed hæc mira, & eximiè fatua aut ſapiens ſententia, nec mihi nunc capienda. An ad contemptum rerum retulit, Nihil hæc (non tamen Nihil) eſſe? velim, & ſic laudem, non ſolum tolerem. Si aliter, & de ipſa exiſtentia; elleboro hæc egent. Ceterùm Zeno Eleates nuſquam tale, apud Laërtium quidem, ubi Dogmata ejus diverſa, ſed nec alibi commemini legiſſe. Viderit Seneca (43). - - - - - - Zeno of Elea freed us from all trouble and all inquiry; for he ſaid that there is nothing. But either this is a very ſurpriſing and fooliſh ſaying, or it is a very wiſe one, and ſuch as I cannot comprehend. Did he uſe it in contempt of things, and mean that the things of this life were (not nothing, but) naught? I aſſent, and not only allow but commend it. If otherwiſe, and he ſpoke of the exiſtence of things, he was ſurely mad. For the reſt, Zeno of Elea ſays no ſuch thing in Diogenes Laërtius, who has related ſeveral of his opinions, nor do I remember to have read this any where elſe. Let Seneca anſwer for it.' What Plutarch relates of Zeno's character will doubtleſs be objected againſt me: Pericles, ſays he (44), was alſo a hearer and diſciple of Zeno Eleates, who taught Natural Philoſophy, like Parmenides. This Zeno oppoſed every thing, and had got a certain habit of objecting and refuting, by which he perplexed his adverſaries, and reduced them to a nonplus: as Timon the Phliaſian teſtifies in theſe verſes.

Zeno with wondrous art could every thing diſpute,
And every thing could critic and confute,
Would either ſide the queſtion take, nor fail
Defending or oppoſing to prevail.

It will be objected againſt me, I ſay, that a Philoſopher of this humour, was capable of quibbling to ſuch a degree, as to maintain that every thing is nothing. I anſwer, that it is not probable that ſo ſubtile a diſputant would have run into ſuch extremities, out of which it ſeems impoſſible for him to have extricated himſelf.

But however incredible this may appear, let us ſay that the conſequences of Pyrrhoniſm may have engaged people to aſſert a great many extravagant things, and let us moderate a little the aſſeverations we have read (45). Let us alſo ſay, that perhaps our Zeno maintained that there was nothing, only in arguing on thoſe principles which he attacked. It may be that from an argument ad hominem, they concluded that he poſitively and abſolutely taught that poſition, though he advanced it only as a doctrine which reſulted from ſome hypotheſis, the falſity of which he had undertaken to prove. We know that he argued thus: if there is one Being, it is indiviſible, for unity cannot be divided; now that which is indiviſible is nothing, for that cannot be accounted among Beings which is of ſuch a nature, that being added to another, it will not increaſe it, and being taken from another, doth not diminiſh it: and therefore there is no Being. This argument is mentioned by Ariſtotle, who ſays it is ridiculous (46). Let us omit the Greek, and ſet down rather Fonſeca's paraphraſe, from which we learn that Zeno thus attacked a doctrine of Plato: ‘Poſterior ratio, quam affert (Ariſtoteles) pro opinione naturalium contra Platonem, erat Zenonis Eleatæ, Parmenidis diſcipuli, qui hunc in modum argumentabatur. Ipſum unum ſeparatum ſi datur, eſt omnino indiviſibile, ergo nihil eſt; unde ſequitur; non tantum illud, non eſſe ſubſtantiam rerum, ſed neque omnino quicquam, quod ad eas pertineat. Conſequentiam verò ex eo firmam putabat Zeno, quia nihil eſſe credebat, niſi quod aliquam magnitudinem haberet: quam ob Cauſam, ſæpe utebatur hoc quaſi Principio, Quod nec additum facit majus, nec detractum reddit minus, nihil eſt. Quocirca dicebat nihil eſſe, quod omni ex parte eſſet ens, niſi Corpus, quando quidem ſolum Corpus additum ſecundum quamcumque dimenſionem facit majus. Siquidem linea addita non facit majus, niſi ſecundum longitudinem; nec Superficies, niſi ſecundum longitudinem & latitudinem. Unde ſequebatur Unitatem abſtractam, qualem ponebat Plato, itemque Punctum, nihil omnino eſſe, quia nequeant rem ullam majorem facere (47). - - - - - - The laſt argument which Ariſtotle alledges in favour of the opinion of the Naturaliſts againſt Plato, was that of Zeno Eleates, the diſciple of Parmenides: he argued thus: if there is one ſeparate Being it is indiviſible, therefore it is nothing, from whence it follows that it is not only not the ſubſtance of things but alſo nothing belonging to them. Zeno imagined this conſequence was juſt, becauſe he believed there was nothing but what had ſome magnitude. Accordingly he often uſed this as a principle. That which being added to another thing, does not increaſe it, or being taken from another thing, does not diminiſh it, is nothing. He therefore ſaid that there was nothing which in every reſpect was a Being, except body; ſince body alone, if added to another, makes a greater, according to its dimenſion: for a line added to a line makes not a greater but in length; nor doth a ſurface added to a ſurface make a greater but in length and breadth. Hence it follows that an abſtract unity, ſuch as Plato ſuppoſed, and likewiſe that a point, are nothing, becauſe they cannot make any thing greater.'

[F] Some of his objections againſt the exiſtence of motion, are preſerved in Ariſtotle's works.] read Ariſtotle's Phyſics (48), where you will find four objections made by Zeno examined.

The firſt is (49). If an arrow, which tends towards a certain place, ſhould move, it would move and reſt at the ſame time. But that is a contradiction; therefore it doth not move. The conſequence of the major is proved thus. The arrow is every moment in a ſpace equal to it ſelf. It is then at reſt; for a thing is not in a ſpace when it leaves it: wherefore there is no moment in which it moves; and if it moved in ſome moments, it would be at once in motion and at reſt. To underſtand this objection the better, we muſt take notice of two principles which cannot be denied: one is, that a body cannot be in two places at (c) See Plutarch's words, towards the end of the remark [E].

---

(42) See Sextus Empiricus adv. Mathemat. lib. vii, cap. ii.

(43) Lipſius, Manuduct. ad Stoic. Philoſ. lib. ii, Diſſ. iv, ſub fin. pag. m. 693, Tom. iv, Oper.

(44) Plut. in Vita Periclis, pag. 154. The words of the original may be ſeen above, in citation (8).

(45) See, below, the explanation on the Pyrrhonians, citat. (3).

(46) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. iii, cap. iv.

(47) Fonſeca in Ariſtotelis Metaphyſ. ibid. pag. m. 473, 474.

(48) In the ninth chapter of the ſixth book.

(49) I reckon it the firſt, becauſe Ariſtotle propoſes and anſwers it at the beginning of the chapter; but afterwards he places it in the third rank.

that he alledged ſeveral others, which perhaps were the ſame with thoſe I ſhall mention below

THAT time is not diviſible in infinitum.

at once; the other, that two parts of time cannot exiſt together. The firſt of theſe two principles is ſo evident, even without making uſe of any attention, that I need not explain it: but as the other requires a little more reflexion, in order to be underſtood, and comprehends the whole force of the objection, I will render it more obvious by an inſtance. I ſay then that what ſuits Monday and Tueſday with reſpect to ſucceſſion, ſuits every portion of time whatſoever. Since then it is impoſſible for Monday and Tueſday to exiſt together, and that of neceſſity Monday muſt ceaſe to be before Tueſday begins to be, there is no part of time whatſoever, which can co-exiſt with another; each muſt exiſt alone; each muſt begin to be, when the precedent ceaſeth to be; and each muſt ceaſe to be before the following can begin to exiſt. From whence it follows, that time is not diviſible in infinitum, and that the ſucceſſive duration of things is compoſed of moments, properly ſo called, each of which is ſimple and indiviſible, perfectly diſtinct from time paſt and future, and contains no more than the preſent time. Thoſe who deny this conſequence, muſt be given up to their ſtupidity, or their want of ſincerity, or the inſurmountable power of their prejudices. But if you once grant that the preſent time is indiviſible, you will be unavoidably obliged to admit Zeno's objection. You cannot find an inſtant when the arrow leaves its place; for if you find one, it will be at the ſame time in that place, and yet not there. Ariſtotle contents himſelf with anſwering, that Zeno very falſly ſuppoſes the indiviſibility of moments. Τοῦτο δὲ ἐστι ψεῦδος· οὐ γάρ σύγκειται ὁ χρόνος ἐκ τῶν νῦν ὄντων ἀδιαιρέτων, ὥσπερ οὐδ' ἄλλο μέγεθος οὐδέν. Hoc verò eſt falſum, cùm tempus ex momentis individuis non conſtet, ut neque alia ulla magnitudo (50).

(50) Ariſtoteles, Phyſic. lib. vi, cap. ix.

Zeno's ſecond objection was this. If there be motion, what moves muſt paſs from one place to another; for all motion comprehends two extremities, terminum à quo, and terminum ad quem, the place from whence it departs, and that to which it comes. But theſe two extremities are ſeparated by ſpaces which contain an infinity of parts, ſince matter is diviſible in infinitum; it is therefore impoſſible for the body that is moved to proceed from one extremity to the other. The intermediate ſpace is compoſed of an infinity of parts, through which it ought to run ſucceſſively, one after the other, without ever being able to touch that which is before at the ſame time that it touches that which is behind: ſo that to run through one foot of matter, I mean, to reach from the beginning of the firſt inch to the end of the twelfth inch, an infinite time would be neceſſary; for the ſpaces, which it is ſucceſſively obliged to run through, betwixt the two extremities, being infinite in number, it is plain that they cannot be run through in leſs than an infinity of moments; unleſs it were pretended that the body which moves is in ſeveral places at the ſame time, which is falſe and impoſſible. To this Ariſtotle makes a wretched anſwer: he ſaith that a foot of matter being no otherwiſe than virtually infinite or infinite in power, may very well be run through in a finite time. I ſet down his anſwer with the perſpicuity which the Conimbrian commentaries have given it. 'Huic rationi ſatisfactum ab ſe jam ante Ariſtoteles ait, videlicet cum hoc libro docuit infinitum ſectione, quod non actu, ſed poteſtate infinitum eſt, tempore finito decurri poſſe. Enimvero cùm tempus continuum ſit, parique modo infinitum, eodem infinitatis jure, eiſdemque partium diviſionibus ſibi mutuò reſpondebunt tempus & magnitudo. Nec contra naturam talis infiniti eſt hoc modo pertranſiri (51). - - - Ariſtotle ſays that he has already anſwered this objection, having ſhewn in this book, that a body infinite in diviſion, that is, not actually, but virtually ſo, may be run over in a finite time. For as time hath a continuity of parts, which are infinite in the ſame manner as the parts of body are infinite, time and body will anſwer to one another by the ſame laws of infinity, and in the ſame diviſion of their parts. Nor is it againſt the nature of ſuch infinite that body ſhould be thus run over.' You have here two particulars: I. That each part of time is diviſible in infinitum; which is invincibly refuted above. II. That a body is only virtually infinite. Which ſignifies that the infinity of a foot of matter, conſiſts in this, that it may be divided without end into ſmaller parts, but not in its actually undergoing that diviſion. To urge this, is to impoſe on the world; for if matter is diviſible in infinitum, it actually contains an infinite number of parts, and is not therefore an infinite in power, but an infinite which really and actually exiſts. The continuity of parts doth not hinder their actual diſtinction; conſequently their actual infinity doth not depend on the diviſion; but it ſubſiſts equally in a cloſe quantity, and in that which is called diſcrete. But if we ſhould grant this infinity in power, which by the actual diviſion of its parts, would become an actual infinite, we ſhould not loſe any ground, for motion hath the ſame virtue as diviſion. It touches one part of the ſpace without touching the other, and touches them all one after another; is not this actually to diſtinguiſh them? Is not this to do the very ſame thing which a Geometrician performs on a table, when he draws lines which mark out all the half inches? He doth not break the table into half inches, but makes a diviſion which expreſſes the actual diſtinction of parts: and I do not believe that Ariſtotle would have denied, that if an infinity of lines was drawn on an inch of matter, it would introduce a diviſion which ſhould reduce that to an actual infinity, which, according to him, was only virtually ſo. Bnt what would be done, with reſpect to the eyes, by drawing lines on an inch of matter, is certainly done with reſpect to the underſtanding by motion. This may be confirmed by what the Geometricians ſay concerning the production of lines and ſurfaces. 'Mathematici ut nobis inculcent veram lineæ intelligentiam, imaginantur punctum . . . . . è loco in locum moveri: cum enim punctum ſit prorſus individuum relinquetur ex iſto motu imaginario veſtigium quoddam longum expers latitudinis . . . . . . Mathematici ut nobis ſuperficiem ob oculos ponant, monent ut intelligamus lineam aliquam in tranſverſum moveri, veſtigium enim relictum &c (52). - - - The Mathematicians, in order to give us a clear idea of a line, imagine a point . . . . to move from one place to another, for as a point is indiviſible, that imaginary motion would leave a certain long trace without any breadth. . . . . . The Mathematicians in order to repreſent to us a ſurface, deſire us to imagine any line moving acroſs from one place to another, and the trace which that motion leaves, is a ſurface.' We conceive that a body which moves by ſucceſſively touching the parts of ſpace, doth determine them as effectually as the chalk in the hand. But beſides, when it may be ſaid that the diviſion of an infinite is ended, is there not then an actual infinite? Do not Ariſtotle and his followers aſſert, that an hour contains an infinity of parts? Wherefore when it is paſt, it muſt be owned that an infinity of parts have actually exiſted one after another. Is this a virtual, and not an actual, infinity? Let us then ſay that this diſtinction is null, and that Zeno's objection remains in full force. An hour, a year, or an age, &c. are each a finite time: A foot of matter is an infinite ſpace; and therefore there is no body in motion that can ever reach from the beginning of a foot to the end of it. We ſhall ſee in the following remark, whether this objection may be eluded, by ſuppoſing that the parts of a foot of matter are not infinite. Let us content our ſelves in this place with obſerving, that the ſubterfuge of the infinity of the parts of time is of no ſervice; for if there were in an hour an infinity of parts, it could never either begin or end. All its parts muſt exiſt ſeparately; any two of them never do, nor can exiſt together: they muſt then be comprized between a firſt and laſt unity, which is incompatible with an infinite number.

(51) Conimbricenſes, in Ariſtot. Phyſic. lib. vi, cap. ix, pag. m. 147, 148.

(52) Clavius in Euclid. lib. i, num. 2, & 5.

The third objection was the famous argument called Achilles (53). Zeno of Elea was the inventer of it, if we believe Diogenes Laërtius, who tells us nevertheleſs that Phavorinus aſcribed it to Parmenides, and to ſeveral others. Οὗτος καὶ τὸν Ἀχιλλέα πρῶτος λόγον ἠρώτησε· Φαβωρῖνος δέ φησι Παρμενίδην, καὶ ἄλλους συχνούς. Hic & Achillea primus oratione argumentatus eſt; quamvis Phavorinus Parmenidem & alios complures profert (54). This objection hath the ſame foundation with the ſecond, but it is more adapted to the declamatory ſtile. It tends to ſhew that the ſwifteſt body in motion purſuing the ſloweſt, can never reach it. Γίνεται δὲ παρὰ τὸ αὐτὸ τῇ διχοτομίᾳ

(53) See, the article ACHILLES, remark [L].

(54) Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 19.

below [G], ſome of which are againſt the exiſtence of extenſion, and ſeem much ſtronger than χοτομία. ἐν ἀμφοτέροις γὰρ συμβαίνει μὴ ἀφικνεῖσθαι πρὸς τὸ πέρας, διαιρουμένου πῶς τοῦ μεγέθους. ἀλλὰ πρόσκειται ἐν τούτῳ ὅτι οὐδὲ τὸ τάχιστον τετραγῳδημένον ἐν τῷ διώκειν τὸ βραδύτερον. ὥστ ἀνάγκη καὶ τὴν λύσιν εἶναι τὴν αὐτήν. Ob idem autem evenit atque in diviſione in dimidia. Nam in utraque accidit, ut ad finem non perveniatur, quoquo modo magnitudine diviſa. Sed in hac additur ne illud quidem, quod celerrimum eſt, (quod tragicè prolatum eſt) id quod tardiſſimum eſt attingere perſequendo. Quamobrem ſolutio eadem ſit neceſſe eſt (55). Suppoſe a tortoiſe to be twenty paces before Achilles, and limit the ſwiftneſs of the hero in proportion to that of the tortoiſe as one to twenty. Whilſt he advances twenty paces, the tortoiſe advances one: ſhe will then be before him ſtill. Whilſt he proceeds to the twenty-firſt pace, ſhe will gain the twentieth part of the twenty-ſecond, and while he gains this twentieth part, ſhe will go through the twentieth part of the twenty-firſt part, and ſo on. Ariſtotle refers us to what he ſays in anſwer to the ſecond objection: and we may refer him to our reply. See alſo what ſhall be ſaid in the following remark, concerning the difficulty of explaining wherein conſiſts the ſwiftneſs of motion.

I proceed to the fourth objection, which ſhews the contradictions of motion. Suppoſe a table of four ells, and take alſo two bodies of the ſame meaſure, one of wood, and the other of ſtone (56). Let the table be immovably fixed, and bear the piece of wood according to the length of two ells weſtward, and ſuppoſe the piece of ſtone placed to the eaſt, and only to touch the edge of the table. Suppoſe it to move on the table weſtward, and that in half an hour it goes the length of two ells; it will become contiguous to the piece of wood. Suppoſe that they touch one another only by their edges, and in ſuch a manner, that the motion of the one towards the weſt doth not hinder the motion of the other to the eaſt. At the moment of their contiguity, let the piece of wood begin to tend towards the eaſt, whilſt the other continues to tend towards the weſt; let them move with equal velocity. In half an hour the piece of ſtone will finiſh it's courſe over all the table; and ſo it will move through a ſpace of four ells, the whole length of the table, in an hour. But the piece of wood will run through the ſame ſpace of four ells in half an hour, by reaſon that it touched the whole extent of the piece of ſtone by the edges: therefore it is true that two bodies moving with an equal ſwiftneſs go through the ſame ſpace, one in half an hour, and the other in an hour: and therefore an hour and half an hour are equal times; which is contradictory. Ariſtotle ſaith, that this is a ſophiſm, ſince one of thoſe moving bodies is conſidered in reference to a ſpace which continues at reſt, meaning the table, and the other with reſpect to a ſpace in motion, meaning the piece of ſtone. I own he is in the right to obſerve that difference, but this doth not remove the difficulty; for a thing, which ſeems incomprehenſible, remains ſtill to be explained, that is, that a piece of wood ſhould at the ſame time move four ells on it's ſouth-ſide, and but two on it's inferior ſurface. But I ſhall illuſtrate this with a clearer inſtance. Suppoſe two books in folio of equal length, as two feet each. Place them on a table one before the other; move them at the ſame time one above the other, one towards the eaſt, and the other towards the weſt, till the eaſtern edge of the one, and the weſtern edge of the other touch one another: and you will find that the edges by which they did touch one another, are now four feet diſtant from each other; and yet each of the books hath moved but the ſpace of two feet. You may ſtrengthen the objection by ſuppoſing whatſoever body you pleaſe in motion, in the midſt of ſeveral others, which are moving ſeveral ways, and in various degrees of ſwiftneſs; you will find that the ſame body will in the ſame time run through ſeveral ſorts of ſpace, double, triple, &c. to one another: conſider well of it, and you will find that this is only explicable by Arithmetical calculations, which are only the idea of our mind; but that thing doth not ſeem practicable in the bodies themſelves (57). For we ought to remember theſe three eſſential properties of motion. 1. It is impoſſible for a body in motion to touch the ſame part of a ſpace twice ſucceſſively. 2. It never can touch two of them at once. 3. It never can touch the third before the ſecond, nor the fourth before the third, &c. He who can Phyſically reconcile theſe three particulars with the diſtance of four feet betwixt two bodies, which have run through no more than the ſpace of two feet (58), muſt be no ignorant perſon. Obſerve, that theſe three properties are as neceſſarily requiſite to a body which goes over ſpaces, whoſe motion is contrary to it's own, as to one which paſſes through ſpaces where it meets with no reſiſtance.

[G] The ſame I ſhall mention below.] I am apt to think that thoſe who would revive Zeno's opinion, ought to argue thus.

OBJECTIONS againſt the exiſtence of extenſion.

I. There is no extenſion, therefore there is no motion. The conſequence is good, for what hath no extenſion fills no ſpace, and what fills no ſpace cannot poſſibly paſs from one place to another, and conſequently move. This is inconteſtable: the difficulty is then to prove that there is no extenſion. Zeno might have argued thus: Extenſion cannot be compoſed either of Mathematical points, or of atoms, or of parts diviſible in infinitum; therefore it's exiſtence is impoſſible. The conſequence ſeems certain, by reaſon it is impoſſible to conceive more than theſe three modes of compoſition in extenſion; wherefore the antecedent alone remains to be proved. A few words ſhall ſuffice as to Mathematical points; for a man of the meaneſt capacity may apprehend with the utmoſt evidence, if he is but a little attentive, that ſeveral nothingneſſes of extenſion joined together will never make an extenſion (59). Conſult the firſt body of ſcholaſtical Philoſophy that comes to hand, and you will there find the moſt convincing reaſons, ſupported by many Geometrical demonſtrations, againſt the exiſtence of theſe points (60). Wherefore to ſay no more on that head, let us take it to be impoſſible, or at leaſt inconceivable, that matter ſhould be compoſed of them. Nor is it leſs impoſſible or inconceivable that it ſhould be compoſed of the Epicurean atoms, that is, of extended and indiviſible corpuſcles; for every extenſion, how ſmall ſoever, hath a right and left ſide, an upper and lower ſide: therefore it is a conjunction of diſtinct bodies; and I may deny of the right ſide what I affirm of the left, for theſe two ſides are not in the ſame place: a body cannot be in two places at once; and conſequently every extenſion which fills ſeveral parts of ſpace contains ſeveral bodies. I know beſides, and the Atomiſts do not deny it, that becauſe two atoms are two beings, they are ſeparable from one another: whence I conclude, with the utmoſt certainty, that ſince the right ſide of an atom is not the ſame being with the left ſide, it is ſeparable from the left; and therefore the indiviſibility of an atom is meerly chimerical. Whence it follows that if there be an extenſion, it's parts are diviſible in infinitum. But on the other ſide, if they cannot be diviſible in infinitum, we ought to conclude the exiſtence of extenſion impoſſible, or at leaſt incomprehenſible.

The diviſibility in infinitum is an opinion embraced by Ariſtotle, and almoſt all the profeſſors of Philoſophy, in all univerſities for ſeveral ages. Not that they underſtand it, or can anſwer the objections it is liable to; but becauſe having clearly apprehended the impoſſibility of either Mathematical or Phyſical points, they found no other courſe but this to take. Beſides, this opinion affords great conveniencies: for when their diſtinctions are exhauſted, without being able to render this doctrine comprehenſible, they ſhelter themſelves in the nature of the ſubject, and alledge, that our underſtandings being limited, none ought to be ſurprized that they cannot reſolve what relates to infinity, and that it is eſſential to ſuch a continuity to be liable to ſuch difficulties as are inſurmountable by human reaſon. Obſerve that thoſe who eſpouſe the hypotheſis of atoms, do not do it, becauſe they comprehend that an extended body may be ſimple, but becauſe they believe the two other hypotheſes to be impoſſible. We may ſay the ſame thing of thoſe who admit of Mathematical points. In general, all thoſe who argue on extenſion, are determined in their choice of an hypotheſis no otherwiſe than by the following principle: If there are but three ways of explaining a ſubject, the truth of the third neceſſarily reſults from the falſity of the other two. Whence, they do not believe themſelves miſtaken in the choice of

(55) Ariſtot. ubi ſupra.

(56) Another matter would be as proper, wood and ſtone being here uſed only for an inſtance.

(57) The ſame difficulties may be raiſed from the ſmall wheels of a coach, running over as much ground as the great ones, in the ſame number of rotations about their center. The ſame thing may be ſaid of a very ſmall wheel and a very large one fixed to one and the ſame axis.

(58) For inſtance, the two folio books above mentioned.

(59) See the Art of Thinking, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. m. 392, and the remark [D], of the following article towards the end.

(60) See among others, a book of Libertus Fromondus, Profeſſor at Louvain, intituled Labyrinthus ſeu de compoſitione continui. It is a much ſtronger book than the anſwer which James Chevreuil (in Latin Capreolus) Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Paris, made in the year 1630, to two queſtions of Cardinal de Richelieu, de demonſtratione magnitudinis in puncto, &c.

than all the reaſons which the Carteſians can alledge. I mean ſome Carteſians, who publickly of the third, when they are clearly convinced that the two others are impoſſible; and accordingly the impenetrable difficulties of the third do not ſtop them in the leaſt: they comfort themſelves with this conſideration that they may be retorted, or with a perſuaſion that after all this hypotheſis is true, becauſe the other two are not ſo. The ſubtle Arriaga having propoſed an unanſwerable objection, declares that he will not therefore change his opinion; for, ſaith he, other ſects cannot reſolve it better. ‘Video hæc adhuc urgeri argumento ſupra facto, quod à nemine vidi ſolutum, ſed nec illud ſolvere præſumo: cùm autem commune ſit omnibus ſententiis de continui compoſitione, non eſt cur propter illud aliquis à propria ſententia diſcedat (61). . . . . Quòd autem alia in ſententia Ariſtotelis difficilia valdè ſint, & quæ à nobis ſolvi non poſſint, non cogit nos hanc ſententiam deſerere: materiæ enim difficultas eſt talis, ut ubique aliqua nobis inexplicabilia occurrant. Malo autem apertè fateri me ignorare ſolutionem aliquorum argumentorum, quàm eam dare quæ forte à nemine intelligatur (62). - - - I ſee theſe objections are ſtill urged in the foregoing argument: I have met with no perſon who could ſolve them; neither do I preſume to do it. But as all opinions concerning the compoſition of continuity are liable to unanſwerable objections, a man has no reaſon, upon that account, to depart from his own opinion. . . . Tho' there are other great difficulties in this opinion of Ariſtotle, and ſuch as we cannot ſolve, yet that doth not oblige us to renounce it: for ſo many difficulties occur on that ſubject, that ſome things are inexplicable to us every where. But I would rather own that I know not how to ſolve an objection, than to give ſuch a ſolution of it, as, perhaps, no body could underſtand.’

A Zenoniſt might tell thoſe who chuſe one of theſe three hypotheſes; you do not argue right, you make uſe of this disjunctive ſyllogiſm.

Matter is compoſed either of Mathematical points, or Phyſical points, or of parts diviſible in infinitum.

But it is not compoſed of . . . nor of (63) . . .

Therefore it is compoſed of . . . . The fault of your argumentation lies not in the form, but in the matter: you ought to lay aſide your disjunctive ſyllogiſm, and make uſe of this hypothetical one.

If extenſion exiſted, it would be compoſed either of Mathematical points, or of Phyſical points, or of parts diviſible in infinitum.

But it is not compoſed either of Mathematical points, or of Phyſical points, or of parts diviſible in infinitum.

Therefore it doth not exiſt.

There is no fault in the form of this ſyllogiſm; the ſophiſm à non ſufficienti enumeratione partium is not in the major; the conſequence is therefore neceſſary, provided the minor be true. To be clearly ſatisfied of the truth of the minor, we need only conſider the arguments which thoſe three ſects alledge one againſt another, and compare them with their reſpective anſwers. When each of thoſe three ſects makes the attack, it overthrows, ſubdues, and triumphs; but when it is on the defenſive, it is utterly overthrown and confounded in it's turn. To be convinced of their weakneſs, it is enough to remember that the ſtrongeſt of them, that which beſt diſputes the ground, is the hypotheſis of the diviſibility in infinitum. The ſchool-men have armed it cap-à-pee with all the diſtinctions which their great leiſure would allow them to invent: But all this only ſerves to afford their ſcholars matter for talk upon a public diſputation, that their relations may not ſuffer the diſgrace of ſeeing them mute. A father or a brother go away better ſatisfied, when the ſcholar diſtinguiſhes betwixt a categorematical infinite, and a ſyncategorematical one, betwixt the parts communicantes, & non communicantes, proportional and aliquot, than if he had anſwered nothing. It was therefore neceſſary for the Profeſſors to invent ſome jargon; but all the pains which they have taken, will never be able to obſcure this notion which is as clear and evident as the ſun: An infinite number of parts of extenſion, each of which is extended, and diſtinct from all others, as well with reſpect to it's entity, as with reſpect to the ſpace it fills, cannot be contained in a ſpace one hundred thouſand millions of times leſs than the hundred thouſandth part of a barley corn.

Diviſibility in infinitum would hinder all manner of contiguity.

Here is another difficulty. An extended ſubſtance, if it did exiſt, muſt neceſſarily admit of an immediate contact of it's parts. According to the hypotheſis of a vacuum, ſeveral bodies would be ſeparated from all others, but ſeveral others muſt immediately touch. Ariſtotle, who denied this hypotheſis, is obliged to own that there is no part of extenſion which doth not immediately touch ſome other parts in all it's exterior points. This is incompatible with the diviſibility in infinitum; for if there be no body but what contains an infinity of parts, it is evident that each particular part of extenſion is ſeparated from all others by an infinity of parts, and that the immediate contact of two parts is impoſſible. But when a thing cannot have whatever is abſolutely neceſſary to it's exiſtence, it is certain that it's exiſtence is impoſſible: wherefore the exiſtence of extenſion neceſſarily requiring the immediate contact of it's parts, and that immediate contact being impoſſible in an extenſion diviſible in infinitum, it is evident that the exiſtence of ſuch an extenſion is impoſſible, and that this extenſion barely exiſts in the mind. What the Mathematicians acknowledge with reſpect to lines and ſuperficies, with which they demonſtrate ſo many excellent things, muſt be owned to be true with reſpect to bodies. They honeſtly own (64) that length and breadth without depth, are things which cannot exiſt any where but in our imagination. Let us ſay the ſame thing of the three dimenſions. They cannot ſubſiſt any where but in our minds; they cannot exiſt any other way than ideally. Our mind is a kind of ground, where a hundred thouſand objects of different colours, figures, and ſituation unite: for from an eminence we may ſee at once a vaſt plain covered with houſes, trees, and flocks, &c. Whilſt it is ſo far from truth, that all theſe things can poſſibly be ranged in this plain, that there are not two which can find room there; each would require an infinite ſpace, ſince it contains an infinity of extended bodies. There ſhould be infinite intervals left round each one, by reaſon that there is an infinity of bodies betwixt each part, and every other part (65). Let it not be ſaid that GOD can do every thing; for if the moſt religious Divines venture to ſay, that in a right line of twelve inches, he cannot render the firſt and third inches immediately contiguous, I may very well ſay that he cannot make two parts of extenſion immediately touch one another, when an infinity of other parts ſeparate them from one another. Let us therefore ſay that the contact of the parts of matter is only ideal; and that the extremities of ſeveral bodies no where unite but in our mind.

Diviſibility in infinitum would occaſion the penetration of dimenſions.

I ſhall now make a quite contrary objection. The penetration of dimenſions is impoſſible, and yet it would be inevitable, if extenſion ſhould exiſt; therefore the exiſtence of extenſion is impoſſible. Put a cannon bullet upon a table, a bullet, I ſay, covered over with ſome liquid colour, make it roll upon the table, and it will trace out a line by its motion: you will then have two ſtrong proofs of the immediate contact of the bullet and table. The weight of the bullet will ſhew you that it immediately touches the table; for if it did not touch it in this manner, it would remain ſuſpended in the air, and your eyes will, beſides, convince you of this contact by the track which the bullet hath left. Now I maintain that this contact is a penetration of dimenſions properly ſo called. That part of the bullet which touches the table is a determinate body, and really diſtinct from the other parts of the bullet which do not touch the table. I affirm the ſame thing of that part of the table touched by the bullet. Theſe two parts touched are each of them infinitely diviſible in length, breadth, and profundity; they muſt therefore mutually touch one another according to their profundity, and conſequently they penetrate one another. This is every day objected to the Peripatetics in their public diſputes: they defend themſelves by a jargon of diſtinctions, proper for no other uſe than preventing the diſpleaſure of a ſcholar's relations, if they ſhould ſee him ſilenced; and as for the farther uſe of theſe diſtinctions they have never ſerved to any other purpoſe than to make it appear that the objection is unanſwerable. Here is (61) Arriaga, Diſput. XVI, Phyſ. §. xi, num. 241, pag. m. 433.

(62) Id. ibid. §. xii, num. 256, pag. m. 435.

(63) For brevity ſake, I do not expreſs the rejection or the admiſſion: for according to the laws of Logic, one may proceed here from the rejection of the two parts whatſoever to the admiſſion of the third.

(64) Compare with this what is ſaid towards the end of the remark [D], in the following article.

(65) This ought to be underſtood with the clauſe diſtributive ſumpta.

publickly aſſert, even in countries where the Inquiſition prevails, that it is impoſſible to know is therefore a very ſingular thing: if extenſion exiſted, it would not be poſſible for its parts to touch one another, and it would be impoſſible that they ſhould not penetrate one another. Are not theſe moſt evident contradictions in the exiſtence of extenſion?

THE means of ſuſpenſion made uſe of againſt the exiſtence of extenſion.

Add to this, that all the ways of ſuſpenſion which deſtroy the reality of corporeal qualities, overthrows the reality of extenſion. Since the ſame bodies are ſweet to ſome men, and bitter to others, it may reaſonably be inferred that they are neither ſweet nor bitter in their own nature, and abſolutely ſpeaking. The modern Philoſophers, though they are no Sceptics, have ſo well apprehended the foundation of the epoch with relation to ſounds, odours, heat, and cold, hardneſs, and ſoftneſs, ponderoſity, and lightneſs, ſavours, and colours, &c. that they teach that all theſe qualities are perceptions of our mind, and do not exiſt in the objects of our ſenſes. Why ſhould we not ſay the ſame thing of extenſion? If a being, void of colour, yet appears to us under a colour determined as to its ſpecies, figure, and ſituation, why cannot a being, without any extenſion, be viſible to us, under an appearance of determinate extenſion, ſhaped, and ſituate in a certain manner? Obſerve alſo, that the ſame body appears to us little or great, round or ſquare, according to the place from whence we view it: and certainly, a body which ſeems to us very little, appears very great to a fly. It is not therefore by their proper, real, or abſolute extenſion that objects preſent themſelves to our mind: whence we may conclude, that in themſelves they are not extended. Would you at this day argue thus: Since certain bodies appear ſweet to one man, ſowre to another, and bitter to another, &c. I muſt affirm, that in general they are ſavoury, though I do not know the ſavour proper to them, abſolutely, and in themſelves? All the modern Philoſophers would explode you. Why then would you venture to ſay, ſince certain bodies appear great to this animal, middle ſized to that, and very little to a third, I muſt affirm, that in general they are extended, though I do not know their abſolute extenſion? Let us ſee what a celebrated Dogmatiſt acknowledges (66): 'It is clearly diſcernible by the ſenſes, that ſuch a body is larger than another; but we cannot certainly know what is the true and natural ſize of each body; to comprehend which we need only conſider, that if all mankind had never ſeen external objects any otherwiſe than through magnifying glaſſes, it is certain that they would not have formed any other idea of bodies, and all the meaſures of body, than according to the ſize in which they had appeared to them through thoſe glaſſes. But our eyes themſelves are optic glaſſes, and we do not know exactly whether they diminiſh or increaſe the objects which we ſee, and whether thoſe artificial glaſſes, which, as we believe, diminiſh or increaſe them, do not on the contrary reſtore them to their true magnitude; wherefore we do not certainly know the abſolute and natural magnitude of each body. Neither do we know whether they appear of the ſame ſize in our eyes as in thoſe of other men: for though two perſons meaſure them, and agree that a certain body, for inſtance, is but five feet; yet what the one conceives to be a foot, differs perhaps from what the other takes to be ſo; for the one conceives what his eyes report to him, as doth the other alſo; but perhaps the eyes of the one do not report the ſame thing which the eyes of the other repreſent, becauſe the optic glaſſes are differently made.' Father Mallebranche (67), and Father Lami (68), a Benedictine Monk, will give you an excellent account of all theſe particulars, which is capable of carrying my objection to a very great degree of ſtrength.

GEOMETRICAL demonſtrations alledged againſt the exiſtence of extenſion.

My laſt difficulty ſhall be grounded on the geometrical demonſtrations ſo ſubtilly diſplayed, to prove that matter is diviſible in infinitum. I maintain they ſerve for no other uſe than to make it appear, that extenſion doth not exiſt any where but in our minds. In the firſt place I obſerve, that ſome of theſe demonſtrations are employed againſt thoſe who affirm that matter is compoſed of Mathematical points. It is objected to them, that the ſides of a ſquare would be equal to the diagonal, and that amongſt concentrical circles, the leaſt would be equal to the largeſt. This conſequence is proved by making it appear that the right lines which may be drawn from one of the ſides of a ſquare to another will fill the diagonal, and that all the right lines which may be drawn from the circumference of the largeſt circle, will find room in the ſmalleſt circumference. Theſe objections are not ſtronger againſt bodies being compoſed of points, than againſt their being diviſible in infinitum; for if the parts of a certain extenſion are not more numerous in the diagonal line, than in the ſides, nor in the circumference of the largeſt circle, than in that of the ſmalleſt concentrical circle, it is clear that the ſides of the ſquare equal the diagonal, and that the ſmalleſt concentrical circle equals the greateſt. But all the right lines which can be drawn from one ſide of a ſquare to another, and from the circumference of the largeſt circle to the center, are equal to each other: they ought then to be conſidered as aliquot parts; that is, as parts of a certain magnitude, and of the ſame denomination. Now it is certain that two extenſions, whereof the aliquot parts and of the ſame denomination, as inch, foot, pace, are in equal number, do not exceed one another: it is therefore certain that the ſides of the ſquare would be as large as the diagonal line, if the diagonal line cannot be interſected by more right lines than the ſides. The ſame thing may be ſaid of two concentrical circles. In the ſecond place I affirm, that it being very true that if circles did exiſt, as many right lines might be drawn from the circumference to the center, as there are parts in the circumference, it follows that the exiſtence of a circle is impoſſible. I am perſuaded it will be allowed me that every being which cannot exiſt, without containing properties which cannot exiſt, is impoſſible: but a round extenſion cannot exiſt, without having a center, in which there meet as many right lines as there are parts in the circumference; and it is certain that ſuch a center cannot exiſt: it muſt then be owned that the exiſtence of this round extenſion is impoſſible. But that ſuch a center cannot exiſt, I ſhall clearly prove. Let us ſuppoſe a round extenſion, whoſe circumference is four feet; it then contains forty-eight inches, each of which contains twelves lines; the circumference will then contain five hundred and ſeventy-ſix lines; which is the number of the right lines that may be drawn from the circumference to the center. Let us trace a circle very near the center; it may be ſo ſmall that it will not contain above fifty lines; it cannot then give paſſage to five hundred and ſeventy-ſix right lines; therefore it will be impoſſible for theſe five hundred and ſeventy-ſix right lines begun to be drawn from the circumference of this round extenſion to reach the center: and yet if this extenſion exiſts, theſe five hundred and ſeventy-ſix lines muſt of neceſſity reach the center. What remains then to be ſaid, but only that this extenſion cannot exiſt, and that accordingly all the properties of circles and ſquares, &c. are founded on lines without breadth, which cannot exiſt otherwiſe than ideally? Obſerve, that our reaſon and our eyes are equally deceived in this caſe. Our reaſon clearly conceives; I. That the concentrical circle neareſt the center is leſs than the circle which encompaſſes it: II. That the diagonal of a ſquare is larger than the ſide. Our eyes ſee this without compaſſes, and more clearly with compaſſes; and yet the Mathematicians teach us, that as many right lines may be drawn from the circumference to the center as there are points in the circumference, and that from one ſide of a ſquare to the other as many right lines may be drawn as there are points in the ſide. And beſides, our eyes ſhew us that there is not in the circumference of the ſmall concentrical circle any one point, which is not a part of a right line, drawn from the circumference of the great circle, and that the diagonal of the ſquare contains no one point that is not a part of a right line drawn from one of the ſides of the ſquare to another. Whence then can it proceed that this diagonal is greater than the ſides?

This is what relates to the firſt proof, which I ſuppoſe Zeno might have made uſe of to refute the exiſtence of motion. It is founded on the impoſſibility of the exiſtence of extenſion. We ſhall ſee, below (69), another another

(66) Nicolle, Art de penſer, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. m. 387, 388. See alſo Rohault, Traité de Phyſique, Part. i, chap. xxvii, num. 6, pag. m. 293, where he mentions the various appearances of the ſame colours; he knew it by experience.

(67) Mallebranche, Recherche de la Vérité, livr. i, ch. vi, & ſeq.

(68) Lami, Connoiſſance de ſoi-même, Tom. ii, pag. 112, & ſeq.

(69) In the remark [I].

know that there are bodies, any otherwiſe than by faith: our ſenſes deceive us, ſay they, with reſpect to the qualities of matter, wherefore we ought to diſtruſt their evidence concerning the three dimenſions. It is not neceſſary, add they, that any bodies ſhould exiſt; for God can without that communicate to our mind whatever it feels, and whatever it another reaſon for the ſame impoſſibility. I am willing to believe that what he might have ſaid in the laſt place, by making uſe of Geometrical demonſtrations, is eaſy to be refuted by the ſame means; but I am ſtrongly convinced that the arguments taken from the Mathematics (70) to prove the diviſibility in infinitum, prove too much: for either they prove nothing, or they prove an infinity of aliquot parts.

II. Zeno's ſecond objection might have been this. Granting that there is an extenſion which is not merely ideal, but really exiſts (71), yet I ſay that it is immovable, motion is not eſſential to it, nor contained in the idea of it, and ſeveral bodies are ſometimes in a ſtate of reſt. Motion is therefore an accident. But is it diſtinct from matter? If it be diſtinct, of what muſt it be produced? Doubtleſs of nothing; and when it ceaſes to be, it will be reduced to nothing. But do not you know that nothing is made out of nothing, and that nothing returns to nothing (72): Beſides, muſt not motion neceſſarily be diffuſed on, and through, the body that is moved? The former will therefore be as much extended as the latter, and of the ſame figure; there will therefore be two equal extenſions in the ſame ſpace, and conſequently a penetration of dimenſions. But when three or four cauſes move one body, muſt not each of them produce its motion? Muſt not theſe three or four motions be penetrated together, both with the body, and amongſt themſelves? How then can each produce its effect? A veſſel moved by the winds, tide, and rowers, deſcribes a line which partakes more or leſs of theſe three actions, according as one of them is ſtronger than the others. Will you venture to affirm that inſenſible entities penetrated amongſt themſelves, and with the whole veſſel, will have ſuch a regard for one another as not to thwart themſelves? If you ſay that motion is a mode which is not diſtinct from matter, you muſt then allow that whatever produces it, creates matter; for without producing of matter, it is impoſſible to produce a being which is the ſame thing with matter. But would it not be abſurd to aſſert, that the wind which moves the veſſel, produces a veſſel? It doth not appear that theſe objections can be any otherwiſe anſwered than by ſuppoſing with the Carteſians, that God is the ſole and immediate cauſe of motion.

III. Here is another objection. It is impoſſible to affirm what motion is; for if you ſay that it is to paſs from one place to another (73); you explain one obſcurity by a greater, obſcurum per obſcurius. I immediately aſk what you mean by the word place? Do you mean a ſpace diſtinct from bodies? If ſo, you will involve your ſelf in a labyrinth from which you will never be able to get out (74). Do you mean by it the ſituation of a body, among ſome others which ſurround it? But in this caſe you will define motion in ſuch a manner, that it will a thouſand and a thouſand times ſuit with bodies that are at reſt. It is certain that hitherto the true definition of motion hath not been found. That of Ariſtotle is abſurd, and that of Des Cartes is wretched. Mr Rohault, after much pains in endeavouring to find one which might rectify that of Des Cartes, produces a deſcription which may agree with bodies, of which we conceive very diſtinctly, that they do not move at all (75); wherefore Mr Regis thought himſelf obliged to reject it (76). But that which he hath given is not capable of diſtinguiſhing motion from reſt (77). God, the only mover, according to the Carteſians, muſt do with reſpect to a houſe, the ſame thing as with reſpect to the air, which flies from it in a high wind: he muſt create the air every moment with new local relations, with reſpect to that houſe: and he muſt alſo every moment create that houſe with new local relations with reſpect to that air. And certainly according to the principles of theſe gentlemen, no body is at reſt, if an inch of matter is in motion. All then that they can ſay centers in explaining apparent motion, that is, explaining thoſe circumſtances which make us judge that one body moves, and another doth not. But all this is uſeleſs labour; every one is capable of judging of appearances. The queſtion is to explain the very nature of things which exiſt independently of our minds; and ſince in that reſpect motion is inexplicable, one had as good ſay that it doth not exiſt but in our minds.

IV. I ſhall now offer an objection very much ſtronger than the foregoing. If motion can never begin, it doth not exiſt; but it is impoſſible for it ever to begin; therefore, &c. I prove the minor thus. It is impoſſible for a body to be in two places at once: but it could never begin to move without being in an infinity of places at once; for though it advance ever ſo ſlowly, it would touch a part diviſible in infinitum, and which conſequently correſponds with infinite parts of ſpace; therefore, &c. Beſides, it is certain that an infinite number of parts doth not contain any which is firſt; and yet a body in motion can never touch the ſecond before the firſt: for motion is a being eſſentially ſucceſſive, of which two parts cannot exiſt together: wherefore motion can never begin, if matter is diviſible in infinitum, as doubtleſs it is if it exiſts. The ſame reaſon demonſtrates that a body in motion, rolling on a ſloping table, could never fall off the ſaid table; for before it falls, it muſt of neceſſity touch the laſt part of the table. And how will it touch that, ſince all thoſe parts which you will pretend to be the laſt, contain an infinity of parts, and an infinite number hath no part which can be laſt? This objection obliged ſome ſcholaſtic Philoſophers to ſuppoſe, that nature hath intermixed Mathematical points with the parts diviſible in infinitum, to the end that they may ſerve to connect them, and compoſe the extremities of bodies. They thought by that means to anſwer alſo the objection of the penetrative contact of two ſurfaces: but this evaſion is ſo abſurd, that it doth not deſerve to be refuted.

V. I ſhall not much inſiſt on the impoſſibility of circular motion, though that would ſupply me with a ſtrong objection. I ſay only in one word, that if there was a circular motion, there would be a whole diameter at reſt (78), whilſt all the remainder of the globe moved very ſwiftly. But conceive this if you can in matter. The Chevalier de Meré did not forget this objection in his letter to Mr Paſcal (79).

VI. Laſtly, I ſay that if motion exiſted, it would be equal in all bodies; there would be no Achilles's nor tortoiſes; the hound would never reach the hare. Zeno objected this (80); but it ſeems he went only upon the diviſibility of matter in infinitum; and perhaps, ſome will ſay, he would have ſet aſide that objection, if he had dealt with adverſaries who admitted either Mathematical points or atoms. I anſwer, that this objection equally ſtrikes at all the three ſyſtems: for ſuppoſe a road compoſed of indiviſible particles; place the tortoiſe in it one hundred points before Achilles, and if ſhe goes on, he will never reach her: Achilles will go but one point every moment, ſince if he went two he would be in two places at the ſame time. The tortoiſe will advance one point each moment: which is the leaſt ſhe can do, nothing being leſs than a point (81). The true reaſon of the ſwiftneſs of motion is inexplicable: the moſt happy thought on this head is, that no motion is continued, and that all thoſe bodies which ſeem to us to move, ſtop by intervals. That which moves ten times faſter than another, reſts ten times to the others hundred. But however well contrived this ſubterfuge appears, it is of no uſe; it is confuted by ſeveral ſolid reaſons which you may ſee in all the bodies of Philoſophy (82). I content my ſelf with that which is drawn from the motion of a wheel. You may make a wheel of ſo large a diameter that the part of the ſpokes the fartheſt diſtant from the center will move one hundred times ſwifter than the part fixed in the nave. And yet the ſpokes remain always ſtrait: an evident proof that the lower part doth not reſt, whilſt the upper moves. The diviſibility in infinitum of the particles of time, rejected above (83) as viſibly falſe and contradictory, is

(70) There are very fine ones in the Art of Thinking, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. 392. See alſo Rohault's Phyſics, Part. i, chap. ix.

(71) Take this for a dato non conceſſo.

(72) Zeno might have ſaid it boldly, for all the ancient Philoſophers admitted this maxim of Lucretius, Res.... non poſſe creari De nihilo, neque item genitas ad nil revocari... Lucret. lib. i, ver. 266.

(73) Migratio de loco in locum.

(74) See the remark [I].

(75) Motion, ſays he, Phyſ. Part. i, ch. x, num. 3, pag. m. 62, conſiſts in the ſucceſſive application of all the external parts of a body to the ſeveral parts of the bodies that are immediately near it.

(76) See his Phyſics, book i, Part. i, ch. i, pag. 42, of Tom. ii, at Lyons, 1691, in 12*mo.*

(77) Motion, ſays he, ibid. pag. 43, is the ſucceſſive active application of all the external parts of a body, to ſeveral parts of the bodies, which immediately touch it.

(78) To wit the axis.

(79) I ſhall ſpeak of this letter, in the remark [D], of the following article.

(80) See the third objection of the foregoing remark.

(81) As it is plain that the atoms of Epicurus are diviſible in infinitum, ſince they have the three dimenſions, and that no body can deny this as to the ſpace they fill up, I have not applied this objection to them.

(82) See Arriaga, Diſp. xvi, Phyſic. §. xi. He follows the hypotheſis of the morulæ, or interruptions of motion: he anſwers the objections very ill, and owns that of the wheel to be unanſwerable: Oviedo in his body of Philoſophy, Tom. i, pag. 357, & ſeq. ſtrives mightily to reſolve it, and believes he has found out a new ſolution of it. Gordiani nodi nova ſolutio, ſays he.

(83) In the remark [F], firſt objection.

it knows; and conſequently the proofs of the exiſtence of matter which reaſon affords us, are not evident enough to form a good demonſtration on this point [H]. As for the objections which may be grounded on the diſtinction of a Plenum and a Vacuum, and which is of no force againſt this ſixth argument. You will find ſome other very ſubtile objections in Sextus Empiricus (84).

WHAT uſe ought to be made of the foregoing diſpute.

Thus, or in a manner very like it, we may ſuppoſe our Zeno of Elea to have argued againſt motion. I will not affirm that his reaſons perſuaded him that nothing moved; he might be of another opinion, tho' he believed that none could refute them, nor elude their force. If I ſhould judge of him by my ſelf, I ſhould affirm that he as well as other men believed the motion of matter; for though I find my ſelf very incapable of ſolving all the difficulties which we have juſt now ſeen, and though the Philoſophical anſwers which may be made to them do not ſeem to me very ſolid, yet that doth not hinder me from following the common opinion. Nay, I am perſuaded that the propoſing of theſe arguments may be of great uſe with reſpect to religion: and I ſay here with regard to the difficulties of motion, what Mr Nicolle ſaid of thoſe of the diviſibility in infinitum. ‘The advantage which may be drawn from theſe ſpeculations is not meerly to acquire this ſort of knowledge, which in it ſelf is very barren; but to learn to know the limits of our underſtanding, and to force it however unwilling to own that ſome things exiſt, though it is not capable of comprehending them: for which reaſon it is proper to fatigue the intellect with theſe ſubtilties, in order to ſubdue its preſumption, and deprive it of the aſſurance of ever oppoſing its faint light to the truths which the church propoſes, under pretext that it cannot comprehend them: for ſince all the force of human underſtanding cannot comprehend the ſmalleſt atom of matter, and is obliged to own that it clearly ſees that ſuch an atom is infinitely diviſible, without being able to conceive how that can be: is it not plain that the man acts againſt reaſon, who refuſes to believe the wonderful effects of God's omnipotence, which is of it ſelf incomprehenſible, becauſe our minds cannot comprehend theſe effects (85).’

[H] The proofs of the exiſtence of matter which reaſon affords us, are not evident enough to form a good demonſtration on this point.] There are two Philoſophical axioms which teach us, one that nature does nothing in vain (86); the other, that things are done in vain by more means which might have been as commodiouſly done by fewer (87). By theſe two axioms the Carteſians, whom I am ſpeaking of, may maintain that no ſuch thing as matter exiſts; for whether it doth or doth not exiſt, GOD could equally communicate to us all the thoughts which we have. To ſay that our ſenſes aſſure us, with the utmoſt evidence, that matter exiſts, is not proving it. Our ſenſes deceive us with reſpect to all the corporeal qualities, not excepting the magnitude, figure, and motion of bodies (88), and when we believe them, we are perſuaded that out of our mind there exiſts a great number of colours, ſavours, and other beings, which we call hardneſs, fluidity, cold, heat, &c. yet it is not true that any ſuch thing exiſts out of our mind. Why then ſhould we rely on our ſenſes with reſpect to extenſion? It may very well be reduced to appearance in like manner with colours. Father Mallebranche having given all theſe reaſons to doubt of the exiſtence of bodies, concludes thus: ‘It is therefore abſolutely neceſſary, in order to be poſitively aſſured of the extraneous exiſtence of bodies, to know GOD, who makes us ſenſible of them, and to know that being infinitely perfect he cannot deceive us. For if the intelligence which gives us the ideas of all things, would, if I may ſo ſay, divert itſelf by repreſenting bodies to us as actually exiſting, tho' there were none; it is evident that this would be no very difficult thing to it (89)’ He adds, that Mr Des Cartes could find no other immovable foundation, than this reaſon, that GOD would deceive us, if there were no bodies; but he owns that this reaſon cannot paſs for demonſtration. To be fully convinced of the exiſtence of bodies, ſaith he (90), it muſt be demonſtrated to us not only that there is a God, and that God is no deceiver, but alſo that God hath aſſured us that he hath really created bodies: and this I do not find proved in Mr Des Cartes's works. God ſpeaks to the mind, and obliges it to believe only two ways, by evidence and by faith. I grant that faith obliges us to believe that there are bodies; but as for evidence, it is certain that it is not full, and that we are not invincibly induced to believe the exiſtence of any thing elſe beſides God and our own ſoul. Obſerve that when he affirms, that God doth not invincibly induce us by evidence to believe that bodies exiſt, his deſign is to teach us that the error in which we ſhould be in this reſpect, ought not to be charged on God. This is rejecting Mr Des Cartes's proof, and ſaying that God would be no deceiver, even tho' not one body ſhould exiſt in the nature of things.

Michael Angelo Fardella, a Sicilian, publiſhed a book of Logic at Venice in the year 1696, in which he aſſerts the ſame principles with Father Mallebranche; as appears by the following extract of his book. He (91) particularly labours to prove, that it is very poſſible that objects ſhould not be conform to their ideas. He ſays, he very clearly conceives that the Author of nature might ſo diſpoſe our ſenſes that they might repreſent to us thoſe objects as exiſtent, which really do not exiſt. Yet (92) when he defines the ſenſations in the ſecond part, pag. 96. he ſays, that they ariſe in the mind from the impreſſion which outward bodies make on the extremity of the nerves. When it is objected to him, that if the evidence of the ſenſes is not infallible, JESUS CHRIST impoſed on the Apoſtles, when to convince them that he had a real body, he ſaid, Palpate & videte, quia ſpiritus carnem & oſſa non habet, - - - Handle me, and ſee, for a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones; he anſwers, that the ways of arguing, which the Scripture moſt commonly makes uſe of, are rather drawn from a Logic accommodated to the capacity of the vulgar, than from a real Logic: whence he concludes, that JESUS CHRIST, in order to perſuade the Apoſtles that he was no phantom, but a real man, made uſe of that ſort of reaſoning which was beſt adapted to vulgar intellects, and by which men uſe to ſatisfy themſelves of the exiſtence of things. He adds, that GOD is not oliged to teach us infallibly that bodies exiſt, and that if we have more than a moral certainty of it, we owe it only to faith. Father Mallebranche's reaſonings are certainly very ſtrong, but I may venture to ſay, that they are much weaker than thoſe we have ſeen above (93). I ſhould be glad to know how Mr Arnauld would have refuted this, no perſon being more capable than he to find out a ſolution. By his examination of Father Mallebranche's opinion, he hath diſcovered that he underſtood the art of attacking the foundation. He hath ſtruck at the baſis of his adverſary's doctrine; for he hath ſhewn, that if there are no bodies, we are forced to admit ſome things in God which are utterly contrary to the Divine Nature, as that of being deceitful, or ſubject to other imperfections, which the light of reaſon evidently makes appear to us, cannot be in God (94). He makes uſe of eight arguments, which Father Mallebrance calls good proofs but very bad demonſtrations (95). I believe, continues he, that matter exiſts, but I believe it as well proved and ill demonſtrated. Nay, I believe it as demonſtrated, but preſuppoſing faith. He propoſes an objection which he grounds on the wicked and impious thoughts of the mind (96), and anſwers, ‘That it is certain that the body doth not immediately act upon the mind, and therefore that God alone immediately puts into the mind all the good and evil thoughts, as it is he alone who moves the arm of an aſſaſſin, or impious wretch, as well as the hand of the alms-giver, and that the only thing which God doth not do is the ſin, that is, he does not cauſe the conſent of the will. It is true, God doth not inſtil into the mind of man vain and ill thoughts any otherwiſe than conſequentially to the laws of the union of the ſoul and body, and to ſin which hath changed this union into a dependance. But how will Mr Arnauld demonſtrate, I mean really demonſtrate that he did not commit ſome ſin ten or twenty thouſand years ago; and that it is not for the puniſhment of that ſin that he is afflicted with theſe uneaſy thoughts, by which God chaſtiſes him, and deſigns to make him deſerve his recompence, by oppoſing what he calls the motions of concupiſcence? Will Mr Arnauld demonſtrate, that God who could per‘ mit

---

(84) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. hypotyp. lib. iii, cap. viii.

(85) Nicolle, Art de penſer, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. m. 394, 395. Compare what has been ſaid in the article PYRRHO, remark [C].

(86) Natura nihil fruſtra facit.

(87) Fruſtra fit per plura quod æque commode fieri poteſt per pauciora.

(88) Mallebranche, ubi infra, pag. 70. See, above, citations (66), (67).

(89) Mallebranche, Eclairciſſemens ſur le I Livre de la Recherche de la Vérité, pag. 64, Paris 1678.

(90) Id. ibid. pag. 68, 69.

(91) Journal des Sçavans, of the 30th of July 1696, pag. 551, 552, Dutch Edit.

(92) The author of the Journal is miſtaken here. He is in the wrong to pretend that Mr Fardella contradicts himſelf: It is no contradiction to ſay that there are bodies, and that it were poſſible there ſhould be none, and yet that we ſhould have the ſame ſenſations we have now. The author of the Journal might have made a better objection, which is, that ſuppoſing Chriſt accommodated himſelf to the popular Logic, it cannot be proved by the Scripture that there are bodies. How then can one be ſure by faith, that there are bodies.

(93) In the remark [G], where the firſt objection is propoſed.

(94) Arnauld, Traité des vraies & des fauſſes Idées, pag. 324.

(95) Mallebranche, Réponſe au Livre des vraies & des fauſſes Idées, pag. 321.

(96) Id. ibid. pag. 325.

which might prove very puzzling to the modern Philoſophers, I think it is very likely that he did not forget them [I]. Not being cotemporary with Diogenes the Cynic it was not his lecture that was refuted by walking. Every body admires the method which that Diogenes made uſe of to confound the arguments of the Philoſopher whom he heard ‘ mit ſin and all it's conſequences, which, by the natural laws, he hath eſtabliſhed, oblige him to put into the mind ſo many filthy thoughts and impious inclinations, could not permit that he himſelf ſhould have ſinned twenty thouſand years ago? Will he demonſtrate that God could not without the help of a body give him diſturbing thoughts; and that in conſequence of the laws of the union of the ſoul and body, which he foreſaw, and which he can follow without having formed any one body? But let him argue as much as he will, I ſhall eaſily break the chain of his demonſtrations, by telling him that God may have had deſigns which he hath not imparted to him (97).’ Mr Arnauld offers a great many things in his reply, and particularly this, that there are in Father Mallebranche's anſwer ſome extravagant propoſitions, which, ſtrictly taken, tend to the eſtabliſhment of a very dangerous Pyrrhoniſm (98). His proof may be ſeen in the following paſſage (99): ‘ I beg of him to tell me, what he meant, when he granted that this propoſition might be taken for an evident principle: God is no deceiver, and it is not poſſible that he ſhould take pleaſure in deceiving me. Doth he pretend that the evidence of this principle is abſolute, or doth he think it reſtrained by this condition, if I ſhould not have committed ſome ſin ten or twelve thouſand years ago, for the puniſhment of which God might take pleaſure in deceiving me? If he anſwers that it is abſolute, what he ſaith of the ſin I might have committed ten or twenty thouſand years ago is foreign to the purpoſe. And if he ſaith that this principle is not abſolute, but reſtrained by that condition, nothing can be eaſier than to ſhew him, that it cannot be aſſerted without overthrowing both the Divine faith, and all human ſciences. For he affirms, that not only the Divine faith, but whatever we know by ratiocination, is grounded on this principle, That God is no deceiver .... (100) But this principle, that God is not a deceiver, will be utterly uſeleſs, if he who makes uſe of it was obliged to prove that he hath not committed ſome ſin ten or twenty thouſand years ago. I will ſay no more: The conſequences of this chicanery are ſo horrible and impious, that it is even dangerous to dwell too long upon them . . . (101) Is it neceſſary that God ſhould impart all his deſigns to us, that we may be aſſured he doth not intend to deceive us? If ſo, none can be certain of it: and thus there will be no Divine faith, no human ſciences, according to the author himſelf, as I have juſt ſhewn.’

It was requiſite, for ſeveral reaſons, that I ſhould recite ſome paſſages of the diſpute of theſe two illuſtrious authors, and that, in general, I ſhould inſert in this remark what I find in that diſpute. For in the firſt place I was obliged to prove, that there are ſtronger objections than thoſe of Father Mallebranche. In effect, if it was true that the actual exiſtence of matter implies contradictions and impoſſibilities, as (102) has been ſet forth above (103), it would be abſolutely neceſſary to recur to faith in order to be convinced of the exiſtence of bodies. Mr Arnauld, who hath found other refuges, would be obliged to have recourſe to that only. In the ſecond place, the article of Zeno of Elea, required a large account of the difficulties which this Philoſopher might have propoſed againſt the hypotheſis of motion. 3. It is of uſe to know that a Father of the Oratory, as illuſtrious for his piety, as for his Philoſophical learning, has aſſerted, that nothing but faith can truly convince us of the exiſtence of bodies. Neither the Sorbonne nor any other tribunal ever gave him any trouble on this occaſion. The Inquiſitors of Italy never diſturbed Mr Fardella, who aſſerted the ſame thing in a printed book. This ought to teach my readers, that they muſt not be ſurprized when I ſometimes ſhew them, that with reſpect to the moſt myſterious evangelical ſubjects reaſon puts us to a ſtand, and that then we ought to be fully ſatisfied with the light of faith. 4. Laſtly, a great part of the things, which I have inſerted in this remark, may ſerve as a ſupplement to another place in this Dictionary (104).

[I] I think it is very likely that he did not forget the objections which may be grounded on the diſtinction of a Plenum and a Vacuum.] Meliſſus, who ſtudied under the ſame maſter with him (105), denied motion, and made uſe of this proof: If motion exiſts, there muſt of neceſſity be a vacuum (106), but there is no vacuum, therefore, &c. This ſhews that in Zeno's time there was a great Philoſopher, who did not believe motion and a plenum to be conſiſtent together. Wherefore ſince Zeno denied a vacuum (107), I cannot perſuade my ſelf that he did not make uſe of the ſame proof with Meliſſus, againſt thoſe who admitted motion. He made it his buſineſs to oppoſe them, and uſed ſeveral arguments for that purpoſe. Would he have forgot the argument which the aſſerters of a vacuum have ſo often employed? He might have turned it otherwiſe than they, but not leſs ſpeciouſly. If there was no vacuum, ſaid they, there would be no motion; but motion exiſts, therefore there is a vacuum. He would have argued on the contrary foot, agreeing with them in this principle, that motion cannot exiſt in a full ſpace; for, from this poſition, common to them and himſelf, he might have drawn a conſequence diametrically oppoſite to theirs. His ſyllogiſm ought to have run thus: if there was any motion, there would be a vacuum; but there is no vacuum, therefore there is no motion. Obſerve, that when I ſay his manner of arguing would not have been leſs ſpecious than theirs; I mean this only with reſpect to Philoſophers very capable of comprehending the reaſons againſt a vacuum; for I know very well that to the vulgar it is almoſt as ſtrange a paradox to deny a vacuum, as to deny motion. Anaxagoras found the vulgar ſo poſſeſſed with the exiſtence of a vacuum, that he had recourſe to ſome trivial experiments to deſtroy this falſe prejudice. Ariſtotle (108) in the chapter where he mentions this, alledges ſome of the arguments which were made uſe of to prove a vacuum. They are not of any force, and he refutes them pretty well in the following chapter. Gaſſendus hath given all poſſible force to the experiments and arguments which favour the hypotheſis of Epicurus concerning a vacuum (109); but he hath ſaid nothing really convincing, and the weakneſs of it is fully expoſed in the Art of Thinking (110), However, I believe our Zeno rendered himſelf formidable on this topic: ſuch a ſubtile and vehement Logician as he, could very dexterouſly perplex this ſubject, and it is not probable that he neglected it.

But if he had known what ſeveral excellent Mathematicians (111) ſay in this age, he might have made vaſt ravages, and given himſelf airs of triumph. They aſſert that a vacuum is abſolutely neceſſary, and that without it the motion of the planets, and the conſequences thereof are things inexplicable and impoſſible. I have heard a great Mathematician (who hath reaped great advantages from the works and converſation of Sir Iſaac Newton) ſay, that it is no longer a problem whether motion be poſſible, ſuppoſing a plenum; that the falſity and impoſſibility of that propoſition hath been not only proved, but Mathematically demonſtrated, and that henceforth to deny a vacuum will be to deny a point ſupported by the utmoſt evidence. He maintained that vacuity takes up incomparably more room than matter in the moſt ponderous bodies; and ſo that in the air, for inſtance, there are not more corpuſcles than there are great cities on the earth. Thus we are doubtleſs highly obliged to the Mathematics: they demonſtrate the exiſtence of what is contrary to the moſt evident notions of our intellect; for if there be any nature with whoſe eſſential properties we are clearly acquainted, it is extenſion: we have a clear and diſtinct idea of it, which informs us that the eſſence of extenſion conſiſts in the three dimenſions, and that its inſeparable attributes and properties are diviſibility, mobility, and impenetrability. If theſe ideas are falſe, deceitful, chimerical, and illuſory, is there a notion in our mind which we ought not to take for a vain phantom, or matter of diſtruſt? Can the demonſtrations which prove a vacuum remove our diſtruſt? Are they more evident than the idea which ſhews us that a foot

ARGUMENTS againſt a Vacuum.

---

(97) Id. ibid.

(98) Arnauld, Défenſe contre la Réponſe au Livre des vraies & des fauſſes Idées, pag. 577, 578.

(99) Id. ibid. pag. 590, 591.

(100) Id. ibid. pag. 592.

(101) Id. ibid.

(102) That is, if according to the light of reaſon, it ſhould ſeem to imply ſome contradictions and impoſſibilities.

(103) In the firſt objection of the remark [G].

(104) To remark [B], of the article PYRRHO.

(105) That is, under Parmenides. See Diogenes Laërtius, lib. ix, num. 24, 25.

(106) Ariſtotel. Phyſ. lib. iv, cap. vii, Textu lxi.

(107) Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 29.

(108) Ariſtotel. ubi ſupra, Textu li.

(109) Gaſſend. Phyſ. §. i, lib. ii, cap. iii, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 192, & ſeq.

(110) Art. de penſer, Part. iii, ch. xviii, num. 4. pag. m. 329, & ſeq.

(111) Mr Huygens, Sir Iſaac Newton, &c.

heard endeavouring to prove that there was no motion. He walked about in the auditory, thinking that was ſufficient to ſhew the falſity of all the Profeſſor had been ſaying;

a foot of extenſion may change its place, and cannot be in the ſame place with another foot of extenſion? Let us ſearch as much as we pleaſe into all the receſſes of our mind, we ſhall never find there any idea of an unmovable, indiviſible, and penetrable extenſion. And yet if there is a vacuum, there muſt exiſt an extenſion, eſſentially endued with theſe three attributes. It is no ſmall difficulty, to be forced to admit the exiſtence of a nature of which we have no idea, and is beſides repugnant to the cleareſt ideas of our mind. But there are a great many other inconveniencies which attend this. Is this vacuum, or immovable, indiviſible, and penetrable extenſion, a ſubſtance, or a mode? It muſt be one of the two, for the adequate diviſion of being, comprehends but theſe two members. If it be a mode, they muſt then define its ſubſtance: but that is what they can never do. If it be a ſubſtance, I aſk whether it be created or uncreated? If created, it may periſh, while the matter, from which it is really diſtinct, may not ceaſe to be. But it is abſurd, and contradictory, that a vacuum, or a ſpace diſtinct from bodies, ſhould be deſtroyed, and yet that bodies ſhould be diſtant from each other, as they may be after the deſtruction of the vacuum. If this ſpace diſtinct from bodies is an uncreated ſubſtance, it will follow either that it is God, or that God is not the only ſubſtance which neceſſarily exiſts. Which part ſoever you take of this alternative, you ſhall find your ſelf confounded: the laſt is a formal, and the other at leaſt a material impiety; for all extenſion is compoſed of diſtinct parts, and conſequently ſeparable from each other; whence it reſults, that if God was extended, he would not be a ſimple, immutable, and properly infinite, Being, but a collection of beings, ens per aggregationem, each of which would be finite, though all of them together would be unlimited. He would be like the material world, which, in the Carteſian hypotheſis, is an infinite extenſion. And as to thoſe who ſhould pretend that God may be extended without being material or corporeal, and alledge, as an argument, his ſimplicity, you will find them ſolidly refuted in one of Mr Arnauld's books, I ſhall cite only theſe words from it: 'So far is the ſimplicity of 'God from allowing us room to think that he may 'be extended, that all Divines have acknowledged 'after St Thomas, that it is a neceſſary conſequence of 'the ſimplicity of God not to be capable of being ex'tended (112).' Will they ſay with the ſchoolmen, that ſpace is, at moſt, no more than a privation of body; that it hath no reality, and that, properly ſpeaking, a vacuum is nothing: but this is ſuch an unreaſonable aſſertion, that all the modern Philoſophers who declare for a vacuum, have laid it aſide, however convenient it was in other reſpects. Gaſſendus carefully avoided having recourſe to ſuch an abſurd hypotheſis (113); but choſe rather to plunge himſelf into the moſt hideous abyſs of conjecturing, that all beings are not either ſubſtances or accidents, and that all ſubſtances are not either ſpirits or bodies; and of placing the extenſion of ſpace amongſt the beings which are neither corporeal nor ſpiritual, neither ſubſtances nor accidents. Mr Locke, believing that he could not define what a vacuum is, hath yet given us clearly to underſtand that he took it for a poſitive being (114). He was too knowing not to diſcern that nothingneſs cannot be extended in length, breadth, and depth. Mr Hartſoeker hath very well apprehended this truth. There is no vacuum in nature, ſaith he (115), this ought to be admitted without any difficulty, becauſe it is utterly contradictory to conceive a meer nothingneſs, with all the properties which can only agree to a real Being. But if it is contradictory that nothingneſs ſhould be endued with extenſion, or any other quality (116), it is not leſs contradictory, that extenſion ſhould be a ſimple being, ſince it contains ſome things, of which we may truly deny what we may truly affirm of ſome others which it includes. The ſpace filled up by the ſun is not the ſame ſpace taken up by the moon; for if the ſun and the moon filled the ſame ſpace, thoſe two luminaries would be in the ſame place, and penetrated with one another, ſince two things cannot be penetrated with a third, without being penetrated among themſelves (117). It is moſt evident that the ſun and moon are not in the ſame place. It may then be truly ſaid of the ſpace of the ſun, that it is penetrated with the ſun, and it may as truly be denied of the ſpace penetrated with the moon: here are then two portions of ſpace really diſtinct from one another, ſince they receive two contradictory denominations, of being penetrated, and not being penetrated with the ſun. This fully confutes thoſe who venture to aſſert, that ſpace is nothing but the immenſity of God; and it is certain that the divine immenſity could not be the place of bodies, without giving room to conclude that it is compoſed of as many parts really diſtinct, as there are bodies in the world. It will be in vain for you to alledge that infinity hath no parts, this muſt neceſſarily be falſe in all infinite numbers, ſince a number eſſentially includes ſeveral unities: nor will you have more reaſon to tell us, that incorporeal extenſion is wholly contained in its ſpace, and alſo wholly contained in each part of its ſpace (118); for not only we have no idea of it, and it thwarts all our ideas of extenſion, but beſides it will prove that all bodies take up the ſame place, ſince each could not take up its own, if the Divine extenſion was entirely penetrated with each body, numerically the ſame with the ſun, and with the earth. You will find in Mr Arnauld a ſolid refutation of thoſe who ſay that God is diffuſed throughout infinite ſpaces (119).

By this ſpecimen of the difficulties which may be raiſed againſt a vacuum, my readers may eaſily apprehend, that our Zeno would, at this preſent time, be much more formidable than he was in his own age. It is no longer to be doubted, would he ſay, that if all is full, motion is impoſſible. This impoſſibility hath been Mathematically proved. He would be far from diſputing againſt thoſe demonſtrations, but admit them as inconteſtable; he would ſolely apply himſelf to prove the impoſſibility of a vacuum, and would reduce his adverſaries to an abſurdity. He would confute them on whatſoever ſide they turned; he would plunge them into perplexities by his dilemmas; he would make them loſe ground wherever they retired; and if he did not ſilence them, he would at leaſt force them to confeſs, that they neither underſtand nor comprehend what they ſay. If any one aſk me (they are Mr Locke's words) (123), what this ſpace, I ſpeak of, is? I will tell him when he tells me what his extenſion is. . . . . They aſk whether this ſpace be body or ſpirit? To which I anſwer by another queſtion, Who told you that there can be only bodies and minds. If it be aſked, (as uſually it is) Whether this ſpace, void of body, be ſubſtance or accident, I ſhall readily anſwer, I know not: nor ſhall I be aſhamed to own my ignorance, till they, who aſk that queſtion, ſhew me a clear, diſtinct idea of ſubſtance (121). Since ſuch a great Metaphyſician as Mr Locke, after having ſo well ſtudied this ſubject, is not able to anſwer the queſtions of the Carteſians, otherwiſe than by aſking other queſtions which he thinks yet more obſcure and perplexed than theirs, we may judge that the objections which Zeno might propoſe, could not be anſwered; and we may certainly conjecture that he would ſpeak thus to his adverſaries: You ſhelter your ſelves in the hypotheſis of a vacuum when you are driven from that of motion and a plenum; but you cannot hold out in this hypotheſis, the impoſſibility of it is demonſtrated. Learn ſome better way to come off by: for by that which you have already choſen you avoid one precipice, and throw your ſelves into another. Follow me, I will ſhew you a better way: do not conclude, from the impoſſibility of motion in a plenum, that there is a vacuum, but rather conclude, from the impoſſibility of a vacuum, that there is no motion, I mean real motion, but at moſt an appearance of motion, or an ideal and intellectual motion. The Antients were ſo perplexed in their diſputes about a vacuum, that ſome maintained that a vacuum and place were the matter of bodies. Φασὶ τινες εἶναι τὸ κενὸν τὴν τῶν σωμάτων ὕλην, οἵπερ καὶ τόπον τὸ ἀυτὸ τοῦτο λέγοντες, quidam vacuum eſſe corporum materiam dicunt, qui quidem & locum hoc idem aſſerunt eſſe (122).

From what has been ſaid, let us deduce a few corollaries.

I. The firſt is, That Zeno's diſpute could not be wholly uſeleſs: for if he miſſed his main deſign, which ſaying; but it is certain that an anſwer of that nature is more ſophiſtical than our Zeno's arguments [K]. I do not believe, what ſome affirm of him (d), that he taught that matter is compoſed of Mathematical points: I ſhould rather think he aſſerted that it could not be compoſed of them (e). I muſt not forget that he was leſs firm and reſolute in ſuffering detraction, than in ſuffering the tortures exerciſed on his body. He was very

---

(112) Arnauld, Défenſe contre la Réponſe au Livre des vraies & des fauſſes Idées, pag. 360.

(113) Gaſſend. ubi ſupra, cap. i, pag. 182.

(114) Lock's Eſſay concerning human underſtanding, book ii, ch. xiii, pag. m. 188, 189.

(115) Hartſoeker, Principes de Phyſique, pag. 4.

(116) Non entis nulla ſunt accidentia, is a notion as evident as any other.

(117) Quæ penetrantur cum uno tertio penetrantur inter ſe.

(118) Tota in toto & tota in ſingulis partibus. This is what the ſchool-men ſay of the preſence of the ſoul in the human body, and of the preſence of Angels in certain places.

(119) Arnauld, Letters viii, ix, to Father Malebranche. See particularly pag. 171, & ſeq. & pag. 210, & ſeq. See alſo a book of Peter Petit, a Phyſician of Paris, intituled de extenſione animæ & rerum incorporearum natura, and Mr de la Chambre's anſwer to it, which he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1666, in 4to, with this title, Defenſe de l'extenſion & des parties libres de l'ame. All the reaſons he alledges to ſhew that extenſion and ſpirituality may exiſt together, are ſo weak, that they only ſerve to ſhew the falſity of his aſſertion.

(120) Locke, ubi ſupra, pag. 188.

(121) Id. ibid. pag. 189.

(122) Ariſtot. Phyſ. lib. iv, cap. vii.

(d) See below, citation (135).

(e) See Ariſtotel. Metaphyſ. lib. iii, cap. iv.

which was to prove that there is no motion, he would, however, have the advantage of ſtrengthening his hypotheſis of the acatalepſia, or incomprehenſibility of all things. The demonſtrations of our modern Mathematicians, to prove a vacuum, have convinced them that motion in a plenum is not comprehenſible. They have therefore admitted the ſuppoſition of a vacuum, not becauſe they did not find it ſurrounded with ſeveral inconceivable and inexplicable difficulties; but being obliged to chuſe one out of two incomprehenſible ſyſtems, they preferred that which leaſt ſhocked them. They choſe rather to ſatisfy themſelves on the Mechanical, than the Metaphyſical part, and even ſlighted the Phyſical difficulties which annoyed them; this, for inſtance, it is not poſſible to give a reaſon for the reſiſtance of air and water, if there be but ſuch a ſmall quantity of matter, and ſo much vacuity in thoſe two parts of the world. Other Mathematicians (123) deny a vacuum ſtill, not but that they are ſenſible of the difficulties which obliged others to admit it; but they are more ſenſibly touched with the diſmal perplexities they find in that ſuppoſition; they do not think it reaſonable, on account of thoſe difficulties, to renounce the cleareſt ideas which we have of the nature of extenſion. Obſerve, that ſome Philoſophers of the firſt rank (124), do not believe that we know either what extenſion or ſubſtance is; they cannot talk otherwiſe as long as they believe a vacuum. This affords no ſmall occaſion of triumph to Zeno and all other Acataleptics: for while it is diſputed whether we know, or are ignorant of the nature of ſubſtance and matter, it is a ſign that we comprehend nothing, and that we can never be ſure that we hit the mark, or that the objects of our mind reſemble the ideas we have of them.

(123) Mr Leibniz, and Mr de Volder, a famous Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Mathematics in the univerſity of Leyden.

(124) See, above, in citat. (120), Mr Locke's words.

The ſyſtem of Spinoza is incompatible with a vacuum.

II. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that the hypotheſis of a vacuum is the moſt proper in the world to overthrow Spinoza's ſyſtem. For if there are two different extenſions, the one ſimple, indiviſible, and penetrable, the other compounded, diviſible, and impenetrable; there muſt be more than one ſubſtance in the univerſe. This is the more eaſy to be inferred, by reaſon that the impenetrable ſubſtance would not be a perfect continuity, but a collection of corpuſcles entirely ſeparated from each other, and ſurrounded by a large incorporeal ſpace. The Spinoziſts would not deny that each of theſe corpuſcles is a particular ſubſtance diſtinct from that of all others. And thus by their own axioms, they muſt renounce their ſyſtem, if they own that there is a vacuum.

A new proof againſt the real exiſtence of extenſion.

III. The laſt conſequence which I would draw, is that the diſputes concerning a vacuum, have afforded a plauſible reaſon to deny the real exiſtence of any other than an ideal extenſion. They have perceived, in arguing againſt the Carteſians, who deny the poſſibility of a vacuum, that extenſion is a being which cannot be limited. It muſt then follow that there is no ſuch thing as body in nature, or that there is an infinity of bodies. One of them cannot be deſtroyed without annihilating all the reſt, nor can the ſmalleſt be preſerved without preſerving them all. Yet we know, by evident ideas, that when two things are really diſtinct, one of them may be preſerved or deſtroyed without the preſervation or deſtruction of the other; for as whatever is really diſtinct from a thing is accidental to it, and as each thing is capable of being preſerved without that which is accidental to it, it follows that the body A, really diſtinct from the body B, may continue in being, without the body B ſubſiſting, and that the preſervation of the body A, doth not at all infer the preſervation of the body B. Συμβεβηκός ἐστιν ὃ γίνεται καὶ ἀπογίνεται χωρὶς τῆς τοῦ ὑποκειμένου φθορᾶς. Accidens eſt quod adeſt atque abeſt ſine ſubjecti interitu (125). If this be true of accidents, which are the modes of a ſubſtance, as Porphyrius underſtands it here, it is truer ſtill of an accidental ſubſtance with reſpect to others, as it is diſtinct from their eſſential attributes. Take notice that the ſchool-men raiſe a great difficulty here on pretence that blackneſs cannot be ſeparated from an Ethiopian. Wherefore they recur to the diſtinction between a mental and a real ſeparation. This is a meer illuſion; for the ſubject of the blackneſs of an Ethiopian is matter, which would not be deſtroyed, if the body of that man was calcined. This conſequence which appears ſo clear and conſiſtent with evident notions, cannot however agree with the ſubject of which we ſpeak; and you cannot ſuppoſe, that all the bodies included in a chamber ſhould periſh, and the four walls be preſerved; for in this caſe there will remain the ſame diſtance betwixt them as before; but this diſtance, ſay the Carteſians, is nothing but a body. Their doctrine then ſeems to infringe the ſovereign liberty of the Creator, and his due unlimited power over all his works. He ought to enjoy a full right of creating few or many, according to his good pleaſure, and of preſerving or deſtroying this or that, as it ſeems good to him. The Carteſians may anſwer, that he may deſtroy each body in particular, provided he make another of the ſame magnitude; but is not this ſetting bounds to his liberty? Is not this impoſing on him a ſort of ſlavery, which neceſſarily obliges him to create a new body every time that he pleaſeth to deſtroy another? Theſe are difficulties which cannot be anſwered on the ſuppoſition that extenſion and body are the ſame thing; but they may all be retorted againſt thoſe who propoſe them to Des Cartes, if at the ſame time they acknowledge a ſpacial extenſion really exiſtent and diſtinct from matter. This extenſion cannot be finite, one part cannot be deſtroyed without the production of another, &c. But if the nature of penetrable or impenetrable extenſion draws along with it ſuch a large train of incoveniencies, the ſhorteſt way is to aſſert that it hath no other exiſtence than in our mind.

(125) Porphyr. Iſag. cap. v.

[K] An anſwer like that of Diogenes is more ſophiſtical than our Zeno's arguments.] Πρὸς τὸν εἰπόντα ὅτι κίνησις οὐκ ἔστιν ἀναστὰς περιεπάτει. Dicente ſibi quodam non eſſe motum, exurgens ambulabat (126). --- When a certain perſon told him that there was no motion, he aroſe and walked. This is all we find on this head in Diogenes Laërtius. You ſee he relates the fact with great ſimplicity: but the Moderns have a little amplified it. 'Vulgo etiam fertur Diogenes, 'cum negari à Zenone motum localem audiſſet, illico 'ſurrexiſſe, & itu redituque aliquoties magnâ feſtina'tione replicata inambulaſſe, & rogatus, quis eum 'ſubitò enthuſiaſmus perculiſſet, reſpondiſſe: Zenonem 'refello (127.) -- It is alſo commonly reported that Diogenes, 'hearing Zeno deny local motion, immediately ſtarted up, 'and walked up and down ſeveral times with great 'ſpeed; and being aſked what ſudden enthuſiaſm had 'ſeized him, he replied, I am refuting Zeno.' They have named the Philoſopher who denied motion, they have embelliſhed the circumſtances of the practical anſwer, they have made it a ſubject of declamations for young Rhetoricians. I am ſurprized that Sextus Empiricus ſhould not vouchſafe to name the perſon, who thus refuted the objections againſt the exiſtence of motion. What he ſaith more particular is, that a Cynic made uſe of this way of refuting thoſe objections: Ταῦτά τοι καὶ ἐρωτηθεὶς Φιλόσοφος, τὸν κατὰ τῆς κινήσεως λόγον, σιωπῶν περιεπάτησεν. Ideoque cùm propoſita eſſet Philoſopho oratio motum negans, tacitus ambulare cœpit (128). --- This Philoſopher hearing a diſcourſe againſt motion, made no anſwer, but walked about. In another place he expreſſes himſelf thus: Διὸ καὶ τῶν Κυνικῶν τις ἐρωτηθεὶς κατὰ τῆς κινήσεως λόγον, οὐδὲν ἀπεκρίνατο, ἀνέστη δὲ καὶ ἐβάδισεν. ἔργῳ καὶ διὰ τῆς ἐνεργείας παραστάς, ὅτι ὑπαρκτή ἐστιν ἡ κίνησις. Ideoque quidem ex Cynicis, cùm ei propoſita eſſet contra motum oratio, nihil reſpondit; ſed ſurgens ambulare cœpit, opere & actu oſtendens exiſtere motum (129). --- One of the Cynics, hearing a diſcourſe againſt motion, made no anſwer; but aroſe, and began to walk; ſhewing, by experience, and in fact, that there is motion. It is better not to name the perſon, than to affirm that Diogenes, the

(126) Diog. Laërt. lib. vi, num. 39.

(127) Libertus Fromondus, de compoſitione continui, pag. 6.

(128) Sextus Empiricus Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. ii, cap. xxii, pag. 104.

(129 Id. ibid. lib. iii, cap. viii, pag. 124.

very angry with a man who abuſed him; and when the world was ſurprized at his indignation, the Cynic, and Zeno of Elea were the actors. This chronological error is inexcuſable (130): the Jeſuits of Coimbria have aſcribed it to Simplicius without refuting it. And, in this particular, they fell in with the vulgar error. ‘ Certè, ſay they (131), hæc Zeno‘ nis tam abſurda opinio nullo melius quàm experien‘ tiæ ipſius argumento refellitur. Quod Diogenes Cy‘ nicus fecit, ut refert Simplicius hoc in libro commen‘ to 53. & lib. 8. comment. 25. Nam cùm Zenonis ‘ rationes aliquando audiſſet, ſurrexit, nec aliter quàm ‘ coram ambulando reſpondit. - - - Certainly this abſurd ‘ opinion of Zeno could not be refuted by a better argument, ‘ than that of experience itſelf. This was done by Diogenes ‘ the Cynic, as Sulpitius relates. For having once heard ‘ Zeno arguing againſt motion, he aroſe, and made him no ‘ other anſwer, but by walking before him.’ They have avoided the other vulgar error; they do not believe that Zeno, who denied motion, and whoſe arguments Ariſtotle examined, was the founder of the Stoics; they have expreſsly named him Zeno of Elea (132). The paſſage which follows is full of faults: ‘ Continuum ex partibus indiviſibilibus conſtare contra ‘ Ariſtotelem conſtanter defendebat Zeno Stoicorum ‘ Princeps, quem ducem ſunt ſequuti ex Philoſophis De‘ mocritus, & Leucippus. Ex Theologis Antiquis May. ‘ in 2. diſt. 2. quæſt. 5. Gerardus apud Tantaletum hoc ‘ lib. quæſt. 1. & Ægidius diſcipulus D. Thom. lib. 1. ‘ de generat. quæſt. 8. citatus à Veracrux 6. Phyſic. ‘ ſpeculat. 1. (133). - - Zeno, the chief of the Stoic Philo‘ ſophers, conſtantly maintained againſt Ariſtotle, that ‘ matter was made up of indiviſible parts. In this opi‘ nion he was followed by the Philoſophers Democritus ‘ and Leucippus, and by the antient Divines, Mayx, ‘ Gerardus, and Ægidius the diſciple of St Thomas.’ There is no room to doubt that the author in this paſſage deſigned to ſpeak of the ſame Zeno, whom Ariſtotle refuted in the ninth chapter of the ſixth book of his Phyſics. But it doth not appear that Zeno of Elea taught that matter was compoſed of indiviſible parts. He contented himſelf with taking advantage of the contrary doctrine, to ſhew the impoſſibility of motion. Nay, he aſſerted, that an indiviſible body did not differ from nothingneſs (134); and I ſhall make it appear below, that he did not admit of any compoſition in the univerſe. Notwithſtanding, he is looked upon as the author of the ſect which maintained, that matter is compoſed of Mathematical points (135). It would be more reaſonable to aſcribe this opinion to Pythagoras and Plato, as Derodon hath done, relying, with regard to Pythagoras, on the teſtimony of Sextus Empiricus, and, with relation to Plato, on that of Ariſtotle (136). But what a blunder is it to make the founder of the Stoics to be the guide of Democritus and Leucippus! Leucippus preceded Democritus, and both of them preceded the head of the Stoics by ſeveral Olympiads. Beſides, their atoms formed a ſyſtem very different from that which is attributed to the Zenoniſts about the compoſition of matter.

However it be, the anſwer of Diogenes the Cynic to the Philoſopher who denied motion, is the ſophiſm which the Logicians call ignoratio Elenchi. Diogenes ſwerved from the ſtate of the queſtion; for the Philoſopher did not deny apparent motion; he did not deny that it appeared to men that there is ſuch a thing as motion; but he aſſerted that nothing did really move, and proved it by very ſubtile and perplexing reaſons. See what Sextus Empiricus ſays of the Sceptics: Ὅσον μὲν γὰρ ἐπὶ τοῖς Φαινομένοις δοκεῖν εἶναι κίνησιν, ὅσον δὲ ἐπὶ τῷ Φιλσόφῳ λόγῳ μὴ ὑπάρχειν. Quantum ad apparentia quidem videri eſſe motum, ſed quatenus quis Philoſophicam rationem ſequatur non eſſe (137). - - - In appearance there is motion, but, according to Philoſophy, there is none. What does it then make againſt this aſſertion, to walk, or cut a caper? Is it proving any thing beſides the appearance of motion? and was that the ſubject in diſpute? Did the Philoſopher deny that appearance? Not in the leaſt; he was not fool enough to deny ocular Phænomena, but he aſſerted that the evidence of the ſenſes ought to be ſacrificed to ratiocination. Conſult Ariſtotle; he will inform you that ſeveral antient Philoſophers, who having found reaſons for abſolutely denying the plurality of parts, the diviſibility, and mobility of the world, afterwards made no account of the teſtimony of the ſenſes. Ἐκ μὲν οὖν τούτων τῶν λόγων, ὑπερβάντες τὴν αἴσθησιν καὶ παριδόντες αὐτὴν, ὡς τῷ λόγῳ δέον ἀκολουθεῖν, εἶναι φασι τὸ πᾶν ἓν, καὶ ἀκίνητον, καὶ ἄπειρον ἔνιοι. Ob haſce igitur rationes nonnulli ſenſum prætereuntes, deſpicienteſque quaſi rationem ſequi ducem oporteat, univerſum ipſum, unum & immobile & infinitum eſſe aſſerunt (138) Parmenides and Meliſſus are the antient Philoſophers of whom he ſpeaks. It muſt be believed that Zeno of Elea retained the ſubſtance of the doctrine of Parmenides, his maſter. Plutarch having ſaid, that Parmenides admitted the eternity and immutability of all things, adds, that Zeno of Elea did not particularize any thing, but ſeemed to float in uncertainty. Ἴδιον μὲν οὐδὲν ἐξέθετο, διηπόρησε δὲ περὶ τούτων ἐπὶ πλεῖον. Nihil hoc in genere ſingulare vulgavit, ſed ancipiti fere dubitationis æſtu fluctuavit (139). But others declare (140), that with Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Meliſſus, he taught the unity and incorruptibility of all things, and the imperfection of the evidence of the ſenſes. He was not humble enough to continue in his maſter's principles without any alteration: we ſee his innovations in a book (141) aſcribed to Ariſtotle. They do not hinder his believing that there was no generation: ſo that by a neceſſary conſequence of his principles, he was obliged to deny the motion, diviſibility, compoſition of matter, &c. We have already ſeen in the article XENOPHANES, at the laſt paragraph of the remark [B], that the author of the Art of Thinking, hath cenſured Ariſtotle, in favour of Parmenides and Meliſſus. And attempts have long ſince been made to give their opinion a favourable ſenſe, and a great air of conformity to the principle of the orthodox, concerning the nature of GOD. But, in all appearance, Ariſtotle doth not deſerve cenſure here; for he very well apprehended, and exactly related what they taught, and conſequently we muſt believe their ſyſtem to be a ſort of Spinoziſm. There is no room for imagining (142) that they expreſſed themſelves by riddles or emblems; for the particular doctrine of the unity and immutability of all things was a conſequence of ſeveral clear and evident principles. See above the article XENOPHANES, towards the beginning of remark [L]. So that it was in good earneſt, and as a ſyſtematical doctrine, and not as a witty conceit, that they denied motion, and aſſerted that it's exiſtence was barely mental. Here follow the names of ſome apologiſts for thoſe Philoſophers (143): ‘ Si prædicti Philoſophi ſuum ‘ illud dogma ad hujus tam reconditæ veritatis intelli‘ gentiam retulere (144), non modo reprehendendi ‘ non ſunt, ſed magnopere etiam commendandi. Certe ‘ Parmenidem defendit, atque interpretatur Simplicius, ‘ hoc in libro ad textum 6. Beſſario, 2. Libro con‘ tra Calumniatorem Platonis, capite 3. & Nicolaus ‘ Cuſa, in lib. de filiatione Dei. Lege etiam pro ‘ eadem re Eugubinum, lib. 3. de perenni Philoſo‘ phia cap. 6. & 7. & F. Mirandulam lib. 6. de ‘ examine vanitatis, cap. 1. - - - If the above-mentioned ‘ Philoſophers, in that opinion of theirs, had regard to ‘ this hidden truth, (viz. That all things are contained in ‘ the Divine goodneſs in an unmeaſurable degree, and ſolely, ‘ as every number is uniformly contained in the unity, and ‘ as all lines joining together in one center from which ‘ they proceeded, are contained in that point) they are not ‘ only not to be cenſured, but they deſerve highly to be ‘ praiſed. Certainly Simplicius, in that book, defends and ‘ explains the opinion of Parmenides; Beſſario, in his ‘ ſecond book againſt the calumniator of Plato, and Nicolas ‘ Cuſa, in his book on the Filiation of GOD, do the ſame ‘ thing. Read alſo on this ſubject Eugubinus's eternal ‘ Philoſophy, and Mirandula's examination of Vanity.’

The reſult of all this is, that Diogenes's anſwer was ſophiſtical, tho' it was proper to gain the applauſe of the company; it was a ſcoffing anſwer, but I believe alſo that the Philoſopher whom it concerned did only deſpiſe it. Perhaps he heartily laughed at it; being a thouſand times happier than the ſophiſt Diodorus, who was not in a laughing humour, when his lectures againſt the exiſtence of motion, were attacked by a malicious irony. Having put his ſhoulder out of joint, he applied to Herophilus, the Phyſician, to have it ſet: How, ſaid the doctor? Your ſhoulder diſlocated! that cannot be; for it is neither removed out of the place where it was, nor where

(130) Diogenes the Cynic lived a long time after Zeno of Elea.

(131) Conimbricenſes in Phyſ. Ariſtot. lib. vi, cap. ii, pag. m. 218.

(132) Ibid. in cap. viii, pag. 145.

(133) Franciſcus de Oviedo, Phyſic. Controverſ. xvii, pag. 334, col. 1.

(134) Ariſt. Metaph. lib. iii, cap. iv.

(135) Arriaga, and many other Spaniſh ſchoolmen, call thoſe men Zenoniſts who hold that matter is compoſed of indiviſible and unextended parts. A very different opinion from that of the Atomiſts.

(136) Derodon, Diſput. de Atomis, pag. 4, 5. He quotes Sextus Empiricus, lib. ix, adv. Mathem. & Ariſtot. lib. i, de Generat. Text. vii.

(137) Sext. Empir. Pyrrh. Hypotyp. lib. iii, cap. viii, pag. 104.

(138) Ariſtotel. de Generat. & Corrupt. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. m. 395.

(139) Plut. in Stromatis, apud Euſebium Præpar. Evang. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 23.

(140) Ariſtocles, de Philoſophia, lib. viii, apud Euſebium, ibid. lib. xiv, cap. xvii, pag. 755.

(141) Intituled, de Xenophane, Zenone, & Gorgia.

(142) Yet this is what the Jeſuits of Coimbra do, in Phyſ. Ariſtot. lib. i, cap. vii, pag. m. 92.

(143) Conimbricenſes, ibid. See the ſame alſo, in lib. i, de Generat. cap. viii.

(144) That is to ſay, that In divina bonitate ſunt omnia immenſurate & unice, ſicut in monade omnis numerus uniformiter eſt, & in centro omnes lineæ ad ſe ipſæ & ad unum initium, à quo proceſſere, conjunctæ & copulatæ continentur.

indignation, he anſwered if I was inſenſible of calumny, I ſhould be likewiſe inſenſible of praiſe (f). This anſwer is unworthy of a Philoſopher.

where it was not. This was one of the ſophiſt's reaſons againſt motion. If a body moves, ſaid he, it muſt move either in the place where it is, or in the place where it is not. But it doth not move either in the place where it is, (for if it is there, it doth nor depart) or in the place where it is not, for it can neither act nor ſuffer where it is not. Therefore, &c. Diodorus being then very little diſpoſed to reliſh this Logic, intreated Herophilus not to remember his diſcourſes, but to give him the neceſſary remedy (145).

ZENO, an Epicurean Philoſopher, a native of Sidon, glorioſly maintained the honour of his ſect; for he acquired a great reputation (a). Amongſt other diſciples he had Cicero and Pomponius Atticus [A], whence we may judge of the time when he lived. Voſſius is miſtaken on that head [B]. Zeno is repreſented as a Philoſopher who

[A] Among other diſciples he had Cicero and Pomponius Atticus.] Mr Menage's words are: ‘Zenonem Sidonium & Cicero & Atticus Athenis audiverunt, ut indicat ipſe Cicero libro II. & V. de finibus, & lib. III. Tuſcul. Quæſt. & libro I. Academ. - - - Both Cicero and Atticus heard at Athens the lectures of Zeno the Sidonian, as Cicero himſelf intimates in his ſecond and fifth book de Finibus, and in his third book of Tuſculan Queſtions, and in his firſt book of Academical Queſtions.’ I found the paſſage in the third book of the Tuſculanæ Queſtiones, and as it contains one of our Zeno's opinions, I ſhall ſet it down. ‘Solent iſti negare nos intelligere quid dicat Epicurus. Hoc dicit, & hoc ille græculus me audiente Athenis ſenex Zeno iſtorum acutiſſimus contendere, & magna voce dicere ſolebat, eum eſſe beatum, qui præſentibus voluptatibus frueretur, confideretque ſe fruiturum aut in omni, aut in magna parte vitæ, dolore non interveniente: aut ſi interveniret, ſi ſummus foret, futurum brevem: ſi productior, plus habiturum jucundi quam mali. Hæc cogitantem fore beatum, præſertim ſi & ante præceptis bonis contentus eſſet, nec mortem, nec deos extimeſceret. Habes formam Epicuri vitæ beatæ verbis Zenonis expreſſam, nihil ut poſſit negari (1). - - - Theſe people are wont to deny that we underſtand the meaning of Epicurus. This is what he means, and it is what the old man Zeno the Greek, the moſt acute of all the Epicurean Philoſophers, uſed to maintain and ſolemnly affirm, when I heard his lectures at Athens, viz. That the man is happy who enjoys the preſent pleaſures, and who is confident that he ſhall continue to enjoy them during all, or the greateſt part of, his life, without any intermiſſion of pain; or if pain ſhould intervene, and be acute, that it ſhall be but of ſhort continuance, or otherwiſe that it ſhall have more good than evil in it; that the man who lives in theſe thoughts ſhall be happy, eſpecially if he is furniſhed with good precepts, and is not afraid either of death, or of the gods. Here you have a deſcription of Epicurus's happy life, expreſſed in the words of Zeno; ſo that no part of it can be denied.’ I have alſo found the paſſage in the firſt book of the Academical Queſtions: it is as follows: ‘Carneades nullius philoſophiæ partis ignarus, & ut cognovi ex iis qui illum audierant, maximeque ex Epicureo Zenone (2) qui quum ab eo plurimum diſſentiret, unum tamen præter cæteros mirabatur, incredibili quadam fuit facilitate (3). - - - Carneades was ſkilled in all the parts of Philoſophy, and had an incredible facility in imparting his knowledge; as I have been informed by thoſe who have heard his lectures, and eſpecially by Zeno the Epicurean, who tho' he differed greatly from Carneades in his opinions, yet was a greater admirer of him than of any other Philoſopher.’ I have not found the paſſage in the ſecond book de Finibus (4), but I have found this in the firſt book. ‘Hic mihi Phædrum, inquam, mentitum, aut Zenonem putas, quorum utrumque audivi, quum mihi nihil ſanè præter ſedulitatem probarent. Omnes mihi Epicuri ſententiæ ſatis notæ ſunt, atque eos quos nominavi cum Attico noſtro, frequentur audivi, quum miraretur ille quidem utrumque, Phædrum autem etiam amaret, quotidieque inter nos, ea quæ audiebamus, conferebamus: neque erat unquam controverſia quid ego intelligerem, ſed quid probarem (5). - - - In this matter, either Phædrus, or Zeno, you think, have impoſed upon me. I attended the lectures of both theſe Philoſophers: but indeed they recommend nothing to me beſides application and diligence. All the opinions of Epicurus are well known to me, and I, and our friend Atticus have frequently heard the lectures of theſe two Philoſophers. He was an admirer of them both, and had even a great affection for Phædrus. We uſed daily to confer together on what we heard, nor did ever any diſpute ariſe concerning what I underſtood, but what I approved.’ Let us add to theſe three paſſages, that wherein the Pontif Cotta, Cicero's cotemporary, acknowledges himſelf to have been a diſciple of this famous Epicurean: ‘Zenonem, quem Philo noſter coryphæum appellare Epicureorum ſolebat, quum Athenis eſſem, audiebam frequenter, & quidem ipſo autore Philone, credo ut facilius judicarem, quàm illa bene refellerentur, quum à principe Epicureorum accepiſſem quemadmodum dicerentur. Non igitur ille ut plerique, ſed iſto modo ut tu, diſtincte, graviter, ornate. Sed quod in illo mihi uſu ſæpe venit, idem modo quum te audirem acciderat, ut moleſte ferrem tantum ingenium (bona venia me audies) in tam leves, ne dicam in tam ineptas ſententias incidiſſe (6). When I was at Athens, I frequently heard the lectures of Zeno, whom our friend Philo uſed to call the chief of the Epicureans. And, indeed, it was Philo who adviſed me to attend theſe lectures, in order, I believe, that I might be the better able to judge whether theſe opinions were well refuted, when I ſhould have heard them in the words of the chief of the Epicureans. Zeno did not expreſs himſelf like moſt of his ſect. His expreſſions were, like your's, diſtinct, weighty, and eloquent. But what often happened to me with regard to him, the ſame thing occurred when I heard you, I was grieved that ſo great a genius ſhould have fallen (permit me to ſay it) into ſuch ſlight, if not fooliſh and idle opinions.’ Mr Menage hath not, like Gaſſendus, referred us to one of Cicero's letters to Atticus, to find the great friendſhip which theſe two illuſtrious Romans had for our Zeno. ‘Quando Cicero & ipſum audivit & de eodem ad Atticum ſcribens: Zenonem, inquit, tam diligo quam tu (7). - - - Cicero, who was a diſciple of Zeno, writes thus of him to Atticus, I love Zeno as much as you do.’ Gaſſendus ſeems to me to be miſtaken. This letter of Cicero was written in the year of Rome 702. What probability is there that Zeno was living at that time, ſince he was very old when Cicero was preſent at his lectures in the year of Rome 674 (8)? Is it probable, if he was then living, that we ſhould not find ſome particular concerning his great age, in the Epiſtle of Cicero, cited by Gaſſendus, nor in the preceding letter, where he mentions the ſame man? Obſerve, that in the beſt editions, for inſtance, that of Mr Grævius, this Philoſopher is not called Zeno but Xeno. Manutius's conjecture on this head is incomparably better than that of Corradus. According to Corradus the Epicurean Philoſopher is meant there (9); but, according to Manutius, Cicero ſpeaks of an agent of Pomponius Atticus (10). Obſerve, that it is believed by ſeveral authors, that Lucretius was a diſciple of our Zeno (11), and ſee what I have remarked (12) againſt the memoir, wherein the Baron des Coutures was cenſured for having advanced that Zeno was the honour of the Epicurean ſect.

[B] Voſſius is miſtaken on this head.] He ſaith (13), 1. That Zeno, the Sidonian, a Philoſopher of the Epicurean ſect, was a diſciple of Apollodorus. 2. That this Apollodorus was one of Epicurus's diſciples. He cites Diogenes Laërtius to prove both theſe facts, and is miſtaken in the laſt; for Diogenes Laërtius only ſaith that Apollodorus, ſirnamed κηποτύραννος horti tyrannus, was an illuſtrious aſſertor of the Epicurean doctrine (14). If he had conſidered the paſſages which inform us that Cicero, Cotta, and Pomponius Atticus, were auditors of Zeno, he would not have made one of Epicurus's diſciples his maſter; for ſince Epicurus (f) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 29, pag. 566.

(145) Sextus Empiricus, ubi ſupra, lib. ii, cap. xxii.

(a) See the remark [A], citation (6).

(1) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(2) There is in my edition ex Epicuro & Zenone, which is a fault.

(3) Idem. Acad. Quæſt. lib. i, in fine.

(4) Fabricius, in Vita Ciceronis, ad ann. 674, quotes alſo the ſecond book, de Finibus.

(5) Cicero, lib. i, de Finibus, cap. v.

(6) Idem, de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxi.

(7) Gaſſendus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. ii, cap. vi, pag. m. 187: He quotes Cicero, lib. i, de Nat. Deor. (but 'tis not ſaid there that Cicero was an auditor of Zeno, for 'tis Cotta who ſpeaks) & lib. v, Epiſt. xi.

(8) Zenonem Athenis Cicero & Atticus A. U. DCLXXIV. Olymp. CLXXV, ſenem audiverint. Jonſius de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 183.

(9) Corradus in Ciceronis Epiſt. xi, Libri v, ad Atticum, pag. 497, Edit. Græv.

(10) Manutius in x Epiſtolam Ciceronis ad Attic. lib. v, pag. 151, Edit. Græv. See the ſame Cicero, Epiſt. xxxvii, lib. xiii, ad Atticum, & ibi Manutium, alioſque comment.

(11) See the remark [M], in the article LUCRETIUS.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. i, cap. xvi, pag. 105, & lib. iv, cap. x, pag. 466.

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. x, num. 25.

who treated his adverſaries with a great deal of contempt, and very harſhly [C]. There is ſcarce any greater proof of his boldneſs than the book which he wrote againſt the Mathematics [D]; a work which is loſt, as well as that written by Poſſidonius to confute

Epicurus died in the ſecond year of the CXXVIIth Olympiad, and Cicero heard Zeno in the 674th year of Rome, that is, the firſt year of the CLXXVth Olympiad, it is impoſſible that Zeno ſhould have been inſtructed by an auditor of Epicurus. There are above one hundred and ninety years betwixt the death of Epicurus, and the year when Cicero heard Zeno's lectures. See Jonſius (15), who hath taken notice of this miſtake of Voſſius. Mr Menage has adopted it (16).

[C] He treated his adverſaries with a great deal of contempt, and very harſhly.] Cotta attempting to prove that the Epicureans were ſlanderous, alledges our Zeno. ‘(17) Zeno quidem non eos ſolum qui tum erant Apollodorum, Syllum, cæteroſque figebat maledictis, ſed Socratem ipſum parentem philoſophiæ latino verbo utens ſcurram Atticum fuiſſe dicebat (18), Chryſippum nunquam niſi Cheſippum (19) vocabat. Zeno not only railed againſt Apollodorus, Syllus, and the other Philoſophers of that time, but he ſaid that Socrates himſelf, the parent of Philoſophy, was an Athenian buffoon, and he always called Chryſippus, Cheſippus [that is a ſhitten fellow].’

[D] The book which he wrote againſt the Mathematics.] We are informed of this by Proclus (20), who adds that Poſſidonius refuted it. Mr Menage cites ſome of Proclus's words: Eum (Zenonem) integro volumine refutavit Poſidonius Apameenſis; alias Rhodius; teſte Proclo libro III. ad 1. Euclidis. Ζήνων, inquit, ὁ Σιδώνιος, τῆς Ἐπικούρου μετέχων αἱρέσεως, πρὸς ὃν καὶ ὁ Ποσειδώνιος ὅλον γέγραφε βιβλίον, δεικνὺς σαθρὰν αὐτοῦ πᾶσαν τὴν ἐπίνοιαν (21). Huetius having told us that Epicurus rejected Geometry, and the other parts of the Mathematics, becauſe he believed, that they, being founded on falſe principles, could not be true, adds, that Zeno attacked them another way. This was by alledging that in order to render them certain, ſome things ſhould have been added to their principles which were not joined to them. Alia via adverſus Geometriam graſſabatur Zeno Epicureus, imperfecta ejus eſſe docens initia, unde nihil effici poſſet, niſi alia quædam adjicerentur, quæ in iis prætermiſſa ſunt: quam ejus ſententiam toto libro confutare conatus eſt Poſidonius (22). The Mathematics are the moſt evident and certain of all human ſciences, and yet they have met with oppoſers. If our Zeno had been a great Metaphyſician, and followed different principles from thoſe of Epicurus, he might have compoſed a book not very eaſy to be refuted, and cut out more work for the Geometricians than they imagine. All ſciences have their weak ſide; nor are the Mathematics free from that defect. Indeed very few people are able to oppoſe them well, becauſe to ſucceed in this engagement it is requiſite not only to be a good Philoſopher, but alſo a very profound Mathematician. But thoſe endued with the latter quality are ſo raviſhed with the certainty and evidence of their inquiries, that they never think of examining whether there be any illuſion in them, or whether the firſt foundation be well eſtabliſhed. They rarely think of ſuſpecting any deficiency in them. But what is very certain is that ſeveral diſputes prevail amongſt the moſt famous Mathematicians. They refute one another, and anſwers and replies multiply among them as well as among other learned men. We obſerve this among the Moderns, and it is certain that the Antients were not more unanimous (23). It is a proof that there are in this road ſeveral dark paths, and that a man may wander and loſe the track of truth. This muſt of neceſſity be the lot of one ſide or the other, ſince one affirms what the other denies. It may be urged that this is the fault of the Artificer, but not of the art, and that all thoſe diſputes proceed from ſome Mathematicians miſtaking that for a demonſtration which is not ſo; but that very thing ſhews that there are ſome obſcurities in this ſcience. Beſides, the ſame thing may be urged, with reſpect to the diſputes of other learned men. It may be ſaid, that if they cloſely followed the rules of Logic, they would avoid the wrong conſequences, and falſe aſſertions which miſlead them. Nevertheleſs we muſt confeſs, that there are many Philoſophical ſubjects, concerning which the beſt Logicians are incapable of coming to a certainty, by reaſon of the want of evidence in the object; but the object of the Mathematics is free from this inconvenience. Be it ſo; yet there is in this object a very great and irreparable defect; for it is a meer chimera which cannot poſſibly exiſt. Mathematical points, and conſequently the lines and ſurfaces, globes and axes, of the Geometricians are fictions which never can have a being: they are therefore inferior to thoſe of the Poets; for the latter commonly contain nothing that is impoſſible, but have at leaſt probability and poſſibility. Gaſſendus made an ingenious obſervation. He ſays that the Mathematicians, and eſpecially the Geometricians, have eſtabliſhed their empire in the land of abſtractions and ideas, where they walk at their eaſe; but that when they get into the country of realities, they ſoon meet with an invincible reſiſtance. ‘Mathematici, imprimiſque Geometræ, quantitatem abſtrahentes à materia, quoddam quaſi regnum ſibi ex ea fecerunt quamliberrimum; quippe nullo facto à materiæ craſſitie, pertinaciaque impedimento. Quare & ſuppoſuere imprimis in ea ſic abſtracta ejuſcemodi dimenſiones, ut punctum, quod foret prorſùs immune partibus fluendo lineam, longitudinemve latitudinis expertem crearet, &c. . . . Atque iſtæ quidem ſuppoſitiones ſunt, ex quibus Mathematici intra puræ, abſtractæve Geometriæ cancellos, & quaſi regnum conſiſtentes ſuas illas præclaras Demonſtrationes texunt (24). . . . Uno igitur verbo Mathematici ſunt, qui in ſuo illo abſtractionis regno ea indiviſibilia ſupponunt, quæ ſine partibus, ſine longitudine, ſine latitudine ſint, ac eam multitudinem, diviſionemque partium, quæ ad finem nunquam perveniat; non item verò Phyſici, quibus in regno materiæ verſantibus tale nihil licet (25). - - - The Mathematicians, and eſpecially the Geometricians, by abſtracting quantity from matter, have erected for themſelves a ſort of empire, where they enjoy the greateſt liberty, as they never meet with any obſtacle from the groſſneſs and ſtubbornneſs of matter. Accordingly they have, in the firſt place, ſuppoſed that in quantity thus abſtracted, there are ſuch dimenſions as a point, which hath no parts, and a line, or length without breadth, generated by the flowing of a point, &c. . . . Such are the ſuppoſitions, by virtue of which the Mathematicians retire within the limits of pure and abſtract Geometry, and as it were into a ſeparate kingdom, where they compoſe their famous demonſtrations. . . . In a word, it is the Mathematicians, who in this their empire of abſtractions, ſuppoſe thoſe things to be indiviſible, which are without parts, without length, or breadth, and that where there is a diviſion of parts, it may be carried on in infinitum. It is not thus with the natural Philoſophers, who having to do with the material world, and living, as it were, in the empire of matter, cannot take ſuch liberty.’ He gives an inſtance of the vanity of their pretended demonſtrations, in two ſubtile Mathematicians who attempted to prove that a finite and an infinite quantity are equal. Nuper Viri præclari Cavalerius, & Torricellius oſtenderunt de acuto quodam ſolido infinitè longo & cuipiam tamen parallelepipedo, cylindrove finito æquali (26). Others prove that there are infinite quantities bounded on each ſide (27). If they find evidence in demonſtrations of that kind, ought it not to be ſuſpected, ſince after all, it doth not over-balance the evidence with which common ſenſe informs us, that what is finite can never be equal with what is infinite, and that infinity as infinity cannot have any bounds? I add, that it is not true, that evidence can accompany thoſe gentlemen in all their ſpeculations. For proof of this I ſhall quote an author who is very well acquainted with their ſubtilties. ‘It were to be wiſhed, ſaith he (28), that the analyſis of infinitely ſmall quantities, which is pretended to be ſo admirably fertile, ſhould carry in its demonſtrations that evidence which is, and of right ought to be expected in Geometry. But when they argue on the infinite, on the infinite of infinite, on the infinite of infinite of infinite, and ſo on, without ever finding terms to ſtop them, and when they apply to finite magnitudes, theſe infinites of infinites, thoſe whom they would either inſtruct or convince, have ‘ not

---

(15) Jonſius, ubi ſupra, pag, 184.

(16) Menage in Laërt. lib. vii, num. 35, pag. 279.

(17) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxxiv, pag. 135, Edit. Leſcaloperii.

(18) See Lactant. Divin. Inſtitut. lib. iii, cap. xix, pag. m. 201.

(19) Ἀπὸ τοῦ χέζειν, quod eſt alvum exonerare.

(20) Proclus, pag. 55, apud Barrow, Lect. V Mathem. pag. 76.

(21) Menag. in Laërt. lib. vii, num. 35, pag. 279, col. 1.

(22) Huetius, Demonſtr. Evangel. Præfat. num. 3, pag. 6, Edit. Lipſ. 1694.

(23) See Huetius, ubi ſupra, Axiom. iv, pag. 28, 29.

(24) Gaſſend. Phyſ. §. i, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 264, Oper. Tom. i.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 265.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 264.

(27) See the twelfth chapter of Father Maignan's Phyſics, pag. m. 295, and the twelfth propoſition, which runs thus, Infinitum categorematicum eſſe poteſt, quamvis clauſum intrinſecis terminis etiam in eo genere in quo eſt infinitum.

(28) Journal de Trevoux, for May and June, 1701, Art. xxxiii, pag. 423, Dutch Edit.

confute it. There are ſome who more regret the loſs of theſe two books, than that of twenty

‘not always the penetration requiſite to ſee clearly into ſuch profound abyſſes . . . (29) Thoſe who are accuſtomed to the old ways of reaſoning in Geometry, do not eaſily quit them to follow ſuch abſtracted methods; they chooſe rather not to go ſo far than to engage in the new paths of the infinite of infinite of infinite, where one doth not always ſee very clearly about one, and where it is eaſy to go aſtray without perceiving it. For it is not ſufficient, in Geometry, to conclude, we muſt evidently ſee that the concluſion is juſt.’

EXTRACTS from a letter, written by the Chevalier de Meré, to Mr Paſcal.

It is a pretty good prejudice againſt the Mathematics, that Mr Paſcal deſpiſed them even before he gave himſelf up to devotion. He had been paſſionately fond of the Mathematics, and had made extraordinary progreſs in them. He was, beſides, endued with a very ſolid judgment, and very few people were capable of knowing the value of things better than he. It was not by his converſion to the only thing neceſſary, that he became diſguſted at theſe ſciences which had ſo charmed him. It was the examination of the thing it ſelf; and the reflexion he made on the diſcourſe of a layman, which cured him of his prepoſſeſſion. It would be fooliſh to imagine that the Chevalier de Meré attacked him with pious reflexions. He undoubtedly made uſe of no other than Philoſophical conſiderations: Let us ſee the effect of them, and cite the beginning of a letter from him to Mr Paſcal. ‘Do you remember you told me once that you were no longer ſo fully perſuaded of the excellency of the Mathematics. And now you write to me that I have wholly undeceived you, and diſcovered to you ſome things which you had never ſeen, if you had not known me. But yet, Sir, I do not know whether you are ſo much obliged to me as you think. For you ſtill retain a habit, which you have got from that ſcience, viz. of not determining on any thing whatſoever, otherwiſe than by your demonſtrations, which moſt frequently are falſe. The tedious ratiocinations drawn from line to line perplex you in a more ſublime knowledge which never deceives . . . . but you will continually remain in thoſe errors into which the falſe demonſtrations of Geometry have plunged you, and I do not believe you entirely cured of the Mathematics, as long as you affirm that the little bodies, concerning which we diſputed the other day, may be divided in infinitum (30).’ The Chevalier de Meré makes him afterwards ſeveral objections on the diviſibility of matter in infinitum. Some of them are pretty good, and others very bad, and look rather like pleaſantry than ratiocination; it is truly ſurpriſing that the ſame letter ſhould be mixed with ſo many unequal things. The author, nevertheleſs, boaſts of a prodigious ability in the ſciences of which we are ſpeaking. You know, ſaith he (31), that I have diſcovered in the Mathematics ſuch extraordinary things, that the moſt learned of the Antients never mentioned them, and the beſt Mathematicians of Europe have been ſurprized at them: you have written on my inventions as well as Mr Huygens, Mr de Fermac (32), and ſo many others who have admired them. You muſt judge from thence that I do not adviſe any perſon to deſpiſe this ſcience, which, to ſpeak truth, is really uſeful, provided we do not too much apply our ſelves to it; for commonly what is ſo curiouſly ſought after in it appears to me uſeleſs; and the time beſtowed upon that inquiry might be better employed. Methinks alſo that the reaſons which we find in this ſcience, though ever ſo little obſcure, or oppoſite to ſenſe, ought to render the conſequences drawn from them very ſuſpicious, eſpecially, as I have already hinted, when they relate to infinity. Obſerve, it is highly proper that thoſe, who endeavour to ſhew the weak ſide of the Mathematics, ſhould convince the public that they underſtand them, that they have ſtudied them, that they acknowledge the uſefulneſs of them, and that they have no deſign to rob them of their juſt value. The learned Biſhop of Avranches, above cited, hath acted according to this rule (33), after having ſaid ſeveral excellent things concerning the uncertainties and illuſions of that ſcience (34).

Another paſſage of the Chevalier de Meré's letter runs thus: ‘I put you in mind that beſides this natural world, which falls under the cognizance of ourſenſes, there is another inviſible, and that it is in the latter that you may attain to the moſt ſublime knowledge. Thoſe who only conſider the material world, commonly judge very ill, and always groſly, like Des Cartes, whom you ſo highly eſteem, who did not know the ſpace of places otherwiſe than by the bodies which fill them . . . . . . But without undertaking to convince him of this error, know that it is in this inviſible world, of an infinite extenſion, that we are enabled to diſcover the reaſons, and principles of things, moſt hidden truths, the fitneſs, exactneſs, and proportion, and the true originals and perfect idea's of all that we ſearch (35).’ This is the concluſion of his letter to Mr Paſcal: I beg leave to ſay that I do not apprehend what he drives at; for his expreſſions are ſo looſe and indefinite, that one may draw concluſions from them, which would be quite contrary to what he muſt have thought and repreſented. His deſign was to cure Mr Paſcal entirely of the fondneſs he had for the Mathematics: he therefore intended to point out to him another object than that of this ſcience, to point it out to him, I ſay, as the ſource and ſeat of thoſe truths after which we aſpire; and yet he deſcribes to him an object which very nearly reſembles that of the Mathematics: For they do not conſider this world which falls under the cognizance of our ſenſes, but that inviſible world, of an infinite extenſion, where we may diſcover the fitneſs, proportion, &c. I believe he intended to recommend the Philoſophy of ideas, the moſt ſubtile Metaphyſics, which only tend to the contemplation of ſpirits, and the intelligible world which is in the mind of GOD: but the characteriſtics, which diſtinguiſh that ſcience from the Mathematics, have not been conſidered by him; nor did he remember that the Mathematics have this principal property of conſidering extenſion as ſeparated from matter and every ſenſible quality. Extenſion, or intelligible matter, is their object as ſenſible matter is that of Phyſics (36). Their excellency, according to the Ancients, conſiſts in diſengaging us from periſhable corporeal things, and raiſing us to thoſe which are ſpiritual, immutable, and eternal. Thence it proceeded that Plato diſliked the conduct of ſome Mathematicians who attempted to verify on matter their ſpeculative propoſitions (37). I ſhall here tranſcribe a moſt excellent paſſage of Plutarch, which turns on a ſaying of Plato, that GOD is continually employed in Geometrical exerciſes (38). ‘This ſaying . . . . intimates . . . . what he himſelf has often mentioned, when he praiſed Geometry as a ſcience that takes men off from ſenſible objects, and fixes their thoughts on ſuch as are intellectual and eternal, the contemplation of which is the end of all Philoſophy, as the viewing of myſteries is the end of myſtical religion: for of all the miſchiefs which ariſe to us from that ſympathy in pain and pleaſure which faſtens the ſoul to the body, this is the greateſt, that it renders ſenſible things more evident to us than intellectual, and forces the underſtanding to judge, rather according to paſſion than reaſon: for man being accuſtomed by his feeling of pain or pleaſure, to regard the mutable and uncertain nature of bodies as a thing actually ſubſiſting, grows blind, and loſes the knowlege of that which really ſubſiſts, and deſtroys that inſtrument and light of the ſoul, which is worth a thouſand bodily eyes, and by which alone the Deity can be diſcerned. Now in all the other Mathematical ſciences, as in plain and ſmooth mirrours, the images and marks of the truth of intellectual objects appear, but Geometry chiefly, as being the parent of all the reſt, withdraws, and, as it were, purifies and ſets looſe the underſtanding from the thoughts of ſenſible objects: and therefore Plato himſelf reprehended Eudoxus, Archytas, and Menechmus, for endeavouring to reduce the doubling of the cube to Mechanical operations, as if it was impoſſible to find out two lines which could be demonſtrated to be mean proportionals. For he objected to them that all that was good in Geometry would be loſt and corrupted, if it was made to fall back again to ſenſible things, inſtead of riſing higher and contemplating thoſe immaterial and immortal images, to which GOD was always attentive, and of which he was alſo the cauſe (39).’ Several paſſages of Ariſtotle (40) inform us, that quantity, as diſengaged

(29) Ibid. pag. 430.

(30) Lettres de Mr le Chevalier de Meré, num. 19, pag. 60, Dutch Edit.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 63.

(32) It ſhould be Fermat.

(33) Huetius, ubi ſupra, Axiom. iv, num. 3, pag. 31.

(34) Ibid. num. 2, pag. 28, & ſeq. See alſo from page 14, to page 19.

(35) Chevalier de Meré, ubi ſupra, pag. 68, 69.

(36) Hæc eſt illa quantitas, quæ dici ſolet materia intelligibilis ad differentiam materiæ ſenſibilis quæ ad Phyſicum ſpectat; illa enim ab hac per intellectum ſeparatur, ac ſolo intellectu percipitur. Blancanus, de natura Mathematicarum, pag. 6.

(37) Plutarch. in Marcello, pag. 305.

(38) Τὸν θεὸν ἀεὶ γεωμετρεῖν. Deum ſemper geometriam tractare. Plut. Sympoſ. lib. viii, cap. ii, pag. 718. Note, that the Moderns, who doubt of the exiſtence of bodies, might make uſe of this maxim, and ſay, that the action of God upon our minds, whereby he communicates to us the ideas of extenſion, and thoſe of numbers, and motion, and of the relations of ſwiftneſs to ſpace and duration, &c. is only a Geometrical work.

(39) Id. ibid.

(40) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathematicis, pag. 4, & ſeq. quotes them.

from twenty or thirty dramatical pieces, or that of the beſt Hiſtorians of antiquity.

from whatever falls under the ſenſes, is the object of the Mathematics. And the greateſt part of the Mathematicians own, that this object exiſts no where but in the mind. Dr Barrow diſapproves the granting this (41). His cenſure falls expreſsly on the Jeſuit Blancanus and on Voſſius; but it is certain that Blancanus was in the right, and ought not to have been cenſured for any thing beſides aſſerting the poſſibility of the exiſtence of the globe and triangle &c. of the Geometricians: ‘ Ultimò dici poteſt: hæc entia eſſe ‘ poſſibilia, quis enim neget Angelum, aut Deum ea ‘ poſſe efficere (42)? - - - - - In the laſt place it may ‘ be ſaid that theſe are poſſible Beings; for what man ‘ will pretend that an Angel, or that GOD cannot pro- ‘ duce them?’ There is no need of a long diſcourſe to ſhew it impoſſible that this globe, or that triangle, &c. ſhould really exiſt; we need only remember that ſuch a globe placed on a plane, would only touch it in one indiviſible point, and that rolling on the plane, it would touch it always in a ſingle point. From whence it will reſult, that it muſt be wholly compoſed of unextended parts; but that is impoſſible, and manifeſtly includes this contradiction, that an extenſion would exiſt and not be extended. It would exiſt according to the ſuppoſition, and it would not be extended, ſince it would not be at all diſtinct from a being not extended. All Philoſophers agree that the material cauſe is not diſtinct from its effect; wherefore what would be compoſed of unextended parts, would not be diſtinct from them: but whatever is the ſame thing with an unextended being, is neceſſarily an unextended thing. Our Divines, when they teach that the world was produced out of nothing, do not mean that it is compoſed of nothing: the word nothing doth not ſignify the material cauſe of the world, materiam ex qua; but the ſtate antecedent to the creation of the world, which they call terminum à quo, and they acknowledge that taking the word nothing in the firſt ſenſe, it is abſolutely impoſſible that the world ſhould have been made of it. Now it is not more extravagant to aſſert, that the world was made of nothing as of its material cauſe, than to affirm that a foot of extenſion is compoſed of unextended parts (43). It is not therefore poſſible that either an Angel, or GOD himſelf, ſhould ever produce the triangle, the plane, the circle, the globe, &c. of the Geometricians; and therefore Blancanus deſerved on this head to be cenſured.

I leave my readers to determine whether my cenſure of the laſt paſſage of the Chevalier de Meré is well grounded.

(41) Iſaac Barrow, Lect. V, pag. 85.

(42) Blancanus, ubi ſupra, p. 7.

(43) Compare with this what has been ſaid above, at the beginning of the remark [G], in the foregoing article.

ZEUXIS, a very famous Painter, flouriſhed four hundred years before CHRIST, towards the XCVth Olympiad [A]. What we know of his country is a little confuſed

[A] He flouriſhed . . . . towards the XCVth Olympiad.] Mr Moreri is guilty of a fault in ſaying only that Zeuxis lived in the LXXVIIIth Olympiad (1); for he ought to have known that Pliny, who exactly ſpecified the time when this Painter lived (2), namely in the fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad (3), refutes thoſe who have placed it in the LXXXIXth. I am ſurprized that Scaliger hath not obſerved this in his note on the place of Euſebius, which makes Zeuxis to flouriſh in the LXXVIIIth Olympiad. Euſebius deſerved to be cenſured; ſince it is undeniable, without contradicting almoſt all thoſe who ſpeak of Zeuxis, that he was very intimately known to Archelaus King of Macedon. But there were two of the name of Archelaus, and the firſt not having begun his reign, according to Euſebius's chronolgy, before the beginning of the LXXXVIIth Olympiad, Zeuxis muſt be arrived at a very remarkable old age, if the time of his flouriſhing fell on the LXXVIIIth Olympiad, and if neverthele ſs he painted at Archelaus's court. I own theſe things are not incompatible; but let that be as it will Euſebius was too forward; he ought to have referred Zeuxis to the reign of this Macedonian King. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that the manner in which the Ancients place the chronology of illuſtrious men, may tend to confuſion. The year of their birth and that of their death ought to be ſpecified, and not the time when they flouriſhed; for that is indefinite and uncertain, it is early or late in a man's life, according to tempers and opportunities: ſome are at the higheſt pitch of their reputation at the age of thirty. Others do not reach it till ſixty. This makes me recollect the proof which Pliny uſes againſt thoſe who place Zeuxis in the LXXXIXth Olympiad. He refutes them by this reaſon, that it is an Olympiad wherein we muſt neceſſarily place the Painter who taught Zeuxis. This reaſon may paſs, conſidering the time when Zeuxis appears in Pliny: but if we change in the text the LXXXIXth Olympiad into the LXXIXth, as Father Hardouin hath done on the authority of the mannuſcripts, Pliny's reaſoning will hardly appear juſt; he will refute thoſe, who ſay that Painter flouriſhed in the LXXIXth Olympiad, he will refute them, I ſay, by ſhewing that to be the time where the maſter of Zeuxis ought to be placed. But why muſt this time be aſſigned to him? Becauſe Zeuxis did not ſignalize himſelf before the end of the XCVth Olympiad. This is a weak reaſon. Muſt not a Painter grow famous till ſixty years after his apprenticeſhip? I would therefore prefer the common reading of Pliny to that of the manuſcripts in the king's library. I do not impute to ſo learned a man as Father Hardouin, what I am going to ſay; his Printers muſt have left out ſome numbers. He pretends that Suidas agrees with Pliny on the time of Zeuxis, ſince Suidas, relying on Ariſtotle, places the birth of this Painter in the LXXXVIth Olympiad, and makes him flouriſh in the time of Iſocrates. A little after he refutes the vulgar reading of Pliny, concerning the LXXXIXth Olympiad, by reaſon that it is evident even from what he had juſt before cited out of Suidas, that Zeuxis died in the LXXXIXth Olympiad. I am ſure that if my eyes do not deceive me, Father Hardouin's Printers have confounded the numeral letters of the original.

As for the reſt I would not depend too much on the time ſpecified by Pliny; it ſeems to me to be wrong. ‘ Ab hoc (Apollodoro) artis fores apertas Zeuxis He- ‘ racleotes intravit, Olympiadis nonageſimæ quintæ ‘ anno quarto, audentemque jam aliquid penicillum ‘ (de hoc enim adhuc loquimur) ad magnam gloriam ‘ perduxit, à quibuſdam falſo in octogeſima nona ‘ Olympiade poſitus, cum fuiſſe neceſſe eſt Demophi- ‘ lum Himeræum, & Neſeam Thaſium, quoniam ‘ utrius eorum diſcipulus fuerit, ambigitur (4). - - - - ‘ Apollodorus having diſcovered the firſt rudiments of this ‘ art, Zeuxis of Heraclea improved it in the fourth year ‘ of the XCVth Olympiad, and from that infancy of glory ‘ in which it then was, brought it to the higheſt perfection. ‘ Some authors falſly place him in the LXXXIXth Olym- ‘ piad: whereas Demophilus Himeræus, and Neſeas ‘ Thaſius, muſt have flouriſhed at that time, it being ‘ doubted of which of theſe two Painters he was the ‘ diſciple.’ There is no need of being very nice about the time of the reputation of a great man, and it were eaſy to prove, from this author's own words, that he had been more exact, if he had marked the chronology ſomewhat more generally. For what doth he mean by this fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad? Does he mean that before this year Zeuxis lived in obſcurity, and did not begin to make himſelf known till then? But this is not a proper way of ſpecifying the time when any perſon flouriſhed; it ought to be ſpecified with reſpect to a reputation of ſome continuance; and if Pliny had done otherwiſe with regard to Zeuxis, he would have been very much miſtaken. In effect, he informs us that this Painter did not give his pieces for nothing, till after he was exceeding rich. But when he gave them away Archelaus was living; for the preſent of his Pan to Archelaus is one of the examples of his liberality related by Pliny. He had therefore acquired vaſt riches and a great ruputation by painting before the death of the laſt Archelaus, that is, before the end of the XCIVth Olympiad (5); and

(1) Mr Hofman has committed the ſame fault.

(2) Mr Felibien, pag. 56, of his I Entretien ſur les Vies & ſur les Ouvrages des Peintres, places Zeuxis in the XCVth Olympiad; but the Printer has committed a fault in making this Olympiad anſwer to the year of the world, 583. It ſhould be 3583. Voſſius, de IV Art. popul. places him alſo in the XCVth Olympiad.

(3) I do not mean with the utmoſt exactneſs. See the following citation.

(4) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. ix, pag. m. 198, 199.

(5) Euſebius places the death of Archelaus, in the third year of the XCIVth Olympiad.

confuſed [B]. Painting was then in the firſt degree of its luſtre: From that beginning of reputation to which Apollodorus had brought it, he raiſed it to a great perfection. Some authors tell us, that it was he who invented the manner of diſpoſing lights and ſhadows (a) [C]; and it is agreed on all hands that he excelled in the art of colouring. Ariſtole (b) found fault with his pictures for not expreſſing the manners or paſſions; yet Pliny obſerves the contrary, with regard to his picture of Penelope, in which, ſaith he, Zeuxis ſeems to have painted her manners (c). He acquired immenſe riches (d); and once made a ſhew of them during the celebration of the Olympic games, where he appeared in a cloak embroidered with gold letters expreſſing his name. After he became ſo rich, he would no longer ſell his works; but gave them away, and ſaid very frankly, that he could not ſet a price on them equal to their value. Before this time he made people pay for the ſight of them; and none were admitted to ſee his Helen but for ready money; whence in rallery the Wits called that picture, Helen the Courtezan (e). He made no ſcruple of placing under her protraicture the three verſes of the Iliad, where Homer relates that honeſt Priam, and the venerable old men of his council, agreed that the Greeks and Trojans were not to blame for expoſing themſelves during ſo long a time to ſo many evils for the ſake of Helen, whoſe beauty equalled that of the goddeſſes (f). I cannot well determine whether this Helen of Zeuxis was the ſame which was at Rome in Pliny's time, or that which he drew for the inhabitants of Crotona, to be placed in Juno's temple (g). It will not be improper to relate here what Zeuxis required from the Crotonians with reſpect to that picture. They had by great ſums of money prevailed on him to come to them, in order to get many of his paintings, with which they intended to adorn their temple; and when he acquainted them that he intended to draw the picture of Helen [D], they were very well pleaſed, becauſe they knew his principal excellence lay in painting of women. He then aſked them what beautiful virgins they had in their city, and they conducted him to the place where young lads learned their exerciſes.

and conſequently Pliny would have been ſtrangely miſtaken, if he had placed the beginning of his reputation in the fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad. For my part, I believe that a medium ought to be taken betwixt Euſebius and Pliny, the rather becauſe we read in Plutarch (6), that this great Painter flouriſhed when Pericles cauſed a great number of public edifices to be built, and made Phidias the ſurveyor of them. But without alledging that Pliny (7) places Phidias in the LXXXIVth Olympiad, it is certain that Pericles cauſed theſe edifices to be built ſeveral years before his death, which happened in the LXXXVIIth Olympiad. Wherefore it doth not appear that Pliny had a great deal of reaſon to refute thoſe who placed Zeuxis in the LXXXIXth Olympiad, and to make him then but a young diſciple.

[B] What we know of his country is a little confuſed.] For though the teſtimony of Tzetzes (8), who makes him a native of Epheſus, ſhould not make us doubt that he was born at Heraclea, ſince Cicero (9), Pliny (10), and Ælian (11) agree, in affirming it; it is not a little perplexing to chooſe out of ſuch a great number of cities which had the name of Heraclea, that where Zeuxis was born. Some conjecture that it was Heraclea, near Crotona in Italy (12).

[C] Some authors tell us, that it was he who invented the manner of diſpoſing lights and ſhadows (13)]. The glory of invention being that on which men ſet the higheſt value, Moreri ſhould have informed his reader of that paſſage in Quintilian. Whereas he aſſures us, that the art of ſhading, in the fine pieces of Zeuxis, was beyond any price. Thus on one ſide he forgets the principal part, and on the other he ſtretches the thing too far. He forgot to tell us, that Zeuxis was the inventer of the mixture of lights and ſhadows in pictures; and, without any ground, he ſaith, that it was the art of ſhadowing which rendred Zeuxis's pieces ineſtimable. His miſtake happened thus. He had read in an author (14) from whom he took ſeveral things, that it was obſerved of Zeuxis that though his pieces, wherein the art of ſhading appeared firſt of all, were beyond any price, which reduced him to the neceſſity of giving them gratis; yet he was guilty of the fault of repreſenting the heads larger than they really were, as he did alſo moſt of the members (15): In this Quintilian (16) obſerves that he did no more than imitate Homer, whoſe beautiful ladies are robuſt, and in good caſe: Moreri, I ſay, had read this, and did not know how to make uſe of it. He ought to have extracted out of it what was blamed in the works of Zeuxis; but above all, he ſhould have taken this obſervation that the art of ſhading was the invention of this Painter. At leaſt, after having left it out, he ſhould not have connected the words that go before it with thoſe that come after; for by this means he hath falſified the paſſage of la Mothe le Vayer, which wanted to be mended inſtead of being falſified. What makes me ſay ſo, is, that this famous writer lays down for a certainty, that the true reaſon why Zeuxis diſcontinued the ſelling of his pieces, was becauſe it was not poſſible for any perſon to pay the true value of them. This is taking that Painter's words too literally (17), he probably did not think as he ſpoke: and if he had really believed it, he had been the moſt extravagant braggadocio in the world; and conſequently his rodomontade ſhould not be alledged as a juſt reaſon. It is very probable that the pieces which he preſented after his being very rich, were not better than thoſe which he formerly ſold; for it is not cuſtomary to finiſh what one has a mind to give gratis, more than what one deſigns to ſell at a dear rate. To which purpoſe I remember it is commonly ſaid, that an Abbot's ſermons are better whilſt he is aſpiring after a biſhopric than after he hath obtained it. And therefore if Zeuxis's reaſon had been true, he ſhould have left off ſelling his works ſooner than he did. I was ſurprized not to find Quintilian's obſervations amongſt thoſe which Felibien hath given us concerning Zeuxis. Mr Hofman hath tranſlated Moreri's expreſſion ſomewhat ambiguouſly; for the words, Donare opera ſua, INTER QUÆ UMBRÆ EMINEBANT, inſtituit, as he has turned them, ſeem to ſignify, that there was one of Zeuxis's pieces in which he had painted the ſhadows, which picture was the moſt excellent of his works. Beſides, the word eminebant doth not ſeem deſigned for umbræ in the Painters ſtile; for no places appear to have leſs relievo in painting, than thoſe expreſſed by ſhadows (18).

[D] To draw the picture of Helen.] It is an inexcuſable omiſſion in Charles Stephens, in Lloyd, Moreri, and Hofman, to have ſaid nothing of the picture of Helen, but that Zeuxis painted it, tho' the Antients have related ſo many remarkable particulars concerning it. Charles Stephens hath only cited Pliny, who ſpoke of it by the by; he ſhould have quoted Cicero and Ælian, who have touched on the circumſtances. Lloyd and Hofman only cite, properly ſpeaking, in the ſame manner as Charles Stephens: for tho' they refer us to Cicero, it is plain that it is with regard to Zeuxis in general, and not with reſpect to Helen's picture; this, I ſay, is plain, becauſe they refer us alſo to Plutarch, in the life of Pericles, where he doth not treat of this picture. By the Printer's errors we find Cicero cited in Mr Lloyd's Dictionary thus; 2. de Juvent. and in that of Mr Hofman alſo, lib. 2. de Juventut. inſtead of lib. 2. de Invent. which is enough to make ſeveral

(a) Luminum umbrarumque inveniſſe rationem traditur. Quintil. lib. xii, cap. x.

(b) De Poët. cap. vi.

(c) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. ix, pag. m. 199.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Ælian, lib. iv, cap. xii.

(f) Valerius Maximus, lib. iii, cap. vii.

(g) The ſame author ſays, that Zeuxis's Marſyas bound up, was to be ſeen in the temple of Concord. Zeuxidis manus vidi, ſays Petronius, nondum vetuſtatis injuria victas.

(6) In the Life of Pericles.

(7) Lib. xxxiv, cap. viii.

(8) Chiliad. VIII, Hiſtor. cxcvi.

(9) Lib. ii, de Inventione.

(10) Piin. lib. xxxv, cap. ix.

(11) Var. Hiſt. lib. iv, cap. xii & lib. xiv, cap. xvii, & xlvii.

(12) Harduin. in Plin. Tom. v, pag. 199. Jacob. Prouſt in Cicer. lib. ii, in Invent. Note, that the Antients, who were contented to call him Heracleotes, have done worſe than if we ſhould now-a-days denote a man's native country, by ſaying that he was born at Clermont.

(13) See Plutarch's paſſage concerning Apollodorus, in the remark [G].

(14) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter ix, in the tenth volume of the Edit. in 12mo. pag. 76.

(15) Pliny not quoted by La Mothe le Vayer, informs us of it, lib. xxxv, cap. ix. Deprehenditur tamen Zeuxis grandior in capitibus articuliſque: This laſt word he ſhould have tranſlated joints and not members.

(16) La Mothe le Vayer quotes lib. xii, Inſt. cap. xviii, but it ſhould be cap. x.

(17) Poſtea donare opera ſua inſtituit, quòd ea nullo ſatis digno pretio permutari poſſe diceret. Plin. ubi ſupra.

(18) See Voſſius de Graphice, pag. 69.

exerciſes. This gave him the moſt favourable opportunity poſſible of ſeeing if they were beautiful, and well ſhaped throughout; for they were ſtark naked; and he appearing very well pleaſed, they gave him to underſtand, that he might judge thereby whether they had beautiful virgins in their city, ſince they had the ſiſters of thoſe young lads whom he moſt admired. He then deſired to ſee the moſt beautiful, and the council of the city having ordered all the virgins to come together to the ſame place, that Zeuxis might have his free choice, he ſelected five; and by taking from each of them what was moſt charming in her, he formed the picture of Helen. Theſe five maids were highly extolled by the Poets on account of their beauty which had obtained the approbation of the man who was the beſt judge of it (b) [E], and accordingly their names did not fail of being conſecrated to poſterity: however I do not believe there is now any trace of theſe names. Cicero, who informs us of all theſe particulars, hath left his reader to gueſs, that the Painter deſired to ſee thoſe five young beauties ſtark naked: but Pliny expreſsly affirms it; nay he ſays that before Zeuxis choſe theſe five, he had ſeen all the Crotonian virgins in that condition (i). It is true he affirms, that Zeuxis painted for the Agrigentines, and not for the Crotoniates, and doth not name the picture: excepting this, it is plain he relates the ſame ſtory with Cicero. I muſt not forget that Zeuxis diſputing the prize of Painting with Parrhaſius loſt it (k) [F], in the following manner. Zeuxis had painted ſome grapes ſo extremely well, that the birds flew down to peck at them. And Parrhaſius painted a curtain ſo artfully, that Zeuxis taking it for a real one, drawn before his antagoniſt's work, aſked with the utmoſt confidence, why they did not immediately draw that curtain in order to ſhew what Parrhaſius had done. Having found ſeveral readers believe that Cicero wrote de Juventute as well as de Senectute. Voſſius (19) hath cenſured Bulengerus, for ſaying in his book of Painting, that it was Venus and not Helen whom Zeuxis painted, from the five living originals placed before him: but in correcting this fault, Voſſius himſelf hath committed another; he ſays that Pliny mentions as expreſsly as Cicero, that Zeuxis painted Helen. But it is not true that Pliny mentions it; he ſpeaks in general of a picture. Obſerve, that Cœlius Rhodiginus, ſpeaking of the picture of Helen, the courtezan, has committed a groſs ſoleciſm (20). Zeuxin, ſaith he, pictura nobilem, inter cætera ejus artificii, haud parum multa quæ circumferuntur, & hominum deſideria vix explent, Helenam quandoque ab eo expictam ferunt, cui tantum ſanè attribuerit, ut non temere nec quemlibet, ac (ut Græci dicunt) ὡς ἔτυχε, ſpectatum admitteret, ni ῥητόν ἀργύειον, id eſt propoſitam pecuniæ quantitatem erogaſſet. The like faults in language have eſcaped the beſt authors.

[E] Theſe five maids were highly extolled . . . . on account of their beauty, which had obtained the approbation of the man who was the beſt judge of it.] One might very well doubt whether the five maids whom Zeuxis choſe, were each of them handſomer than thoſe whom he did not chuſe. The reaſon of this ſcruple is, that he deſigned only to unite in one body, the particular beauties which he found ſeparated in thoſe five maids: to which purpoſe there was no neceſſity that they ſhould be all very beautiful; it was ſufficient that ſome of them had the beauties which the others wanted. But who can deny that there are ſome women of indifferent beauty, who if you only compare one ſingle part with the ſame in another, will, in that, ſurpaſs the greateſt beauties. Wherefore it doth not appear that Cicero, or the Poets of whom he ſpeaks, were neceſſarily in the right to prefer thoſe five Crotonian maids, choſen by the Painter of Helen, to thoſe who were paſſed by. Perhaps the Painter rejected ſome, who wanted very little to render them perfect beauties; but who were not at all for his purpoſe, becauſe he found the ſame beauties they were endued with, in a more eminent degree in one of the five: after which it was enough for another of the five, tho' but indifferently handſome, to have that very ſmall thing which was wanting in thoſe whom he refuſed. The queſtion, as every body ſees, is not important, it may be laid aſide; and if any perſon ſhould aſſert that Zeuxis choſe the fineſt five of them all, not by reaſon of it's being neceſſary to his deſign, but to enjoy a more agreeable ſight, I will not oppoſe him. One of the chief grounds of this ſtory is what is commonly ſaid, that nothing in the world is perfect. And this holds true eſpecially in relation to beauty. I appeal to the criticiſms which handſome women paſs upon one another, and yet they do not ſee every thing, as Zeuxis did, being, without doubt, reſolved not to follow the method of which Horace ſpeaks in his ſecond ſatire of the firſt book.

. . . . Ne corporis optima lynceis
Contemplere oculis, Hypſea cæcior, illa
Quæ mala ſunt ſpectes. O crus! O bracchia! verum Depygis, naſuta, brevi latere ac pede longo eſt (21).

Be not too eagle-ey'd to view a grace;
And blind, as Hypſea is, to ſpy a fault;
For ſuch as judge by faults are often caught.
How neat her arm! her leg! 'tis true, but ſtay,
Her waſte is ſhort, noſe long, her feet are ſplay.

CREECH.

The truth is, this Painter had no need of any thing, beſides his own imagination, to draw the picture of a compleat beauty; for it is certain that our ideas go beyond nature. ‘ Ego ſic ſtatuo, nihil eſſe in ullo genere tam pulchrum quo non pulchrius id ſit unde illud ut ex ore aliquo quaſi imago exprimatur, quod neque oculis, neque auribus, neque ullo ſenſu percipi poteſt, cogitatione tantum & mente complectimur . . . . . Nec verò ille artifex (Phidias) quum faceret Jovis formam aut Minervæ, contemplabatur aliquem è quo ſimilitudinem duceret, ſed ipſius in mente inſidebat ſpecies pulchritudinis eximia quædam, quam intuens, in eaque defixus, ad illius ſimilitudinem artem & manum dirigebat (22). - - - - In my opinion, there is not any thing, of whatever kind, ſo beautiful as that idea from which it is expreſſed, and of which it is only, as it were, an image or repreſentation; an idea which is not the object of the eyes, or ears, or of any other of the ſenſes, but of our thoughts alone, and can only be perceived in the mind . . . . Phidias, when he made the ſtatue of Jupiter, or that of Minerva, did not ſet up for his pattern any particular perſon: but he had in his mind a certain noble and exalted idea of beauty, which he regarded ſtedfaſtly, and attentively followed as the model of his work.’ It would not be more impoſſible to find men as accompliſhed as the heroes of romances, than it would be to find as beautiful women as the heroines of the ſame fabulous country. This is ſo true, that when authors would in few words repreſent any one perfectly beautiful, they content themſelves with ſaying, that the perſon ſurpaſſes the ideas of Poets and of Painters (23).

[F] Zeuxis diſputing the prize of Painting with Parrhaſius, loſt it.] The fact relating to the birds which Zeuxis deceived by his painted grapes, is commonly related after a very confuſed manner. But if Pliny was well conſulted, authors would not fall into that confuſion; for they would there ſee that Zeuxis drew two ſeveral pictures which related to this fact, and that each had it's particular adventure. I do not take notice

---

(b) Quarum nomina multi poetæ memoriæ tradiderunt, quod ejus eſſent judicio probatæ qui veriſſimum pulcritudinis habere judicium debuiſſet. Cicer. lib. ii, de Invent.

(i) Tantus diligentia ut Agragantinis facturus tabulam quam in templo Junonis Laciniæ publicè dicarent, inſpexerit virgines eorum nudas & quinque elegerit, ut quod in quaque laudatiſſimum eſſet pictura redderet. Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. ix.

(k) Id. ibid. cap. x.

(19) De Graphice, pag. 69, in libro de IV Artib. popular.

(20) Cœlius Rhodiginus, Antiq. Lect. lib. xix, cap. xxvii, pag. m. 1086.

(21) See how Robert and Antony Chevalier d'Agneaux, natives of Vire, in Normandy, have tranſlated theſe lines. Nothing can be more lively.
Tout ainſi ce qu'en ſoy.
Le corps a de plus beau,
D'ieux Lynceens ne voy:
Regarde plus qu'Hypſée aveugle, les parties.
Qui plus laides y ſont.
Eſbahy tu t'eſcries;
O la greve, o les bras, mais long nés & courts flancs,
Et greſle cuiſſe ell' a avecques les piés grands.

(22) Cicero, in Oratore, init.

(23) Lateri applicat meo mulierem omnibus ſimulacris emendatiorem. Petronius.
Spondebatque ducem celſi nitor igneus oris,
Membrorumque modus qualem nec carmina fingunt Semideïs.
Claudian. de Laudib. Stilicon. lib. i.

found his miſtake, he confeſſed himſelf outdone, ſince he had only deceived birds, whereas Parrhaſius had impoſed on the very maſters of the art. Another time he painted a boy loaded with grapes, and the birds flew alſo to this picture; this diſpleaſed him, and he ingenuouſly owned that his work was not ſufficiently finiſhed, ſince if the boy had been as naturally expreſſed as the grapes, the birds would have been afraid of him. We are told that he wiped out the grapes and only kept the figure, in which he had leaſt ſucceeded (l). Archelaus King of Macedon employed Zeuxis to adorn his palace with paintings; on this occaſion we have in Ælian a fine reflexion of Socrates (m). One of this Painter's beſt pieces was a Hercules ſtrangling ſome dragons in his cradle in the ſight of his affrighted mother: but he himſelf preferred his Athlet, or wreſtler, before all the reſt, and under it placed a verſe which afterwards became famous (n) [G]. It is not

(l) Senec. Controv. v, lib. v.

(m) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. xiv, cap. xvii.

(n) Adeo ſibi in illo (Athleta) placuit ut verſum ſubſcriberet celebrem ex eo, inviſurum aliquem facilius quàm imitaturum. Plin. ubi ſupra.

---

notice of what ſeveral authors relate, that Zeuxis himſelf attempted to draw Parrhaſius's curtain; for Pliny doth not tell the ſtory ſo: but this is an alteration of circumſtances too inconſiderable to ſay any thing more of it. There is much more reaſon to think it ſtrange, that Moreri's Dictionary ſhould ſay nothing of the challenge or wager of theſe two Painters, and that Lloyd and Hofman have given but a very ſmall hint of it. As for what relates to the other piece, wherein the boy carried grapes, Mr Moreri hath mentioned it in a manner which is not much to his honour, ſince he hath omitted the principal circumſtances, not having given the leaſt hint of the judgment which Zeuxis himſelf made of this piece; Mr Hofman hath not forgot this, but he makes uſe of a phraſe which he ought entirely to have ſuppreſſed; eadem ingenuitate, ſaith he, proceſſit (Zeuxis) iratus operi ac dixit. Theſe words are Pliny's, and are extraordinary proper in the original, where they relate to the ſtory of the wager, that is to ſay, to Pliny's narrative, with what ingenuity Zeuxis owned that he was outdone. But when, in an article where there is nothing of this ingenuity, they tell us that Zeuxis acknowledged with the ſame ingenuity, &c. they throw us into impenetrable obſcurities, and we can only conjecture, that the author gives us an imperfect paſſage. Moſt abbreviators are ſubject to this fault (24). Mr Hofman is on this head much more excuſable than Mr Lloyd; for the latter having retained the phraſe, eadem ingenuitate proceſſit, which he found in Charles Stephens, might eaſily think that it concerned a particular to which the reader of Charles Stephens was referred. But Mr Lloyd hath ſuppreſſed this reference, and by this means hath increaſed the obſcurity of his article. Not that I pretend wholly to excuſe Charles Stephens, for his ut in Parrhaſio ſupra vidimus, could not give him a right to make uſe of theſe words, eadem ingenuitate proceſſit, becauſe he had not been ſpeaking of the ſucceſs of the wager. The article of Zeuxis is much better in Calepin (25), than in all the Dictionaries which I have juſt mentioned. But I have not found any author who hath worſe expreſſed the diſpute betwixt theſe two Painters, than he who makes the greateſt figure in the commentary variorum on Valerius Maximus (26). He affirms that Parrhaſius painted ſome birds on a cloth, ſo very naturally, that Zeuxis fearing the judgment of the birds, with a modeſt ingenuity gave up the cauſe. I am very much miſtaken if his phraſe, Zeuxis alitum judicium timens is not a corruption of Pliny's words, Zeuxis alitum judicio tumens; and if ſo, what greater inſtance can there be of the alterations made in thoughts of authors?

Let us remember that Lancelotti of Perugia, takes all that is ſaid of theſe two pictures to be fabulous. He doth not believe that the birds pecked at Zeuxis's vine, nor that Zeuxis miſtook for a real curtain that of Parrhaſius. It is thus that he clears himſelf of the objection, which this affords to thoſe who have a mean opinion of the Moderns; he denies the fact; a very convenient way of ſolving difficulties. 'Oh, Zeuſi con l'uva dipinta, dite voi, traſſe gli uccelli à beccarla, il che non habbiamo d'alcuno de' noſtri mentovati di ſopra. Già io hò dato dentro con un libro di Farfalloni contra gli antichi Hiſtorici, & hocci rotto, come ſuol dire il Volgo, un paio di ſcarpe, intendinla come vogliono i preſenti o' poſteri bell' Ingegni, e però non temo, che ſono millanterie della Grecia, e Farfalloni di Plinio, e quello dell'uva, e quelli de gli animali, che deſſero ſegno di riconoſcere altri della loro ſpecie fatti di colore per naturali (27). - - - But Zeuxis, you will ſay, painted grapes ſo well that he inticed the birds to fly down, and peck at them: and this is not related of any of the Moderns. I have already publiſhed a book, wherein I expoſe the idle ſtories of the antient Hiſtorians .... Let the preſent, or ſucceeding, Virtuoſo's underſtand this as they pleaſe, yet I doubt not but that the ſtory of the grapes, and that of the animals, who miſtook a picture for living creatures of their own ſpecies, are nothing but the vain boaſts of Greece, and the idle ſtories of Pliny.' Mr Perrault, full as zealous for the Moderns as Lancelotti, hath hit upon a more ſolid anſwer; for he alledges the like performances of a freſh date, which alſo prove that the nicety of painting doth not conſiſt in that. His words are (28): It is ſaid that Zeuxis repreſented ſome grapes ſo naturally, that the birds flew down to peck at them. But what is ſurprizing in this? A great many birds have killed themſelves againſt the Heaven of Ruel's perſpective, by attempting to paſs beyond it, without any perſon being ſurprized at it, and even this has not been much inſiſted upon in praiſing of that perſpective .... (29) Some time ſince, going by the Engliſh nuns, I was an eye-witneſs of an adventure full as honourable to the art of painting, as the ſtory of Zeuxis's grapes, and much more diverting. A new painted picture was ſet to dry in Mr le Brun's yard, the door of which was open; in the fore-part of the piece a great thiſtle was perfectly well repreſented. An honeſt country-woman went by with her aſs, which ſeeing the thiſtle, ſuddenly ran into the yard, threw down the woman, who in vain ſtrove to hold him in by his halter, and if a couple of luſty young fellows had not each of them beſtowed on him fifteen or twenty blows with a cudgel to force him to retire, he had eaten the thiſtle, I mean, that it being newly painted, he would have licked off all the painting with his tongue .... Pliny alſo relates, that Parrhaſius ſo naturally counterfeited a curtain, that Zeuxis himſelf was deceived by it. The like deceptions happen every day, whilſt the pieces which deceive are not at all eſteemed. Cooks have a hundred times laid hold of partridges and capons naturally repreſented, in order to ſpit them; and what followed? The company laughed, and the picture remained in the kitchen.

[G] Under it he placed a verſe, which afterwards became famous.] If we believe Plutarch (30), this verſe was placed under the pieces of Apollodorus. He doth not ſay that Apollodorus himſelf put it there, as Voſſius (31), and Father Hardouin (32) affirm; he ſaith, in general, that it was written on the works of Apollodorus, οὗ τοῖς ἔργοις ἐπιγέγραπται, Μωμήσεταί τις μᾶλλον ἢ μιμήσεται. Cujus operibus inſcriptum fuit, Facilius hæc culpabit quis quàm imitabitur. - - - It was inſcribed on the works of Apollodorus, It is eaſier to blame this picture than to imitate it. This is not the only thing Plutarch aſcribes to Apollodorus, inſtead of attributing it to Zeuxis, as others do; he will have it alſo that Apollodorus invented ſhadows in Painting, ἀνθρώπων πρῶτος ἐξευρὼν φθορὰν καὶ ἀπόχρωσιν σκιᾶς. Primus hominum invenit colorum temperationem diverſorum & umbræ coloribus exprimendæ rationem. The whole paſſage runs thus: Apollodorus, the firſt inventer of the tempering of colours, and of the art of expreſſing ſhadows, was an Athenian, on whoſe works was written,

One may more eaſily blame, than imitate this picture.

A French Poet (33) ſhewing the like aſſurance, ſaith of his Franciade in the following verſes,

Un lit ce livre pour apprendre,
L'autre le lit comme envieux:
Il eſt bien aiſé de reprendre,
Mais mal aiſé de faire mieux.

(24) Some inſtances of it may be ſeen in Gronovius's book de pernicie Judæ. See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, 1684, for May, Art. vi.

(25) The quotation out of Pliny, ought to be mended. It ſhould be lib. liii, inſtead of xxxv. Charles Stephens, and Father Cantel, in his Valerius Maximus, in uſum Delph. quote, lib. lv.

(26) His name is Oliverius. See Valerius Maximus Variorum, of Leyden, 1655, pag. 314.

(27) Secondo Lanceloti da Perugia Abbate Olivetano, l'Hoggidi Part. ii, Diſinganno, xv, pag. 308.

(28) Perrault, Parallèle des Anciens & des Modernes, Tom. i, pag. 136, Dutch Edit.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 137.

(30) Plut. de Gloria Athenienſ. pag. 346.

(31) De Graphice, pag. 79.

(32) In Plin. Tom. v, pag. 200.

(33) Ronſard: ſee his Life.

Some

not improbable that he highly valued his Alcmena (o), ſince he preſented it to the Agrigentines. He did not value himſelf on quickly finiſhing his works [H]. It is ſaid that having painted an old woman, he fell into ſuch an exceſſive fit of laughter at the ſight of that picture, that he died of it. This is what Verrius Flaccus relates (p) [I]. There is in Lucian a deſcription of a picture of Zeuxis which deſerves to be read: that picture repreſented a female centaur. I had collected ſeveral particulars for this article, which I ſuppreſs, on account of the publication of Junius de Pictura Veterum (q) [K]. I ſhall here inſert a remark which was in the additions to my project: it relates to a book of Carlo Dati [L]. I ſhall not forget the firſt remark which I made in the article Zeuxis of my project. It points out ſome general defects in Moreri's Dictionary [M].

(o) Mr Felibien, pag. 56, ſays Athalanta inſtead of Alcmena.

(p) At the word Pictor.

(q) It was printed ſince my Project in the year 1694.

Some read my book to learn, ſome to condemn,
'Tis harder to write better than to blame.

[H] He did not value himſelf on quickly finiſhing his works.] Plutarch relates that Zeuxis being informed that Agatarchus boaſted of painting with eaſe and great diſpatch, ſaid, that as for his own part, he valued himſelf upon his ſlow performance, becauſe that was the way to make his works of a long duration (34). The ſame Plutarch, in another book (35), relates the ſtory, as if Zeuxis owned to ſome people who blamed his ſlowneſs, That it is true he was long in painting his pieces, but they were deſigned for a long time. All writers make him anſwer, that he painted for eternity: and thus this thought has lately been applied to the Dictionary of the French Academy, in the preface to that of Furetiere. It is the buſineſs of thoſe, who amplify the boaſting of this Painter, to ſee what authority they have for it.

[I] This is what Verrius Flaccus relates.] He adds two verſes which allude to this adventure,

Nam quid modi facturus riſu denique,
Ni pictor fieri vult qui riſu mortuus eſt?

He ſets no bounds to his immod'rate laughter,
Thinking who laughs to death muſt be a Painter.

But if it be true that Zeuxis died in this manner, how is it poſſible that ſo few authors ſhould mention it? Was there any thing ſo remarkable in all his liſe as this extraordinary death? However, among the many Antients who have mentioned Zeuxis, only Verrius Flaccus informs us of this uncommon particular. And that by chance, and ſo improperly, that he is reprimanded by his abbreviator Pompeius Feſtus, for inſerting ſuch a thing in a work wherein he deſigned to treat of the ſignification of words. I wiſh we had the paſſage of Verrius Flaccus entire: what remains of it, was in the moſt deplorable condition in the world, before Joſeph Scaliger applied his divining criticiſms to it. Had Moreri and Hofman known this, they would doubtleſs have mentioned it, as they ſhould have done, and then they had given us the two Latin verſes a little more intelligible. Honeſt Raviſius Textor (36) hath not inſerted our Painter in his catalogue of thoſe who died of laughing; which is doubtleſs an involuntary omiſſion.

Obſerve, that Simon Majolus, Biſhop of Voltura-ra, is very much miſtaken in relation to this fact. 'Zeuxis Pictor, ſaith he (37), deformiſſimam ſpectans 'quandam picturam ſolutus in riſum expiravit. Ver'rius alter pictor quod Anum quandam deformiſſimam 'pinxiſſet eandem mortem in riſum ſolutus obiit, Rho'digino teſte lib. 4. cap. 18. - - - The Painter Zeuxis, 'at the ſight of a very deformed picture, fell into ſuch 'an exceſſive fit of laughter, that he died of it. Ver'rius, another Painter, having drawn a moſt deformed 'old woman, fell into the like fit of laughter, and alſo 'died of it, as Rhodiginus teſtifies.' There is a very conſiderable omiſſion in what he ſaith of Zeuxis, and a very great miſtake in the reſt: for this pretended Painter Verrius, who died of laughter, is a chimerical perſon: beſides, Rhodiginus is very ill cited. See the margin (38); you will admire the metamorphoſis of the thoughts tranſcribed by ſome compilers, which is ſometimes as ſurpriſing as thoſe of Ovid.

[K] On account of the publication of Junius de Pictura Veterum.] I had rather refer to the excellent and learned collections of Junius, than heap up things which are to be found there. I take this opportunity to obſerve, that this work of Junius, printed at Rotterdam by Reinier Leers, would, perhaps, have yet lain hid in ſome ſtudy, if the Abbot Nicaiſe (39) had not made a thouſand efforts to procure the edition of it. They forgot to acquaint the public of this in the preface. This excellent work is dedicated to the Abbot BIGNON, one of the moſt illuſtrious protectors which the ſciences at preſent have, and who by his wit, eloquence, and extenſive learning, worthily maintains the glory of the name which he bears. Read that Epiſtle Dedicatory (40).

[L] It relates to a book of Carlo Dati.] Here is the laſt piece of the additions to my Project: 'Since the 'Printing of this article I have met with a book, 'which would have ſaved me a great deal of labour, 'if I had had it ſooner. It is the life of Zeuxis, 'written in Italian by Carlo Dati, and printed at 'Florence in 1667, together with thoſe of Parrha'ſius, Apelles, and Protogenes. The author hath 'collected whatever he found relating to thoſe four 'Painters in the works of the Antients, and hath 'very exactly connected the whole; beſides, he hath 'added to each life, ſeveral remarks, full of very 'fine and curious erudition. Thoſe which relate to 'the life of Zeuxis would afford me a great deal of 'matter, if I was not in the laſt page of my Project. 'I ſhall only obſerve that they have informed me of 'a particular of which Voſſius was ignorant; that is, 'that Bullingerus was not the firſt who ſaid that 'Zeuxis painted Venus and not Helen, from the liv'ing originals which he ſelected out of the beautiful 'maids of the city. Volaterranus, and John della 'Caſa, before him, miſtook the one for the other; 'and what is more, Lipſius hath ſomewhere ſaid '(41), that it was Juno and not Helen that Zeuxis 'painted. I obſerve by the way, that Carlo Dati 'hath cenſured Pliny without good reaſons. He be'lieves, that becauſe the temple of Juno Lacinia was 'near Crotona in Calabria, the Agrigentines did not 'employ Zeuxis to paint a piece in order to be 'conſecrated in that temple. But were not the temple 'of Delphi, and that of Jupiter Olympius filled with 'the gifts of all ſorts of people, as at preſent our Lady 'of Loretto is filled with Ex Voto's from all Catholic 'countries?'

When I publiſhed what you have juſt read, I did not know that Taſſoni fell into the ſame error with Juſtus Lipſius. 'Queſti fu colui, ſaith he (42), ſpeak'ing of Zeuxis, che chiamato da gli Agrigentini, ò 'come hanno altri voluto da i Protoniati (43), à fare 'il ritratto di Giunone, il copiò dalle fatezze piu 'belle di cinque vergine da loro elette fra un numero 'infinito, che ne vide d'ignude. - - - Zeuxis was the 'Painter, who, being deſired by the Agrigentines, or, as 'others will have it, by the Crotoniati, to draw the 'picture of Juno, copied it from the moſt beautiful fea'tures and ſhapes of five of their naked virgins, who 'had been ſingled out from an infinite number of others.' The Italian is not leſs liable to ambiguities than the dead languages: if a Frenchman ſhould place his words as they are in Taſſoni, one would think, with reaſon, that he ſaid that Zeuxis ſaw naked an infinite number of virgins, and that out of this great number, the inhabitants of Agrigentum choſe five to ſerve as an original for this Painter. But the circumſtances of this picture ſhould not be related after this manner.

[M] Some general defects in Moreri's Dictionary.] I ſhall ſet down another piece of my Project, tranſcribed from pag. 387. 'I do not pretend to pro'poſe this article as a perfect model: the world will 'do me ſufficient juſtice, if they find it exempt from 'ſome faults which prevail in Moreri. That au'thor's manner of citing books, is certainly a great

(34) Plut. in Vita Periclis, pag. 159.

(35) Idem, de Multitudine Amicorum, pag. 94.

(36) See his Officina, or Theatrum Hiſtoricum, lib. ii, cap. lxxxvii.

(37) Simon Majolus, Dierum Canicularium, Colloq. iv, pag. 165. Edit. Romanæ, 1597.

(38) Zeuxin pictorem riſu emortuum prodidit Verrius, dum anum à ſe pictam ridet affluentius. - - - Verrius relates that Zeuxis died of laughter, at the picture which he had drawn of an old woman. Cœlius Rhodiginus, lib. iv, cap. xviii, pag. m. 207.

(39) Concerning his good offices to authors, and his zeal for the promoting of learning, ſee Mr Nicole's preface againſt the Quietiſts.

(40) It is very well written, and aſcribed to Father de la Baune.

(41) Lipſ. Monit. Polit. lib. i, cap. i.

(42) Aleſſandro Taſſoni, Penſieri diverſi, lib. x, cap. xix, pag. 414.

(43) It is doubtleſs an error of the preſs inſtead of Crotoniati.

‘fault; he heaps up all his quotations at the end of each article, without letting us know that ſuch a thing was ſaid by this, and ſuch a thing by that author; he therefore gives his reader a great deal of trouble, ſince he is ſometimes obliged to knock at five or ſix doors before he can find the perſon with whom he would ſpeak. This is a predominant fault in ſeveral other books, the conſequences of which were well known to a very able and judicious writer, who hath lately given us the Hiſtory of the Roman Emperors (44). To this I add, that Mr Moreri advances a thouſand things, which we either do not find at all in his citations, or which he confirms by no evidence, or which are curtailed by the omiſſion of certain circumſtances, which are the moſt material parts of a fact, and afford the greater pleaſure. To conclude, I ſay, he doth not always repreſent perſons by what is moſt remarkable in them. And I think thoſe faults will not be diſcovered in my article of Zeuxis.’

(44) Mr de Tillemont. The firſt volume of his book was printed at Paris, in 1690. (See Mr de Beauval's Journal, for the month of June 1691.) His manner of citing in that work, is extremely exact.

ZIA, or ZEA, an iſland of the Archipelago, one of the Cyclades, was antiently called Ceos, or Cea. It is ten thouſand paces from the promontory of Attica, formerly called Sunium (a), and at preſent Capo delle Colonne. It was antiently part of Eubœa, but the ſea ſeparated it, and afterwards waſhed away almoſt one fourth part of its length, which was five hundred ſtadia, or ſixty two thouſand five hundred paces (b) [A]. In Strabo's time, the four cities which had been in the iſle of Cea, were reduced to two, one of which was called Julis, and the other Carthæa (c). One of the two ruined cities bore the name of Careſſus, and the other that of Pæeeſſa. There was in the neighbourhood of theſe two laſt towns a temple dedicated to Apollo Smintheus; and betwixt the ruins of Pæeeſſa and this temple, was that of Minerva Nedufia, which Neſtor conſecrated after his return from Troy (d). I have elſewhere mentioned (e) the names of ſome illuſtrious perſonages born in the iſle of Cea, and (f) whatever relates to it with reſpect to Ariſtæus the inventer of honey. I muſt add here, that a woman of this iſland invented the art of ſpinning the production of the ſilk-worms, and of weaving it into ſtuffs [B]; and that it was the cuſtom of the inhabitants to poiſon themſelves as ſoon as they were arrived at a certain age [C]. The port of Zia is one of the ſecureſt harbours in the Mediterranean, beſides, the ſhips there take in freſh water, biſket and wood (g). The iſland pays

(a) Plinius, lib. iv, cap. xii, pag. m. 453.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Strabo, lib. x, pag. 335. See alſo Pliny, ibid.

(d) Strabo, ibid.

(e) In the article Julis.

(f) Above, in the firſt article of ARISTÆUS.

(g) Guillet, Athenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. m. 85.

[A] It's length was five hundred ſtadia, or ſixty-two thouſand five hundred paces.] Pliny affirms it: Mr Baudrand is therefore miſtaken in aſſerting, on the teſtimony of this author, that the circuit of the iſle of Cea was formerly ſixty thouſand paces (1), There is a great difference betwixt the circuit and the length of an iſland; however, he ought to have followed the account of his author without any diminution. He adds, that at preſent the circuit of this iſland is ſcarce forty thouſand paces, the ſea having ſwallowed up a part of it.

[B] A woman of this iſland invented the art of ſpinning the production of the ſilk-worms, and of weaving it into ſtuffs.] Pliny and Solinus affirm it. ‘Ex hac (inſula) profectam delicatiorem feminis veſtem, auctor eſt Varro (2). - - - - Varro relates that the fine garment worn by the women, came from this iſland.’ ‘Ceos quæ ut Varro teſtis eſt, ſubtilioris veſtis amicula arte lanificæ ſcientiæ prima in ornamentum fœminarum dedit (3). - - - Ceos, which as Varro teſtifies, firſt produced, by the art of manufacturing wool, the fine garments which the women wear for ornament.’ What follows is more exact. ‘Telas araneorum modo texunt (bombyces) ad veſtem luxumque feminarum, quæ bombycina appellatur. Prima eas redordiri, rurſuſque texere invenit in Ceo Mulier Pamphila, Latoi filia, non fraudanda gloria excogitatæ rationis, ut denudet feminas veſtis (4). - - - - The ſilk-worms ſpin webs in like manner as ſpiders: theſe webs ſerve for the luxurious apparel of the women, which are called ſilken garments. The art of firſt ſpinning, and afterwards weaving, theſe webs was invented in the iſle of Ceos, by a woman named Pamphila, the daughter of Latous: ſhe muſt not be deprived of the glory of having invented this garment, which makes the womens ſhapes appear to greater advantage.’ Ariſtotle (5) furniſhed Pliny with this particular. Salmaſius pretends that Ariſtotle's words ought to be underſtood of the iſle of Cos, and that Pliny is miſtaken in underſtanding them of the iſle of Ceos (6). His pretenſion is not utterly groundleſs, but it is not inconteſtable.

[C] It was the cuſtom of the inhabitants to poiſon themſelves as ſoon as they arrived at a certain age.] It is pretended that they were obliged to this by a law. Strabo, on this ſubject, cites two verſes of Menander, and believes that the perſons who had paſſed the age of ſixty, were obliged to conform to that law, that a ſufficient ſtore of proviſions might be left for the reſt of the inhabitants. Παρὰ τούτοις δὲ δοκεῖ τεθῆναί ποτε νόμος, οὗ μέμνηται καὶ Μένανδρος:

Καλὸν τὸ Κείων νόμιμόν ἐστι Φανία
Ὁ μὴ δυνάμενος ζῆν καλῶς, οὐ ζῇ κακῶς

Προσέταττε γὰρ ὡς ἔοικεν ὁ νόμος τοὺς ὑπὲρ ἑξήκοντα ἔτη γεγονότας κονεάζεσθαι, τοῦ διαρκεῖν τοῖς ἄλλοις τὴν τροφήν. i. e. Apud hos lex poſita aliquando videtur, cujus meminit etiam Menander:

Optimum Ciorum inſtitutum eſt Phania
Qui non poteſt vivere bene, non vivat male.

Jubebat enim, ut videtur, lex, eos qui ſexaginta annos exceſſiſſent, cicutam bibere, ut aliis victus ſufficere (7). - - - - There ſeems to have been once a law among this people, which Menander mentions,

Brave edict of the Cean commonweal,
Let not the man live ill, who can't live well.

It therefore ſeems that this law enjoined that thoſe who exceeded ſixty years ſhould drink hemlock juice, to the end that a ſufficient quantity of proviſions might be left for the reſt of the inhabitants. He alſo ſays it was reported that the inhabitants of this iſle being beſieged by thoſe of Athens made a decree, by which they condemned to death all the old men whereupon the Athenians retired. The Greek word κονεάζεσθαι in Strabo ought to be changed into κωνειάζεσθαι which ſignifies to drink the juice of hemlock. This is Caſaubon's conjecture (8), which he confirms by two paſſages, one out of Heraclides, and the other out of Ælian. The firſt of theſe authors ſaith that the air of the iſle of Cea is ſo good, that men, but more eſpecially women, might live there to a great age; but that they do not make any advantage of this favour of nature, and before they ſuffer the infirmities of a frail old age, they diſpatch themſelves out of the world ſome by the uſe of poppy, and others by that of hemlock. Οὔσης δὲ ὑγιεινῆς τῆς νήσου, καὶ εὐγήρων τῶν ἀνθρώπων, μάλιστα δὲ τῶν γυναικῶν, οὐ περιμένουσι γηραιοὶ τελευτὴν, ἀλλὰ πρὶν ἀσθενῆσαι, ἢ πηρωθῆναί τι, οἱ μὲν μήκωνι, οἱ δὲ κωνείῳ ἑαυτοὺς ἐξάγουσι. Quum ſalubri cœlo fruatur hæc inſula, & extremam ſenectam attingere ibi hominibus detur, præſertim fœminis, non expectant tamen provectæ ætatis qui ſunt, fatum ſuum, ſed illud antevertunt priuſquam vel imbecillitas accedat, vel parte aliqua manci fiant, ita ut hi quidem papavere, illi verò cicuta ſibi ipſis vitam eripiant (9). As for Ælian, he affirms that thoſe who by reaſon of a decrepit age found themſelves incapable of doing

(1) Baudrand, Geograph. Tom. i, pag. 251.

(2) Plinius, lib. iv, cap. xii, pag. m. 453.

(3) Solin. cap. vii, pag. m. 23.

(4) Plin. lib. xi, cap. xxii, pag. 515.

(5) Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. lib. v, cap. xix, pag. m. 649.

(6) Salmaſ. in Solin. pag. 144.

(7) Strabo, lib. x, pag. 335.

(8) Caſaub. Comment. in hunc locum Strabonis, pag. m. 165.

(9) Heraclides, de Politiis, pag. m. 20. Note that Berkelius, in Stephanum Byzantinum, pag. 421, falſely ſuppoſes, that Heraclides ſaid that women were particularly obliged to execute the law.

pays to the Turk ſeventeen hundred piaſtres for the Caraſch, and two thouſand five hundred by way of tenth (b). The Biſhop of Thermia paſſes half the year in this iſland (i): it hath at preſent a large city and a ruined caſtle. Conſult Moreri's Dictionary at the word Zea. He ſhould have referred the reader to this word, rather than to that of Cea, when he ſet down the word Zia.

doing ſervice to the public, aſſembled together at a feſtival and drunk the juice of hemlock. Νόμος ἐϛὶ Κείων, οἱ πάνυ παρ' αὐτοῖς γεγηρακότες, ὥσπερ ἐπὶ ξένια παρακαλοῦντες ἑαυτούς, ἢ ἐπί τινα ἑορταϛικὴν θυσίαν ἀνελθόντες, καὶ ϛεφανωσάμενοι, πίνουσι κώνειον, ὅταν ἑαυτοῖς συνειδῶσιν, ὅτι πρὸς τὰ ἔργα τὰ τῇ πατρίδι λυσιτελοῦντα ἄχρηϛοί εἰσιν, ὑποληρούσης ἤδη τι αὐτοῖς καὶ τῆς γνώμης διά τὸν χρόνον. Conſuetudo eſt apud Ceos, ut ii, qui ſenio plane confecti ſunt, tanquam ad convivium ſe mutuo invitent, aut ad quoddam ſolenne ſacrificium conveniant, & coronati cicutam bibant: quum ſibi ipſis conſcii ſunt, ſe ad promovenda commoda patriæ inutiles amplius eſſe, animo jam ob ætatem delirare incipiente (10). Pinedo (11), Kuhnius (12), and Berkelius (13), approve of Caſaubon's correction, and there is no room to doubt of it's being a good one. Scaliger (14) citing the paſſage of Strabo reads κωνιάζεσθαι, and not κονεάζεσθαι. Here is another of Caſaubon's conjectures: he believes that Stephanus Byzantinus (15), who relates the ſame particular with Strabo, but inſtead of telling us that the old men drank hemlock juice, ſaith that they fought duels together, ἀγωνίζεσθαι, in certamine dimicare, made uſe of a copy of Strabo where the reading was κονίεσθαι or κονίζεσθαι in arenam deſcendere, and not κωνιάζεσθαι. Berkelius rejects this conjecture on pretence that it is contrary to the practice of the old men of Ceos, and to the teſtimony of Hiſtorians (16); but he did not in the leaſt apprehend Caſaubon's thought; he fancied that Caſaubon ſuppoſed that this word might be that of Strabo, whereas he ſhould have known that Caſaubon ſuppoſed the copy of Stephanus Byzantinus to be corrupted. Mr Kuhnius offers another conjecture, which is that the reading in Strabo was ἀκονίζεσθαι to drink aconite or wolf-bane (17): the change of that word into ἀγωνίζεσθαι might very eaſily happen. Pighius had before him told us that the text of Stephanus ought to be corrected in that manner (18).

We muſt now examine whether this practice of the old men of Cea was founded on a decree of the ſtate or barely on one of thoſe cuſtoms, which being once linked with the notions of a greatneſs of ſoul, are almoſt as ſtrictly obſerved as the legal decrees. We have ſeen that Strabo was of opinion that there was an edict, which obliged them to kill themſelves after having paſſed the age of ſixty years. But very probably he is miſtaken, for ſince the air of this iſle was very heathful, and the inhabitants lived very long (19), the common-wealth would have been deprived of ſeveral robuſt ſubjects, who were ſtill capable of ſerving their country, had they been forced by the authority of the laws to poiſon themſelves at the age of ſixty one years. And obſerve that the expreſſions of Heraclides inſinuate rather a voluntary cuſtom than an obligatory law. Obſerve alſo that Ælian's words very clearly ſpecify decrepit perſons, and not thoſe who had attained the age of ſixty-one. All this tends to refute the opinion of Strabo. If it was true, we could at leaſt prove that this edict was not in force in the iſle of Cea in Tiberius's time. The proof which Valerius Maximus hath given us of it, will let us into the true ſtate of the caſe. Wherefore it will be proper here to conſider the circumſtances of that writer's narrative: they will make it appear that the public authority did not interpoſe any farther than to permit thoſe who were weary of living to poiſon themſelves, but not to command thoſe who had paſſed a certain age to do it. Valerius Maximus before he gives an account of what he ſaw in the iſle of Cea, relates that at Marſeilles a poiſoning liquor was kept by the public, and given to thoſe who offered ſatisfactory reaſons to the Senate why they deſired to rid themſelves of their lives. The Senate examined their reaſons with a certain temperament, which neither indulged a paſſionate and raſh inclination to die, nor oppoſed a reaſonable deſire of death, whether they wanted to deliver themſelves from the perſecutions of ill fortune, or would not run the riſk of being forſaken by proſperity. This was the rule of the Senate, they forced no body to poiſon himſelf, but granted a permiſſion to do it when they judged it proper: none could kill himſelf in the due form, and canonicamente, without being authorized by the ſovereign. Venenum cicuta temperatum in ea civitate publicè cuſtoditur, quod datur ei, qui cauſas Sexcentis (id enim Senatus ejus nomen eſt) exhibuit, propter quas mors ſit illi expetenda: Cognitione virili benevolentia temperata, quæ nec egredi vita temere patitur, & ſapienter excedere cupienti celerem fati viam præbet; ut vel adverſa, vel proſpera nimis uſis fortuna (utraque enim finiendi ſpiritus, illa ne perſeveret, hæc ne deſtituat, rationem præbet) comprobato exitu terminetur (20). The author adds, that in his opinion this practice at Marſeilles was borrowed from Greece (21); for I have obſerved, ſaith he, that it is alſo in uſe in the iſle of Cea. Upon this he relates that going into Aſia with Sextus Pompeius, and paſſing through the city of Julis, he was preſent at the death of a lady aged above ninety years. She had declared to her ſuperiors the reaſons which induced her to depart this life, after that, ſhe kept her ſelf ready to drink the poiſon; and as ſhe thought that Pompey's preſence would add a great luſtre to the ceremony, ſhe cauſed him to be moſt humbly ſupplicated to be preſent. He granted the favour, and with the moſt preſſing inſtances eloquently exhorted her to conſent to live, but all in vain. She thanked him for his kindneſs, and prayed that he might be rewarded not ſo much by the gods whom ſhe was going to, as by thoſe whom ſhe quitted (22). She declared that ſhe had been always favoured by fortune, and would not expoſe her ſelf to the reverſe of it. Ceterum ipſa hilarem Fortunæ vultum ſemper experta, ne aviditate lucis triſtem intueri cogar; reliquias ſpiritus mei proſpero fine, duas filias & ſeptem nepotum gregem ſuperſtitem relictura, permuto (23). She left two daughters and ſeven grand children, and having exhorted them to a mutual agreement and concord, &c. with an undaunted courage ſhe took the glaſs which contained the poiſon, and after recommending her ſelf to Mercury to obtain a happy and ſucceſsful paſſage, ſhe greedily drank off the mortal liquor. Cohortata deinde ad concordiam ſuos, diſtributo eis patrimonio, & cultu ſuo ſacriſque domeſticis majori filiæ traditis; poculum, in quo venenum temparatum erat, conſtanti dextra arripuit. Tum defuſis Mercurio delibamentis, & invocato numine ejus, ut ſe placido itinere in meliorem ſedis infernæ deduceret partem; cupido hauſtu mortiferam traxit potionem (24). I omit the reſt of the relation; and would not have cited ſo much, had it not been very rare to find in the heathen writers, the manner of their recommending themſelves to the gods at the point of death. I do not remember to have ever obſerved that they aſked the pardon of their ſins. Nor do we ſee that this lady of the iſle of Cea put up ſuch a petition.

Let us obſerve by the way that the heathens admired leſs thoſe, who killed themſelves in their misfortunes, than thoſe who did ſo, when they were under proſperous circumſtances, and only in order to eſcape the inconſtancies of fate. A man was no ſooner prepoſſeſſed with the maxims of the Stoicks, but he looked upon thoſe as cowards who were fond of life during bodily infirmities or diſgraceful misfortunes. In ſuch caſes death was accounted the only remedy which one ought to have recourſe to without murmuring or complaining, and it was pretended that none, but thoſe who loved life, would accuſe the gods and men. Otho when dying made uſe of this maxim. ‘ Plura ‘ de extremis loqui, pars ignaviæ eſt: præcipuum ‘ deſtinationis meæ documentum habete, quod de ‘ nemine queror; nam incuſare deos vel homines, ‘ ejus eſt, qui vivere velit (25). - - - - - To ſay much of ‘ death is an indication of cowardice. I die with this ‘ reſolution, to complain of no body: for to accuſe the ‘ gods, or men, is the part of a man who deſires to ‘ live.’

(b) Spon, Voiage, Tom. i, pag. 149, Dutch Edition.

(i) Baudrand, Geogr. Tom. i, pag. 251.

(10) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. iii, cap. xxxvii.

(11) In Steph. Byzant. pag. 332.

(12) In Ælian. ubi ſupra.

(13) In Steph. Byzant. p. 421.

(14) Scaliger. in Varronem de Ling. Lat. lib. vi, p. m. 118.

(15) Steph. Byzant. voce Ἴουλις.

(16) Hæc quanquam ſpecioſa videntur, minime approbanda judico, cum antiquo ritui & Hiſtoriæ plane ſint contraria. Berkel. ubi ſupra, pag. 421.

(17) Kuhnius in Ælian. ubi ſupra, pag. 233.

(18) Pighius in Valerium Maximum, lib. ii, cap, vi.

(19) See the quotation out of Heraclides, above, num. (9).

(20) Valer. Maximus, lib. ii, cap. vi, num. 7, in Ext. pag. m. 180.

(21) E Græcia tralatam inde exiſtimo, quod illam ETIAM in inſula Ceo ſervari animadverti. Id. ibid. num. 8.

(22) Tibi quidem, inquit, Sex. Pompei Dii magis, quos relinquo, quam quos peto, gratias referant: quia nec hortator vitæ meæ, nec mortis ſpectator eſſe faſtidiſti. Id. ib. pag. 181.

(23) Id. ibid.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xlvii.

ZIEGLER (JAMES) profeſſor of Divinity, a Mathematician and Coſmographer, flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He was born at Landſhut in Bavaria [A]. He is ſaid to have been a Mathematical profeſſor in the univerſity of Upſal (a). Paul Jovius thought him a Swede, probably becauſe Ziegler wrote ſome books concerning that country [B]. But that proof will be ſcarce ſufficient to thoſe who ſhould only ſay that he reſided there ſome time; for he declares himſelf that he compoſed his book concerning Scandinavia from memoirs communicated to him while he was at Rome [C]. The Biſhop of Paſſau (b), a very learned prelate, was his Mecenas, and erected a tomb to him in his epiſcopal city (c). Ziegler had retired to this prelate's court, when the terror of the Ottoman armies obliged him to leave Vienna where he had taught a long time (d). He died in Auguſt 1549, and not in 1559, as Moreri ſays. The reading of ſome of his books hath been prohibited by the Inquiſition; and that of others premitted only on condition that ſome things be corrected in them, and that the note of condemned author be always placed by the word Ziegler (e). Some Proteſtant authors acknowledge him as their brother (f). In the year 1523, he was ſtrongly inclined to turn Proteſtant, as appears by a book which he wrote at Rome in favour of Eraſmus againſt James Stunica

(a) Schefferus, in Suecia Literata, pag. m. 273. He quotes Meſſenius in Sueopentap. cap. vi.

(b) His name was Wolfgang, and he was of the houſe of the Counts of Salm.

(c) Gaſpar Bruſchius, de Laureaca & Patavio Germanico, lib. ii, pag. 273, 274, & in Epitaphio Jacobi Ziegleri, ibid. pag. 322.

(d) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. m. 118.

(e) See the Index Librorum prohibitorum, pag. 546, Edition 1667.

(f) See Mollerus Hypomn. ad Sueciam Literatam, pag. 441.

[A] He was born at Landſhut in Bavaria.] And not at Landau, as we are told in the French tranſlation of Thuanus cited by Mr Teiſſier (1). The ſame thing is aſſerted with an additional error in Moreri's Dictionary; for it is there ſpecified that James Ziegler was born at Landau in the Lower Alſatia. The Dutch editions, and that of Paris (2), have corrupted this place inſtead of correcting it; for they have changed the Lower Alſatia into the Lower Germany. Thuanus called him Lindavus (3), which rather ſignifies that Ziegler was of Lindau than of Landau. However that be, we ought to believe that when Geſner (4), and ſeveral others call him Landavum Bavarum, they mean that he was born at Landſhut. Paul Jovius is miſtaken in making him a Swede. I ſhall give his own words in the following remark. His error was followed by ſome authors, as Mr Mollerus obſerves in his additions to John Scheffer's Suecia Literata page 441. The learned Mr Schurtzfleiſch (5), does not follow Jovius, but he affirms that our Ziegler was originally a Swede. I do not know any more than Mr Mollerus whether he is in the right.

[B] Paul Jovius thought him a Swede, probably becauſe he wrote ſome books concerning that country.] He quotes with great encomiums what Ziegler wrote concerning the cruelty of King Chriſtian II. 'Quis eò Latinas 'literas, quò Romana arma penetrare nequierint, 'perveniſſe non miretur? Hic enim in terra Gothica 'natus, ac educatus, adeò exactè, puriter & facundè, 'Chriſtierni Daniæ, atque Norvegiæ Regis immanitatem, neque ipſi ſanguinario Tyranno diu lætam, 'neque demum Diis ultoribus neglectam perſcripſit, 'ut eruditis gentibus pudori eſſe poſſit; quòd Latinæ 'facundiæ fruges, ſub Cimmerio cælo penè felicius 'ac uberius, quam ſub hac benigniore, ac temperatiore plaga proveniant (6). - - - - - - Is it not 'very ſurpriſing, that the Latin tongue ſhould reach that 'country, whether the Roman arms could never penetrate. For James Ziegler, born and educated in a 'Gothic land, has with ſo much accuracy, purity, and 'elegance, deſcribed the cruelties of Chriſtian King of 'Denmark and Norway, in which the blood thirſty 'tyrant did not long triumph, nor at laſt eſcape the 'avenging hand of Heaven, that learned nations may 'well be aſhamed that Roman eloquence, planted in a 'northern ſoil, ſhould thrive and proſper better than in 'this more benign and temperate climate.' Schefferus obſerves that this book of Ziegler was printed at Straſburg by Wendelin Rhiel in the year 1536 (7). Geſner ſaith the ſame thing, but obſerves that it was printed with ſome other books of the ſame author, and with a deſcription of the Holy Land written by Wolffgang of Weiſſenburg: 'Terræ ſanctæ, quam 'Palæſtinam nominant, Syriæ, Arabiæ, Ægypti, & 'Schondiæ doctiſſima deſcriptio, unà cum ſingulis 'tabulis earundem regionum topographicis. Item, 'Holmiæ planè regiæ urbis calamitoſiſſima clades ab 'eodem deſcripta: cujus libri & hic titulus eſt: 'Chriſtierni ſecundi regis Danmarchiæ crudelitas perpetrata in proceres Sueciæ & populum Holmenſem. 'Volumen impreſſum Argentorati apud Wend. Rihelium, 1536 in folio cum alia deſcriptione Terræ 'ſanctæ juxta ordinem alphabeti, ad ſcripturam proxime directa, authore Wolffgango Weiſſenburgio (8). '- - - - - A learned deſcription of the Holy Land, called 'Paleſtine, of Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Scandinavia, 'together with Topographical maps, of each of theſe 'countries. Likewiſe the calamitous overthrow of the 'royal city of Stockholm, deſcribed by the ſame author, 'in a book intituled; The cruelties perpetrated by Chriſtian 'II King of Denmark, on the Nobles of Sweden, and 'the inhabitants of Stockholm. This volume is printed 'at Straſburg by Wend. Rhiel in the year 1536, in 'folio, together with another deſcription of the Holy Land 'in alphabetical order, deſigned for the underſtanding of 'the Bible, by Wolffgang Weiſſenburg.' This Hiſtory of the cruelties of Chriſtian is inſerted in the ſecond tome of the Scriptores hiſtoriæ Germanicæ, printed at Baſil by the care of Schardius in the year 1574. It was joined by Wolfius, with Ziegler's Scandinavia, to Albertus Krantzius's Hiſtoria Regnorum Septentrionalium, of the Francfort edition in 1583. The index Librorum prohibitorum (9) informs us that the deſcription of the Holy Land, &c. was printed at Straſburg apud Petrum Olipionem in the year 1532. Geſner knew not of this edition.

[C] He declares . . . . . . that he compoſed his book concerning Scandinavia, from memoirs communicated to him while he was at Rome.] I ſhall ſet down a piece of his preface, extracted out of Geſner's Bibliotheque in the 368th leaf. 'Ego qui de locis Septentrionalibus, veteri hiſtoriæ incognitis, commentarium 'æditurus ſum, atque ita ut illa loca rebus his, unde 'regiones beatæ dicuntur, affluentia ſim oſtenſurus, 'ut hæc plena fide apud auditorem reponam, neceſſario 'quoque præfabor quibus auctoribus conſtet ſuſceptum 'opus. Romæ dum eſſem, fuerunt in urbe continuo 'tempore, duo archiepiſcopi Nidroſienſes regni Norduegiæ, prior quidem gente Danus, &c. Poſt hujus mortem ſubſtitutus ei Olavus Romam venit, quem 'frequenter conveni, & didicit reliqua Norduegiæ, 'quanta tradi ab uno potuerunt. Gothiam vero, 'Sueciamque, & Finlandiam, ſupraque has ad Boream 'Laponiam extenſam, ſed etiam Gronlandiæ Cherſoneſum & inſulam Tylen accepi à reverendis epiſcopis, Joanne Magno Upſalienſi, & Petro Aoroſienſi Gothis, tunc in urbe privatis amicis, & 'mecum conjunctiſſime converſatis. Et quidem Upſalienſis in commentario Schondiæ ſcribendæ antea 'fuerat, permiſeratque id cenſuræ noſtræ, &c. '- - - - - - As I am going to publiſh a book concerning the 'northern countries, which were unknown to antient 'hiſtorians, and to make it appear that thoſe parts 'abound in ſuch things as denominate a country happy; 'in order to gain credit with my readers, I ſhall give 'a prefatory account of my vouchers. While I was at 'Rome, there lived in that city two Archbiſhops of 'Drontheim in the Kingdom of Norway, one a Dane '&c. After his death his ſucceſſor Alaus coming to 'Rome, I frequently viſited him, and learned of him 'the other matters concerning Norway, as much as 'could be related by one ſingle perſon. What concerns 'Gothland, Sweden, and Finland, and Lapland lying 'to the north of theſe countries, and alſo of Groenland, and the iſland of Iceland, I had from two 'reverend Prelates both born at Goth land, who lived 'at Rome in private friendſhip and great intimacy with 'me. And indeed the Biſhop of Upſal, one of them, had 'been formerly imployed in writing a book concerning 'Schoonen, and had ſubmitted it to my amendments &c.'

(1) Teiſſier, Addit aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 20, Edit. 1696.

(2) In the year 1699.

(3) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. 118, Edit. Francof. 1625.

(4) Geſner. in Biblioth. fol. 367.

(5) Page 34, of his Diſſertation de Rebus Sueo-Gothicis, apud Mollerum Hypomn. ad Sueciam Literatam, pag. 441.

(6) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. cxxxviii, pag. m. 281.

(7) Scheffer. in Suecia Literata, pag. 273, Edit. 1699.

(8) Geſner. in Bibl. fol. 367, verſo.

(9) Page 546, of the edition 1667.

Stunica [D], and which was printed at Baſil by John Froben in the ſame year. What he wrote on Aſtronomy is not amiſs [E]. There are ſeveral other authors called Ziegler; ſome of whom are in Mr Konig, but not Jerom Ziegler profeſſor of Poetry at Ingolſtad in the XVIth century. He publiſhed Aventinus's Annals, as I have ſaid (g), and wrote ſeveral dramatic poems which are publiſhed (b).

[D] A book which he wrote at Rome in favour of Eraſmus.] The title of it is, 'Libellus Jacobi Ziegleri Landavi Bavari adverſus Jacobi Stunicæ maledicentiam, pro Germania. The Printer Frobenius ſaith of it: Commodum à Roma miſſus eſt Libellus Jacobi Ziegleri Landavi Bavari, quo promittit perpetuam rerum geſtarum ſeriem ex quatuor Evangeliis contextam, & obiter Stunicam pro ipſius dignitate tractat . . . . . Videtur hic Landavus homo multæ reconditæque lectionis, ingenio feſtivo, magno judicio, ſtilo non neglecto, denique toto pectore Germanam ſpirans indolem. - - - - - - The book of James Ziegler of Landſhut in Bavaria was ſent from Rome, at a very ſeaſonable time: in this book he promiſes to give a continued Hiſtory from the four Evangeliſts; and he occaſionally takes to taſk Stunica, in a manner ſuitable to his deſerts. This Bavarian ſeems to be a man of extenſive and curious learning, of a facetious humour, and of great judgment: he ſeems not to be wanting in ſtile, and to have all the accompliſhments of a German.'

[E] What he wrote on Aſtronomy is not amiſs.] At Baſil in the year 1536, was publiſhed in 4to his book, de conſtructione ſolidæ Sphæræ, cum Scholiis in Opuſculum Procli de Sphæra, & de canonica per Sphæram operatione, & de hemicyclio Beroſi memorato à Vitruvio (10). Adjunctis Arati phænomenis Græcis, cum Commentariis Theonis. His Commentary on the ſecond book of Pliny; quo difficultates Plinianæ, præſertim Aſtronomicæ, omnes tolluntur: item Organum quo catholica ſyderum, ut apud Plinium eſt, mira arte docetur, was printed at Baſil in 1531. Of this James Milichius ſpeaks honourably in the Preface to a book which he publiſhed on that ſubject in the year 1534, in 4to (11). 'Extant, ſaith he (12), in hunc librum (ſecundum Plinii) Cigleri hominis docti, Commentarii, erudite & ſubtiliter ſcripti, ſed neque integrum librum interpretantur, & à ſcholarum conſuetudine nonnihil recedunt. Quare ſpero eum boni conſulturum eſſe, quòd Amicis morem geſſi, qui mihi autores fuerunt, ut hæc ad utilitatem juventutis collecta ederem. Adeo enim nihil de ipſius exiſtimatione detraho, ut libenter profitear, me ab ipſo ſæpe adjutum eſſe. - - - - There are extant on this ſecond book of Pliny the Commentaries of the learned Ziegler, which are written with great erudition and acuteneſs, but they do not explain the whole book, and depart a little from the uſages of ſchools. I hope therefore he will take it in good part that I comply with my friends, who have adviſed me to publiſh this commentary for the uſe of youth. And ſo far am I from derogating from the merit of Ziegler, that I willingly own I have been frequently aſſiſted by him.'

ZOROASTER, King of the Bactrians, was vanquiſhed by Ninus, and paſſed for the inventer of Magic [A]. Euſebius places this victory of Ninus in the ſeventh year of Abraham, and ſeveral authors make Zoroaſter much antienter. There are alſo ſome who

[A] He was vanquiſhed by Ninus, and paſſed for the inventer of Magic.] The following words of Juſtin inform us that this was the laſt victory of this conqueror, and that Zoroaſter philoſophized very judiciouſly on the principles of the univerſe, and the motion of the ſtars. Poſtremum illi (Nino) bellum cum Zoroaſtre rege Bactrianorum fuit, qui primus dicitur artes magicas inveniſſe, & mundi principia, ſiderumque motus diligentiſſime ſpectaſſe. Hoc occiſo, & ipſe deceſſit (1). Some (2) aſcribe to Semiramis the glory of having vanquiſhed Zoroaſter. They doubtleſs mean ſomewhat more than what we read in Diodorus Siculus (3), viz. that being gone to her huſband at the ſiege of Bactra, ſhe adviſed and made an attack, which ended in the reduction of the city. After which Ninus married her. I believe they mean that one of the wars which ſhe glorioully terminated after the death of that great monarch, was that in which Zoroaſter loſt his dominions. An Hiſtorian (4), cited by Syncellus, treats of the birth of Semiramis and of that Magician, after having related the actions of Ninus (5). It is therefore to Semiramis rather than Ninus, that he aſcribes the victory of which we are ſpeaking, and I cannot tell whether to confirm this, we might not take advantage of the following Latin Verſes.

Perſarum ſtatuit Babylona Semiramis urbem,
. . . .
. . . .
Juſſit & imperio ſurgere Bactra caput (6).

. . . . Semiramis
Rais'd Babylon, the Perſian town, ...
. . . .
. . . . and bad
The Bactrian city riſe her empire's head.

Mr Stanley (7) ſaith, that Zoroaſter, according to Euſebius, was cotemporary with Semiramis; but it is certain, that, according to Euſebius, he was vanquiſhed by King Ninus. If what Arnobius ſaith be true, that magical ſecrets were uſed on both ſides in this war betwixt the Aſſyrians and Bactrians, it will be difficult to believe that Zoroaſter was the inventer of that art; for it muſt be ſuppoſed that theſe ſecrets quickly paſſed into Chaldæa, and that they grew to ſuch a great perfection in a very ſhort time, that Ninus's Magicians were able to conteſt with, and overcome, the inventer. I do not lay this down as an impoſſibility. But Arnobius's words runs thus: 'Ut inter Aſſyrios & Bactrianos Nino quondam Zoroaſtreque ductoribus non tantum ferro dimicaretur & viribus, verum etiam magicis & Chaldæorum ex reconditis diſciplinis, invidia noſtra hæc fuit (8). - - - - Antiently the Aſſyrians and Bactrians, the former under the conduct of Ninus, and the latter under that of Zoroaſter, fought againſt each other, not only with armed men, but alſo by the help of Magical arts, and the ſecret diſcipline of the Chaldeans.' Ammianus Marcellinus will have it, that Zoroaſter was only the augmenter of the Magical ſecrets of the Chaldeans (9). Some authors inform us that Azonaces was Zoroaſter's inſtructer, and conſequently Azonaces muſt be conſidered as the inventer of Magic: 'Hermippus qui de tota ea arte diligentiſſime ſcripſit, & vicies centum millia verſuum à Zoroaſtre condita, indicibus quoque voluminum ejus poſitis explanavit, præceptorem, à quo inſtitutum diceret, tradidit Azonacem, ipſum vero quinque millibus annorum ante Trojanum bellum fuiſſe (10). - - - Hermippus, who hath written with great care on every thing relating to this art, and explained twenty thouſand verſes compoſed by Zoroaſter, relates that Azonaces was the perſon who initiated him in this art, and that he lived five thouſand years before the Trojan war.' St Auguſtin (11) and Oroſius (12) have followed the tradition mentioned by Juſtin. Apuleius, in his catalogue of the moſt famous Magicians of antiquity places Zoroaſter in the firſt rank, and makes him the moſt antient of all. 'Si quamlibet medicum emolumentum probaveritis, ego ille ſim Carinondas, vel Damigeron, vel Moſes, vel Jannes, vel Apollonius, vel ipſe Dardanus, vel quicumque alius POST Zoroaſtrem & Hoſtanem inter Magos celebratus eſt (13). - - - - If you will prove that it is of any advantage, then let me paſs for Carinondas, or Damigeron, or Moſes, or Jannes, or Apollonius, or Dardanus himſelf, or for any other celebrated Magus SINCE THE TIME of Zoroaſter and Hoſtanes.'

Obſerve, that Diodorus Siculus (14), who very amply relates the war betwixt Ninus and the Bactrians, calls the

---

(g) Remark [C], of the article AVENTINUS.

(b) See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, pag. m. 355.

(10) Lib. ix, cap. ix.

(11) Father Harduin, Præf. in Plinium, mentions that edition. I have not ſeen it, nor that of the year 1538, Halæ Suevorum, in 4to, mentioned by Geſner; but I have ſeen that of Francfort 1543, in 4to, and that of Leipſic, typis Wœgelianis, 1573, in 4to.

(12) Jacobus Milichius Præfat. Commentarii in II Librum Plinii, fol. A 5, Edit. Lipſ. 1573.

(1) Juſtin. lib. i, cap. i.

(2) Theo, in Progym. cap. ix, pag. m. 112.

(3) Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii, cap. vi.

(4) Called Cephalion. He lived under Hadrian. See Marſham, ubi infra.

(5) Syncellus, pag. 167, apud Marſham. Chron. Can. ad Sæcul. ix, pag. m. 144.

(6) Propert. Eleg. X, libr. iii.

(7) Thomas Stanleius, Hiſt. Philoſ. Orientalis, lib. i, cap. iii, pag. 10, ex verſione Jo. Clerici.

(8) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 5.

(9) Cujus (Magiæ) ſcientiæ ſeculis priſcis multa ex Chaldæorum arcanis Bactrianus addidit Zoroaſtres. Amm. Marcell. lib. xxiii, cap. vi, pag. m. 374.

(10) Plinius, lib. xxx, cap. i, pag. m. 725.

(11) Magicarum artium fuiſſe perhibetur inventor (Zoroaſtres). Auguſtin. de Civitat. Dei, lib. xxi, cap. xiv.

(12) Oroſius, lib. i, cap. iv.

(13) Apuleius, Apolog. pag. m. 331.

(14) Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii, cap. iv, & ſeq.

who make him of a much later date: all authors are full of variations on this part of the Hiſtory of this famous perſon [B], and ſcarce agree better on the reſt. My readers therefore ought not to expect here any thing beſides a heap of uncertainties, and an odd medly the king of the latter not Zoroaſtres but Oxyartes, nor doth he mention any Magic. Yet he relates what he had read in Cteſias, an Hiſtorian ſufficiently inclined to ſpread ſuch ſtories (15). Voſſius (16) and Henry Valeſius pretend that Juſtin ſays that Zoroaſter defended himſelf againſt Ninus, not only by force of arms, but alſo by that of Magic. But Juſtin hath no ſuch thing. The ſame Voſſius affirms, that Juſtin's relation was taken from the firſt book of Cteſias, as Arnobius aſſerts, But this is a new falſity. Arnobius's words are very confuſed (17), and this fact doth not appear there.

[B] All authors are full of variations concerning the time of Zoroaſter.] We have ſeen that he was made cotemporary with King Ninus, who, according to Euſebius, died about eight hundred twenty-five years before the taking of Troy. We have alſo ſeen (18) that Zoroaſter, according to the opinion of Hermippus, preceded the Trojan War five thouſand years. Hermodorus, the Platoniſt, followed the ſame chronology with Hermippus (19), and Plutarch mentions it as being the moſt commonly believed (20): but, according to Suidas, the interval betwixt Zoroaſter and the Trojan war was but five hundred years. Some very great authors have ſaid that Zoroaſter lived ſix thouſand years before the death of Plato: 'Eudoxus, qui inter ſapientiæ ſectas clariſſimam, utiliſſimamque eam (Magicam artem) intelligi voluit, Zoroaſtrem hunc ſex millibus annorum ante Platonis mortem fuiſſe prodidit. Sic & Ariſtoteles (21). --- Eudoxus, who would have the art of Magic to be accounted the nobleſt and moſt uſeful of all the branches of knowledge, relates that this Zoroaſter lived ſix thouſand years before Plato's death. The ſame thing is affirmed by Ariſtotle.' Others, as Xanthus, the Lydian (22), do not make him above ſix hundred years more antient than Xerxes's expedition. Others ſay that he muſt be looked upon as the ſame with a Pamphylian, whoſe name was Er, and who was the ſon of Armenius, and being riſen again twelve days after his death, related what he had ſeen in the other world (23). His narrations ſeem to prove that he had read Homer's Iliad, and are at leaſt a demonſtrative proof that he lived after the ſiege of Troy. You will find them in Plato in the tenth book of his Republic (24). It is Clemens Alexandrinus who ſuppoſes that this man was the ſame with Zoroaſter, which he proves by this, that the latter declares himſelf the ſon of Armenius, and a Pamphylian by birth (25), and divinely inſtructed in ſeveral things in Hell (26). But ſince Arnobius obſerves that this Pamphylian, the ſon of Armenius, was the favourite of Cyrus, we have here a tradition according to which Zoroaſter appeared in the world much later than it is believed. Armenius Zoſtriani nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri (27), are the words of Arnobius. Valeſius obſerves that Armenius is there taken for filius Armenii (28); the word Cyri ſeems to him ſuſpicious, he rather inclined to have it Nini, becauſe, ſaith he, the perſon ſpoken of is one Zoroaſter mentioned in Cteſias's firſt book. But Cteſias did not begin to ſpeak of the King of Perſia till his ſeventh book; and his ſix preceding books were employed in relating the actions of the Aſſyrians and Medes. I anſwer, it is not at all certain that Arnobius pretends that Cteſias ſpoke of this ſon of Armenius. Obſerve, that ſeveral Critics pretend that Oſtanis, or Hoſtanis, ſhould be read inſtead of Zoſtriani; but they are not aware that they impute a very groſs anachroniſm to Arnobius, for Oſtanes having followed Xerxes in the expedition to Greece (29), it is not poſſible that he ſhould have been grand-father to a friend of Cyrus.

Agathias, who lived in the reign of Juſtinian, informs, that according to the Perſians of that time, Zoroaſter, and Hyſtaſpes were cotemporary. But they did not ſay whether this Hyſtaſpes was the father of Darius, or any other. Sir John Marſham poſitively decides, that it ought to be underſtood of Darius's father (30), and grounds his opinion on this, that one of the elogies engraved on his tomb, make him the inſtructer of the Magi; and that the ſame Hiſtorian who affirms that Hyſtaſpes excelled in Magic, ſtyles him the father of Darius (31): 'Deinde (poſt Zoroaſtrem) Hyſtaſpes Rex prudentiſſimus Darii pater. Qui cum ſuperioris Indiæ ſecreta fidentius penetraret, ad nemoroſam quamdam venerat ſolitudinem, cujus tranquillis ſilentiis præcelſa Brachmanorum ingenia potiuntur: eorumque monitu rationes mundani motûs & ſiderum, puroſque ſacrorum ritus quantum colligere potuit eruditus, ex his quæ didicit, aliqua ſenſibus Magorum infudit: quæ illi cum diſciplinis præſentiendi futura, per ſuam quiſque progeniem, poſteris ætatibus tradunt. Ex eo per ſæcula multa ad præſens unà eademque proſapiâ multitudo creata, Deorum cultibus dedicatur (32). --- After the time of Zoroaſter, reigned Hyſtaſpes, a very prudent king, and the father of Darius. This prince having boldly penetrated into the moſt remote parts of the upper India, came at laſt to a ſolitary foreſt, where there dwelt a ſilent and awful tranquillity which the Brachmans enjoy. In this ſolitude theſe ſublime genius's inſtructed him in the knowledge of the motion of the earth, and that of the ſtars; and from them he learned as much as he could acquire concerning the pureſt rites of religion. Part of this knowledge he communicated to the Magi, which, together with the art of predicting future events, they delivered down to poſterity, each in his own family. The great number of men who have ſprung from theſe families, ever ſince that age down to the preſent, have all been ſet apart for cultivating the worſhip of the gods.' Ammianus Mercellinus was in the wrong to ſay, that this father of Darius was a king, and perhaps he committed this fault upon having read in general, that one King Hyſtaſpes was a great Magician, and believed that there was no other Hyſtaſpes than the father of Darius. But it is beyond diſpute, that a certain Hyſtaſpes elder than the foundation of Rome, and a great prophet, is mentioned by authors. 'Hydaſpes quoque, qui fuit Medorum rex antiquiſſimus, à quo amnis quoque nomen accipit qui nunc Hydaſpes dicitur, admirabilis omnium, ſub interpretatione vaticinantis pueri ad memoriam poſteris tradidit, ſublatum iri ex orbe imperium, nomenque Romanum; multo ante præfatus, quam illa Trojana gens conderetur (33). --- Hydaſpes alſo, the moſt antient King of the Medes, and from whom the river Hydaſpes derives it's name, is the moſt admirable of them all: for under the interpretation of the prophecy of a boy, he informed poſterity that the Roman empire, and even the Roman name, ſhould be utterly deſtroyed; and this he predicted a long time before the eſtabliſhment of that colony of Trojans.' It ought to be read Hyſtaſpes and not Hydaſpes in this paſſage of Lactantius. Thus ſome good Critics have corrected two places, where Juſtin Martyr mentions this Pagan prophet; one of them informs us that he predicted the conflagration of all periſhable things; and in the other, he obſerves, that the reading of his writings was prohibited on pain of death, becauſe they diſcoverd the truths which the Pagans perſecuted (34). Κατ' ἐνέργειαν δὲ τῶν φαύλων δαιμόνων, θάνατος ὡρίσθε κατὰ τῶν τὰς Ὑστάσπου, ἢ Σιβύλλης, ἢ τῶν προφητῶν βίβλους ἀναγινωσκόντων, ὅπως διὰ τοῦ φόβου ἀποστρέψωσιν ἐντυγχάνοντας τοὺς ἀνθρώπους τῶν καλῶν γνῶσιν λαβεῖν, αὐτοῖς δὲ δουλεύοντας κατέχωσιν. ὅπερ εἰς τέλος οὐκ ἴσχυσαν πρᾶξαι. Operâ autem & inſtinctu malorum dæmonum mortis ſupplicium adverſus librorum Hydaſpis aut Sibyllæ aut prophetarum lectores conſtitutum eſt: ut per timorem homines ab illis, quò minùs ſcripta ea legentes rerum bonarum notitiam percipiant, ſed in ſervitute eorum retineantur, abſterreantur (35). -- For by the powerful influence of the evil ſpirits, it was decreed, that whoever ſhould read the books of Hydaſpis, of the Sibyl, or of the Prophets, ſhould be put to death: This decree was made in order to deter men from reading thoſe books which might lead them to the knowledge of the truth, and in order to keep them in ſubjection to thoſe evil ſpirits. I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that theſe books (36), as well as thoſe of the Sibyls, were the pious forgeries of ſome Chriſtians. Sir John Marſham might have made uſe of another proof, and form his argument thus: Clemens Alexandrinus ſaith, that Zoroaſter was the ſame with the Pamphilian, ſon of Armenius; but, according to Arnobius, this Pamphilian was a friend of Cyrus, and we find in Herodotus a diſcourſe of Cyrus and Hyſtaſpes, medly of ſtories. We are told (a) that Zoroaſter laughed on the very day he was born, that he is the only perſon to whom this happened; and that the palpitation of his brain was ſo ſtrong, that it repulſed any hand laid upon his head, which was a preſage of his knowledge. It is added (b), that he paſſed twenty years in the deſerts, and that he there eat nothing but a kind of cheeſe which never grew old (c); that the love of wiſdom and juſtice obliged him to retire to a mountain to live there in ſolitude; that when he deſcended from thence there fell a celeſtial fire upon it which perpetually burned; that the King of Perſia accompanied with the greateſt lords of his court approached it in order to put up prayers to God; that Zoroaſter came out of theſe flames without being damaged; that he comforted and encouraged the Perſians, and offered ſacrifices as if God had accompanied him to that place; that afterwards he did not live indifferently with all ſorts of men, but only with thoſe born for truth, and who were capable of the knowledge of God, which kind of people the Perſians called Magi; (d) that he wiſhed to be ſtruck with thunder, and conſumed by fire from Heaven, and that he ordered the Perſians to collect his bones after he was burnt in this manner, and to keep and venerate them as a pledge of the preſervation of their monarchy; that they really paid a great veneration to his relics, but that in proceſs of time having neglected them, their monarchy fell to ruin. The chronicle of Alexandria adds, that after having held this diſcourſe with them, he invoked Orion, and was conſumed by a celeſtial fire. Some writers ſay (e); that Mizraim the ſon of Ham was inſtructed in Magic by his father, and (f) that he was burned alive by the Demon whom he too frequently importuned (g); that the Perſians adored him as a favourite of GOD, and a ſaint whom a thunderbolt ſerved as a vehicle to mount up to Heaven, and as a living ſtar, whence it came, that after his death he was called Zoroaſter. Gregorius Turonenſis relates very near the ſame thing of Cuſh, the eldeſt ſon of Ham [C]. Others will have it that Ham himſelf was the Zoroaſter of the eaſtern nations, and the inventer of Magic (h). Mr Bochart very well refutes this falſity (i). Cedrenus obſerves that Zoroaſter, who became ſo famous an Aſtronomer among the Perſians, was deſcended from Belus. This imports that he was deſcended from Nimrod. Some authors have taken him for Nimrod himſelf (k); others for Aſſur or Japhet. All the ancient Perſians believe Zoroaſter ancienter than Moſes, nay ſome Magi affirm that he is the ſame with Abraham, and frequently call him Ibrahim Zerdaſcht, as much as to ſay, Abraham the friend of fire (l). The eaſtern Chriſtians ſay that Zoroaſter began to flouriſh in the reign of Cambyſes, and that he was a native of the Province of Media; but others make him an Aſſyrian, and pretend that he was a diſciple of the Prophet Elijah (m) . . . . . . Ben Schubnah ſaith, that he was a diſciple of Ezra, and that

---

(15) Henr. Valeſ. in Amm. Marcell. lib. xxiii, pag. m. 374.

(16) Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 33.

(17) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 31.

(18) In the foregoing remark, citat. (10).

(19) Apud Diogen. Laërt. in Procem. num. 2.

(20) Plut. de Iſide, pag. 369.

(21) Plinius, ubi ſupra.

(22) Apud Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(23) Plato, de Republ. lib. x, pag. 361.

(24) Pag. 361, & ſeq.

(25) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. v, pag. 599.

(26) Compare what has been ſaid of PYTHAGORAS, remark [F], of his article.

(27) Arnob. lib. i, pag. 31.

(28) Henr. Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

(29) Plin. ubi ſupra, pag. 726.

(30) Marſham. Chron. Can. ad Sæcul. ix, pag. m. 145.

(31) Porphyr. περὶ ἀποχῆς, lib. iv, num. 15, apud Marſham, ibid. Valeſius, ubi ſupra, pretends that this elogy was engraved upon Darius's tomb, and not on that of Hyſtaſpes.

(32) Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxiii, pag. m. 374.

(33) Lactant. lib. vii, cap. xv, pag. m. 492. In the xviiith chapter of the ſame book he quotes a paſſage of that Hydaſpes.

(34) Juſtin. Apolog. II, p. 66.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 82.

(36) See in what manner Clemens Alexand. Strom. lib. vi, pag. 636, D ſpeaks of them.

Hyſtaſpes, the father of Darius; wherefore it is true that Zoroaſter and this Hyſtaſpes lived at the ſame time (37). Valeſius the younger affirms (38), that according to the teſtimony of Agathias, ſome ſaid that Hyſtaſpes, the doctor of the Magi, was much more antient than Darius's father. It is certain that Agathias doth not ſay this, but on the contrary complains, that the Perſians did not ſay whether their Hyſtaſpes was the father of Darius, or not. I mention this only to ſhew that the citations of the moſt judicious authors frequently deceive us, and conſequently that prudence obliges us to examine quotations, by whomſoever alledged. I here repeat this obſervation, though I remember to have made it in other places.

I ſhould never have done, if I ſhould cenſure all the miſtakes of our authors, and mention all their variations, with relation to the chronology of Zoroaſter. But what farther confirms Sir John Marſham's opinion is this. It is affirmed that Pythagoras was Zoroaſter's diſciple, under the reign of Cambyſes, the ſon of Cyrus. I have elſewhere cited (39) the words of Apuleius, which inform us of the fact. Some underſtand them as if Pythagoras, having been made a ſlave in Egypt, was tranſported into Perſia. Others will have him tranſported into Babylon, and there inſtructed by Zoroaſter the Babylonian, whom they diſtinguiſh from the Perſian. ‘Hiſce (quinque Zoroaſtris) addi poteſt Sextus Zoroaſter, ſic enim ab † Apuleio vocatur, qui Babylone vixit, quo tempore Pythagoras captivus à Cambyſe eo deductus eſt. Idem ſcriptor eum vocat, omnis divini arcanum antiſtitem, eoque magiſtro præcipuè uſum eſſe Pythagoram dicit. Videtur idem eſſe ac Zabratus, à quo Diogenes ‡ affirmat Pythagoram purgatum eſſe omnibus priſtinæ vitæ ſordibus, & edoctum, quarum rerum probos expertes eſſe oporteret, uti & Phyſicam. Idem quoque erit Nazaratas Aſſyrius, quem Alexander, in libro de Pythagoricis Symbolis, affirmat magiſtrum fuiſſe Pythagoræ. Hunc eundem Suidas vocat Zarem, Cyrillus Zaranem, Plutarchus Zaratam (40). - - - To theſe five Zoroaſters we may add a ſixth mentioned by Apuleius. This Zoroaſter lived in Babylon, at the time when Pythagoras was brought thither a captive by Cambyſes. The ſame writer calls him the chief interpreter of all divine myſteries, and ſays, that Pythagoras was inſtructed principally by him. He ſeems to be the ſame with Zabratus, by whom, as Diogenes affirms, Pythagoras was purged from all the filth of his former life, and inſtructed in what good men ought to know, and in Natural Philoſophy. He is alſo the ſame with Nazaratas the Aſſyrian, whom Alexander, in his book concerning the Pythagorical ſymbols, affirms to have taught Pythagoras. The ſame perſon Suidas calls Zares, Cyrillus Zaranes, and Plutarch Zarates.’ Theſe words are taken out of Mr Stanley's book: I do not know what he means when he obſerves that Apuleius makes uſe of the expreſſion Sextus Zoroaſter, which I do not find in the book he cites. Nor am I more certain on what he grounds his aſſertion, that Pythagoras was brought priſoner to Babylon by King Cambyſes. The words of Apuleius plainly import that he was ſent into Egypt with the priſoners of that prince (41). In order to underſtand this perfectly well, Herodotus ſhould be conſulted (42), who relates, that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, intending to put to death ſome perſons which he ſuſpected to be hatching a rebellion, entreated Cambyſes to aſk ſome troops of him; which Cambyſes accordingly deſiring, Polycratres ſent him into Egypt forty ſail of ſhips, in which he embarked theſe perſons, and prayed him not to let them return. Apuleius meant, no doubt, that ſome pretend, that Pythagoras was one of thoſe who were then delivered by Polycrates to Cambyſes. He doth not ſpeak of the tranſportation of Pythagoras, either to Perſia or to Babylon.

[C] Gregorius Turonenſis relates very near the ſame thing of Cuſh the eldeſt ſon of Ham.] ‘The eldeſt ſon of Ham, ſaith he (43), was named Cuſh. The latter was the firſt inventer of the art of Magic by the ſuggeſtion of the devil, and withal the firſt beginner of idolatry He was the firſt who, moved by a diabolical ſuggeſtion, made a ſmall ſtatue to be adored:

(a) Riſiſſe eodem die, quo genitus eſſet, unum hominem accepimus Zoroaſtrem. Eidem cerebrum ita palpitaſſe, ut impoſitam repelleret manum, futuræ præſagio ſcientiæ. Plin. lib. vii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 35.

(b) Id. lib. xi, cap. 42, pag. 592.

(c) Dio Chryſoſt. Orat. Boriſthenica.

(d) Cedrenus, and Suidas.

(e) Clemens Recognitionum, lib. iv, apud Bochart. Geog. Sacræ, lib. iv, cap. i, pag. m. 231.

(f) Id. ib. apud Huetium, Demonſtr. Evang. Propoſ. iv, cap. v, pag. m. 156.

(g) Id. ibid. apud eumd. ibid. pag. 152.

(h) See, above, remark [B], of the article CHAM.

(i) Bochart. ubi ſupra, pag. m. 231, & ſeq.

(k) See Huetius, ubi ſupra, pag. 150.

(l) Herbelot, Bibl. Orientale, pag. 931.

(m) Id. ibid. ex Abulpharagio.

(37) Herodot. lib. i, cap. ccix.

(38) Hadrian. Valeſius in Ammian. Marcellin. ubi ſupra.

(39) Above, citation (25), of the article PYTHAGORAS.

† In Floridis.

‡ Porphyr. Vit. Pythagoræ.

(40) Thomas Stanleius, Hiſtor. Philoſophiæ Orientalis, lib. i, cap. ii, p. 8, 9.

(41) Inter captivos Cambyſæ regis, Ægyptum cum adveheretur (Pythagoras.) Apul. Flor. pag. m. 351.

(42) Herodot. lib. iii, cap. xliv.

(43) Gregor. Turon. Hiſt. Francorum, lib. i, cap. v.

that this Prophet laid his curſe on him, on account of his maintaining ſome opinions very oppoſite to the Jewiſh law; that he became leprous by way of puniſhment for his impiety, and that being expelled Jeruſalem on that account, he retired to Perſia, where he ſet up a new religion (n). Some have taken him for the Prophet Ezekiel (o), and it cannot be denied that they ground their aſſertion on the agreement of numerous particulars which belong to the one, and are related of the other (p). George Hornius imagines that Zoroaſter is the falſe Prophet Balaam (q). Huetius ſhews that he was the Moſes of the Jews, and mentions an infinite number of particulars, in which the account we have of Moſes agrees with the Pagan ſtories of Zoroaſter (r). There are ſcarce any people who do not believe that there were ſeveral Zoroaſters, as well as ſeveral Jupiters and Hercules's. See Dr Thomas Stanley's treatiſe which Mr le Clerc hath tranſlated into Latin (s); and you will there find (t) a Chaldean, a Bactrian, a Perſian, a Pamphilian, a Proconneſian, and a Babylonian Zoroaſter (u). They are in the wrong who believe that Zoroaſter taught a diabolical Magic; for his Magic was only the ſtudy of the Divine nature, and of religious worſhip, as Plato expreſsly declares [D]. But though it is eaſy to clear him from this accuſation, it is difficult to excuſe him with regard to the doctrine of two principles, ſo ſtrong is the preſumption that he actually taught that there are two co-eternal cauſes, one of good, and the other of evil things [E]. Dr Hyde in his excellent 'adored: he made men believe that he had power to 'bring down the ſtars and fire from heaven. He 'went to the Perſians, who called him Zoroaſter, 'that is, a living Star. Having alſo learned of 'him the cuſtom of worſhipping fire, they adored 'him as a god, after he had been divinely conſumed 'by fire.'

[D] His Magic was only the ſtudy . . . . . of religious worſhip, as Plato expreſsly declares.] There are four choſen perſons, ſaith he, appointed to educate the eldeſt ſon of the King of the Perſians. They chooſe the wiſeſt, the moſt juſt, the moſt temperate, and the braveſt man that can be found. The wiſeſt man inſtructs him in Zoroaſter's Magic, that is, the worſhip of the gods: beſides, he teacheth him the art of government. Ὧν ὁ μὲν μαγείαν τε διδάσκει τὴν Ζωροάςρȣ τȣ̃ Ὡρομάζȣ (ἔςι δὲ τȣ̃το θεῶν θεραπεία) διδάσκει δὲ καὶ τὰ βασιλικά. Quorum primus magiam Zoroaſtri Oromaſii filii docet, eſt autem illa Deorum cultus; atque idem tradit inſtituta regia (44). Obſerve that Zoroaſter is called the ſon of Oromaſius, and that Oromaſius is the name which he and his followers gave to the good God, or good principle. Whence to call him the ſon of Oromaſius ſhould ſeem to be the ſame, as calling him the Son of God. Dr Stanley conjectures, with great probability, that this laſt title was really beſtowed on him. 'Hinc 'colligas verba Platonis eſſe intelligenda de Mago Per'ſa, qui propter inuſitatam eruditionem figuratè, aut 'fabuloſè dicebatur filius Dei, aut alicujus boni Genii, 'quo honore affecti ſunt Pythagoras, Plato, aliique 'præſtantiſſimi viri (45). - - - From hence we may in'fer that Plato's words muſt be underſtood of that Per'ſian Magus, who, on account of his uncommon learn'ing, was in an allegorical or fabulous manner, ſtiled 'the Son of God, or of ſome good genius: and this ho'nour was alſo paid to Pythagoras, Plato, and other 'learned men.' Thoſe who deſire to ſee a great many paſſages which teſtify, that the Magic of the Perſians, inſtituted by Zoroaſter, was the ſtudy of religion and morality, need only read Briſſonius (46) and Bullingerus (47). Nor is any perſon ignorant that Gabriel Naudé hath learnedly and ſolidly juſtified our Zoroaſter againſt the accuſation of the black art (48). He mentions ſeveral authors who may be conſulted.

[E] That there are two co-eternal cauſes, one of good, and the other of evil things.] Plutarch having aſſerted that this is the opinion of moſt, and of the wiſeſt of the Antients, adds (49), Zoroaſter the Magician, who is 'ſaid to have lived five thouſand years before the Tro'jan war . . . called the good God Oromazes, and 'the other Arimanius (50) . . . and taught mankind 'to offer ſacrifices and prayers to the former, that he 'might beſtow upon us all good things, and accept of 'our thanks for thoſe which we receive: and to the 'latter, that he might avert all hurtful and evil things: 'for they (51) pound in a mortar a certain plant, 'named Homomy, and call upon Pluto and dark'neſs; then mixing it with the blood of a ſacrifi'ced wolf, they convey it to a certain place where 'the ſun never ſhines, and there caſt it away. For 'of herbs and plants, they believe that ſome belong 'to the good God, and others to the evil dæmon; 'and likewiſe they think, that land animals, ſuch as 'dogs, fowls, and hedge-hogs, belong to God, and wa'ter animals to the evil dæmon; for which reaſon they 'account him happy who kills the greateſt number of 'them.' However, theſe men relate a great many 'fabulous ſtories concerning theſe gods. They ſay, 'for inſtance, that Oromazes ſprung from the pureſt 'light, and Arimanius from darkneſs; that they are 'at war one with another, and that Oromazes made 'ſix gods, the firſt of whom is the god of Benevo'lence, the ſecond of Truth, the third of Juſtice, 'the fourth of Wiſdom, the fifth of Wealth, and the 'ſixth of Pleaſure which accrues from good actions; 'and that Arimanius likewiſe made the like number 'of dæmons, all oppoſite and enemies to the former. 'After this, Oromazes having firſt trebled his own 'magnitude, mounted up as far above the ſun, as 'the ſun is above the earth, and ſo beſpangled the 'heavens with ſtars, among which he eſtabliſhed one '(called Sirius, or the Dog-Star) as a miſtreſs or 'guide to all the reſt. After having made twenty'four gods more, he placed them in an egg-ſhell. 'But thoſe who were made by Arimanius (being alſo 'of the like number) grated and raſped this egg-ſhell 'to ſuch a degree, that they pierced it; and ever 'ſince that time bad things have been promiſcuouſly 'mingled and confounded with good. But the fatal 'and predeſtinated time will come, when Arimanius, 'who brought plagues and famines upon the earth, 'ſhall be ruined and utterly deſtroyed by the good 'gods; at which time, the earth ſhall be plain, 'ſmooth, and level, and there ſhall only be one man'ner of life, and one form of government among 'men, who ſhall all ſpeak the ſame language, and 'live happily. Theopompus alſo writes, that accord'ing to the Magi, one of theſe gods ſhall be victo'rious for the ſpace of three thouſand years, and ſhall 'be vanquiſhed during as long a time, and that for 'three thouſand years more, they ſhall contend and 'fight one againſt the other, and deſtroy each others 'works; till at laſt Pluto ſhall fail and utterly periſh, 'then mankind ſhall be happy, and neither need 'food nor yield a ſhadow; and that the god, who 'has wrought all theſe things, doth, for ſome time, 'take his repoſe and reſt; but that this time is not 'too long for a god, and would not ſeem conſiderable 'to a man aſleep. Theſe are the fables invented by 'the Magi.'

It was not a needleſs thing to ſet down this whole paſſage, ſince it contains ſomewhat at large the opinions and precepts of Zoroaſter; and we may obſerve from thence, that the aſſerters of two principles, involved themſelves in ſeveral abſurdities, when they deſcended to a particular explanation of their ſyſtem. I have obſerved the ſame thing when ſpeaking of the Manichees (52). But ſince, according to the moſt common tradition, Zoroaſter muſt paſs for the founder of the Magi, and it appears by a great number of authorities that they admitted a good god, whom they called Oromaſes, or Oromaſdes, and an evil god whom they named Arimanius; it is very probable that he really aſſerted this doctrine (53).

(n) Ibid. pag. 932.

(o) Huetius, ubi ſupra, pag. 151.

(p) Id. ibid. pag. 458.

(q) Hornius, Hiſtor. Philoſ. lib. ii, cap. iv, pag. 79, 80.

(r) Huetius, ubi ſupra, pag. 149, & ſeq.

(s) Intituled, Hiſtoria Philoſophiæ Orientalis.

(t) In the ſecond chapter, of the firſt book.

(u) See the remark [B], towards the end.

(44) Plato, in Alcibiade I, pag. 441, C.

(45) Stanleius, ubi ſupra, pag. 11.

(46) Briſſonius, de Regno Perſarum, lib. ii, pag. 178, & ſeq. Edit. Commel. 1595.

(47) Jul. Cæſar Bullengerus, Eclog. ad Arnobium, pag. 346, & ſeq.

(48) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, pag. 134, & ſeq.

(49) Plut. de Iſide & Oſiride, pag. 369.

(50) What is omitted here may be ſeen above, in the article MANICHEES, remark [C], at the firſt paragraph.

(51) That is, the Perſians.

(52) Above, remark [B], of the article MANICHEES.

(53) See Diog. Laërt. in Proœmio, num. 8, and Agathias Hiſtor. lib. ii.

excellent treatiſe on the religion of the antient Perſians, cites ſome authors who clear him

Let us obſerve, that Plutarch having recited what we have ſeen above, adds, theſe are the fables invented by the Magi (54). If we ſhould infer from thence that he rejected, in general, the whole hypotheſis of two principles, the one good, and the other evil, we ſhould miſtake his ſentiments. He might indeed very well condemn the particular explications of Zoroaſter's followers, but doubtleſs he admitted the whole foundation of their ſyſtem, that the god whom they called good, is not the cauſe of any evil. I have cited ſeveral paſſages of his works, wherein he declares himſelf very clearly on this head, and yet they do not diſcover the whole foundation of his doctrine (55). Wherefore I ſhall add here ſome paſſages which will more clearly explain it to us. I believe that it agreed very well with the opinion he aſcribed to Plato. ‘ That Philoſopher, ſaith he (56), admits two ſouls of the world, one good, and the other evil; and alſo acknowledges, betwixt theſe two, a third cauſe, which is not without either ſoul or reaſon, nor immovable of it ſelf, as ſome think, but adjacent, and adherent to the other two, yet always deſiring and purſuing what is beſt . . . becauſe the generation, compoſition, and conſtitution, of this world, is intermixed with contrary powers, which are not however equal, for the beſt prevails and is ſtrongeſt, but it is impoſſible that the worſt ſhould utterly periſh; ſo firmly is it ſettled in the body and ſoul of the univerſe, where it is perpetually at war with the good principle.’ In another place he more amply ſets forth this doctrine of Plato, and informs us that the original of evil is not lodged in an inſenſible, inanimate, matter, utterly void of action and qualities, and which is capable of receiving all imaginable forms; but in a matter which moves and is united to a ſoul, the diſorders of which cannot be wholly and entirely corrected. I ſhall hereafter declare why I cite ſuch a long paſſage.

‘ (57) The world, ſaith Heraclitus, was neither created by a God, nor by a man: as if he had been afraid, that, in caſe we denied that God is the Creator of the univerſe, we ſhould be obliged to own that man was the architect of it. But, according to Plato's opinion, it is far better to own that the univerſe was created by God, and in our ſongs of praiſe to aſcribe the glory of this ſtructure to him, the frame itſelf being the nobleſt maſter-piece, and God the moſt excellent architect, and the beſt of all cauſes; yet that the ſubſtance and matter of the univerſe were not created, but always ſubject to the ordering and diſpoſal of the builder, ſo as to be made as like himſelf as poſſible. For the creation was not out of nothing, but out of matter wanting beauty and perfection, like the rude materials of a houſe, a garment, or a ſtatue lying firſt in ſhapeleſs confuſion. For before the creation of the world the univerſe was a chaos, that is, a confuſion or diſorder of things: yet this chaos was neither without a body, without motion, nor without a ſoul: but the corporeal part was without form or conſiſtence, and the moving ſoul was raſh and inconſiderate, without reaſon or conduct. God did not make a body of that which was incorporeal, nor a ſoul of that which was inanimate; as the Muſician doth not make the voice, but only renders it ſweet, tuneful, and melodious, or as the dancer doth not make motion, but only renders it graceful and well-timed: thus God did not make the tangible ſolidity of bodies, nor the imaginative or moving faculties of the ſoul; but having found theſe two principles, the one obſcure and dark, the other turbulent and extravagant, both imperfect, diſordered, and confuſed, he ſo ordered and diſpoſed them both, that of theſe two principles he made the nobleſt and moſt excellent of all animals. Therefore the ſubſtance of body is no other than what Plato calls the nature ſuſceptible of all things, and the ſeat and nurſe of all created beings. As to the ſubſtance of the ſoul, in the book intituled Philebus, he calls it infinity, or the privation of all number, meaſure, and proportion, admitting neither of more nor leſs, greater nor ſmaller, like nor unlike. As to that ſubſtance which he ſays, in his Timæus, is mixed with the indiviſible nature, and becomes diviſible in bodies, we muſt not underſtand it to be a multitude in unity, or length and breadth in points; for theſe are qualities more proper to bodies than to the ſoul; but it is that unlimited principle, moving both itſelf and other ſubſtances, that, which in ſeveral places of his writings he calls neceſſity, and in his treatiſe of laws he openly ſtiles the diſorderly, evil, and miſchievous ſoul. For ſuch was the ſoul of itſelf; but at length it was endowed with underſtanding, ratiocination, and harmony, that it might become the ſoul of the world. Thus that all-receiving and material principle had both magnitude, ſpace, and diſtance, but was void of beauty, form, and proportion: however, all theſe it obtained, when it came to be formed into ſeas and land, the heavens, the ſtars, and that infinite variety of plants and living creatures. Now as for thoſe who attribute to matter, and not to the ſoul, that which Plato in his Timæus calls Neceſſity, in his Philebus Infinity, and the privation of meaſure and proportion, they cannot maintain it to be the cauſe of evil, becauſe Plato always ſuppoſes that this matter is void of form or figure, or any other quality or virtue, and compares it with oils that have no ſcent; ſuch as the Perfumers uſe in compoſing their perfumes. For Plato could not poſſibly ſuppoſe that to be the cauſe and principle of evil, which of itſelf is ſluggiſh, without any active quality, motion, or inclination; and at the ſame time give this infinity the epithet of wicked and miſchievous, and call it Neceſſity, which, in ſeveral caſes, is repugnant to, and rebellious againſt, God. For this Neceſſity, which defeats heaven (as he ſays in his Politics) and overturns it, together with that concupiſcence which is born with us, and that confuſion of antient nature, which was void of order, before it was formed into it's preſent beautiful ſhape, whence came they to be conveyed into the various forms and beings, if the ſubject, which is the firſt matter was void of all quality whatever, and deprived of all efficient cauſe? The architect being in his own nature good, intended a frame the neareſt approaching to his own perfections. For beſides theſe two, there is no third principle, and if we admit that there is evil, without any precedent cauſe or principle that produced it, we muſt fall into the difficulties and perplexities of the Stoics: for of thoſe principles that have a being, it is not poſſible that either the good one, or the other which is void of all quality, ſhould produce evil. But Plato did not act like thoſe who came after him, who not having perceived and underſtood the third principle and third cauſe which is between God and matter, fell into the moſt ſtrange and abſurd propoſition imaginable, affirming that the nature of evils came forth caſually, and by I know not what accident, or came forth of it ſelf: yet they will not allow a ſingle atom of Epicurus to ſhift ever ſo little in its place; for this, ſay they, would infer that there is motion without any prior cauſe. Nevertheleſs they affirm, that vice and wickedneſs, with a thouſand other deformities and imperfections of bodies ariſe by conſequence, and without any other efficient cauſe (58). But Plato does not ſay ſo, for denying that the firſt matter hath any quality, and removing from God, as far as is poſſible, the cauſes of evil, he has written thus concerning the world in his political diſcourſes. The world, ſays he, received from its maker all things beautiful and good; but as to things evil, wicked, and unjuſt, in heaven, they proceeded from its exterior habit, and former diſpoſition, and it conveys them to the ſeveral animals on the earth. A little lower, in the ſame treatiſe, he adds, In proceſs of time, when oblivion encroaches upon the world, the diſtemper of its antient confuſions prevails more and more, and the hazard is, leſt being diſſolved, it ſhould again be ſunk and plunged into the immenſe abyſs of its former confuſion . . . . . Plato does indeed give to matter the titles of mother and nurſe; but the cauſe of evil he makes to be the moving force reſiding within it, and which in body is diviſible, a motion not governed by order and reaſon, though not without a ſoul, which in his treatiſe of laws, he expreſsly calls the ſoul repugnant, and contrary to What chaos is, according to Plato, as explained by Plutarch.

Of the ſubſtance of body, and the ſoul of the world, and what they are.

Supposing two principles of things, viz. the Artificer and the firſt matter, he endeavours to explain the cauſe of evil: but he loſes himſelf, being ignorant of what the holy Scripture ſays on this ſubject.

In order to illuſtrate what is ſaid above, he ſuppoſes a third principle between God and matter, and afterwards ſets forth Plato's opinion concerning the cauſe of evil.

---

(54) Ἡ μὲν οὖν μάγων μυθολογία τοιοῦτον ἔχει τρόπον. Hoc modo ſe habent magorum fabulæ. Plut. de Iſide, pag. 370, B.

(55) See, above, the article MANICHEES, remark [C]; the article PAULICIANS, citation (67); and the article PERICLES, citation (71).

(56) Plut. ibid. pag. 370, F.

(57) Plut. de creat. animæ, p. 1014, 1015. Note, that of the four ſummaries at the margin of this quotation, the three laſt were made by Simon Goulart.

(58) See, above, remark [T], of the article CHRYSIPPUS, the Philoſopher; and remark [L], of the aritcle PAULICIANS.

him on this head. I ſhall examine whether they deſerve credit [F]. It is even affirmed that 'that other which is the cauſe of all good. For tho' the ſoul be the cauſe and principle of motion, yet it is the underſtanding which is the cauſe and principle of the order and harmony of motion: God therefore hath not rendered matter ſluggiſh, but prevented it from being any longer troubled and diſordered by an extravagant and inconſiderate cauſe: neither hath he infuſed into nature the principles of mutation and paſſion; but when it was under the preſſure of all ſorts of paſſions, and diſorderly mutations, he removed all the diſorders and irregularities, making uſe of ſymmetry, proportion, and number, as the moſt proper inſtruments for that purpoſe.'

This explication of Plato's doctrine concerning the creation of the world, and the original of evil, is one of the moſt beautiful paſſages in Plutarch; and though this doctrine is not true, it deſerves to be read with attention, and contains ſeveral excellent ideas, and ſublime conceptions, of a ſurprizing fertility, with regard to thoſe who know how to make good uſe of conſequences. This is the reaſon which engaged me not to curtail this paſſage. How many people who ſhall read this, would not take the pains to recur to Plutarch, if I had only mentioned the pages of the author? Another reaſon prevented my being contented with this: I here find ſome particulars, which I ſhall make uſe of below (59).

[F] Dr Hyde . . . cites ſome authors who clear him . . . I ſhall examine whether they deſerve credit.] Thoſe who have read Mr Bernard's journal (60), need not be informed that the Hiſtoria Religionis veterum Perſarum, publiſhed by Dr Hyde (61) at Oxford, in the year 1700, in 4to, is one of the moſt excellent pieces that can poſſibly be written on ſuch a ſubject. The idea which the learned journaliſt hath given of this performance is ſufficient to convince us, that it contains a very curious erudition, and profound diſcuſſions, which diſcloſe ſeveral uncommon particulars, and diſcover a country which we ſcarce knew any thing of before. But to come to the matter. Dr Hyde affirms (62), that the antient Perſians acknowledged no more than one ſole uncreated principle, which was the good principle, or, in one word, GOD: and that they looked upon the evil principle as a created being. One of the names which they gave to GOD was Hormizda, and they called the evil principle Ahariman. And this is the original of the two Greek words 'Ωρομάσδης and 'Αρειμάνιος: one of which was the name of the good, and the other that of the evil principle, as we have ſeen above (63), in a paſſage of Plutarch. The Perſians pretended that Abraham was the firſt founder of their religion (64). Zoroaſter afterwards made ſome alterations in it, but it is ſaid that he made no manner of change, with relation to the doctrine of one ſole uncreated principle; but that his innovation in this particular, was only the giving the name of light to the good principle, and that of darkneſs to the evil one (65). Of which here is an evidence (66). Zerduſht affirmavit Lucem & Tenebras eſſe . . . . duo Principia ſibi invicem contraria: & ſic eſſe Yezdân & Ahreman, qui fuerunt . . . . initium eorum quæ inveniuntur in Mundo: ex eorum miſtione [ſeu combinatione] extitiſſe Compoſitiones; & ex variis Compoſitionibus productas fuiſſe formas. Et quòd Deus qui creavit Lucem & Tenebras, utriuſque Autor unicus ſit, ſine Socio, ſine Pari aut Simili; nec ei referenda ſit . . . exiſtentia Tenebrarum, ſicut dicunt Zervanitæ: ſed Bonum & Malum, Integritas ac Corruptio, & Puritas ac Spurcities exiverunt ex miſtione [ſeu commiſſione] Lucis & Tenebrarum: & niſi hæc duo commiſta fuiſſent, non extitiſſet Mundus. Et hæc duo contra ſe invicem inſurgebant & de victoriâ contendebant, donec Lux vinceret Tenebras, & Bonum Malum. Tum poſtea ſalvum evaſit Bonum ad mundum ſuum, & Malum divertebat ad Mundum ſuum: & ſic fuit cauſa Liberationis. Cumque Deus excelſus hæc duo temperaverat & miſcuerat pro arbitrio ſuo, eaque in Compoſitione viderat, tum inſtituit Lucem ut originale quiddam, & indixit exiſtentiam ejus ut exiſteret. Sed Tenebræ ſecutæ ſunt ſicut umbra perſonam. Nam cùm videret eas quodammodo exiſtere, ſed non realiter exiſtere, tum planè produxit Lucem, & acquiſitæ ſunt Tenebræ per conſequentiam: nam ex neceſſitate extitit contrarium, quippe cujus exiſtentia fuit neceſſaria, ſc. ut contingens in creatione, non autem ex primâ intentione, ſecundum exemplum quod adduximus de Perſonâ & Umbrâ. Theſe words clearly expreſs, that, in Zoroaſter's hypotheſis, the two principles, one of good, and the other of evil, Oromazes, Arimanius, or light and darkneſs, were, properly ſpeaking, no more than ſecond cauſes, and did not ſtrictly deſerve the name of principles: they were the effects of another cauſe, and the productions of GOD. There ariſe ſeveral abſurdities in the particular explication of the doctrine of this Magus; for he aſſerted, on the one ſide, that GOD alone had produced darkneſs; and on the other, that its exiſtence ought not to be referred to GOD. He ſaid, that GOD mixed the light with darkneſs, becauſe without this mixture the world could not have been produced; that good and evil, purity and impurity, proceeded from this mixture; that there was a ſharp engagement betwixt light and darkneſs 'till the latter was overcome; that after its defeat it retired into its own world, and light to its proper world alſo; that GOD having mixed theſe two contraries together, eſtabliſhed an original light, and made it exiſt; that darkneſs reſulted from it as a ſhadow from a body; for GOD ſeeing that darkneſs exiſted in ſome ſort, though not really, gave a plenary exiſtence to light, and ſo to darkneſs by an inevitable conſequence, and not according to the primitive and direct intention of the Creator (67). This chaos of thoughts is incomprehenſible to us weſtern people. None but the eaſtern nations accuſtomed to a myſtical and contradictory language can bear ſuch exceſſive nonſenſe without diſguſt and horror. But be it how it will, may they reply to me, Zoroaſter is thus cleared of the principal accuſation, and it muſt no longer be pretended that he acknowledged two uncreated principles, or an Arimanius eſſentially evil and ſelf-exiſtent. This is what remains to be examined.

I. I anſwer, in the firſt place, that it is unqueſtionable, that the Greek authors, who have aſcribed to Zoroaſter the opinion of two principles, deſigned to attribute to him a doctrine contrary to the common Theology, as well as to the principles of the Ariſtotelians and Stoics: thoſe two ſects agreed with the people on this head, that the ſame GOD who pours down good upon the earth, pours down evil alſo; and that if he puniſhes on one ſide, he rewards on the other, &c. But if they had aſſerted that Zoroaſter and the Magi were of a contrary opinion to that, they muſt have believed that theſe Magi taught that the principle which diſtributed good, is perſonally diſtinguiſhed from the principle which does the contrary, and that theſe two principles are independent of each other, and the one co-eternal with the other (68).

II. This is confirmed by reaſon, that this hypotheſis was recurred to on no other account, than in order to ſhun the perplexity (69) which they met with in the ſuppoſition, that the ſame Being, which is the cauſe of good, is alſo the cauſe of evil. But this difficulty had not been avoided, if Arimanius had been allowed to have been a production of the good GOD; for the queſtion would have turned, how Arimanius, the evil principle, could have been produced by a cauſe infinitely good. It is obvious to all men, that to aſſert that GOD himſelf produced all evils, or that he produced Arimanius, who conſequently is the neceſſary author of all evils (70), amounts to the ſame thing, quod eſt cauſa cauſæ eſt cauſa cauſati. - - - that which is the cauſe of a cauſe, is alſo the cauſe of its effect. So that Zoroaſter could not eſcape the force of any one objection, if his doctrine had been what Shahriſtâni ſays it was (71). Therefore let us grant that the Greeks have not without ground charged him with admitting two eternal principles.

III. I am not ignorant that it may be urged that the Grecians were very imperfectly acquainted with the opinions of the Philoſophers whom they called Barbarians, and that what they wrote of the Jewiſh nation, and the antiquities of Egypt is very inaccurate. But let this be repeated as often as you pleaſe, I ſhall anſwer, the Arabian writers are not more credible, when they ſpeak of a Philoſopher ſo remote from their own time as Zoroaſter was.

IV. I conjecture that his followers for their own intereſt have done him the favour to aſcribe to him the creation of the evil principle, and that they did it that he was no idolater, either with reſpect to the worſhip of fire, or that of

---

(59) In the following remark.

(60) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for February, 1701, Art. iii, and for March 1701, Art. i.

(61) Profeſſor of the Oriental languages, in the univerſity of Oxford.

(62) Thomas Hyde, Hiſt. Religionis veter. Perſarum, cap. ix, pag. 161.

(63) In the remark [E], citation (50).

(64) Id. ibid. cap. xxi, pag. 275.

(65) Id. ibid. cap. xxii, pag. 290.

(66) Shahriſtâni, apud Hyde, ubi ſupra, pag. 299. I have left out the Arabic words which are in this and the following paſſages of Dr Hyde, and in the room of them have put blanks.

(67) Compare what has been ſaid in the article CHRYSIPPUS, the Philoſopher, remark [T]; and in the article PAULICIANS, remark [I], at the third paragraph.

(68) Dr Hyde owns that this doctrine was taught by thoſe whom Plutarch mentions. See, below, citation (75).

(69) See Plutarch, in the paſſage which has been cited in the article MANICHEES, citation (28), and in the foregoing remark of this preſent article.

(70) Light and darkneſs, are cauſes acting neceſſarily and without any liberty.

(71) Above, citat. (66).

it ſince the time that they were ſubjected to the ſevere domination of the Mahometans who abhor them, and call them idolaters and worſhippers of fire. Being unwilling to expoſe themſelves ſtill more to their hatred, and inſults, under pretext that they acknowleged an uncreated nature ſovereignly wicked, and independent of God, they thought fit to varniſh over this part of their ſyſtem with another interpretation: they could not abſolutely deny that Zoroaſter admitted of two principles, ſince it is too well known that he acknowledged them. ‘The Tarikh Montekheb ſaith, that Zoroaſter, author of the ſect of the Megiouſch, or Magi, was alſo the firſt who taught the doctrine of two principles of all things, and that the firname of Megiouſch, beſtowed on them, is a word corrupted by the Arabians, from the Perſian word, Meïkhouſch, which ſignifies ſharp-ſweet, by reaſon of the two principles, good and evil, which he eſtabliſhed (72).’ Here is an author who aſcribes to Zoroaſter the firſt eſtabliſhment of this opinion; but Dr Hyde alledges a paſſage which makes this ſyſtem of a much older date, and beſides ſeems to hint that Zoroaſter only reformed it: ‘Quod Perſarum gentem . . . . . . ei eſt Religio pervetuſta: & in eâ Docti vocantur Keiomarſii. Iſti ſtatuunt aliquem Deum æternum quem vocant Yezdan, eo deſignantes τὸν Θεόν: & alium deum creatum ex Tenebris, quem nominant Ahreman, deſignantes Diabolum. Magnifaciunt Lucem, eo uſque dum colant Ignem: & cavent ſibi à Tenebris. Nec deſtiterunt ſic facere (73), DONEC prodiit Zerduſht jactans prophetiam. Aſſerunt itaque Deum Creatorem, quod ſcil. creavit Lucem & Tenebras; eumque eſſe Unicum, nec habere Socium. Et quod Bonum & Malum, & Probitas & Improbitas conquiſita ſunt ex mixtione Lucis & Tenebrarum: & quòd ſi hæc duo non fuiſſent mixta, non extitiſſet Mundus: &, quòd hæc duo hoc modo mixta non deſinent, donec Bonum approprietur Mundo ſuo & Malum Mundo ſuo; [i. e. utrumque horum tandem concedet ad Mundum ſibi proprium, ſcil. in fine Mundi.] . . . Et hanc eſſe Religionem Magorum (74). - - - - There was a very antient religion among the Perſians; and thoſe who were learned in it, were called Keiomarſii. They hold that there is an eternal Deity, whom they call Yezda, meaning GOD, and that out of darkneſs was created an other god, whom they name Ahreman, by which word they denote the Devil. They highly eſteem light, inſomuch that they worſhip fire; and they have a great averſion to darkneſs. They continued in this practice, UNTIL Zerduſht appeared, who pretended to prophecy. Thus they affirm that GOD is the creator of the univerſe, becauſe he created light and darkneſs, that there is but one GOD, who is without any equal: that good and evil, probity and wickedneſs, ſprung from the mixture of light and darkneſs: that if theſe two had not been mixed together, the world would not have had a being: and that they will not ceaſe to be thus mixed, till good and evil be appropriated each to it's own world, [that is, till each of them retires to the world proper to it, namely, at the end of the world.] This is the religion of the Magi.’

V. Laſtly, I ſay that Dr Hyde owns that there are yet ſome ſects, which by acknowledging God and the Devil to be two co-eternal natures, agree with the aſſerters of Zoroaſter's Oromazes and Arimanius. His words are: ‘Dualiſtæ Diaboli coæternitatem aſſerunt. Sunt enim ex Indo-Perſis & Dualiſtis Manichæis aliiſque Hæreticis (ut quidem ſunt in omni Religione,) qui opinantur Diabolum à ſeipſo proceſſiſſe, ut loquuntur, i. e. æternum fuiſſe, & malos Angelos ſibi creâſſe: ſed eſt Hæretica opinio, eaque ignorantium quorundam hominum qui peculiariter vocantur . . . Thanavîa, i. e. Dualiſtæ ſeu . . . . . . Domini duorum, ſcil. Aſſertores ſeu Autores duorum principiorum; qui (inquit Shahriſtâni,) Lucem & Tenebras ſeu Deum & Diabolum ſtatuunt duo Principia coæterna, in contrarium Magorum qui Lucem æternam & Tenebras creatas ponunt. Iſti tales fuerunt, qui Oromazen & Arimanium duos eſſe Deos aſſerebant ut Plut. lib. de Iſide & Oſir. (75) - - - - - - The Dualiſts aſſert the co-eternity of the Devil. For there are ſome Indian Perſians, and Manichean Dualiſts, and other Heretics (as there are ſome in all religions) who imagine that the Devil proceeded from himſelf, as they term it, that is, that the Devil is eternal, and created the evil angels: but this is an heretical opinion, and held only by ſome ignorant men, who are diſtinguiſhed by the name Thanavia or Dualiſts, or aſſertors or authors of the two principles, who affirm (ſays Shahriſtani) that light and darkneſs, God and the Devil, are two co-eternal principles, in contradiction to the Magi, who believe that light is eternal, and that darkneſs was created. Such were they who aſſerted, as Plutarch informs us, that there are two gods, Oromazes and Arimanius.’ There are ſome particulars which are very ſingular and extravagant concerning the ſyſtem of the Zoroaſtrian Magi in the book of a Mahometan. I ſhall cite from it what relates to the Dualiſts, who hold ſtill the co-eternity of the Devil, and with great importunity aſk whence evil could proceed, if the evil principle was not eternal? ‘Addit Shahriſtâni, Quòd Maguſæis peculiaris ſit . . . . . . Dualitas, adeò ut ſtatuant . . . . . Ductores ſeu Gubernatores duos æternos, qui dividuntur in Bonum & Malum, & Probitatem ac Improbitatem, Emolumentum ac Nocumentum. Horum unus nominatur Lux, & alter Tenebræ, ſc. Yezdan ſeu Deus, & Ahreman ſeu Diabolus. Eorumque Religionem eſſe ſec. hanc diviſionem ſeu diſtinctionem: & quòd omnes Magorum Quæſtiones vertantur ſuper duobus Cardinibus, quorum unus eſt Explicatio cauſæ Miſtionis Lucis & Tenebrarum, & alter eſt Explicatio Liberationis Lucis à Tenebris. Et quidem, quòd Miſtionem ſtatuant . . . . Initium ſeu ſtatum à quo, & Liberationem . . . . . . Reditum ſeu ſtatum ad quem. - - - - - - The Magi alone, adds Shahriſtian, believe a duality, and that there are two eternal chiefs, or governours, who are divided into good and evil, probity and wickedneſs, advantage and hurt. One of theſe is called light, and the other darkneſs, the former is Yezdan, or GOD, and the latter Ahreman, or the Devil: and their religion is founded on this diviſion or diſtinction: all the queſtions of the Magi turn upon theſe two points, one of which is to explain the cauſe of the mixture of light and darkneſs; and the other to explain the deliverance of light from darkneſs. And they hold that this mixture was the beginning of things, or condition from whence they proceeded, and that this deliverance is the return of things, or condition into which they are to be brought.’ I ſhall further cite what follows; ‘Supradictus Shahriſtani pergit narrare, Quòd Magi ſtatuant . . . . . . Principia duo, ſicuti dixerat: ſed quòd . . . . Magi originales non exiſtiment expedire ut ambo ſint . . . . . coæterna ab intio; ſed quòd Lux ſit . . . . . æterna ab initio, & Tenebræ . . . . productæ. Et quòd tum, differant de modo ſeu causâ productionis ejus; cùm à Luce producitur tantùm Lux, quæ non producit ullum Malum; & quomodo ergò productum Principium Mali aut alius cujuſvis rei, cùm nihil adjunctum (ſeu par fuerit) Luci quoad primam ejus productionem & æternitatem (76). - - - - - - - The ſame Shahriſtani continues to relate, that the Magi lay down two principles; as he had ſaid before; but the original Magi, ſays he, do not think that both muſt be co-eternal; they hold that light alone is eternal, and darkneſs created: then they differ concerning the manner and cauſe of the production of darkneſs; ſince from light nothing can proceed but light, which doth not produce any evil, how then was the principle of evil, or of any other thing produced, ſince nothing was joined with light, (or equal to it) as to its firſt production and eternity.’ Some of the Magi aſſert that Arimanius, or the evil principle, was created by an evil thought which aroſe in the Divine intellect. This thought was, what will happen, if I meet with no oppoſition? What can be ſaid more deteſtable? Would it have been more blaſphemous to allow this Arimanius to be eternal, than to aſcribe ſuch an original to him? ‘Aſſerentes Yezdân fuiſſe . . . . ſine initio æternum, & Ahreman fuiſſe . . . . . . productum & creatum. Yezdan cogitâſſe ſecum. Niſi fuerint mihi controverſiæ, quomodo erit? Hancque cogitationem pravam naturæ Lucis minùs analogam, produxiſſe Tenebras dictas Ahreman, qui naturâ diſpoſitus ad malum & diſſidium & improbitatem & noxam & omnia ‘ nocumenta:

---

(72) Herbelot, Bibl. Orientale, pag. 931, col. i,

(73) This ſeems to ſignify that Zoroaſter put an end to thoſe things.

(74) Ibn Shahna, in libro de Primis & Poſtremis apud Hyde, ubi ſupra, cap. ix, pag. 163.

(75) Id. ibid. pag. 164.

(76) Id. ibid. cap. xxii, pag. 295, quoting Shahriſtâni de Religionibus Orientis.

of Mithra [G]. What appears leaſt uncertain among ſo many things which are related of him, is that he was the introducer of a new religion into Perſia, and that he did it about the reign of Darius the ſucceſſor of Cambyſes. He is ſtill in great veneration amongſt thoſe Perſians, who are not of the Mahometan religion, but retain the ancient worſhip of their country. They call him Zardhuſt, and ſeveral people believe that he came from China, and relate a great number of miraculous things on that head. You may ſee a ſpecimen of them in Mr d'Herbelot's Bibliotheque Orientale (x), and in the Hiſtory of the religion of the Banians, written in Engliſh by Mr Lord, and tranſlated into French by Mr Briot (y). Conſult alſo Huetius's Evangelical Demonſtration (z), and Dr Hyde's book. Several authors believe that all the works which have gone under the nocumenta: & prodiens contra Lucem, eam oppoſuit tam naturâ (ſeu facto) quàm dicto (77). - - - - - - They affirm that Yezdan is eternal without beginning, and that Ahreman was produced and created: that Yezdan thought with himſelf, what will happen, if I meet with no oppoſition? And that this evil thought not being analogous to the nature of light, produced darkneſs, called Ahreman, which, being naturally diſpoſed to evil, diſcord, wickedneſs, and all manner of miſchief, came forth againſt light, and oppoſed it both in word and deed.' They add, that a war aroſe betwixt the army of light, and that of darkneſs, which at laſt ended in an accommodation, of which the Angels were the mediators, and the conditions were that the inferior world ſhould be wholly left to Arimanius for the ſpace of ſeven thouſand years, after which it ſhould be reſtored to light. Before the peace Arimanius had extirpated all the inhabitants of the world. Light had called men to its aſſiſtance whilſt they were yet but ſpirits: which it did either to draw them out of Arimanius's territories, or in order to give them bodies to engage againſt this enemy. They accepted the bodies, and the fight, on condition that they ſhould be aſſiſted by the light, and ſhould at laſt overcome Arimanius. The reſurrection ſhall come when he ſhall be vanquiſhed. This, they conclude (78), was the cauſe of the mixture, and ſhall be the cauſe of the deliverance. The Greeks were not ignorant that Zoroaſter taught a future reſurrection (79).

[G] It is affirmed that he was no idolater either with reſpect to the worſhip of fire, or that of Mithra.] Dr Hyde affirms (80) that the followers of the ancient religion of the Perſians deny that they ever paid Divine adoration to the ſtars. They maintain that they do not adore the ſun, but only turn towards it when they pray to God. He has found amongſt Zoroaſter's precepts that we ought to ſalute the ſun, and beſtow praiſes on him, but not that we ought to ſerve him with religious worſhip. He proves that their ceremonies might very juſtly paſs for civil honours, and to this purpoſe he makes ſome exceeding curious obſervations. He applies to the fire what he ſays of the ſun; the bowings and proſtrations of the Perſians before the holy fire were not a religious adoration, but only a civil one: ‘Idem quoque dicendum eſt de eorum cultu Ignis, quem (ut ſupra tetigimus,) imitando Judæos in Pyreis ſervârunt. Nam quamvis ei exhibuerint Reverentiam quandam, eamque per Proſtrationes, hæ tamen non fuerunt Adoratio divina, ſed tantum civilis, prout ſe habet mos Orientis erga quoſvis Magnates, & olim fuit erga Angelos tanquam Dei Legatos ejus perſonam repræſentantes; cujus rei exempla affatim ſuppetunt non tantum in Vet. Teſt. ſed & in Novo, ubi fœminæ ad veram Fidem converſæ (viſis apud Chriſti ſepulchrum Angelis,) adorârunt procidentes faciebus in terram: idque quamvis probè ſcirent non eſſe Deum, ſed Angelos, ut conſtat ex verbis earum profitentium ſe vidiſſe viſionem Angelorum (81). - - - - - - The ſame thing muſt be ſaid of their worſhipping fire, which, as I have mentioned above, they kept in their Pyrea in imitation of the Jews. For though they paid a certain reverence to the fire, and that by proſtration, yet this was not a religious, but only a civil, worſhip; as it is the cuſtom of the eaſtern people to proſtrate themſelves before any great man, and as it was antiently the cuſtom to fall down before Angels, as being the meſſengers, and repreſentatives of GOD. There are many examples of this kind of worſhip not only in the Old Teſtament, but alſo in the New, where the women who had been converted to the true Faith, (upon ſeeing the Angels at the ſepulchre of Chriſt), fell with their faces to the ground, and worſhipped. Yet they well knew that it was not GOD they ſaw, but his Angels, as appears from their own words, we have ſeen a viſion of Angels.' He concludes (82) with obſerving that they are wrongfully called idolaters, and worſhippers of fire, and will have it that Zoroaſter was an inſtrument to oblige them to perſevere in the true faith (83). He was a man educated in the knowledge of the true God, whom he peculiarly worſhipped in a natural cave, in which he placed ſeveral ſymbols repreſenting the world. Mithra, repreſenting the ſun, filled the maſter's place. But it was not to Mithra, but to the true God, that he paid his adorations: ‘Is cùm eſſet inſignis Philoſophus, Religione auſterus, & totius Matheſeῶs peritiſſimus, hac ratione Perſas ſui admiratione perculit, & ſuæ Doctrinæ attentos reddidit. Præſertim coluit Deum in naturali quodam Antro, quod ille Mithriacum effecit & mirificè ac mathematicè comparavit, ubi ſcil. Mithra præſidens, hæc inferiora Regio modo regens, eaque imprægnans ſedebat: adeo ut omnes poſteà non tantùm in ſummis Montium jugis antiquiſſimo more Deum colebant, ſed & ſubinde illius exemplo, Sacra ſua Mithriaca in tali Antro præſtare & peragere didicerunt. In eo erant Mithræ & hujus Mundi Symbolica philoſophicè & mathematicè ſpectanda & contemplanda, non autem colenda; quâ itaque in re falluntur Autores: nam Perſæ tunc talia Simulachra non colebant (84). - - - - - - As he was an eminent Philoſopher, ſtrict and auſtere in his religion, and greatly ſkilled in all the parts of the Mathematics, he ſtruck the Perſians with an admiration of him, and rendered them attentive to his doctrine. He worſhipped GOD chiefly in a certain natural cave, which he conſecrated to Mithra, and adorned in a wonderful and regular manner, placing in it ſeveral ſymbols which repreſented the world. There Mithra preſided, as the ſovereign of all earthly things, which he governed and impregnated: ſo that afterwards they all worſhipped GOD not only on the tops of the mountains, after the antient cuſtom; but alſo from his example they learned to perform their mithriatic rites in the like caves, where they placed ſymbolical figures of Mithra and of the world; theſe figures were to be beheld and contemplated in a Philoſophical and Mathematical manner, but were not to be worſhipped: ſo that in this point authors are miſtaken: for at that time the Perſians did not worſhip theſe images.' Conſult this learned man in the fourth chapter of his work, where beſides other learned paſſages, you will find theſe words of Porphyry: ‘Referente Eubulo, Zoroaſtres primus omnium in montibus Perſidi vicinis Antrum nativum, floridum, fontibuſque irriguum in honorem Creatoris, & omnium Patris Mithræ, conſecravit: ita ut Antrum conditi à Mithrâ Mundi figuram ei repræſentaret: ea verò quæ intra Antrum, erant certis invicem intervallis diſpoſita, ut Elementorum Climatumque mundanorum ſymbola ſeu figuras gererent (85). - - - - - - Eubulus relates that Zoroaſter was the firſt who, in the mountains nigh Perſia, conſecrated a natural cave, adorned with flowers, to Mithra the creator and parent of all things. This cave repreſented to him the figure of the world, created by Mithra; and the things which were within it, were diſpoſed at certain diſtances, in ſuch a manner that they were the figures, or ſymbols, of the elements and climates of the earth.'

We may here obſerve that in this book of Dr Hyde there are ſome particulars which may be ſerviceable to the Jeſuits, on account of the charge brought againſt them concerning the honours paid to Confuſius, which they affirm to be purely civil. Father le Comte who hath been ſo much blamed for aſſerting that the true religion

---

(x) At the word Zerdaſcht.

(y) That tranſlation was printed at Paris in the year 1666, in 12mo.

(z) Pag. 152, & ſeq. and pag. 458, 459.

(77) Id. ibid.

(78) Ejuſmodi fuiſſe cauſam Miſtionis, hanc verò cauſam liberationis. Id. ibid. pag. 296.

(79) See what Diogenes Laërtius, in Proœmio, num. 8, relates concerning the doctrine of the Magi.

(80) Hyde, ubi ſupra, cap. i, pag. 5.

(81) Id. ibid. pag. 10.

(82) Id. ibid. pag. 14. See alſo pag. 22.

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 160.

(84) Id. ibid.

(85) Porphyr. de Nympharum antro, apud Hyde, ibid. cap. iv, pag. 118.

the name of Zoroaſter, ſome of which are yet in being, are ſuppoſititious. Dr Hyde is not of that opinion [H].

religion, or the knowledge of the true God, hath laſted in China for ſeveral ages (86), will find a very good aſſiſtant in this learned Oxford Profeſſor.

[H] Several authors believe that all the works which have gone under the name of Zoroaſter . . . . are ſuppoſititious. Dr Hyde is not of that opinion.] Suidas affirms that there were extant four books of Zoroaſter ϖερὶ φύσεως de natura - - - concerning nature; a book ϖερὶ λίϑων τιμίων de gemmis - - - concerning precious ſtones; and five books of judiciary Aſtrology, Ἀςεροσκοπικὰ ἀποτελέσματα, prædictiones ex inſpectione ſtellarum. It is very likely that what Pliny relates as quoted from Zoroaſter (87) was taken from thoſe books. Euſebius (88) cites a paſſage, which contains a magnificent deſcription of God, and gives it as the very words of Zoroaſter, ἐν τῇ ἱερᾷ συναγώγῃ τῶν Περσικῶν, in ſacro Perſicorum rituum commentario - - - in his ſacred commentary on the Perſian rites. I know no body who doth not believe that Clemens Alexandrinus ſays, that Prodicus's followers boaſted of having Zoroaſter's ſecret books (89). But perhaps his words are intended in another ſenſe, and mean that they boaſted of having the ſecret books of Pythagoras. They have been lately printed, with the verſes of the Sibyls at Amſterdam in the year 1689, according to Opſopæus's edition, Oracula magica Zoroaſtris cum Scholiis Plethonis & Pſelli. Thoſe pretended magical oracles make but two pages. Here follows the opinion of Huetius concerning all the books in general which go under Zoroaſter's name. He calls them all ſupoſititious. ' Ex cujus (Zoroaſtris) fama & exiſtimatione provenit eorum fallacia, qui ſub ejus nomine ' Oracula quædam magica Græce ſcripta incautis ' obtruſerunt. Edita illa ſunt cum Pſelli & Plethonis ' ſcholiis: ſed ſi nares admoveris, fraus ſubolebit. ' Vetuſtiora quidem illa ſunt, nihilo tamen γνησιώτερα (ſinceriora) Oracula, quæ Crœſi temporibus ' extitiſſe narrat * Nicolaus Damaſcenus. Inſinceros ' quoque eos dixerim libros, quos Chaldaice ſcriptos, ' & Chaldaicis commentariis illuſtratos, & effata ac ' ſententias complexos Johannem Picum habuiſſe ferunt; inſincerum & librum Zind, mihi de nomine ' ſolum cognitum, quo ritus magicos, & ignis colendi ' diſciplinam ajunt contineri. . . . . . Inſinceros & ' quos Hermippus, Plinio teſte, ducentis verſuum ' millibus ſub Zoroaſtris nomine conditos indicibus ' quoque poſitis explanavit. Ex iiſdem falſariorum ' incudibus profectus eſt ſupra memoratus Perſicarum ' Legum codex Zundavaſtaw, quem vetuſtiſſimum ' tamen conjicio, & eumdem fortaſſe, qui ab † Euſebio ' Collectio ſacra Perſicarum rerum appellatur. Indidem ' profectus & quem ſe in arcanis habere jactabant, qui ' Prodici Philoſophi doctrinam ſectabantur, ut eſt apud ' ⸸ Clementem Alexandrinum; indidem & quos commemorat ‡ Suidas; & qui de Magia, Zoroaſtris ' nomine, ſcripti circumferebantur, ut habet  Auctor ' Recognitionum; & quem tradit Auctor Aſtrologiæ ' cujuſdam Perſicæ, Ebraice redditæ, ab eo lucubratum, ' & Regnum Dei fuiſſe inſcriptum, & manibus Perſarum aſſidue geſtari eſſe ſolitum (90). - - - - - - - ' The fame and reputation of Zoroaſter encouraged certain ' men fradulently to impoſe upon the unwary ſome magical ' oracles witten in Greek, as the genuine works of this ' Philoſopher. They are publiſhed with the commentaries ' of Pſellus and Plethon: but upon a ſlight examination, ' you perceive the fraud. Thoſe oracles which, as Nicolas ' Damaſcenus ſays, were extant in the time of Crœſus, ' are indeed much antienter, but not more genuine than ' the former. I may likewiſe call ſuppoſititious thoſe books ' written in the Chaldaic tongue, illuſtrated with Chaldaic commentaries, and containing the wiſe ſayings and ' opinions of this Philoſopher, which they ſay were in ' the poſſeſſion of John Picus. I alſo take to be ſuppoſititious the book of Zind, which I know only by the ' title, and is ſaid to contain the Magic rites, and the ' manner and form of worſhipping the fire. . . . . . The ' ſame thing may be affirmed of thoſe two hundred thouſand verſes, which went under the name of Zoroaſter, ' and were, as Pliny teſtifies, explained by Hermippus. ' Zundavaſtaw, the abovementioned book of the Perſian ' laws, is of the ſame ſtamp: yet in my opinion it is ' very antient, and the ſame with what Euſebius calls ' the ſacred Collection of the Perſian Affairs. To ' theſe we may add the book which the followers of the ' Philoſopher Prodicus boaſted they had ſecretly in their ' poſſeſſion, as we learn from Clemens Alexandrinus. ' The books mentioned by Suidas are likewiſe forged, as ' alſo thoſe on Magic, which went about under the name ' of Zoroaſter, as the author of the Recognitiones, ſays; ' and that which the author of a certain book on Perſian ' Aſtrology, tranſlated into Hebrew, mentions as the compoſure of Zoroaſter, and which he ſays was intituled ' the Kingdom of God, and was continually in the ' hands of the Perſians.' Huetius adds (91), that Porphyry (92) reproached the Chriſtians with the forgery of ſeveral books, and boaſted of having proved that the apocalypſe of Zoroaſter was one of thoſe ſupoſititious pieces.

Dr Hyde acknowledges that the ancient Heretics falſly alledged, under the name of Zoroaſter, ſome ſuppoſitious prophecies concerning Jesus Christ; but he ſaith that they had not preſumed to do it, if they had not known that there were extant genuine works of Zoroaſter in which were contained ſuch prophecies (93). He believes (94) that God revealed to Zoroaſter the coming of the Meſſiah, and that Zoroaſter inſerted this wonderful revelation in his works. He takes the Zundavaſtaw, which Huetius rejects, to be an authentic piece: he gives us the true title and analyſis of it, and is perſwaded (95), that this author's works were written in the ancient Perſian language, and are preſerved to this preſent time.

(86) The Sorbonne condemned that propoſition on the eighteenth of October 1700.

(87) Plin. lib. xviii, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 501; & lib. xxxvii, cap. x, pag. 407, 410, 411.

(88) Euſeb. Præpar. Evang. lib. i, ſub fin. pag. 42.

(89) Clem. Alexandrin. Strom. lib. i, pag. 304.

* Nicol. Damaſc. Hiſt. l. 7. in Exc. Conſt. Porphyr.

† Euſeb. Præp. Ev. l. 1.

⸸ Clem. Alex. Strom. 1.

‡ Suidas, in Ζωροάςρης.

 Auct. Recogn. l. 4, c. 27.

(90) Huet. ubi ſupra, p. 159.

(91) Huet. ibid. pag. 160.

(92) Porphyr. in Vita Plotini.

(93) Hyde, ubi ſupra, in Epiſt. Dedicat. See alſo cap. xxvi, p. 340, 341.

(94) Idem, cap. xxxi, pag. 382, & ſeq.

(95) See his preface.

ZUERIUS BOXHORNIUS (Mark) Profeſſor at Leyden, the ſon of James Zuerius Miniſter at Bergen-op-Zoom, and of Anne Boxhorn the daughter of a Miniſter at Breda, of whom I ſhall ſpeak below [A], was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in September 1612 (a). He was but ſix years old when his father died. Some time after he followed his mother to Breda, and there was educated by Henry Boxhornius, his grand-father by his mother's ſide, till the Spaniards became maſters of that city in the year 1625. Then he was carried to Leyden by Henry Boxhornius, who having no male iſſue deſired him to take his name. This young ſcholar made ſo great and ſpeedy a progreſs, that he publiſhed ſome very good Poems in the year 1629, on the taking of Boiſleduc,

(a) He was a twin: his twin brother was the eldeſt, his name was Henry, he was a miniſter, and died in the year 1640, being but little above 28 years of age, and a very learned and hopeful man. Jacob. Baſelius, in Vita

Marci Zuerii Boxhornii, Epiſtolis Boxhornii præfixa. See alſo, Epiſt. Boxhornii, pag. 168, Edit. Francof. 1679.

[A] He was grandſon to a Miniſter at Breda, of whom I ſhall ſpeak below.] His name was Henry Boxhornius, or Boxhorn, and he was born in Brabant. He went through his ſtudies at Louvain, and after having there obtained the decree of Licentiate in Divinity, he was promoted to the Deanry of Tillemont, and expreſſed ſuch a warm zeal for the Romiſh religion that he was made Inquiſitor. But he changed his opinion, and embraced the Reformed religion. He was firſt of all a Miniſter in the duchy of Cleves, afterwards at Woerden in Holland, and at laſt at Breda (1). He left this laſt town, when the Spaniards took it in the year 1625, and retired to Leyden, where he took care of the education of his grandſon (2), who is the ſubject of this article. Henry Boxhornius wrote ſome books of controverſy. His antagoniſt was Henry Cuyckius, who accuſed him of falſely pretending to be of the family of the Boxhorns. This Cuyckius, Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Louvain, Grand-Vicar and Official to the Archbiſhop of Mechlen, and at laſt Biſhop of Ruremonde, publiſhed in the year 1596, an Epiſtola Parænetica, in which he exhorted Henry

(1) Taken from the Anti of Mr Baillet, Tom. i, pag. 158, 159.

(2) Jacobus Baſelius, in Vita Marci Zuerii Boxhornii.

Boiſleduc, and ſome other victories obtained by the Dutch. He was then only ſeventeen years of age. He was but twenty when he publiſhed ſeveral conſiderable works [B]. This acquired him ſo great a reputation, that, in the ſame year 1632, the curators of the univerſity of Leyden conferred on him the Profeſſorſhip of Eloquence. He made ſo great a figure in this poſt that Chancellor Oxenſtiern, then Ambaſſador-Extraordinary from Sweden in Holland, offered him an honourable employment, by order of Queen Chriſtina [C]: but Boxhornius preferred the poſt he enjoyed in his own country to all thoſe honours [D]; and continuing as well by his lectures as books to give frequent proofs of his learning, and exact knowledge in Politics, and Hiſtory, he was made Profeſſor of thoſe two ſciences in the room of Daniel Heinſius who was declared emeritus. He diſcharged this office in a manner very advantageous to his auditors, and very glorious to himſelf. He was for ſome time at variance with Salmaſius; but that quarrel which obliged him to take pen in hand againſt that formidable Critic, was at laſt compoſed [E]. He freely communicated his knowledge to other authors, as Valerius Andreas confeſſes in his Bibliotheca Belgica. He died after a tedious ſickneſs at Leyden on the third of October 1653. Aged forty-one years. He wrote on various ſubjects [F], and particularly Boxhorn to return into the pale of the Church. To which Boxhorn anſwered that he would have nothing to do with ſuch a corrupt Church. Cuyckius returned to the charge: and Boxhorn replied by an Anti-Cuyckius, printed at Leyden, in the year 1598. Boxhorn was attacked on his nobility; for Cuyckius would not admit his pretenſion of being deſcended from the Boxhorns, a noble family in Brabant (3). See the hiſtory of the ſiege of Breda (4).

[B] He was but twenty years of age when he publiſhed ſeveral conſiderable works.] As Theatrum Urbium Hollandiæ; Scriptores Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ cum Animadverſionibus ac Notis (5); Poëtæ Satyrici minores cum Commentariis; Plinii Panegyricus. He deſerved a place among the illuſtrious youths, of whom Mr Baillet hath drawn up ſuch a curious catalogue; for to ſay nothing of the verſes which he publiſhed at the age of ſeventeen, and which were very much applauded (6), it is certain that in the year 1631, he publiſhed an edition of Suetonius with notes, which induced the Profeſſors of the univerſity to adviſe him to put in for the Greek Profeſſorſhip, which was then vacant (7). He was therefore an author at the age of nineteen. How many conſiderable books did he publiſh in the following year? There was no occaſion for an officious lie to make him an early author: the ſtricteſt truth was ſufficient for it; I wiſh therefore Valerius Andreas had rigorouſly adhered to it, and had not ſaid that Boxhornius publiſhed books at the age of ſixteen, and that he was made profeſſor of Eloquence, and of the Belles Lettres, before he was nineteen years of age. The firſt of his productions appeared in the year 1629, and he was not Profeſſor before 1632. Add to this, that he was thirteen years old when he left Breda to go to Leyden: wherefore they are miſtaken by one year who make him but twelve years old when he was matriculated at Leyden (8). It happened to Boxhornius as to ſeveral others; when age increaſed his learning he grew ſomewhat aſhamed of his firſt productions, and accordingly diſcovered ſome deſire to diſown them. Neverthele ſs it appears that he had ſtill a tenderneſs for them, ſince whilſt he ſeemed to diſown them, he took care to publiſh the praiſes which Salmaſius gave them in his letters to him. ‘ Claudius Salmaſius juveniles hoſce conatus ſibi adeo probari tum temporis literis ad Boxhornium datis ſignificavit, ut maxima quæque ab ipſo non tantum ſperare, ſed ſibi & eruditorum orbi & quidem ex vero promittere adeoque præſagire fuerit auſus: quæ illius Herois verbis ipſis publice alibi (9) leguntur, eo nempe loco quo Boxhornius ipſe poſtmodum hæc ipſa aliaque Juvenilia damnavit, ac proinde inter ſcripta ſua vix numeravit. - - - Claudius Salmaſius, in his letter to Boxhorn, ſays, that he was then ſo well pleaſed with theſe juvenile eſſays, that he not only entertained the greateſt hopes of him, but alſo ventured to promiſe to himſelf, and to the learned world, nay, to preſage the greateſt things of him. Theſe are the expreſſions of Salmaſius, which are publiſhed in that place where Boxhorn himſelf afterwards diſapproved of theſe, and other, his juvenile performances, and accordingly would hardly reckon them among his writings.’ This we find in Boxhorn's life. It puts me in mind of what Grotius wrote to Scriverius (10).

[C] Chancellor Oxenſtiern . . . . . offered him an honourable employment by order of Queen Chriſtina (11).] The author of Boxhornius's life doth not mention in what year this Chancellor came into Holland; had he taken the pains to expreſs it, he would have avoided an error in Chronology: he would not have ſaid that ſome time after Boxhorn had refuſed to go to Sweden, he refuſed to go to Dort, whither he was invited by the magiſtrates to teach in the college which they re-eſtabliſhed in the year 1634. ‘ Non diu poſthæc cum Reip. Dordracenæ proceres illuſtre ſuum & vetuſtiſſimum à Reformatione in fœderato Belgio Gymnaſium anno quidem unde octogeſimo ſuperioris ſeculi erectum ſed collapſum reſtaurarent an. 1634, omnium calculis Boxhornius dignus judicatus & habitus eſt cui res literaria in eo promovenda committeretur. - - - Not long after, in the year 1634, when the magiſtrates of Dort were re-eſtabliſhing their illuſtrious college, which was as antient as the Reformation in the United Provinces, being erected in the year 1579, they unanimouſly choſe Boxhorn, as a perſon worthy to be intruſted with the promoting of learning in that college.’ The dates are confounded here; for it is certain that the Chancellor of Sweden did not come into Holland before the year 1635. The magiſtrates of Dort offered Boxhorn a better penſion than he had at Leyden, yet he did not accept their offers; which procured him an augmentation of his ſalary at Leyden. This is the uſual conſequence of refuſals of this kind, when men either are willing, or know how to make the beſt of them.

[D] Boxhorn preferred the poſt he enjoyed in his own country to all theſe honours.] Before the author of his life publiſhed this fact, Valerius Andreas ſpoke of it: How then comes Moreri to ſay that Boxhornius went into Sweden, where his merit procured him conſiderable employments? Is it thus that theſe words ought to be tranſlated? Evocatus ſuperioribus annis à Suecorum ad Ordines fœderatos Legato, Reginæ & Procerum nomine ad ampliſſimas dignitates in Sueciam illi ſeptentrioni amorem prætulit patriæ (12).

[E] That quarrel with Salmaſius was at laſt compoſed.] This muſt be underſtood with ſome diſtinction: The acts of hoſtility ceaſed, they did no longer openly profeſs themſelves enemies to each other, but their hearts remained the ſame, and could not ſuppreſs their ſallies and eruptions on all occaſions. Boxhornius a year before his death, when already ſeized by his mortal diſtemper, diſdainfully received the viſits of ſtrangers recommended by Salmaſius. ‘ Eos qui à Salmaſio venerant faſtidioſè excipiebat, jam tum nimio tabaci uſu correpta valetudine quæ altero poſt anno eum cum vitâ deſtituit. - - - He diſdainfully received the viſits of thoſe who came from Salmaſius: his health was already impaired by an immoderate uſe of tobacco: he died two years after.’ Theſe two facts I find in the funeral orations of John Caſpar Lentzius (13). And what relates to tobacco puts me in mind of what I have heard, that Boxhorn had a hat with a hole in the brim to hold his pipe, ſo that he could ſmoak both whilſt he was ſtudying and writing.

[F] He wrote on various ſubjects.] He muſt not only have been very laborious, but alſo have known a great many things, and have been endued with a very great facility in writing; for without that a life ſo ſhort as his would not have ſufficed for all the works, which he publiſhed. I have already mentioned

(3) See Mr Baillet, ibid. pag. 158, & ſeq.

(4) Pag. 153.

(5) In four volumes in 12mo. Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays that this work, Pliny's Panegyric, Juſtin, and ſome ſatirical Poets were publiſhed by Boxhornius in the year 1631. Valerius Andreas has committed the ſame fault, as to the Hiſtoria Auguſta.

(6) Omnium applauſu lectos fuiſſe non ſemel audivi. Jacob. Baſelius, in ejus Vita.

(7) Suetonius tanto omnium favore exceptus eſt, ut clariſſimi hujus Acad. Profeſſ. ad linguæ Græcæ profeſſionem quæ jam vacat adſpirare me voluerint. Boxbornius, in Epiſt. pag. m. 15, Edit. Francof. His letter is dated on the 29th of September 1631.

(8) As Valerius Andreas does. Hankius de Romanar. Rer. Script. pag. 295, has tranſcribed moſt of his faults.

(9) In Apologia pro Commentario ad Agricolam Taciti adverſus Dialogiſtam.

(10) See the article THOMÆUS, citat. (6).

(11) Ab Axelio Oxenſtierna regni Cancellario Fœderis Germanici Directore, ad Fœderatos Belgas legato extraordinario Reginæ & eorundem Procerum nomine ad ampliſſimas dignitates in Zueciam evocatus fuit. Baſelius, ubi ſupra.

(12) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 641. Baſelius adds, Quare eas recuſavit, & apud ſuos mediocri in conditione eſſe maluit, quam apud exteros alto in faſtigio collocari.

(13) In Theatro Pauli Freheri, pag. 1180.

particularly on the invention of Printing [G]. On that ſubject he advanced an opinion very different from that of Mallinkrot, and yet his diſſertation procured him the friendſhip of that learned man. He very carefully ſtudied the antiquities of Gaul [H], which led him to dive into the Scythian tongue, and the antiquities of that nation, on which he wrote very ingeniouſly both in Dutch and in Latin. He had alſo compoſed an Hiſtorical account of women, illuſtrious for their learning, and writings; but this book never appeared [I]. Some have pretended that the Dutch were not pleaſed with the publication of a ſmall treatiſe which he had dictated to his ſcholars, and wherein he explained the conſtitution of the Republic of the United Provinces (b) [K]. His Sacred and tioned ſome of his commentaries on the ancient authors, but have ſaid nothing of his notes on Juſtin, Tacitus, and Pliny's epiſtles, nor of his commentary on the life of Agricola publiſhed in the year 1642, and a little while after defended againſt the attacks of an anonymous writer. I have not mentioned his annals of Zeland and Holland, which he publiſhed in Dutch with large additions, and better digeſted; thoſe of Zeland in the year 1644, and thoſe of Holland in 1650. He endeavoured to obtain the title of Hiſtoriographer of Zeland (14), and afterwards that of Hiſtoriographer of all the United Provinces (15): but I believe he obtained neither; for if his requeſts had ſucceeded, the author of his life would have touched on this point: now I do not find that he ſaith one word of it. The Index to his letters mentions that he obtained his requeſt with regard to Zeland; but when one conſults the page to which it refers us, nothing like it appears. His hiſtory of the ſiege of Breda is written in good Latin. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes on political ſubjects, as an apology for the navigations of the Hollanders. Diſſertatio de Trapezitis vulgo Longobardis qui in fœderato Belgio fœnebres menſas exercent: Diſſertatio de ſucceſſione & jure primogenituræ adeundo principatu ad Carolum II, magnæ Britanniæ Regem: De majeſtate liber ſingularis adverſus J. B. Cogitationes ſubitaneas in præcedentem diſſertationem. It appears by this laſt piece that what he publiſhed in favour of Charles II King of England, when fled from his kingdom, had diſpleaſed ſome republicans. There is a collection of his Diſquiſitiones politicæ, id eſt, 60. caſus politici ex omni hiſtoria ſelecti, printed in the year 1651 in 12mo. He publiſhed a great number of Orations on ſeveral ſubjects, and after his death came out his Ideæ orationum ex ſelectiori materia moderni ſtatus politici deſumptæ, his Inſtitutiones politicæ, and his Latin Letters and Latin Poems. This laſt printed in the year 1659, was reprinted in Germany in 1679, with a preface written by James Thomaſius, Profeſſor at Leipſic, which very well deſerves to be read.

[G] . . . . . . And particularly on the invention of Printing.] He aſſerts that the glory of this invention is due to the city of Haerlem, and not to Mentz, as he formerly believed. Cujus inventæ gloriam Harlemenſibus, non Moguntinis, ut olim, nunc denuo aſſertum imus (16). His diſſertation on this ſubject was printed in the year 1641.

[H] He very carefully ſtudied the antiquities of Gaul.] Of this the author of his life gives us the following account. ‘Nunc hiſce finem imponerem, niſi paucis dicendum eſſet de iis, quæ ſuper Dea Nehalemia (17) 1647 primum in Walachriæ oris inventâ eſt commentatus, & inde ad Scythicæ gentis linguam, antiquitatem, & mores indagandos multa ingenioſè ſane ſcripſit & ſcripturivit non vernacule modo, prout inceperat, ſed & Latine: nominatim librum originum Gallicarum (18), in quo Gallos à Germanis ortos ex veteri ipſorum lingua aſſerere conatur, qui tamen non niſi à morte autoris & alia ejuſdem, prodiit in lucem, obſtetricante Georgio Hornio in profeſſione Hiſtoriarum non indigno ſucceſſore. - - - - - - I ſhall conclude, after I have ſaid ſomething concerning the obſervations he made on the goddeſs Nehalemia, who was firſt found on the coaſts of Walchern, and concerning what he afterwards ingeniouſly wrote, and intended to write not only in Dutch, as he had begun to do, but alſo in Latin, in order to diſcover the language, antiquity, and manners of the antient Scythians, eſpecially concerning his book on the antiquities of Gaul; where he endeavours to maintain, that the antient Gauls were deſcended from the Germans, and to prove it by their antient language. Yet this, with ſome other of his books did not appear till after the author's death, being publiſhed by George Hornius, his worthy ſucceſſor, in the profeſſorſhip of Hiſtory.’ It appears by Boxhornius's letters that his Origines Gallicæ were in the preſs in the year 1648 (19): and continued ſo in 1652 (20). He ſpeaks of it only as of a ſmall piece (21), but he had a good opinion of his ſyſtem. He hoped to prove that the Greeks and Romans owed all to the antient Frieſlanders (22). His treatiſe de Scythicis originibus was finiſhed in the year 1647 (23), but he had a hundred things to add to it; for in a letter written to Mr de Zuilychem in the year 1652. He ſpeaks thus: ‘De originibus noſtris & ſepultis hactenus Scythicis Antiquitatibus (nam & de iis quærere dignatus es) hoc eſt, ut ego accipio, Aſiæ totius & Europæ, ſuperbius forte & jactantius reſpondeo. Multa excuſſi diligenter, conquiſivi multa, multa meditatus ſum, multa etiam ignorata, feliciter, niſi fallor, tandem deprehendi; quæ aliquando publicis judiciis ſiſtere ac exponere tuo imprimis, quod ſcio eſſe & graviſſimum pariter, & æquiſſimum, audebo (24). - - - - - You are pleaſed to inquire of my book on the antiquities of the Gauls, and thoſe of the Scythians, which are as yet unknown, being, as I take it, the antiquities of all Aſia and Europe. I anſwer with confidence, and perhaps with ſome vanity, that I have very diligently examined, collected and reflected on a great many things, and have at length, if I miſtake not, made ſeveral happy diſcoveries, which I may ſome time lay before the judgment of the public, and before your's in particular, which I know to be of great weight, and very impartial.’ He publiſhed a Latin diſcourſe in the year 1650, to ſhew the affinity betwixt the Greek, Latin, and German languages.

[I] He had compoſed an hiſtorical account of women, illuſtrious . . . . . . but his book never appeared.] Valerius Andreas is to blame for inſerting in the Catalogue of Boxhorn's works, Bibliothecam eruditione ac ſcriptis illuſtrium fœminarum; and doubtleſs it was owing to him that ſeveral authors imagined, and even publiſhed, that Boxhorn put out this curious treatiſe. Voglerus affirms it as poſitively as if he had read the book (25), and is not cenſured for it by Meibomius (26). What is certain is, that Boxhorn had this project in his head: he had good collections on this ſubject, which he offered to Iſaac Pontanus (27), who had ſome thoughts of an undertaking of this nature (28); but if you think no more of it, added he, and will be pleaſed to transfer to me this commiſſion, I beg of you to ſend me your memoirs. Erneſtus Brinchius communicated to him a liſt of learned women. Velim nobili viro Erneſto Brinchio gratias meo nomine agi, ob tranſmiſſum Syllabum eruditarum fœminarum. In quarum gratiam Bibliothecam meam, & amicorum ſcrinia nuper excuſſi. Deprehendi autem non pœnitendum earum numerum, quæ vulgò ignorantur. Si tibi animus ſit pergere in eo, quod aliquando cœpiſſe te intelligo, lubens qualiacunque mea tranſmittam, ſin verò tibi viſum lampada mihi tradere, ut tua non deneges, unicè rogo. I ſhall here occaſionally ſay that Father Jacob, a French Carmelite, had compoſed a book of the like nature; which many authors cite and refer to, and yet it never was printed, nor ever will, for the manuſcript is loſt.

[K] Some have pretended that the Dutch were not pleaſed, &c. . . . . . .] Sorbiere writes this to Patin; his words are: ‘I have ſent you a curious little book intituled Commentariolus de Statu Provinciarum fœderati Belgii, the publication of which has very much diſpleaſed in theſe provinces, becauſe it gives a very clear and diſtinct idea of the government of this Republic, and this ought to remain inter Arcana Imperii. Boxhorn had made this commentary for his ſcholars in politics, and had dictated it to them in private; but the ſecret took wind, and there have been ſo many copies of it handed about, that at laſt a Bookſeller

---

(b) Ex ejus Vita, conſcripta à Jacobo Baſelio, quæ extat in limine Epiſtolarum Boxhornii.

(14) Boxhorn. in Epiſtol. pag. 219, 226.

(15) Ibid. pag. 308.

(16) Epiſtol. pag. 167.

(17) He wrote two tracts in Dutch upon that goddeſs: one of them was printed in the year 1647, and the other in 1648.

(18) That book is intituled Originum Gallicarum Liber in quo veteris & nobiliſſimæ Gallorum Gentis Origines, Antiquitates, Mores, & Linguæ aliaque eruuntur aut illuſtrantur. Cui accedit antiquæ Linguæ Britannicæ Lexicon Britannico-Latinum, inſertis explicatiſque paſſim Adagiis Britannicis. Prodiit Amſt. apud J. Janſſ. 1654, in 4to.

(19) Epiſt. Boxhorn. pag. 291.

(20) Ibid. pag. 315.

(21) Sub prælo jam eſt opuſculum Originum Gallicarum. Ib. pag. 315.

(22) Ibid. pag. 289.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 314.

(25) Similiter plane ad noſtrum inſtitutum deditaque opera id argumentum egregie tractavit Marcus Zuerius Boxhornius EDITA Bibliotheca eruditione ac ſcriptis illuſtrium fœminarum. Voglerus, Introduct. univerſ. in Notitiam Scriptorum, cap. xxvii, pag. m. 113.

(26) He publiſhed the book of Voglerus, with notes and additions in the year 1691.

(27) Epiſtol. pag. 137.

(28) Ibid. pag. 120.

and Profane Hiſtory, which extends from the birth of JESUS CHRIST to the year 1650, is well eſteemed: it is but one volume in 4to. The beſt part of it is that of the XVIth century, and the beginning of the XVIIth. Boxhorn was ſomewhat ugly, and ſo ſwarthy, that he was one day taken for a Spaniard [L]. Upon that occaſion he made an anſwer full of zeal for his country (c); but let the Caſuiſts determine whether it be conformable to the Spirit of the Goſpel [M]. Sorbiere ſeeing him ſomewhat angry with Grotius had the equity to excuſe him; and beſides, to ſuggeſt that this language was conformable to the laws of Policy [N].

Some learned Germans had no great opinion of his learning, and have obſerved ſeveral errors in his works. He had notice of this, and reſolved to revenge himſelf by a ſatire [O]: I cannot tell whether he executed his deſign.

. . . .

‘a Bookſeller put it to the preſs without placing his name to it; and the impreſſion was ſold before the public had time to find fault with it (29).’ I do not certainly know whether Sorbiere was in the right to ſay this, but I know that this ſmall treatiſe was printed at the Hague for John Verhoeve, in the years 1649, and 1650, and that the edition of 1650, was reviſed and enlarged. There were alſo other editions. I have ſeen the ſixth, printed at the Hague by Adrian Vlacq, in the year 1659.

[L] He was ſo ſwarthy that he was one day taken for a Spaniard.] This was in the year 1637, when the Spaniſh garriſon left Breda according to the capitulation. Boxhorn being then in the Prince of Orange's camp, and ſeeing that garriſon paſs, heard a Dutch ſoldier take him for a Spaniard: You miſtake, ſaid he, do not judge of me by my hair and my aſpect; if you knew the candour of my heart, you would not doubt of my being a true Hollander. And if I were able, I would immediately throw the King of Spain into a fever, fix him ſo cloſe to his bed, and ſo terrify him, that he ſhould never more unjuſtly attack our liberty. Thoſe who had rather read the original Latin, ſhall ſoon be ſatisfied. Statura corporis ipſi fuit longa & erecta, & quam cum ſubfuſcâ facie crines efficiebant qualemcunque deformem: nigredinem eam candore animi ſui albicantem reddere ſolebat. Unde cum Bredâ captâ inter exeuntium Hiſpanorum ſpectatores & ipſe eſſet, & à noſtrate quodam milite ipſo audiente pro Hiſpano ob dictam nigredinem habitus, illi homini facetè non minus quam verè reſpondebat, ‘Tu me ex vultu & crinibus Hiſpanum judicas, ſed male: nam ſi candorem animi Belgici mei noſſes, qui tam magnus eſt ac nigri ſunt mei crines, & in mea eſſet poteſtate, pro amore in communem patriam vel hodie Hiſpaniarum Regem febri affligerem lectoque alligarem, & metu ſic terrerem, ut impoſterum abſtineret ab injuſta liberorum Belgarum oppreſſione & oppugnatione (30).’

[M] Let the Caſuiſts determine whether this anſwer was conformable to the Spirit of the Goſpel.] The accuſation which appeared in a looſe ſheet in March 1694 (31), if juſt, would prove, that Boxhorn might eaſily obtain his abſolution, and even a full approbation of the Caſuiſts, who ſhould be like the preacher who is accuſed; for we are told that he preached that the precept of loving and bleſſing the perſecutors of the Church, doth not engage us to any more than to wiſh and promote their heavenly felicity. The temporal miſchief (32) which Boxhorn would have done to the King of Spain, would not have prevented his wiſhing the converſion of that Prince. Beſides, a diſeaſe is no aſſaſſination; but the ſaid preacher hath told us in one of his books, that except aſſaſſination, all other means are allowable and fair againſt a declared enemy (33). He hath made ſo lame an anſwer to the accuſation, and that with ſuch perplexed and ſophiſtical turns (34), that his anſwer, together with the induſtrious care he took to withdraw his ſermons from the preſs, have convinced all reaſonable men, that he was very juſtly accuſed. Conſult Mr Saurin's book (35).

See, below, the remark [P].

[N] Sorbiere had the equity to ſuggeſt that this language was conformable to the laws of Policy.] Boxhorn was thirty years of age when Sorbiere went to viſit him, and was known then by a great many, and perhaps too many books (36). By degrees he grew warm againſt Grotius in this converſation, and blamed him not only for his method of re-uniting Chriſtians, but alſo with reſpect to the political affairs of Holland. ‘Is viſus eſt τῷ πάνυ Grotio minus amicus; nam ſenſim procedente, ut fit, ſermone ad quæſtiones tunc temporis volitantes docta per ora virum & nupera ſcripta, non ſolùm diſſentire (quod faciunt multi boni & amici Grotio) ſe faſſus eſt circa initum conciliationis modum & tributam nimiam Rom. Pontifici authoritatem, ſed ipſum inſimulatus eſt circa politica patriæ negotia, una cum cæteris Remonſtrantibus (37). - - - He ſeemed not to love Grotius; for the converſation, as it uſually happens, gradually falling upon the queſtions at that time among the learned, and upon the new books, Zuerius not only confeſſed that he differed with Grotius (which many of his good friends own they do) as to his manner of reconciling Proteſtants and Papiſts, and the too great authority aſcribed to the Pope; but alſo blamed him, and the reſt of the Remonſtrants, with regard to the political affairs of Holland.’ Sorbiere excuſed Boxhorn, becauſe it would not have been prudent in a profeſſor, who intends to be ſucceſsful in his affairs, and uſe his endeavours for the advancement of his domeſtic proſperity, to expoſe himſelf to the diſpleaſure of the ruling party. Quærens apud me rationem qua excuſarem Boxhornium; aut quia junior res geſtas audierat ab aliis non probatæ fidei teſtibus: aut quia profeſſorium munus exercens conductum mercede ſe putabat à Calvinianis, quorum excidere gratia, clavum Reipubl. tenentium, non eſt hominis bene rem familiarem gerere quærentis. Perhaps there lurks a malignity in theſe excuſes; but ſince Sorbiere doth not deny that Boxhorn might ſpeak according to his perſuaſion, we ought not to ſuppoſe that he applied to him the ſaying, beneficium accipere libertatem vendere eſt: a well paid ſalary prevents ſpeaking one's thoughts.

[O] Some learned Germans . . . have obſerved ſeveral errors in his works, he . . . . reſolved to revenge himſelf by a ſatire.] This appears in a letter from Rupert to Reineſius. ‘Videtur Boxhornius nimium tribuere ingenio ſuo, & ante tempus togâ brachium exerere. Quum olim vidiſſem Florum ejus, occurrebant multa valdè putida; quæ privato ſtudio notata, ſed poſteà neſcio quâ fraude in vulgus ſparſa, in ipſius Boxhornii manus veniſſe dicuntur. Etiam Satyram, ut audio, minatus eſt in literis ad quendam Dreſdenſem; quaſi pro meis agnoſcere debeam univerſa, quæ inimica manus tranſmiſit: Vivimus enim hic in Viperina ſocietate. Sed quicquid velit, agat, & typographica tubâ proprium dedecus inſonet in eruditas aures: ego nullus trepido, quamvis illud poetæ inſuſurrare quiſpiam poſſit:

Occurſare Capro, cornu ferit ille, caveto (38).

‘Boxhornius ſeems to be full of himſelf, and to ſhew his parts before they are ripe. Some time ago when I read his Florus, I met with ſeveral very bad things; theſe I noted for my own uſe; but afterwards, by I know not what fraud, theſe notes became public, and it is ſaid, even fell into the hands of Boxhornius himſelf. I am informed, that in a letter to a certain perſon at Dreſden, he threatens me with a ſatire; as if I ought to acknowledge all theſe to be my writings, which his enemies publiſh againſt him: for here we live together like vipers. But let him do as he pleaſes; let him proclaim to the world his own diſgrace. I am not afraid; though ſomebody may whiſper the ſaying of the Poet:

Avoid the goat, who puſhes with his horn.

Reineſius, in a letter to Hoffman, hath theſe words: ‘Tragocerotem Batavum qui neſcio quid Ruperto noſtro minatus fuerat, confidentiſſimum Criticum eſſe & in Antiquitate videre præ calore parum, oſtendam ex

(c) See the remark [L].

(29) Sorbiere, Letter lxiii, pag. 438.

(30) Baſelius, in ejus Vita.

(31) With this title Nouvelle Héréſie dans la Morale touchant la Haine du prochain, prêchée par Mr Jurieu, &c.

(32) Note, that the miſchief which ſoldiers do to the enemy by wounding or killing them, and the miſchief which a private man ſhould do them, by giving them a draught, that occaſions a Fever, &c. are different things. The firſt is not brought into queſtion here, but is ſuppoſed without any difficulty.

(33) See the Entretiens ſur la Cabale chimerique, pag. 87, & ſeq.

(34) He reckons among the propoſitions complained of ſeveral conſequences, which the accuſer ſays might be drawn from the Hereſies charged upon him; but he does not ſay that the miniſter preached thoſe conſequences. It is therefore a baſe trick to complain that he is accuſed of having preached thoſe conſequences.

(35) Intituled, Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 807, & ſeq.

(36) Inviſi Boxhornium juvenem annorum triginta . . . . doctum ſane, & multis, ne nimiis dicam, libris notum. Sorberiana, pag. 44, Dutch Edit.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Epiſt. xxi Reineſii ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, pag. 64, 65.

. . . . [P]. . . . .

'ejus Quæſtionibus Romanis, ubi circa Inſcriptiones nonnullas pueriliter hallucinatur (39). - - - As for that formidable Dutchman, who has threatened I know not what againſt our Rupert, I ſhall ſhew that he is a moſt audacious Critic, and very ſhallow in the knowledge of antiquity, being hurried away with his paſſion. This I ſhall prove upon him from his Quæſtiones Romanæ, where, explaining ſome inſcriptions, he blunders like a child.' See alſo the 27th letter of the ſame Reineſius (40); where he treats Boxhorn with a great deal of contempt.

[P] . . . . . . : . . . . . .]

An important digreſſion on the accuſation of a new Hereſy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour.

Having here an occaſion to ſpeak of this accuſation of a new Hereſy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour, I ſhall make a digreſſion, which I think very important. I am perſuaded that a compiler of facts is wanting in his duty, if he neglects to engage the attention of his readers to thoſe accidents which are ſomewhat ſingular. Now there is not any thing more capable to gain their attention, than the pains which an author takes to reflect on thoſe accidents, and obſerve ſuch circumſtances of them as diſcover uncommon paſſions. All this furniſhes the reader with an ample matter of reflexion, with the art of judging of men, and of avoiding being ſurprized into a raſh credulity.

This is what engages me to make ſome remarks here on the conſequences of the accuſation; and as moſt of my readers may not know the contents of that looſe ſheet, and cannot now have a writing of that nature from the Bookſellers, it is fit that the groundwork of my digreſſion ſhould be an abſtract of that little piece.

The accuſer firſt relates the doctrine which had been preached, and ſecondly he ſhews the pernicious conſequences of it.

He affirms, that the doctrine of Mr Jurieu, the Miniſter accuſed, amounts to this: I. That the ſentiments of hatred, indignation, and wrath, are allowable, good, and commendable, againſt the enemies of GOD, that is, as he himſelf explained it, againſt the Socinians, and the other Heretics of Holland, againſt the ſuperſtitious, idolators, &c. II. That we ought to ſhew this hatred and indignation, by breaking off all correſpondence with theſe people, neither ſaluting them, nor eating with them, &c. III. That we muſt not only hate the Hereſies and bad qualities of ſuch people, but that we ought to hate and deteſt their perſons. One of the objections which he ſtarted to himſelf, and rejected with the moſt diſdainful airs, is this, that we are bound to war againſt error and vice; and yet to have charity for the perſon of the ſinner. After theſe general propoſitions, to which the doctrine of the accuſed perſon is reduced, he is charged in particular with having objected to himſelf the hiſtory, or parable, of the Samaritan, the example of Jesus Christ, who converſed with people of a bad life, the command he gives us to love our enemies, to bleſs thoſe who curſe us, to pray for thoſe who perſecute us, and in general all that is uſually repreſented to a Chriſtian people, in order to make them renounce the ſpirit of revenge: The Miniſter, I ſay, is charged with having raiſed all theſe objections to his doctrine, and of having ſlighted and deſpiſed them. He pretended that theſe paſſages are not well underſtood; nay, he aſſerted, that the ſermons of our Saviour on the mount, are a hard doctrine which muſt needs be ſoftened, by taking it not in a litteral, but in a figurative ſenſe, and that by the perſecutors for whom our Saviour commands us to pray, we are not to underſtand thoſe who perſecute the Church, but ſuch private and perſonal enemies as a man may have in the place of his reſidence; that, for the reſt, we may fulfil the command of bleſſing thoſe who curſe us, provided we wiſh them ſpiritual happineſs, though we hate their perſons, and wiſh them temporal evils. Whereupon, addreſſing himſelf to his audience, he declared to them, that they might and ought to hate the King of France, and wiſh him ill; not, added he, becauſe he has taken your goods and eſtates from you; but becauſe he perſecutes your religion.

Theſe are the tenets imputed to Mr Jurieu: I have given the very words of the perſon who accuſes him in their full extent, becauſe I was afraid leaſt an abridgment of them ſhould not be faithful. This is his firſt point; the ſecond is as follows.

The accuſer having ſet forth the Hereſy which had been preached, ſtrongly exhorts the paſtors and conſiſtories to cenſure it; and, in order to animate them the more, he points out the fatal effects it may produce, if it ſhould paſs unpuniſhed. He repreſents to them the aſcendant which Mr Jurieu has over the people, and how eaſily they are perſuaded into what flatters their paſſions, and adds, that the ſtrongeſt and moſt natural paſſion of the heart of man is that of revenge and hatred of our enemies; that nothing is ſo grating to our corrupt nature, as not to be allowed to bear an ill will to thoſe who have tormented us on account of religion; that it would be a very great conſolation for a man, whom a Prieſt or Captain of dragoons has perſecuted, in order to make him go to Maſs, to be allowed, without any ſcruple of conſcience, to wiſh that ſuch a perſon had the plague, or the gravel, or was in the gallies, &c. and to load him with imprecations and abuſe; and that nothing is more irkſome than what we read in thoſe treatiſes, which are commonly peruſed by way of preparation for the Sacrament, that he who preſents himſelf at the table of the Lord, with a heart full of reſentment or hatred againſt any perſon whatſoever, communicates to his own damnation. But Mr Jurieu, continues he, removes all thoſe pious ſcruples. He allows us (41) to communicate with hatred in our hearts, and imprecations in our mouths, againſt thoſe who perſecuted the Refugees. He deſires us to hate them, and forbids us to wiſh them temporal felicity. The accuſer affirms, that according to theſe doctrines it would not be allowable to procure temporal happineſs to our perſecutors, and would be an unjuſtifiable action to relieve them in ſickneſs, or if their houſes took fire, to aſſiſt in extinguiſhing it. He expreſsly exhorts the Synod of the Walloon Churches (42), to prevent the bad conſequences of theſe falſe doctrines, he alledges ſeveral arguments to induce them to it, and tells them, among other things, that the Hereſy which he attacks, is incompatible with the proſperity of the State; For, ſays he, what diſtractions would not enſue, if the Proteſtants ſhould neither ſalute thoſe of a different religion, nor eat with them, nor trade with them; what if it was a thing allowed and commendable in them to hate all the Papiſts, all the Arminians, Mennonites, &c. what if the goſpel obliged them only to wiſh the ſpiritual felicity of ſuch people, but not to wiſh them any temporal good, nor to help them out of a ditch, if they ſaw them in one, nor to give them an alms, if they ſaw them in want? Could this country proſper upon the foot of ſuch maxims? For the reſt, he declares that he does not deſire the Synod to give credit to his accuſation, that his ſole view is to induce them to inform themſelves of the fact, and oblige Mr Jurieu to publiſh the two ſermons ſuch as they were preached.

We muſt remember that theſe two ſermons were preached on the twenty-fourth of January, and the twenty-firſt of February 1694; and that this accuſation appeared in the month of March of that ſame year, at a time when the audience had freſh ideas of theſe ſermons. This circumſtance is remarkable.

Let us now take a view of the accuſed Miniſter's conduct. As ſoon as he knew that ſeveral of his hearers were ſhocked at his doctrine, he ſent theſe two ſermons to be printed. They were already in the preſs, and would have appeared ſoon after: but as ſoon as the accuſer's pamphlet was publiſhed, Mr Jurieu put a ſtop to the printing of them, and took other meaſures. He publiſhed remarks on this looſe ſheet, he affirmed that it was full of falſhoods; for it is falſe, theſe are the terms of the author of the remarks,

'1. That Mr J. ſaid, that the ſentiments of hatred are good and commendable againſt any perſon whatever, if hatred is taken for a human paſſion which has its principle in ſelf-love.

'2. It is falſe that he aſſerted abſolutely that we ought to ſhew this hatred againſt Heretics, by not ſaluting them, nor eating with them. What he advanced on this point is what St Paul and St John have affirmed, with the reſtrictions which will appear in theſe ſermons.

'3. It is falſe that he aſſerted that we ought to break off all the commerce of civil ſociety with Papiſts, Mennonites, Arminians, &c. that is to ſay, (39) Ibid. Epiſt. xxvi, pag. 99.

(40) Ibid. pag. 111.

(41) Obſerve, this does not mean that he expreſly and particularly preached up ſuch a permiſſion. It is only objected to him as a conſequence of his doctrine, as we ſhall ſee below.

(42) It was to meet ſoon after in the city of Tergow.

that we ought neither to give to the Jews, nor take from them bills of exchange. An impertinence which he neither advanced nor imagined.

‘4. It is falſe that he rejected this maxim, Love the perſon of a ſinner, but hate his vices, as a dangerous or falſe one, he rejected it as being too ſubtile, as being not very intelligible, and, in ſhort, as not being applicable in all caſes. Theſe ſagacious gentlemen, no doubt, underſtand very well how it is poſſible to afflict the perſon of a parricide with the moſt horrible torments, with burning irons, melted lead, the rack, tearing him limb from limb, and at the ſame time love that perſon. But they ought to excuſe thoſe who cannot comprehend this.

‘5. It is falſe that Mr J. ſaid, directly or indirectly, in part, or in whole, that by the perſecutors, for whom our Saviour commands us to pray, we muſt not underſtand thoſe who perſecute.

‘6. It is falſe that he addreſſed himſelf to his audience to tell them that they might and ought to hate the King of France, and wiſh him ill. What was ſaid on that head will appear in theſe ſermons.

‘7. It is falſe that he allowed of any man communicating with hatred in his heart, and imprecations in his mouth.

‘8. It is falſe that Mr J. forbad to do good, or to wiſh temporal felicity to our perſecutors, and ſaid that we were not obliged to procure any temporal good to the Papiſts, Mennonites, &c.’

Obſerve, that he promiſes twice to publiſh theſe ſermons, as being the infallible way to detect and expoſe the falſhoods aſſerted by his accuſer. But in the ſame page 3, where this promiſe is made, he gives notice, that, inſtead of publiſhing theſe ſermons, he may, perhaps, put out a compleat treatiſe on this part of Morality. A little lower he acquaints us that honeſt people ſhall, at a proper time, be inſtructed in this matter; but that at preſent theſe ſermons will not be publiſhed, becauſe he is informed, from ſeveral quarters, that his enemies have prepared their batteries, and were reſolved to find Hereſies in them at any rate (43) . . . . I ſhall wait a while, continues he, till their fire is ſpent. I paſs by the reſt, it is only a heap of praiſes and invectives, which Mr Jurieu beſtows, the former on himſelf, commending his own great feats, and the latter on his enemies. I likewiſe paſs by a writing which appeared againſt this Miniſter's remarks, not with regard to the accuſation, but with regard to his quarrels with Mr de Beauval. That piece, and Mr Jurieu's Apology (44), and Mr de Beauval's Reply, are incidents entirely foreign to the accuſation, and conſequently to my digreſſion; my ſole deſign being to conſider what happened in conſequence of the accuſation.

If the accuſation made Mr Jurieu's two ſermons the ſubject of great talk, his remarks on it, made them ſtill more ſo, and as this happened on the day before the Synod met at Tergow, every body was impatient to know what reſolution that aſſembly would take in relation to an affair which was ſo nice, and ſo ſcandalous. That appeared very ſoon. The Synod treated both the pamphlet of the accuſer, and that of the perſon accuſed, as libels, and dropped the affair, as a thing which had never happened. This was very ſtrange and ſurpriſing to thoſe who had expected that the Synod would inform themſelves of the fact; nor did it remove the great ſcandal which had been given to the public, either by the accuſer, if he calumniated Mr Jurieu, or by the perſon accuſed, if he had preached the doctrine laid to his charge. Here is the queſtion which I deſign to clear up. It is a ſhame for our age that people dare to impoſe, with ſo much boldneſs, upon the public; this is the way to deprive us of the moſt ſpecious maxims we can offer againſt the incredulous in matters of fact. Since therefore the bulk of this work may probably withſtand the injuries of time better than a little book, I think myſelf obliged to communicate to my readers, whilſt the affair is freſh, an explanation of this charge of a new Hereſy, to the end that no importunate Sceptic may object, that in the year 1694, there having ariſen a diſpute whether a Miniſter, who had more than 1200 hearers, had preached a certain doctrine, or had not, it was impoſſible to decide it three days after the ſermon was preached. Thoſe who will duly conſider my remarks will own, I am perſuaded, that in this affair it is poſſible to diſcern the truth and the falſhood.

I. I begin with this conſideration, that no regard is to be had to the following principle, If it was falſe that a Miniſter preached before 1200 perſons the Hereſy of the hatred of our neighbour, no body would have been bold enough publickly to accuſe him of it three days after. The reaſon why this principle is here of no force, is becauſe another propoſition may be oppoſed to it, namely, If it was true that a Miniſter preached that Hereſy before 1200 perſons, he would not have dared publickly to deny it three days after. If you conclude from the former principle that ſuch an Hereſy muſt have been preached, ſince the Miniſter was immediately accuſed of it before the public, I may conclude from the other principle that it muſt not have been preached, ſince as ſoon as the accuſation appeared, the perſon accuſed publickly denied it. The ſhorteſt way is to ſet aſide this manner of arguing, and to balance the affirmative of the accuſer with the negative of the perſon accuſed. Let us imitate the Synod of Tergow, which paid no regard to either, and treated the pamphlet of the accuſer, and that of the perſon accuſed, as equally libellous. In general, let us lay down this as a maxim, that all the proof we can draw from one man's affirming any thing, is defeated by another man's denying it, and let us now determine, by the particular circumſtances of this queſtion, which is the ſafeſt ſide of it, the affirmative, or the negative. This is my deſign in the following obſervations.

II. The accuſer was not obliged to declare his name, ſince his deſign was only to engage the Synod to examine whether the Hereſy which he attacked, had been actually preached. So that nothing can be inferred in Mr Jurieu's favour from hence, that his accuſer did not publiſh his name.

III. The accuſer was not obliged to anſwer Mr Jurieu's pamphlet; for it became him to wait the determination of the Synod, in relation to a fact which he affirmed, and the other denied: and when he ſaw that they would not meddle in the queſtion, it became him to give it over, ſince no private man has a right to put interrogatories, and that was the only way of deciding the queſtion. Nothing therefore can be inferred in Mr Jurieu's favour from hence, that his accuſer did not ſupport his firſt writing by a ſecond; for let him have written what he would, all was to no purpoſe, unleſs witneſſes were judicially examined.

IV. It is a certain and unqueſtionable fact that the Walloon Synods favour Mr Jurieu. He has more than once boaſted of the regard they paid him, and has as often gloried in the triumphs which they gave him over his enemies. To be convinced of this we need only ſee his anſwer to the accuſation (45). His adverſaries complain of the indulgence, ſhewn him by the Synods, and obſerve that he has abuſed their exceſſive lenity (46). See the hiſtory of this Synodal favour in a book of Mr Saurin, a Miniſter at Utrecht (47). From hence we may draw two conſequences, one to juſtify the accuſer's ſilence, and the other againſt Mr Jurieu. In effect, if, as that Miniſter himſelf owns, the Synod of Breda threw aſide among the rubbiſh the accuſations brought againſt him by the deputies of ſome churches, if the Synod took into conſideration only four of them, from which they took care to juſtify Mr Jurieu; we may eaſily underſtand that the author of the accuſations ought to have been ſilent; and if in truth he was in the right, it was however prudent in him not to proſecute his firſt deſign, as it would have been to no purpoſe. The other conſequence I am to mention is this. A Synod, which manifeſtly favours a Miniſter, does not neglect to examine an affair, when it is certain that ſuch an inquiry would fully juſtify that Miniſter, and confound his accuſers. Since therefore the Synod, tho' ſtrongly ſollicited by the author of the accuſation to examine the fact, neglected to make any manner of inquiry, it is very probable that they feared leſt the event of it might not be favourable to Mr Jurieu. Thus it muſt be preſumed that this Miniſter preached the Hereſies laid to his charge.

(43) See the reflexions which Mr de Beauval made upon this, in his Conſiderations on two ſermons of Mr Jurieu, pag. 2.

(44) That Apology left Mr de Beauval's remarks in all their force; and this he made appear in his reply, in a manner which confounded Mr Jurieu ſo much, that not being able to diſentangle himſelf, he imitated the Miſſionaries of France, who finding themſelves too hard preſſed by a book of Controverſy, had recourſe to the Civil Magiſtrate, and obtained the ſuppreſſion of the book.

(45) Theſe gentlemen are very incorrigible. The Synod of Leyden tore their libel: and after they had renewed their objections under a greater authority; the Synod of Breda had ſo little regard for all that heap of accuſations, that they only conſidered four of them, from which they took care to juſtify Mr J. and left all the reſt among the rubbiſh: Tho' his abſence gave his adverſaries a full liberty, which they knew well how to employ.

(46) Dénonciation de la Nouv. Héreſie, near the end.

(47) See the Preface, of the book intituled, Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu.

V. It

V. It is certain Mr Jurieu was perſuaded that the author of the accuſation was a Divine (48), and that the whole party, with which he has had ſo ſharp encounters, had a hand in that piece. Hence it is that in his remarks he generally uſes the plural number, theſe gentlemen. It cannot therefore be alledged that if he did not take an effectual method of refuting the accuſation, his reaſon was becauſe he would have only expoſed a ſingle perſon, and one unknown; for it is certain that he would have expoſed, as he imagined, all thoſe Miniſters with whom he is at variance. Why then did he neglect this advantage at ſo deciſive a juncture? Why did he not deſire the Synod to name commiſſioners who might be ſent to the place where his ſermon was preached, and interrogate the moſt intelligent hearers? Why has he not produced any depoſition in his favour, having ſo many friends who would not have refuſed him any thing, which their conſciences had allowed them to declare in his vindication? In a word, why did he not publiſh his two ſermons? The accuſation ſhould have made him deſirous to publiſh them; on the contrary, it occaſioned his putting a ſtop to the printing of them. A man muſt be a very ſtanch Pyrrhoniſt, who does not deciſively affirm that ſuch a conduct fully juſtifies the accuſation. All appearances incline us to believe, that Mr Jurieu reſolved to publiſh theſe ſermons, when he knew they had ſhocked his audience. Doubtleſs he wrapped up and diſguiſed the harſheſt maxims he had preached, and hoped that ſuch a remedy would remove the ſcandal which had been taken. But when he beheld with what an air of importance the matter was treated in the accuſation, and what an odious and ſeditious turn his doctrine would bear, he perceived that he had not ſufficiently ſoftened matters, and that, in order to blind his cenſurers, it was fit to make ſeveral more conſiderable alterations in his copy. Whereupon the only courſe he could take was to ſtop the impreſſion: for had he corrected the copy ſo far as to get beyond the reach of his enemies, he would have put forth the moſt horrible medley that ever appeared, his ſyſtem would have been a contradiction, from beginning to end; beſides, ſeveral people would have well remembred that the ſermons, as they were printed, were not the ſame which they had heard. The general talk would have been the inſincerity of this Miniſter, who preached one doctrine, and publiſhed another. An atteſtation of the Conſiſtory, that the printed ſermons were perfectly like thoſe which had been preached, was not eaſy to be obtained, and would not have convinced his auditors that they had heard ſuch a doctrine preached, which they well remembred they had not heard. He therefore had no option to make, he was obliged to reſolve upon ſuppreſſing them, and thereby deprive himſelf of the moſt effectual and expeditious method of covering his enemies with eternal ſhame, in caſe he had been innocent, in caſe the accuſation was falſe. This is a deciſive argument againſt him.

VI. Whoever has but a ſlender knowledge of the ſituation of affairs in this country, certainly knows that the Walloon Conſiſtory of Rotterdam grants every thing that Mr Jurieu can reaſonably demand (49). Nay, there are people who believe that his intereſt is not confined within ſo narrow limits. However, I ſuppoſe, that he obtains from the Conſiſtory nothing but what is reaſonable. Now had he not preached the doctrines laid to his charge, nothing was more juſt than to grant him a certificate of this. He would therefore have obtained it, had he aſked it of his Conſiſtory. Why then did not the Miniſter accuſed, inſtead of denying the accuſation, in an anonymous pamphlet, diſavow, in the face of the world, that he had preached the errors imputed to him, and ſupport his denial by an ample certificate from his colleagues, Elders, and Deacons? He paſſes for being very tender of his reputation, and does not ceaſe to ſay that his honour is neceſſary to the Church; it cannot therefore be pretended that he neglected to obtain a certificate, becauſe it was indifferent to him whether he was defamed, or commended, being contented with the teſtimony of his own conſcience, and that of honeſt minds who love him. Such a manner of defending him would be to impoſe upon the world, and upon himſelf in the firſt place.

VII. He well foreſaw that the ſuppreſſion of his two ſermons would be the triumph of his adverſaries. Accordingly he did not ſay that he intended to ſuppreſs them; he only gave ſome reaſons why the publication of them was ſuſpended for ſome time; and in caſe he ſuppreſſed them; he promiſed a compleat treatiſe on that ſubject. All this pleads in favour of the accuſer, better than an able Advocate could: for here are the reaſons of this delay. He was informed that theſe gentlemen intended to criticize the two ſermons, and did not think it proper at preſent to give them the pleaſure of the attack. That would divert them; but that would ſcandalize the public. It is fit to wait a little till their fire is ſpent (50). But it is obvious that theſe gentlemen would have only rendered themſelves ridiculous by criticizing two orthodox ſermons, ſince they had accuſed them as full of Hereſies. Where could they find theſe Hereſies, if the accuſation was ſuch as Mr Jurieu pretends? The public would not have been ſcandalized to ſee a famous Miniſter make out his innocence: on the contrary, the public would have been greatly edified to ſee a falſe accuſer put to ſhame. A diſpute on this ſubject in writing, could not appear too ſoon, ſince it would contribute ſo greatly to ſhew the innocence of the Miniſter, and the calumny of his cenſurer. The more his critics had acted according to their firſt heat and paſſion, the more would they have entangled themſelves. A man of parts would have taken advantage of their fury. But let us grant to Mr Jurieu that his delay was reaſonable, what will this avail him, ſince it now appears that he did not intend to publiſh theſe ſermons. A year is now elapſed without the publication either of them, or of any book on the hatred of our neighbour. Is not the fire of his adverſaries yet ſpent? But, if the reaſons he has aſſigned for the ſuppreſſion of theſe two ſermons betray his inſincerity, the remarks he has made on the occaſion betray it likewiſe.

VIII. He has not diſtinguiſhed thoſe two points which the accuſer has ſo clearly done. See, above, the two points of the accuſation. The firſt relates to the doctrines aſſerted by Mr Jurieu: the ſecond concerns the effects which theſe doctrines may produce. All thoſe who know the laws of diſputation, tell us, that the conſequences reſulting from any doctrine ought not to be imputed to the defender of that doctrine, when he is known to reject them; but let him reject, or admit them, it is ſtill allowable to point them out to him, becauſe this may be a means of converting him. How many people would abandon a principle, if they knew the bad conſequences which may juſtly be deduced from it? Thus the accuſer has done nothing but what was reaſonable, when, in order to induce and prevail with the Synods to cenſure the Hereſy which he accuſed, he pointed out the pernicious conſequences of it. He would have been in the wrong to aſſert that Mr Jurieu expreſly preached theſe conſequences; neither has he aſſerted it: the moſt ignorant readers may diſcern, as eaſily as the moſt learned, which are the propoſitions his accuſer imputed to him, and which are the propoſitions he infers from the former, without pretending that he preached them; can it therefore be thought that Mr Jurieu dealt ſincerely when he confounded theſe two kinds of propoſitions? Is it not manifeſt, that, in order to delude honeſt minds, and credulous people, he complained that he was accuſed of having preached, that it is lawful for a man to communicate with hatred in his heart, and imprecations in his mouth? All the hearers of whom it ſhould be aſked if they had heard him utter ſuch a propoſition, would anſwer, No, and yet would they ſay with wonder, this is what the baſe accuſer imputes to him; after ſuch a calumny what may not be expected from him? This whole pamphlet is nothing but an infamous libel. This artifice, groſs as it is, may have deceived a great many people; and for that reaſon Mr Jurieu employed it in his anſwer. Let us affirm the ſame thing of this other propoſition, namely, that he is accuſed of having preached, that we ought to break off all the commerce of civil ſociety with Papiſts, Mennonites, Arminians, &c. that is, we ought neither to give bills of exchange to the Jews, nor take them from them. It is very falſe that he was accuſed of having preached theſe words, and of having deſcended into theſe particulars;

(48) The author of the Libel heaps up ſo many falſhoods, that one could not believe that any Divine ſhould be capable of impoſing upon his neighbour, in ſo ſhameleſs a manner. Réflexions ſur la Dénonciation, pag. 1.

(49) In the year 1694, that Conſiſtory was extremely favourable to him.

(50) See how Mr Saurin has refuted all theſe reaſons, in his Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, Tom. ii, p. 812.

one muſt take him for a madman to accuſe him of ſuch things. It was only repreſented to the Synod that if we were to live according to the doctrines which he taught, we muſt renounce all manner of commerce with the enemies of the truth. It is his part to ſhew, if he can, that his principles do not inſer ſuch monſtrous conſequences.

Obſerve, that ſome conſequences have ſo cloſe and obvious a connexion with their principle, that we can never be perſuaded that a man of ſenſe, who teaches the principle, rejects theſe conſequences. If once you teach that it is lawful to hate, and to curſe thoſe who perſecute, how can you deny that it is not lawful for a man to preſent himſelf at the communion-table with his heart full of hatred, and his mouth full of imprecations againſt thoſe who perſecute. Is it not evident that in order to prepare one's ſelf for receiving the communion, it is enough to depart from things unlawful? But let that be as it will, what the accuſer imputes upon this head is an obvious conſequence, which he draws from the Hereſy charged upon him, and is not one of the propoſitions imputed to him. This diſcovers more and more the diſingenuity of the preacher. And from henceforth we may believe him very capable of denying that he preached ſuch a Hereſy, though it is very true that he did preach it.

IX. The ſame diſingenuity will evidently appear, if we conſider how he anſwers in relation to the doctrines imputed to him. Let us compare his anſwer with the terms of the accuſation. He is accuſed of having preached, that the ſentiments of hatred are good and commendable againſt the enemies of God: his anſwer is, it is falſe that he affirmed that the ſentiments of hatred are good and commendable againſt any perſon whatever, if hatred is taken for a human paſſion, which hath its principle in ſelf love. This is a downright impoſition upon his readers; for thus he ſuppoſes that he was accuſed of having ſaid, that hatred, even when it is a human paſſion, which hath its principle in ſelf-love, is good and commendable. But it is evident that this is not the queſtion: he is accuſed only of having ſaid that the ſentiments of hatred are good and commendable againſt the enemies of God. A man who deals plainly, and is conſcious of his own innocence, does not recur to ſuch artifices; he does not juſtify himſelf againſt chimerical accuſations, he faithfully repreſents the crime of which he is accuſed, and anſwers plainly and preciſely to the ſenſe of the words of the accuſation. Has Mr Jurieu done this? Has he anſwered, as a man ought to have done, who could juſtly deny the charge? I did not ſay that the ſentiments of hatred are good and commendable againſt the enemies of God. Not in the leaſt; he choſe rather to entangle himſelf in captious diſtinctions, I did not ſay that the ſentiments of a human hatred which has it's principle in ſelf-love, are good and commendable againſt any perſon whatever. But was you accuſed of this, might it be anſwered? What avails a juſtification of this nature, which is foreign to the accuſation? I go farther, and maintain that his own diſtinction undoes him; it proves that he preached that, provided the ſentiments of hatred be not founded in ſelf-love, they are good and commendable againſt the enemies of God, and ought not to be called a human paſſion; he therefore preached that his hearers might lawfully hate the Papiſts, provided their hatred was not grounded upon ſome injury received, but upon the war the Papiſts make againſt the truths which God hath revealed. Now this is what the accuſer calls a new Hereſy in Morality, relating to the hatred of our neighbour. He did not make this new Hereſy conſiſt in the following propoſition; It is good and commendable to hate our enemies; but in this, It is lawful and commendable to hate the enemies of God: and conſequently the perſon accuſed owns all that is charged, and, in ſpite of his wrangling, juſtifies the veracity of the accuſer.

It does not concern me to examine whether the doctrine in queſtion is juſtly ſtiled Heretical; I only inquire after the truth of the fact, and do not think it neceſſary to acquaint any body that this doctrine is really a pernicious Hereſy (51). None but ſuch as have never underſtood the New Teſtament, can doubt of it; and if once it was commendable to hate the perſon of our neighbour for the love of God, there is not one precept in Scripture which a man might not tranſgreſs for the love of God.

X. I expreſly ſet down the words, hate the perſon of our neighbour, becauſe this gives me a freſh occaſion of ſhewing the ſincerity of the accuſer. Mr Jurieu owns that he rejected this maxim, We ought to love the perſon of a ſinner, and hate the vice, not as a dangerous or falſe one, but as being too ſubtile, as being not very intelligible; and, in ſhort, as not being applicable in all caſes. For inſtance, ſays he, it is not applicable to thoſe who put a criminal to death. It would not have been an eaſy matter to give a better proof than this of the accuſer's ſincerity. He ſaid that one of the objections which Mr Jurieu rejected with the moſt diſdainful airs is this, that we ought to war againſt error and vice, and yet have charity for the perſon of the ſinner. Does Mr Jurieu own this charge, ſince he confeſſes that he rejected that objection as being too ſubtile, as not very intelligible, nor applicable to Judges who puniſh criminals? In the ſtile of diſputation, thoſe who reject a diſtinction as too ſubtile, and too obſcure, and thoſe who reject it as falſe and chimerical, differ only in their expreſſions. The former uſe polite terms, and a ſort of compliment; the latter an uncivil language: but, in truth, both of them form the ſame thought, and it is certain that the greateſt defect in the diſtinctions of the Iriſh, or Spaniſh, Logicians is, that they are not very intelligible, they are too abſtract, and too ſuſceptible of exceptions. Add to this, if the diſtinction between the crime, and the perſon of a criminal does not take place in the tribunals of Judges, it cannot take place any where elſe, ſince no man living lies under ſo great an obligation as a Judge does, to renounce all paſſion againſt the perſon of a criminal. I refer my reader to Mr Saurin (52), and ſhall only ſay, that Mr Jurieu's anſwer, concerning the two principal doctrines which had been imputed to him, raiſes a preſumption againſt him, which is not leſs forcible than a good proof.

If we would multiply preſumptions againſt him, we need only obſerve the paſſages in his remarks where he acts with diſingenuity.

XI. He acts with diſingenuity, and with a ſeditious and perſecuting ſpirit, when he affirms that his accuſer is a Socinian and Anabaptiſt, with regard to magiſtracy and war. His accuſer only ſaid that the precepts of Jeſus Chriſt, and the maxims of charity are believed and taught by thoſe very Heretics who attack the Trinity, the Incarnation, and Predeſtination. Does this mean that he approves what they teach concerning war and the magiſtrates?

XII. He acts with diſingenuity when he ſays, that he was obliged to preach theſe two ſermons, in order to refute, among other maxims, this, that charity does not permit us to trouble any perſon under the pretext of piety and religion, and that Heretics ought not to be diſturbed, as enemies to God. He preached theſe two ſermons in order to refute what one of his colleagues had lately preached. Now it is certain that this colleague never ſaid, nor ever believed, that Heretics ought not to be troubled, or diſturbed. He is well perſuaded that we ought to write againſt them, demonſtrate their chicaneries, preſs them hard upon their ſophiſms, and ſhew their ſyſtem in all its falſity and abſurdity: and theſe things cannot fail to trouble and diſturb the Heretics.

XIII. He acts with diſingenuity when he alledges what paſſed with relation to certain letters, which Mr Jurieu had written to the Duke of Montauſier, as a proof of a correſpondence with the court of France. Mr Jurieu's enemies have had tranſcripts of theſe letters, and of that Duke's anſwers, and have made uſe of them to vex, and, as they expreſs themſelves, to unmaſk him (53). They have publiſhed ſome extracts of them, which ſhew that he made moſt flattering compliments to the King of France, and ſuch as were the very reverſe of the language he held here in converſation, in the pulpit, and in his books. The accuſer touched upon this point by the way. This greatly angered Mr Jurieu: he affirmed that theſe gentlemen, by producing theſe extracts, had given an unanſwerable proof, that they held an unwarrantable correſpondence with the enemies of the State (54). He affirmed

(51) See Mr Saurin's book, intituled, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, Tom. ii, pag. 807, & ſeq. where he refutes Mr Jurieu's Remarks, on the Accuſation, and ſhews him that his Moral Doctrine, concerning the hatred of one's neighbour, is one of the looſeſt maxims of the Jeſuits.

(52) Ibid.

(53) See the Cabale Chimérique, pag. 51, 52, of the new edition, and Lettre de Mr de Beauval ſur les Différens de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle, pag. 35, 36.

(54) Réflexions ſur la Dénonciation, pag. 4.

affirmed that the court of France had ſent them back theſe letters, and had thereby ſhewn what confidence it placed in them. In a word, he maintained that the proof is ſuch, that in any other government but this, theſe gentlemen had been lodged in a place from whence they had never come out. No reaſonable man can perſuade himſelf that Mr Jurieu here deals ingenuouſly. Paſſion, I grant, may blind the underſtanding, and a thirſt after vengeance obſtruct the intellects; but all things have their bounds, and it appears impoſſible for a man to miſtake in certain caſes. Mr Jurieu well remembers, that in his letters he enlarged very much on the Fanatics of Dauphiné, and dropped ſome ſubmiſſions to the King of France, which ſet him at variance with himſelf. Theſe are the two paſſages on account of which the men of learning, and the men of wit, who made their court to the Duke of Montauſier came to know theſe letters. The Duke imparted to them, both what had been written to him, and what he had anſwered, and allowed tranſcripts to be taken of all theſe letters. Mr Jurieu's enemies in France were exceeding glad to have a proof, both of his hypocriſy, and of the negotiations in which he had engaged to maintain ſome cheats who pretended to prophecy. They ſent one of theſe tranſcripts to a Merchant in Holland, who ſhewed it to his friends, and among others to Mr de Beauval and Mr Bayle. The affair was not unknown to Mr Jurieu. At that time they were his intimate friends, and were the firſt to acquaint him that they had ſeen this tranſcript. Their intimacy was not the leſs on that account, and was not broken off till the beginning of the year 1691, on occaſion of the Chimerical Cabal of Geneva. Mr Jurieu was therefore perſuaded during a year and more, that the reception of this tranſcript was not a proof of a correſpondence with the court of France. He believed that certain learned men of Paris who had no reaſon to ſpare him, ſuch as the Biſhop of Meaux, Mr Peliſſon, Mr Nicolle, being informed by the Duke of Montauſier of the tenor of theſe letters, had been very well diverted with them, and heartily agreed that tranſcripts of them ſhould be diſtributed, and communicated to foreigners. After this how can he perſuade himſelf, that the only way of receiving the tranſcript of theſe letters is by holding an unwarrantable correſpondence with the court of France? Is it not obvious that the bare correſpondence of our Gazetteers at Paris is ſufficient to procure ſuch a tranſcript. Is it not therefore againſt his conſcience, and plainly at the hazzard of rendering himſelf ridiculous, that he has been ſo bold as to publiſh that the receiving of this tranſcript, unanſwerably proved ſo criminal a correſpondence with the Court of France, that in any other country but this, the perſons to whom it was ſent, would have been condemned to perpetual impriſonment (55)?

XIV. Mr Jurieu acts with diſingenuity, when he ſays, that what he wrote to Mr de Montauſier concerning Lewis XIV, amounts only to the not giving offenſive language, and making ſome general ſubmiſſions (56).

XV. He acts with diſingenuity when he ſuppreſſes all the reaſons which rendered thoſe letters worthy to be tranſcribed and communicated to ſtrangers. He only ſpeaks of them as propoſing the exchange of a miniſter in priſon for a man who had offered his ſervice to aſſaſſinate the King of France. Had he ſpoken of them as containing ſeveral remarks concerning the pretended prophets, he would not have dared to call it a ſtate-affair. Here is therefore a very malicious and fraudulent artifice.

We have now made great progreſs in diſcovering the impoſture. It is either on the ſide of the accuſer, or on that of the miniſter accuſed, and every thing ſpeaks in favour of the former againſt the latter.

XVI. Here are further preſumptions. Mr Jurieu's beſt friends cannot deny that he is choleric, paſſionate, and a very dangerous enemy. All who are acquainted with him, know that when he has any quarrels, and he is never without them, he leaves nothing unattempted to overthrow his enemy. Yet he would be reputed a devout and very zealous man. The way to make theſe things conſiſtent is to teach that the Goſpel does not forbid us to hate the enemies of the truth, and permits us to war againſt them to the uttermoſt, provided we are moved in it by a zeal for the houſe of the Lord. It is therefore highly probable that he preached the hereſy imputed to him: for there he could find an apology for his own conduct, and a certain way to perſuade the people that he does not depart from the paths of the Goſpel, by behaving in the manner he does againſt perſecutors, and againſt his enemies. His temper, his paſſions, his actions, are nearly concerned that the new hereſy ſhould be true. Aſk not the cui bono, the advantage of this, it is too viſible that he would reap a very great advantage from this falſe doctrine. It is therefore highly probable that he preached it (57). The inclinations and actions have a mutual relation to each other. The inclinations produce the actions, and the actions bear the tincture and diſtinguiſhing marks of the inclinations. . . . . As bold Divines who fancy themſelves authorized, do not ſcruple to give out as doctrines, and articles of faith, their own paſſions and conduct, and to reduce their doctrines to practice, we have reaſon to fear that we ſee Mr Jurieu's heart, in his opinion of the hatred of our neighbour, as well as in his maxims on the rights of Chriſtians in war. This is the preamble of a learned Miniſter (58), when he attacks Mr Jurieu on the affair of the accuſation.

XVII. I draw a new preſumption from hence, that Mr Jurieu does not deny that he puts a figurative ſenſe upon our Saviour's precept. Love your enemies, bleſs thoſe who curſe you, &c. So far is he from refuſing it, that he charges his accuſer with being a Socinian, and Anabaptiſt, becauſe he had diſapproved of his preaching that our Saviour's ſermons on the mount are a hard doctrine, which muſt be ſoftened by not taking it in a literal ſenſe. As Mr Jurieu has not ſaid that the precept of bleſſing thoſe who curſe us, and of loving our enemies, is one of thoſe which muſt be interpreted according to the letter, it manifeſtly follows that he accounts it a hard doctrine which ought to be taken in a figurative ſenſe, and conſequently it is very probable that he preached the doctrine imputed to him.

XVIII. The preſumption I am going to mention is much ſtronger: I take it from the murmurs and emotions of his audience (59). I am a witneſs that ſeveral people have been ſhocked at theſe two ſermons; but do not pretend that my evidence ſhould be reckoned. Let us therefore cite other witneſſes. The moſt favourable thing we can ſay of theſe two ſermons, is, that all the honeſt people who heard them, were ſcandalized, and extremely grieved, and Mr Jurieu's friends were mortified. This Mr Saurin, an evidence of great weight and authority, affirms in a book which bears his name (60). Another author goes farther, and aſſerts that ſome of the hearers being ſhocked and ſcandalized by Mr Jurieu, have given over hearing him for the future (61). This is a manfeſt proof that Mr Jurieu preached the pernicious morality imputed to him; for had he preached the eight maxims which he ſays will appear in the ſermons (62), he would have aſſerted nothing extraordinary, he would have kept in the road of all the other miniſters, and even in the rigid principles of the love of our neighbour.

XIX. I have one conſideration to add which is of great weight. The accuſer is unknown: he may be ſincere, and may not be ſo; we cannot judge of this by his preceding actions, ſince we know not who he is. But as for the perſon accuſed, he is known by all the world, and his beſt friends cannot deny that he has often advanced things which proved falſe. Read what was written on both ſides concerning the Cabal of Geneva, and the Advice to the Refugees: There you will find long catalogues of falſhoods, which his enemies have charged him to prove, and which never have been proved (63): long catalogues, I ſay, which will be ſurpriſing, whether we conſider the nature of the falſhoods, or the aſſurance a man muſt have to aſſert them publickly: there you will find that he was convicted of having miſrepreſented and falſified what his Bookſeller told him concerning the printing of a project of peace; I ſay, of having falſified it in the capital and eſſential points (64). Mr de Beauval a long time after ſo ſtrongly convicted him of impoſture and calumny, that he could oppoſe nothing to his convictions, but an order he obtained from the magiſtrates prohibiting the ſale of the book.

This

(55) See Mr de Beauval's Conſidérations ſur deux Sermons de Mr Jurieu, pag. 42, & ſeq. where he gives the Hiſtory of theſe Letters, and ſolidly refutes the chicaneries of the accuſer.

(56) Ibid. pag. 45.

(57) See Mr de Beauval's Conſiderations, pag. 4, & ſeq.

(58) Saurin, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, Tom. ii, pag. 807, 808.

(59) Mr de Beauval, ubi ſupra, pag. 3.

(60) Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 808.

(61) Mr de Beauval's Conſiderations, pag. 4.

(62) Reflexions ſur la Dénonciation, pag. 3.

(63) See the preface to the Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée, pag. 19

(64) See the Cabale Chimer. pag. 58, of the firſt edition, and pag. 62, of the ſecond; & la Chimere démontrée, pag. 6

This avails nothing; for when the magiſtrates prohibit a book, they do not warrant that it contains falſe facts. Mr Jurieu does not pretend that when the States of Holland prohibited the book intituled l'Eſpirt de Mr Arnauld, they determined that the facts contained in that book were lies. In fine, a miniſter venerable on account of his age, his gravity, piety, and learning (65), ſuch a miniſter, I ſay, who hath ſeen Mr Jurieu an hundred times in the Synods, affirms that Mr Jurieu's preſence uſually ruins his affairs, becauſe he has fits of raving which he cannot keep up, and he RASHLY ADVANCES THINGS OF THE FALSHOOD OF WHICH HE IS PRESENTLY CONVICTED. What man does not ſee that ſince either the accuſer, or the perſon accuſed, muſt needs be an impoſtor, reaſon and good ſenſe would have us ſuſpect the latter, rather than the former (66).

XX. Some body perhaps will ſay that in an affair of this nature, one might give more credit to a perſon unknown, if the queſtion was not concerning a falſhood to which ſo many perſons living were witneſſes. In anſwer to this objection, I ſhall make two remarks, one is, that Mr Jurieu was ſo bold as to publiſh in the year 1691, that the Burgo-maſters of Rotterdam had ſhewn a particular regard to him, when they ſent for him and the author of the Cabale Chimerique, to acquaint them with their reſolution. Yet it is certain that theſe gentlemen had held an even balance between the two parties, and required nothing of one, but what they required of the other (67). There were five witneſſes to this, the four Burgo-maſters, and the Penſionary of the city. Nevertheleſs, Mr Jurieu immediately publiſhed that they had ſhewn him this pretended regard, without fearing that any of theſe worthy perſons ſhould detect him in that falſe aſſertion. He had his evaſion at hand; viz. that he had not put his name to his factums or caſes; and beſides that, he well knew they would not go ſo far as to judicial proceedings. What he has done ſince that time is much bolder, he has ſaid (68), that theſe gentlemen will ever lament the zeal which the worthy magiſtrates of Rotterdam ſhewed againſt their friend the profeſſor of Philoſophy. A few days after he perceived that this made againſt him, for it plainly imports that this profeſſor loſt his poſt, only on account of religious opinions, and therefore that the accuſations of ſtate-crimes which Mr Jurieu laid againſt him, with ſo great a noiſe that it reſounded throughout all Europe, were not regarded. This comes very near to make him known for a public calumniator, or a raſh and heedleſs accuſer, utterly void of diſcernment. What has he done to ward off this blow? Why he has changed his tone; he has affirmed, that the book on comets was not the true cauſe of the Profeſſor's diſgrace, and that it was chiefly on account of the Advice to the Refugees that his ſalary, and permiſſion to teach, were taken from him, not without having been heard, but after the Magiſtrates had taken up a conſiderable time in examining all the pieces, anſwers, replies, &c. This is an aſſertion of the falſhood of which the whole city of Rotterdam is convinced, for there is not one citizen who did not aſk of ſome of the Counſellors how the affair paſſed, and conſequently muſt have known that the very firſt time it was propoſed in the council, whether they ſhould revoke the permiſſion granted to that Profeſſor, in the year 1681, to teach both in public and private, with a ſalary of 500 florins, the majority were for the affirmative: thus the affair was propoſed and concluded in the ſame meeting: I know not if it laſted a full hour. The Advice to the Refugees was not mentioned there, directly, nor indirectly. Some of thoſe who gave their opinions only alledged the Thoughts on the Comets, and repreſented the danger of ſuffering youth to be inſtructed in ſuch opinions as are contained in that book. How bold muſt the man be, who after two or three months, whilſt all the members of the Council are living, publickly aſſerts, that theſe gentlemen grounded their reſolution chiefly upon the Advice to the Refugees, and had thoroughly examined that affair long before? This boldneſs is the more ſurpriſing, as ſeveral of theſe gentlemen, when they came to the Council, knew not that ſuch a propoſal would be made, I mean that of revoking the ſalary, and the permiſſion to teach. Never had a word been ſaid of this matter in their meetings, never were the members exhorted to examine the pieces, never were commiſſioners named to examine them, and make their report. It is well known that moſt of theſe gentlemen do not underſtand French, and conſequently could not examine any factum (or caſe) on the accuſation of the Advice to the Refugees, nor examine the book on comets. Mr Jurieu's temerity, indiſcretion, and want of reſpect for the Council of Rotterdam, whoſe conduct he has unſeaſonably, and without the leaſt occaſion, taken upon him to juſtify, might be fully expoſed, if one knew as little as he does how to render to Cæſar, the things which are Cæſar's. The Council of that city has no need to juſtify their conduct in that affair. They are abſolute ſovereigns, with regard to the permiſſions of teaching; and may order, as they think proper, that every Philoſopher who would obtain a ſalary, and permiſſion to teach, ſhould follow this or that ſyſtem; ſo that the author of the book on Comets might have been removed from his profeſſorſhip merely becauſe he was no Voëtian, after the ſame manner as in other countries all Ramiſts, Carteſians, &c. are excluded from profeſſorſhips. Let us conclude, that a man, capable of aſſerting, that the Magiſtrates of Rotterdam, did a thing which they have not done; capable of aſſerting it, I ſay, whilſt theſe Magiſtrates are ſtill living, and have freſh ideas of the affair, is very capable of denying that he preached a doctrine, though it is certain that he did preach it.

XXI. I have one obſervation more to make, which appears to me conſiderable. It is eaſy to conceive, may our poſterity ſay, that the anonymous author of a pamphlet may wrongfully accuſe a famous Miniſter of having preached Heretical doctrines; whereas it is incredible that ſuch a Miniſter would dare to deny that he preached what he did actually preach. Two thouſand hearers, if you pleaſe, will deteſt the aſſurance of the falſe accuſer; but what harm can they do him? They know not who he is, nor where to find him, he is ſure never to meet with the ſhame which he deſerves. The Miniſter cannot flatter himſelf with theſe hopes. Two thouſand hearers, provoked at his boldneſs, or rather effrontery, would mortify him wherever he appeared. Common ſenſe teaches us that this puniſhment is inevitable. It is not therefore probable, that a Miniſter would expoſe himſelf to it; ſince therefore Mr Jurieu, a few days after he had preached theſe ſermons, publiſhed a pamphlet, in which he denied that he preached the Hereſy imputed to him, he deſerves more to be credited than the accuſer.

This is a plauſible objection, and may forthwith ſtrike foreigners; but they and our poſterity will eaſily avoid being ſurprized, if they conſider the two things which I am going to obſerve.

Firſt, this objection proves too much; for if it was a good one, Mr Jurieu had not publickly advanced what I have already mentioned; nor aſſerted in the Synods ſeveral falſhoods of which he was preſently convicted, as Mr Saurin, an eye-witneſs, has charged upon him in the face of the public (69). Fifty Miniſters, and about as many elders, all preſent together in a Synod, are more to be feared than a multitude of people ſpread in a city; I ſay, they are more to be feared by a Miniſter who dares to deny a known truth.

In the ſecond place, the greateſt number of hearers are not capable of certifying whether a Miniſter preached the propoſitions charged upon him, or thoſe which he owns that he preached. They have not attention, or penetration, or memory enough, to be able to anſwer that there were, or were not, ſuch and ſuch reſtrictions and explanations in the doctrine preached. So that a Miniſter may be very eaſy as to the greateſt part of his hearers; he may aſſure himſelf that he can ſafely deny that he preached what he has actually preached, and diſguiſe it as he thinks fit, without fearing the conſequences. As for intelligent hearers, they are to be feared; but Mr Jurieu is on ſuch a footing that he has no occaſion to fear them.

(65) Mr Saurin, See his Preface to his Examen la Théologie de Mr Jurieu.

(66) Semel malus (and by ſo much the more reaſon Sæpè malus) ſemper preſumitur in eodem genere mali, ſay the Civilians.

(67) See la Chimere démontrée, pag. 215, and in the Preface, pag. 64.

(68) Réflexions ſur la Dénonciation, pag. 5.

(69) In the Preface to his Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. xxxx, 4. See above the end of number xix.

He foreſaw what has happened to him; I mean that he ſhould raiſe many enemies to himſelf: for this reaſon he had the addreſs to fortify himſelf more carefully than they fortify frontier towns the moſt expoſed. He ſhewed a zeal full of fury for the ruin of Popery, and that of France (70). He inſulted and affronted all the ſectaries in Holland, both as being Heretics, and Republicans, in order to make a merit of being odious to them. He made a great ſhow of his intereſt: and having perſuaded his emiſſaries that he had not this intereſt by the recommendation of others, but originally and directly by himſelf, they ſpread this news from houſe to houſe: ſo that thoſe of Mr Jurieu's congregation are perſuaded, that he can do a great deal of good to thoſe who are devoted to him, and a great deal of miſchief to thoſe who oppoſe him (71); I am perſuaded, that, by a ſubtle and artful gaſconade, he has increaſed the idea of his intereſt: but it is certain that he has powerful patrons, who, through maxims of ſtate, will bring him off in the worſt affairs, in which he can engage. Hence it is that there is hardly any body who does not carefully avoid incurring his indignation. He well knows this, and therefore was not concerned if two or three hundred private perſons were convinced that he denied the truth, by denying the accuſation. He was well aſſured that no body would ſtand as a witneſs againſt him: he knows that good Chriſtians are perſuaded that they ought to hide the faults of their paſtors, as Shem and Japhet hid the nakedneſs of their father. He has ſo often affirmed and repeated that it is not poſſible to blemiſh him, without injuring the Church, that he has perſuaded a great many people into the belief of it: he has ſo often, and ſo pathetically, repreſented that he has worn out his ſtrength and vigour in the ſervice of the cauſe, and now only leads a wretched, lingering, life, becauſe he has ſacrificed his watchings and labours to the good of the Church, that moſt of his brethren are perſuaded that they ſhould be guilty of a cruelty, if they ſhould caſt the leaſt ſtain upon his honour; and they will not reproach themſelves with having made his grey hairs deſcend with ſorrow to the grave. This is one of the reaſons of what his adverſaries call the exceſſive lenity of the Synods. Now ſince the appearing of his Important Advice to the Public, and his marvellous accuſation of the Cabal of Geneva, people are afraid of being incorporated in it, if they ſpeak or act in the leaſt like thoſe of that pretended Cabal. One would think they imagine that he is an open dealer in wares of this ſort. This puts me in mind of one thing, which, of all the expedients he has uſed to eſtabliſh his authority, I ought firſt to mention. He ſet up for an informer of two great conſpiracies, which he pretended to have diſcovered among the Refugees. One is a Cabal both of ſtate and religion, the other of religion only. The former is ſpread from ſouth to north, and has its center at Geneva, and its deſign is to render the King of France maſter of all Europe, in order that he may ruin the Proteſtants. The other is compoſed of a great many Miniſters come from France, who are infected with the Pelagian and Socinian Hereſies, and are reſolved to ſow them as much as poſſible, ſince they are no longer reſtrained by the fear, which, in France, obliged them to conceal their opinions. Theſe two conſpiracies proved to be equally chimerical; nevertheleſs, the informer reaped a great advantage by them. He thereby made himſelf conſidered as the rampart of Orthodoxy, and honeſt people were very near giving him the title of Marſhal of the Faith: I mean Marſhal, or Provoſt at leaſt, of the long robe. Several of the brethren have attributed his greateſt faults to an exceſs of zeal, and have only conſidered them as irregularities, which might, with a ſafe conſcience, be protected, or excuſed, that the Church might not be deprived of ſo neceſſary a defender. Several others did not dare to declare againſt him, leſt they ſhould paſs for members of one or other of theſe two imaginary Cabals. One is in fear for his penſion, another of being never promoted. After all, if we are ſurprized that the Miniſters, in a body, would not meddle in the affair of the accuſation, we ought not to be ſurprized that no private perſon gave his atteſtation in that cauſe. The lawful authority did not require it of any perſon, beſides the fact to be atteſted was ſcandalous, and the ſcandal ſeemed to be ſufficiently removed by the public diſavowal of the perſon accuſed. It is a great matter to ſee ſuch a man not dare to maintain what he has preached. It is a tacit retracting of his doctrines, which they thought might be ſufficient. And he well knew that they would be content with it.

Where is the man, who, after having reflected on all theſe things, thinks it ſtrange that Mr Jurieu dared to deny the accuſation.

Theſe are the weapons with which I thought it became me to furniſh poſterity againſt future Sceptics. A Sceptic glad to render all facts uncertain, might have ſaid thirty years hence, It cannot be known for certain whether a famous Miniſter did or did not preach an Hereſy on ſuch a day: how then can we certainly know what paſſes in councils of ſtate? He may be anſwered by virtue of my explanation, that it is very eaſy to aver that the Miniſter did preach the doctrines with which he is charged by the accuſer. If whilſt things were freſh, any perſon had taken the pains to explain them, as I have done this, we ſhould not be obliged on ſo many occaſions to fall in with Scepticiſm in hiſtory. The negative argument would not in that caſe be of any force. I call a negative argument the ſilence of cotemporary authors, with regard to remarkable accidents, whether mentioned by no body, or mentioned without being contradicted. We are in this laſt caſe. Mr Jurieu denies, and every body ſuffers him to deny; even the accuſer ſuffers it. For this reaſon, in future generations, the ſtrength of the negative argument might be uſed in his behalf, if they did not know the contents of my digreſſion.

There is no reaſon why what I have attempted to do in favour of our poſterity, may not extend even to foreigners: for as to the perſons who are now living in Holland, they do not want this information. They doubt not that Mr Jurieu preached the hatred of our neighbour in the ſenſe of the accuſation. The ſuppreſſion of theſe ſermons ſpeaks very clearly on this head, and ſuch of his hearers as can ſpeak out without fearing the effects of it, very frankly tell the truth when occaſion offers. This indeed is only the talk of converſation, and not a public certificate. It was ſaid once in the preſence of a Magiſtrate who had heard theſe ſermons, that Mr Jurieu denied the whole accuſation. How, ſaid the Magiſtrate, does he deny he preached that a man fulfils the command, provided he wiſhes ſpiritual felicity to perſecuters? Yes, it was anſwered, that is one of the points which he moſt boldly denies. The Magiſtrate ſhrugged up his ſhoulders, and proteſted that he diſtinctly remembered to have heard him ſpeak this new doctrine. I was preſent at that converſation.

(70) Here I only relate ſome of the expedients by which he is become formidable. The reſt are not known, or only known by hear-ſay, and were they known, it would probably not be prudent to publiſh them. I am not a writer of Anecdotes.

(71) There are examples of both kinds, and this is more perſuading than his boaſts. It is known that he has had the addreſs to become a kind of almoner, I mean the diſtributer of ſeveral ſums which other people give for pious uſes. This is a great lure, to make himſelf creatures.

ZUYLICHEM (Constantine Huygens, Lord of) Secretary and Counſellor to the Princes of Orange, one of the moſt ingenious men and beſt Poets [A] of the XVIIth Century, was born at the Hague, on the fourth of September 1596. He was the ſecond ſon of Chriſtian Huygens [B], Secretary to the Council of State of the Republic

[A] And beſt Poets.] There are of his compoſure an infinite number of Dutch verſes: he alſo publiſhed ſome Latin poems under the title of Momenta deſultoria.

[B] He was the ſecond ſon of Chriſtian Huygens.] This Christian was the ſon of Cornelius Huygens, a gentleman of Brabant, and of Gertrude Back (1). He was the firſt of his family who ſettled in Holland. He married (2) into a very conſiderable family of Antwerp, by taking for his wife Suſanna Hoefnagle, the daughter of James Hoefnagle, and Elizabeth Veſeler (3). This James Hoefnagle was ſo rich, that he gave three hundred thouſand florins for his redemption from the Spaniſh garriſon when it mutinied in Antwerp in the year 1576. This large ranſom ſecured him and his family from the fury of the ſoldiers,

(1) The daughter of Chriſtian Back, and Lucy Back de Weelden, of the ſame family with thoſe of Aſten.

(2) Being 26 years of age.

(3) The eldeſt daughter of George Veſeler, Intendant-General of the Mints of the King of Spain.

Republic of the United-Provinces, and was preferred to the poſt I have mentioned under Prince Frederic Henry. He continued in the exerciſe of it under his ſucceſſors, until he reſigned it to his eldeſt ſon (a). In the year 1661, he was ſent to the Court of France, to ſollicit the reſtitution of Orange, of which Lewis XIV had taken poſſeſſion. And in the year 1665, having at laſt obtained what he demanded, he took a journey to Orange, in order to cauſe that principality to be delivered to its lawful ſovereign. This was performed with great ſolemnity (b). He lived to a great old age, with the happineſs of retaining both the ſolidity of his judgment, and the vivacity of his wit, and alſo of ſeeing his family well ſettled, and the ſixty-two years ſervices he had done to the houſe of Orange well approved. He had kept a great epiſtolary correſpondence with the moſt illuſtrious learned men [C], and as he loved and underſtood the Liberal Arts, he delighted in favouring thoſe who made profeſſion of them. He died in the year 1687, aged ninety years and ſix months. He was Preſident of the Prince of Orange's Council. Mr Huygens, one of the greateſt Mathematicians of Europe, was one of his three ſons [D].

(a) See the remark [D].

(b) See the relation publiſhed by Mr Chambrun, Miniſter of Orange, in the year 1666.

ſoldiers, as well as the fine houſe which he had built; but did not prevent their killing, even in his arms, one of his relations who fled to him for protection. The country-ſeat which he built, about a quarter of a league from Antwerp, is ſtill known by the name of Lanternhorf. Balthazar Hoefnagle, his eldeſt ſon, married the daughter of the Chancellor of Brabant (4). As for CHRISTIAN HUYGENS, he ſerved Prince William in quality of his Secretary, ever ſince the foundation of the Republic of the United-Provinces. The hiſtories of Reydanus and Hooft relate a noble action of his, when he was Deputy to that Prince, after whoſe death he was Secretary of the Council of State. He died at the Hague, in the year 1624, leaving two ſons and two daughters. MAURICE HUYGENS, his eldeſt ſon, and godſon to Prince Maurice, was born at the Hague on the twelfth of May 1595, and was Secretary to the States after the death of his father, and left iſſue. CONSTANTINE HUYGENS, the ſecond ſon of Chriſtian, is the ſubject of this article. He had two ſiſters: GEERTRUDE HUYGENS, the eldeſt, was married to Philip Doublet, Lord of St Annelant, &c. Receiver-General of the United-Provinces. From this marriage proceeded Philip Doublet, Lord of St Annelant, &c. who married SUSANNA HUYGENS, his couſin-german, the daughter of our CONSTANTINE HUYGENS. The other ſiſter of the ſaid Conſtantine, named CONSTANTIA HUYGENS, was born on the ſecond of Auguſt 1602, and married David le Leu de Wilhem, as I have ſaid above (5).

[C] He had kept a great epiſtolary correſpondence with the moſt illuſtrious learned men.] Chiefly with Daniel Heinſius, Nicolas Heinſius, the ſon of Daniel, Voſſius, Ericius Puteanus, Balzac (6), Corneille, and ſtill more with Father Merſenne, and Mr Des Cartes (7). Obſerve alſo, that he is frequently mentioned in the printed letters of ſeveral learned men. See amongſt others thoſe of Mr de Wicquefort and Barlæus, lately publiſhed in Latin and French (8).

[D] Mr Huygens, one of the greateſt Mathematicians of Europe, was one of his three ſons.] His name was CHRISTIAN; he died on the eighth of July 1695, at the age of ſixty-ſix years, without ever marrying. Hymen could not well agree with a perſon like him, wholly devoted to the enquiry after what was moſt profound in Mechanics, Aſtronomy, Geometry, &c. See his elogy in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (9). To make it compleat, Mr de Beauval had no occaſion for any thing elſe beſides a catalogue of the writings and inventions of this great man. You will alſo find his elogy, as well as that of Mr de Zuylichem, his father, in a letter written by Sorbiere, on the thirteenth of July 1660 (10). Mr Huygens was then only thirty-one years of age (11). His eldeſt brother, named CONSTANTINE, was Secretary to the Prince of Orange, upon the reſignation of his father, and continued in the poſſeſſion of that poſt after the acceſſion of that great Prince to the Britiſh throne. He died at the Hague in November 1697. Mr de Zuylichem left a third ſon, who died at Rotterdam in the beginning of July 1699. He had the office of Deputy of the Admiralty of the Maeſe for life. He left a very fine family. His eldeſt ſon poſſeſſes the lordſhip of Zeelhem, of which Mr Huygens, the Mathematician, bore the title during the laſt years of his life.

---

(4) Called Theodore van Liefvelt, Lord of Hamme, Ste. Anne, Opdorp, &c.

(5) In the article WILHEM, remark [F]. All this is extracted out of a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(6) Balzac inſcribed to him his criticiſm upon Heinſius's Herodes infanticida. Several Letters which he wrote to him are printed.

(7) See Mr Baillet in his Life of Des Cartes, paſſim.

(8) At Amſterdam 1696.

(9) For Auguſt, 1695, Art. ix, pag. 542, & ſeq.

(10) Sorbiere, Lettres & Relations, p. 143, & ſeq. Paris edition, 1660, in 8vo.

(11) Sorbiere ſays he was but 24. He is miſtaken.

AN

Hiſtorical Diſcourſe

On the LIFE of

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS,

KING OF SWEDEN.

CHAP. I.

Containing his actions till the truce concluded with Poland in the year 1629, ſome time before he entered Germany, to make war on the Emperor Ferdinand II.

SWEDEN had been governed for almoſt a century, by Princes different from thoſe who reigned in Denmark, when GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS aſcended the throne. The vicinity and warlike temper of theſe two nations, raiſed ſo great an antipathy between them, that the one has always attempted to ſubdue the other. They have ſome times ſucceeded in theſe attempts, and Sweden and Denmark have reigned over each other by turns. Near the cloſe of the XVth century, it was the turn of Denmark to reign over Sweden: for CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN I, King of Denmark, who died in the year 1482, was likewiſe King of Sweden, and left a ſon, named JOHN II, who for ſome time enjoyed both theſe kingdoms. He was expelled by the Swedes; and this made CHRISTIAN II, his ſon, more deſirous to re-unite theſe two kingdoms in himſelf. He at firſt ſucceeded in his enterprize; for notwithſtanding the valour and reſiſtance of the Swedes, he laid ſiege to Stockholm, and obliged them to acknowledge him as their King. But he did not long ANNO enjoy either this new kingdom, or that which he poſſeſſed already. His cruelties ren- 1523. dered him ſo odious, that, upon his return from Sweden, the Danes took from him the crown of Denmark, and gave it to his uncle FREDERIC, Duke of Holſtein, who 1523. having defeated CHRISTIAN, confined him in a caſtle, during the reſt of his life.

This change gave the Swedes an opportunity of ſhaking off the Daniſh yoke. Fortune was ſo favourable to the courage of a Prince of the houſe of VASA, called GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, (that is the ſon of ERIC) deſcended from the antient Kings of the Goths, and from CHARLES CANUTE, who had ſixty years before been King of Sweden, that he drove the Danes out of all their garriſon-towns, and was afterwards proclaimed King of Sweden, amidſt the joyful acclamations of all the people. From him 1523. deſcended the famous GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, who is the ſubject of this diſcourſe.

This great revolution, by which in the ſame year Sweden and Denmark had each a new King, was not like to ſtifle the antient quarrels between theſe two kingdoms. One might have thought that FREDERIC, the better to juſtify the choice which had been made of him, would have laboured to recover to the Danes the ſuperiority which they had loſt; and that GUSTAVUS, for a like reaſon, would have uſed all his efforts to ſecure the advantage, which he had gained from the Danes: but the contrary happened: each of the new Kings only endeavoured to eſtabliſh himſelf in the throne which he had obtained by the voice of his ſubjects, and believing that the friendſhip of each other was neceſſary for that purpoſe, they contracted together a very ſtrict alliance, which doubtleſs greatly contributed to introduce the Lutheran religion into theſe two Northern kingdoms: for as Princes are uſually diſpoſed, they rarely embrace the ſame novelties, when they hate one another, and the attachment of their enemies to a new religion, is to them a ſtrong argument of the falſhood of it.

I ſhould depart from my ſubject, was I to explain how ERIC, the eldeſt ſon of GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, was deprived of his crown by JOHN, his brother, Duke of Finland, and huſband to the Princeſs CATHARINE, ſiſter of SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS King of Poland; and how afterwards CHARLES, Duke of Sudermania, another ſon of King GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, was made King of Sweden, in prejudice to Prince SIGISMUND, the eldeſt ſon of King JOHN, his brother. I ſhall only obſerve that this excluſion of SIGISMUND, ſowed great diſcord between the Poles and the Swedes, becauſe SIGISMUND having been elected King of Poland during his father's life, and not having been able to prevent his uncle CHARLES, Duke of Sudermania, from being declared King of Sweden by the States of the kingdom, he employed the forces of Poland, to take ſatisfaction for the injury he believed the Swedes had done him, and tranſmitted to his poſterity the care of making good his pretenſions. But notwithſtanding this, as the reign of SIGISMUND, and that of his ſon ULADISLAUS were very glorious in Poland; ſo CHARLES enjoyed Sweden with great reputation till his death, and left that kingdom to his ſon, under whom it became one of the moſt glorious and flouriſhing in Europe. ANNO 1587.

In the year 1611, upon the death of CHARLES, was raiſed to the throne of Sweden this illuſtrious ſon, who has done ſo great honour to his nation, the famous GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, the ſcourge of the Houſe of Auſtria, the terror of the Court of Rome, and deliverer of the Proteſtant religion. He was born at Stockholm on the ninth of December 1594, and his birth gave a moſt ſenſible joy to his father, and to the Princeſs CHRISTINA his mother, CHARLES's ſecond wife, and daughter to a Duke of Holſtein. SIGISMUND King of Poland, had in the ſame year been crowned King of Sweden, and returning to Poland, had left the regency of Sweden to CHARLES his uncle. In the year 1600 this regency was changed into a true and full royalty, by the States of the Realm, and in an authentic manner, ſuch as removes every juſt charge of uſurpation from the memory of that Prince. Otherwiſe, we muſt ſay that SIGISMUND ought to have laid no claim to the crown of Sweden, ſince he was the ſon of 1596. a Prince, who only aſcended the throne upon the excluſion given by the States to him who filled it. But tho' the royal name, and the royal authority had been conferred on CHARLES in the year 1600, he was crowned only in 1607, three years after the ſame States of the kingdom had ſettled on his family the ſucceſſion to the crown of Sweden by way of election, without excluding the daughters, if the male iſſue ſhould fail.

We may eaſily imagine that Poland did not lie quiet, and that CHARLES put himſelf in a condition to make head againſt the Poles. He immediately paſſed into Livonia, chuſing rather to carry the war out of his kingdom, than to wait for the enemy in his own dominions. 1600. He knew beſides that the places belonging to Sweden in that country, lay the moſt expoſed to the attacks of the enemy. Thus Livonia became the theatre of the war which aroſe between Sweden and Poland.

The firſt campaign was very proſperous to the King of Sweden, the greateſt part of Livonia having then been reduced. But the two following years, the Poles in their turn gained very conſiderable advantages over him, by the valour of JOHN ZAMOISKI, one of their moſt famous generals. Afterwards both ſides had their ſhare of ſucceſs, and taſted a little of good, and of bad fortune.

It having been reported in the year 1609, that SIGISMUND had attacked Muſcovy, in order to get himſelf declared Great Duke; CHARLES, thought himſelf obliged to traverſe that deſign, the ſucceſs of which could not but prove fatal to him. The affairs of Muſcovy were then in a bad ſituation, by reaſon of the frequent ſeditions, which in a very ſhort time had cut off three or four of their Emperors.

BASIL ZUSKI (1) who reigned at that time, aſcended the throne, by putting to death DEMETRIUS, who had got poſſeſſion of it, by making the people falſly believe that he was the ſon of the Great Duke JOHN BASIL, the ſecond of that name, who died in the year 1584. Under cover of this impoſture, he had formed a great party; and by the powerful ſuccours he received from the Poles, had cauſed the Great Duke FOEDOR-BORIS-LOWIZ to be ſtrangled. This FOEDOR-BORIS-LOWIZ had ſucceeded his father BORIS-GUDENOW, who died two months before (2) of the uneaſineſs that was given him by the warlike preparations of the pretended DEMETRIUS. No man was better acquainted with the impoſture of this DEMETRIUS than BORIS-GUDENOW; for he knew very well that he had rid himſelf of the true DEMETRIUS, the brother of the Great Duke THEODORE, as well as of THEODORE himſelf, whom he had

---

(1) He was crowned on the firſt of June, 1606.

(2) Boris-Gudenow died on the third of April, 1605.

had poiſoned in the year 1597. The good fortune which DEMETRIUS had to become Emperor, made a greater impreſſion on ſome turbulent ſpirits, than the violent death which precipitated him from the throne: for BASIL ZUSKI, who upon his death was become Great Duke, in a ſhort time found he had to contend with two falſe DEMETRIUS's, who raiſed great diſorders in Muſcovy. Such was the ſtate of affairs in that country, when the King of Poland carried the war into it. There was a great probability tha the would oblige the Muſcovites to chooſe him their Emper or, andeven that this new dignity would enable him to ſubdue the Swedes, whom he only conſidered as his rebellious ſubjects. All the maxims of policy determined CHARLES to give his aſſiſtance to the Great Duke, who ſtrongly importuned him for it.

The affair having been propoſed to the States-General of the kingdom, they reſolved to make a treaty of alliance with the Great Duke; whereupon King CHARLES ſent him ſome good troops under the conduct of Count JAMES LA GARDIE: theſe troops did the Czar great ſervice, and ſignalized themſelves on many occaſions. But the reſtleſs, wild, and odd, humour of the Muſcovites furniſhed the factious with too many means of ſupporting themſelves; beſides the Swediſh troops having mutinied, becauſe they did not receive the pay which the Czar owed them, that unfortunate Emperor, deſtitute of every reſource, was dethroned, and confined in a monaſtery. Upon this SIGISMUND conceived greater hopes either for himſelf, or for his ſon ULADISLAUS. There was indeed much talk of chuſing his ſon Emperor of Muſcovy. Some people alſo caſt their eye on Prince CHARLES PHILIP, the King of Sweden's ſecond ſon, and this was much talked of, even after the death of that King: yet neither was elected. The Muſcovites preferred a ſovereign born in their own country, and elected MICHAEL FEDEROWITS, a relation (3) of JOHN BASILIDES.

ANNO 1613.

During theſe laſt diſorders in Muſcovy, CHARLES was involved in a new war. CHRISTIAN IV, King of Denmark, being unwilling to loſe ſo favourable an opportunity, as the King of Sweden preſented to him, by engaging in the war with Muſcovy and Poland, reſolved to break with him. He found out ſeveral pretences, and ſeveral ſubjects of complaint, he wrote letters, he inſiſted much on his patience, and propoſed ways of accommodation, as they always do, who are fully determined to come to a rupture. In a word, he made uſe of all the formalities which are commonly employed either to hide from the public the injuſtice of the aggreſſor, or to retard the preparations of the enemy, and by which none but very ſimple people are enſnared. At laſt, after having uſed all thoſe little formalities, he wrote to King CHARLES, that he declared war againſt him, and at the ſame time ſet out in order to beſiege at once both Calmar and Elfſburg.

This was the firſt war in which GUSTAVUS ſerved, being only ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age. Something had been always obſerved in him, which promiſed that one day he would be a great man; and the King, his father, who had perceived this better than any other perſon, relying upon it, had taken an extreme care of his education, and neglected nothing that might render him an accompliſhed Prince, both in the qualities of his body and mind. Finding himſelf obliged to repel the Danes, who beſieged two of his towns at the ſame time, he carried his ſon with him to the army, and ſent him towards Chriſtianopel, a place which belonged to the Danes, hoping to give their forces a diverſion, by threatning one of their towns. The ſucceſs was greater than had been expected; for though there was a ſtrong garriſon in Chriſtianopel, yet the Swedes ſeized it at the firſt onſet, after having blown up the gates by petards. The garriſon not having had time to capitulate, was put to the ſword, and the city was ſet on fire.

GUSTAVUS tranſported by the ardour of his courage, run a great hazard in this expedition; for having expoſed himſelf too far, he was forced to eſcape the danger he was in, by puſhing his horſe into a water half frozen, where he had periſhed, if PETER BANNIER, knight of the order, and Senator of the kingdom, had not come to his aſſiſtance.

The taking and ſacking of Chriſtianopel, and ſome other attempts which were made on the Danes, did not hinder them, after they had made themſelves maſters of the town of Calmar, from taking likewiſe the Citadel. It is true that this was not ſo much owing to their valour, or to any neglect in CHARLES to relieve the Citadel, as it was to the treachery of the officer who commanded in it. The ſurrender of that place was ſoon followed by the invaſion of the iſland of Oeland, and by the taking of the caſtle of Borkholm.

Theſe diſgraces ſo much incenſed the King of Sweden, that not having been able to take ſatisfaction of the enemy, in ſome battles which he hazarded, he propoſed to the King of Denmark that they ſhould terminate their quarrel by a Duel. CHRISTIAN ridiculed this propoſal, and anſwered that ſuch a combat was rather the affair of an adventurer, than of a Prince. Nay he railled him on the infirmities of his old-age, as if there was but little glory to be won, by gaining an advantage over a man in his years, or as if it was an unfair dealing to place the lives of a young and of an old King in ballance, when the courſe of nature alone would ſoon put an end to that of the latter. A little after, he attacked the King of Sweden in his camp, and killed more of King CHARLES's ſoldiers, than he loſt of his own.

---

(3) Micheal Federowits was the ſon of Theodore Kikitits, Patriarch of Moſcow, and of Mary daughter of John Baſilides, and ſiſter to the true Demetrius.

We may eaſily imagine that all this grievouſly vexed the King of Sweden, who had never wanted vigour nor courage, and had acquired great glory on many occaſions. He thought of the means of revenge, and met with ſome: but doubtleſs the moſt pleaſing was that which GUSTAVUS procured him, by retaking the iſland of Oeland and the caſtle of Borkholm, ſhewing that his very firſt attempts were maſterly ſtrokes.

How unwelcome and afflicting muſt death be to the father of ſuch a ſon, from whom he might daily expect ſo many grounds of comfort? yet he muſt reſolve to die near the end of the ſame campaign: for on the thirtieth of October 1611, CHARLES IX, King of Sweden, died after a few days illneſs. Four days before his death he had been informed that Count LA GARDIE had retaken ſeveral places from the rebellious Muſcovites, and that the inhabitants of Novogrod whom he had ſubdued, had given him their promiſe to elect CHARLES PHILIP to the crown of Muſcovy: but he ſeemed to take little concern in all this. He ſhewed that from thenceforth his only care was to prepare for death, and that he left all the affairs of this world to his ſon GUSTAVUS. He died very piouſly in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, much regretted by his ſubjects, who conſidered him as the preſerver of the Proteſtant religion, which the artifices of the Jeſuits, backed by the credit of SIGISMUND, had infallibly baniſhed out of Sweden, if CHARLES had not prevented it.

The loſs of ſo great a Prince would have occaſioned a longer and more ſenſible grief to the whole kingdom, had it not been for the great qualities of the young GUSTAVUS, who ſucceeded. I have already ſaid that his father had conceived the greateſt hopes of a ſon who had ſuch natural endowments, and ſo careful an education. He had often expreſſed to his court the good opinion he had of his dear GUSTAVUS; for ſpeaking of various things which he had wiſhed for the grandeur and glory of the nation, but ſuch as he did not hope to accompliſh, he uſed to ſay to thoſe who were preſent, this lad will do it, laying his hand on the head of his ſon. And as this kind of diſcourſe never fails to paſs from the court to the city, and to run from mouth to mouth, throughout the whole kingdom, all Sweden knew the eſteem which King CHARLES had for his ſucceſſor, and had conceived very great hopes of him, as well as CHARLES. How great a burthen is this on a Prince! For, on one hand, nothing is more difficult for him than to anſwer the high ideas which a whole people have preconceived of him; and, on the other, nothing is more blaſting to his reputation, than not to anſwer them. We ſhall ſee hereafter that GUSTAVUS ſurpaſſed all that had been expected of him.

As a long interregnum could not but be prejudical to the Swedes, in the ſituation of the general affairs of the kingdom at that time, being at war with Poland, Denmark, and Muſcovy; the States of Sweden, without loſs of time, aſſembled at Nicoping, in the month of December which followed the death of the King, and, by the general voice of all the deputies, elected to the crown GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, his ſon. This Prince being only ſeventeen years of age, made a ſpeech which charmed the whole aſſembly, ſo full was it of greatneſs of mind, and of modeſty together. He ſaid, 'That conſidering his youth, and the difficulty of the affairs of the kingdom, he would rather 'have choſen not to take ſo heavy a burthen upon him; but that the States having 'thought it proper he ſhould, he would undertake that charge in the name of the moſt 'holy Trinity, and apply all his care, and all his forces to maintain all the orders of 'the ſtate in the true religion and in all their privileges.'

In the beginning of his reign, he applied himſelf wholly to the war againſt the Danes, becauſe that was the moſt preſſing evil, as it threatned the heart and center of the kingdom. He therefore took the field as ſoon as the ſeaſon permitted, being reſolved to recover Calmar, and drive the enemy from the frontiers: but before he ſet out, he diſpoſed of the principal offices of the crown, and filled them with perſons of a diſtinguiſhed merit, eſpecially the office of Great Chancellor of the kingdom, which he beſtowed on the famous AXEL OXENSTIERN, one of the ableſt men that ever appeared in Europe.

A King who had no other endowments but the courage of GUSTAVUS, would not have failed to open the campaign with the ſiege of Calmar; but as for him who notwithſtanding his fire, and the impetuoſity with which his youth inſpired him, was not incapable of entering into himſelf, and deliberately conſulting the maxims of prudence, he conſidered that the Danes had ſo ſtrongly fortified that place, that it was more proper to think of recovering it by gaining equivalent advantages, than by attacking it with main force. Therefore he did not lay ſiege to Calmar, but was only intent on giving the enemy a diverſion: and for this end the King himſelf entered Schonen as far as was poſſible, and having ravaged it, he returned to his camp, after having had a ſharp encounter with the enemy in his retreat.

But whatever pains GUSTAVUS took either to vanquiſh the Danes, or at leaſt to defeat their enterprizes, he had but little ſucceſs. CHRISTIAN IV King of Denmark, was a courageous Prince, ſkilled in the art of war, and had more troops than his enemy. He therefore took ſome towns from the Swedes, and put to ſea a fleet which alarmed the city of Stockholm, and to ſay the truth, the advantage of that war was on his ſide. For though by the treaty of peace concluded in the beginning of the year 1613, he reſtored to the Swedes all the places he had taken from them, yet they were obliged to pay him great ſums of money for his reimburſement, and to make him ſeveral conceſſions. From hence, to obſerve it by the way, we may learn that it is not always ſure to judge of the reign of a Prince by the firſt years of it, for here is one of the moſt glorious reigns that ever was, the beginnings of which were attended with a kind of diſgrace. Here you ſee the great GUSTAVUS, who being involved in a war in the beginning of his reign, only comes out of it by dearly purchaſing peace, at the mediation of the King of England.

His honour did not ſuffer by it; for there are a great many occaſions, when Princes have the diſadvantage without deſerving to be blamed. If we would juſtly blame an unſucceſsful Prince, it is not enough for us to ſay that he was unſucceſsful, we muſt add that he had but very ſmall obſtacles to encounter; and this could not be alleged againſt the King of Sweden. Moreover the maxims of policy determined him to make peace with the King of Denmark, for beſides the diſpoſition of the King of Poland, always to create troubles to the Swedes, he likewiſe ſaw the Muſcovites at variance with Sweden. King CHARLES, earneſtly ſollicited by the Great Guke to aſſiſt him againſt the enterprizes of SIGISMUND, and ſufficiently induced to it by his own intereſt, had ſent ſome good troops into Muſcovy, as I have ſaid already. Theſe troops greatly conduced to keep affairs in ballance; and if they did not obtain, as the Swedes had been made to hope, that GUSTAVUS's brother ſhould be choſen Great Duke in the room of BASIL ZUSKI, who was confined in a monaſtery, the Poles on their ſide could neither obtain the election of SIGISMUND, nor that of ULADISLAUS. The Muſcovites choſe an Emperor from among their own Princes, and at leaſt they ought to own that the aſſiſtance of Sweden had been uſeful to them, in procuring the liberty of that election. But no ſooner was the new Czar inſtalled, than he declared war againſt Sweden.

GUSTAVUS, to convince him that he had judged wrong, if he had founded his hopes on the youth of the King of Sweden, reſolved to invade Muſcovy in the year 1615. Accordingly he entered that country, immediately ſeized on ſome towns, beat the Muſcovites who durſt keep the field in his preſence, and laid ſiege to Pleſkow, a rich town, and one of the principal keys of Muſcovy. He opened the trenches with great vigour, and his batteries had already made a conſiderable breach in the walls of the town, when at the preſſing ſollicitations of the King of Great Britain, the greateſt peace-maker of the world, he raiſed the ſiege. The rigour of the ſeaſon, which was already far advanced, had not been able to make him take that reſolution; but the intreaties of King JAMES joining with this conſideration, GUSTAVUS raiſed the ſiege with a good grace, ſhewing, in oppoſition to the notions entertained by ſome people, that the greateſt generals, and thoſe who are appointed by Heaven to perform the greateſt exploits, do not take all the towns which they attack.

It muſt be added in his vindication, that he entered Muſcovy, not with the deſign of making conqueſts there, but only to oblige the Czar to make a peace. Had he aimed at conqueſt, he would not have caſt his eye on that quarter; he would have been contented to have nothing to fear from it. Thus the Ambaſſador of Great Britain, having aſſured him that the Great Duke deſired a peace, but that out of haughtineſs he would not enter upon a negotiation, while he ſaw his towns beſieged, GUSTAVUS abandoned the ſiege of Pleſkow, and wrote a handſome letter to King JAMES, wherein he did not fail to make him ſenſible of the ſacrifice which, in his conſideration, he had made to the work of peace, by raiſing the ſiege of a very conſiderable town, the taking of which appeared to him infallible. He then returned to Sweden, and held the States of Finland and Nordland, which he had ſumomned to meet on the nineteenth of January 1616.

As he was not a Prince who only ſought to be admired by his ſubjects for his valour, he made in the aſſembly a very eloquent ſpeech, and ſuch as was very proper to perſuade the people that he chiefly deſired to be loved by them, as a Prince incapable of ſacrificing their wealth and repoſe to his own glory. This was wiſely conſidered by GUSTAVUS: for we need not queſtion but there were ill deſigning perſons in the kingdom, who tacitly accuſed him of too great ambition, and ſaid that he had more regard for his own glory, than for the repoſe of his ſubjects, when he engaged in the war with Muſcovy. This was not only ſaid, but was alſo written in certain libels, which SIGISMUND, King of Poland, ſpread about in the kingdom, to ſow diſcord among the Swedes. In order to diſſipate theſe ſuſpicions, GUSTAVUS ſhewed in his ſpeech what conduct the Muſcovites had held with regard to Sweden, and from thence drew ſeveral reaſons to ſhew that they ought indiſpenſibly to undertake and purſue the war againſt them. He did not forget to warn his ſubjects againſt the artifices of SIGISMUND, and after having given a particular account of what had paſſed in Muſcovy, he concluded with a proteſtation that all his deſigns were only directed to obtain a good peace, and to ſecure the public tranquillity. This ſpeech produced the moſt deſirable effect for the King of Sweden, and procured him what he had thought the moſt difficult to obtain; for the States conſented to raiſe the ſupplies which were neceſſary for carrying on the war. It would not be a hard matter to make ſubjects approve of conqueſts and battles, provided they coſt them no money. The difficulty lies in perſuading them that it is often the part of policy and œconomy to expend a great deal of money for that purpoſe, which indeed is very true.

It appeared that Gustavus had ſpoken ſincerely; for in the year 1617, a peace was actually concluded with the Emperor of Muſcovy, by the mediation of England and Holland, and would have been concluded ſooner, had it not been obſtructed by the long preliminaries which were neceſſary in order to examine the full powers of the Ambaſſadors, and to agree on titles and dignities, which it is not an eaſy matter to regulate with the Ambaſſadors of the Great Duke; and generally the moſt important part of their embaſſy is over, when the affair of precedence and titles is terminated. By this peace the whole province of Ingria, which is very conſiderable, was yielded to Sweden.

After this peace, King Gustavus made ſeveral eſtabliſhments in domeſtic affairs, for the interior felicity of the kingdom: this is never more neceſſary than in the reign of a conquering Prince, becauſe it generally happens that a kingdom which acquires great glory abroad, is exhauſted and miſerable at home. He made uſeful regulations for the holding of the States, eſtabliſhed a council for maritime affairs, a Chancery, a court of Exchequer, and beſides, a chamber of Commerce, with ſeveral good ſtatutes concerning Merchants, whether Swedes, or foreigners.

But as it was not enough to provide for domeſtic affairs only, Gustavus did not forget what kind of a man his couſin the King of Poland was. He did not forget that Sigismund was a Prince who left nothing unattempted to recover the crown of Sweden, and had his emiſſaries in that kingdom, who diſperſed libels againſt the preſent government, and endeavoured to ſeduce as many people as they could from their allegiance to Gustavus. To prevent the effect of theſe ſecret practices, in the year 1614, an edict of the King had been publiſhed in the general aſſembly of the States of the kingdom, prohibiting all his ſubjects from ſtudying in the univerſities of Roman Catholics, and from travelling to the court of the King of Poland, or having any correſpondence with his courtiers or officers. Sigismund was not contented to ſeduce the Swedes by libels, but went ſo far as to ſpread about manifeſto's in Sweden, wherein he exhorted them take up arms againſt their King.

Gustavus found no better means of guarding againſt theſe indirect hoſtilities, than to attack Poland with open force. He had capacity enough to defend himſelf againſt his enemy by the weapons of the cabinet; but beſides, that theſe are not much in uſe among the northern nations, he had too great a ſoul to ſubmit to theſe artifices; and, to ſay the truth, the match had been too unequal in that reſpect, between a Lutheran Prince, and a Prince aſſiſted by the counſels of the court of Rome, who had at his ſervice as many Monks and Jeſuits as he pleaſed. Gustavus therefore very wiſely reſolved to repel Sigismund's intrigues by arms, and he had no difficulty to obtain the conſent of the States to the war with Poland.

After ſuch a reſolution had been taken, the important affair was to prevent his enemy. For this purpoſe, the King of Sweden, without loſs of time, ſent troops into Livonia, with a fleet of eighteen men of war, and ſeized Dunamond, a place which checks the town of Riga, at the mouth of the river Dwina, and defends the harbour. To this conqueſt he ſoon after added that of Pernaw and Windaw; and he might eaſily have carried his conqueſts farther, becauſe the King of Poland was at that time greatly preſſed by the Turks and Tartars: but he ſacrificed all theſe advantages to generoſity, and granted a truce for two years, which his enemy demanded of him. An example of moderation which the Swedes would have ſet off with many pompous panegyrics, had they been acquainted with the modern Rhetoric.

The moderation of Gustavus did not make him forget what he owed to the tranquillity of his dominions, and he would not gain any praiſe by this virtue, at the expence of his other qualities. When therefore he granted to Sigismund a truce, which gave him leiſure to defend himſelf againſt the Infidels, Gustavus thought himſelf obliged to join this condition with it, that during theſe two years they ſhould endeavour to put an amicable end to all the differences ſubſiſting between Sweden and Poland. This was reaſonable, for it was not to be expected that Gustavus ſhould renounce the advantages he poſſeſſed, without taking precautions againſt future evil; beſides, he granted as long a truce as could be deſired for the diſcuſſion of the differences between him and Sigismund. Two years would not perhaps have ſufficed for that diſcuſſion in the Diet of Ratiſbon, but they ought to ſuffice to the Poles; ſo that Gustavus, beſides the moderation of taking no advantage of the incurſions which the Turks and Tartars made on his enemy's frontiers, had likewiſe the generoſity not to preſcribe him too ſhort a time for the pacification of their differences. But as he was well perſuaded that Sigismund had only demanded the truce, that he might have leiſure to gather new ſtrength, and more forces, he took, with his Council and the States of the kingdom, all the neceſſary meaſures to prevent being ſurprized by that dangerous neighbour, and to begin the war as ſoon as the truce ſhould be expired.

If GUSTAVUS had valued himſelf on craftineſs, he would have concealed his deſign, and given ſeveral plauſible reaſons for all theſe warlike preparations; but his great courage would not ſuffer him to diſſemble. On the contrary, he ordered Count JAMES LA GARDIE, Governor of Eſtonia, and Great Marſhal of the kingdom, to write to the Governor of Livonia for the King of Poland, that he would not be kept eternally in ſuſpence between peace and war, and was therefore reſolved, as ſoon as the two years of the truce were expired, either to conclude with the King of Poland a perpetual and irrevocable peace, or at leaſt a truce for many years, or to attack him with all his might. Certainly this is a ſincerity which is no longer in practice; where are the Princes who give their enemies notice ſo long beforehand that they intend to declare war on them at a certain time? How many Princes do we ſee who attack their enemies while they are proteſting that they have no deſign to break the peace? They who on one hand will applaud the great candour of GUSTAVUS, will not blame him on the other for any want of prudence, when they know what great preparations he made for the war with Poland, for which he was willing that SIGISMUND ſhould alſo be prepared, ſince he gave him notice of his deſign. Theſe preparations were ſuch as manifeſted that GUSTAVUS was as great in prudence as courage. He gave full ſatisfaction to Chriſtian IV, King of Denmark, upon ſome grievances which he complained of, and had a perſonal interview with him on the borders of the two kingdoms, in order to confirm the friendſhip and good underſtanding which ſubſiſted between them, and that he might have nothing to fear from Denmark, while he ſhould make war in Poland.

As GUSTAVUS well knew the importance of naval forces in a war, he took particular care to equip a good fleet, and with ſo great ſucceſs, that he rendered it the principal hope and firmeſt ſupport of the State. He cauſed a great number of cannons to be caſt, and all ſorts of ſmall arms and warlike machines to be forged. He levied many troops, and ordered ſome officers, well ſkilled in military diſcipline, to make them perform their exerciſes regularly, to make them encamp, and in general to keep them enured to all the military functions. He was frequently preſent at all theſe exerciſes, and eſtabliſhed good order every where, to which his preſence contributed as much as his capacity.

ANNO 1620. Before he came to a rupture with Poland, he married the Princeſs ELEONORA, daughter of JOHN SIGISMUND, Elector of Brandenburg, and after the nuptials were over, he ſummoned the States of the kingdom, who took the neceſſary reſolutions for the charges of the war. They likewiſe appointed public prayers and rejoicings in memory of the Reformation, which had been introduced into the kingdom an hundred years before; ſo that this became a ſecular ſolemnity.

The truce being expired without the King of Poland's accepting the condition which had been propoſed to him, or ſhewing any inclination to a deciſive treaty of peace, 1621. GUSTAVUS began the war by making an irruption into Livonia. He ſent no Herald of Arms to SIGISMUND to declare war againſt him in form, becauſe he had plainly and publickly ſignified to him, that the very moment the truce ſhould be expired, he would attack him, if no treaty was then concluded. The Poles complained of having been attacked without any previous declaration of war, but this complaint was entirely groundleſs, ſince they had been threatened with a war two years before.

The firſt attempt which GUSTAVUS made was the ſiege of Riga, the ſtrongeſt and moſt important town in all that country. Such a conduct is not always attended with ſucceſs, and there ſeems to be ſome temerity in attacking the chief places at firſt; becauſe, if the attempt miſcarries, the General ſuffers in his reputation, or diſcourages his ſoldiers, whilſt he raiſes the courage of the enemy; whereas if he fixes on a leſs difficult ſiege, he may depend on ſucceeding, or gaining all the favourable opinions and prejudices that accompany happy beginnings. But, on the other hand, if he takes the capital, he makes all the reſt of the province tremble of courſe, and it is uſually by theſe deciſive ſtrokes that great things are brought about in a little time. GUSTAVUS having maturely weighed all the reaſons on both ſides, determined to open the campaign with the ſiege of Riga, the capital city of Livonia.

Riga is a large town, fortified with good baſtions and fraized half-moons, and has a large trade by reaſon of its ſituation, being only two leagues diſtant from the ſea, where the river Dwina, which runs through it, opens ſo commodious a harbour, that veſſels of all kinds paſs and repaſs within its encloſure. In the year 1181, it ſurrendered to STEPHEN BATTORY, King of Poland, having been formerly ſubject to the temporal juriſdiction of its own Archbiſhop. Livonia had already been almoſt wholly ſubdued by King SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS, the laſt of the JAGELLONS, who had overcome GOTHARD KETHLER, Great-Maſter of the Teutonic order in Livonia, and had obliged the Livonians to take an oath of allegiance to him, and acknowledge themſelves ſubjects of the crown of Poland. This SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS likewiſe forced the Great-Maſter to conſent to the ſuppreſſion of his order, and to yield all his rights on Livonia to Poland. In conſideration of this, in the year 1561, he was inveſted for himſelf and his deſcendants with the duchy of Courland and Semigalia. It was an eaſy matter to ſubdue Livonia; for the Great-Maſter, the knights of his order, and moſt of the eccleſiaſtics, having embraced the Lutheran religion, met with nothing but rebellion and diſobedience among their ſubjects; which formed ſeveral parties in that province. William of Brandenburg, brother of Albert, Duke of Pruſſia, nephew of the King of Poland, and Archbiſhop of Riga, having died a Proteſtant much about the ſame time that the Great-Maſter Kethler made his treaty with Sigismund, Riga was erected into a Republic, and Sigismund ſeized on the reſt of the dioceſe: but it afterwards ſurrendered to Poland, in the reign of King Stephen Battory, that it might enjoy the ſame privileges with Dantzic, and ſecure to itſelf a powerful protection. This is a ſhort account of the revolution which brought the town of Riga under the Poles, who poſſeſſed that place when Gustavus laid ſiege to it in the year 1621.

His fleet met with ſuch a violent ſtorm near the mouth of the Dwina, that a timorous and ſuperſtitious man would have imagined that Heaven warned him not to continue in his enterprize. But Gustavus, without being aſtoniſhed at this unhappy beginning, in which ſome of his ſhips were loſt, and others were diſperſed, continued firm in his firſt reſolution, ſo that having brought together his fleet, and landed his army, which conſiſted of about twenty or twenty-five thouſand men, he encamped before the city of Riga. The principal officers who ſerved under him were Prince Charles Philip, his brother; Count James la Gardie, Great Marſhal of the kingdom; Herman Wrangel, Field-Marſhal; Gustavus Horn, John Bannier, Mansfeld, Rosencrants, Oxenstiern, illuſtrious names in the Hiſtory of that age, and two brave Scotiſh Colonels, Seaton and Ruthwen. The quarters having been marked out, and occupied by the troops that were to be poſted there, they immediately began to throw up the lines of circumvallation; and in the mean time, the Admiral Charles Gyldentrilhm, and Claudius Fleming who commanded the fleet under him, had orders to keep at ſea at the mouth of the river, to prevent any ſuccours of men or warlike ſtores from entering the town.

The inhabitants made the greater preparations for a defence, as they judged by the manner in which Gustavus went about the ſiege, that he was reſolved not to leave the place till he ſhould make himſelf maſter of it. The citadel was ſufficiently provided with a garriſon, arms, and proviſion. The town indeed had only three hundred ſoldiers to defend it; but the citizens, jealous of their liberty, and well diſciplined, ſupplied that deficiency. We may judge of the reſiſtance they made by the length of the ſiege, by the capacity and intrepid activity of Gustavus; and we may form a pretty great idea of the difficulties he met with to reduce the beſieged, if I only ſay that they did not ſurrender to Gustavus, till after a ſiege of ſix weeks. I ſhall not enter into the particulars of all the aſſaults, and all the ſallies; theſe details, which do well in a journal, and would not be diſagreeable if I was ſpeaking of the laſt ſiege of Vienna, would ſtrangely tire the reader, when they concern a town which was attacked in the year 1621. I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying that the batteries of the Swedes overturned ſeveral ſteeples, and ſeveral public buildings, and made ſeveral breaches in the baſtions, and in the walls, that the Swedes ſpared neither grenado's, nor bombs, nor mines, nor countermines, nor any of the things which the reader well enough imagines of himſelf, when he knows that a town has been well attacked, and well defended.

The intrepidity and activity of Gustavus were conſpicuous every where, nay, ſometimes appeared a little too much; for it is ſaid that he did not always remember he was a King, ſo much did he expoſe himſelf to danger, like the meaneſt ſoldier of fortune. He was far from the circumſpection of thoſe Princes, who always keep without the reach of cannon-ſhot; for at the firſt approaches, Gustavus obſerving from an eminence what places were the moſt proper for the different quarters of the army, a cannon-bullet ſtruck the very place from whence he had juſt removed. Another time ſome people were killed with a cannon-ſhot ſo near him, that his cloaths were ſtained with their blood; and a third time, a bullet pierced into his tent, and made a kind of circular motion, as if it was to ſeek the head of the King, as they ſay who find wonders in every thing. In ſhort, Gustavus was very near diſproving the obſervation of Charles V, who ſaid one day to one of his Generals, who exhorted him not to hazzard himſelf ſo much, that there never was a King killed by a cannon-ſhot.

If upon this any one ſhould imagine that Gustavus had been ſorry to take the town without reſiſtance, he would certainly be miſtaken: for by his letters he frequently exhorted the Senators and citizens to ſurrender voluntarily, and not to wait for the ſad extremities which they might apprehend. He endeavoured to intimidate them. He promiſed to grant them an advantageous capitulation, and ſurely was not well pleaſed that they paid no regard to his ſummons. I am willing to believe that this conduct proceeded, in ſome meaſure, from his finding himſelf obliged to lay waſte a fine city, by his cannons and bombs, and to deſtroy many people: yet we muſt not doubt but that he had a more prevailing motive to it; and that was the ſaving of his time and preparations, which he might have employed to better purpoſe, had he ſoon been maſter of the town and citadel of Riga. Generals are glad to perſuade the towns they beſiege, that their only motive in exhorting them to a timely ſurrender is their good-will towards the beſieged: but for the moſt part clemency is not the motive to theſe exhortations, and the beſieged likewiſe do not believe it.

Though the King of Poland was then ſtill at war with the Ottoman Porte, yet he ſent ſome troops to the relief of Riga, under the conduct of Prince CHRISTOPHER RADZWIL. They approached the lines, but finding from ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes that nothing could be done, they quickly retired. The inhabitants were made to hope they ſhould ſoon be relieved, and this rendered them more obſtinate in rejecting any capitulation.

At laſt GUSTAVUS vexed to be ſo long in taking a town, reſolved to ſpring the mines which were ready under the walls, at the ſame time to make a general aſſault, to expoſe the town to pillage, and afterwards raze it to the foundation. But the Prince, his brother, and the other great lords of the kingdom interceding for that town, obtained of the King that the inhabitants ſhould have notice of the deſtruction which threatned them, and that ſix hours ſhould be granted them to come to their final reſolution. The magiſtrates and inhabitants having maturely conſidered the condition they were in, reſolved at laſt to ſurrender; and thus they ſaved themſelves from a terrible deſtruction which hung over their heads.

The King uſed them with a ſingular clemency, though their obſtinacy had greatly provoked him, and promiſed not only to allow them the enjoyment of their liberty, but likewiſe to augment their privileges, provided they ſhould prove as faithful to him, as they had been to the King of Poland. The Poles were not wanting to publiſh that GUSTAVUS had made himſelf maſter of the town by means of a treacherous correſpondence, the faction in the city which favoured him having raiſed a ſedition in his behalf. Thus men endeavour to comfort themſelves in their diſgraces, by leſſening the glory of the enemy who has beat them: yet as it cannot be denied but that there is very frequently ground for attributing the taking of towns to the perfidy of their governors and inhabitants, it muſt likewiſe be owned that the vanquiſhed on many occaſions have recourſe very wrongfully to that weak conſolation, and would be more equitable, if they beſtowed greater praiſe on the valour of their enemy. The taking of Riga is one of theſe occaſions.

After this important conqueſt, the King ſecured Mittau, the reſidence of the Duke of Courland; ſoon after he re-eſtabliſhed him in it on certain conditions, having concluded a truce for one year with the King of Poland. The city of Riga appeared by it's deputies in the States-General of Sweden, ſummoned to meet at Stockholm the following year, and there took an oath of loyalty and allegiance to GUSTAVUS.

The truce ſeemed only to have been agreed upon, that both ſides might have time to make great armaments. It appeared by the ſteps which SIGISMUND took, that he was reſolved to make great efforts to invade Sweden. In effect, his preparations in Pruſſia were made with this view. To prevent this irruption, GUSTAVUS diſcuſſing ſome differences he had with the King of Denmark, concerning the duties on the importation and exportation of merchandizes, demanded of him not to ſuffer SIGISMUND to levy men in Denmark, nor his ſhips to paſs the Streight. Not content with this, GUSTAVUS obtained an order in the States of the kingdom, that the war ſhould be tranſported into Pruſſia, the better to ſecure to the Swedes their commerce in the Baltic; and becauſe the duties laid in the year 1620, on cattle and ſown lands were not a ſufficient fund for the charges of the war, it was moved in the aſſembly of the ſaid States that a new duty, till then unknown in Sweden, ſhould be laid on all proviſions conſumed in the kingdom; and though this motion at firſt ſtartled moſt of the members, yet they agreed to it. It appeared that this kind of impoſt would be leſs burthenſome to the inhabitants, and would produce a greater revenue, becauſe no perſon of whatever quality or condition would be exempt from it; and the more eaſily to obtain the conſent of all the orders, a promiſe was made that as ſoon as this new duty ſhould be laid, the other extraordinary duties ſhould either be taken off, or leſſened. Theſe promiſes are very often made, but very rarely kept.

Beſides, the King by a ſolemn edict took under his protection all thoſe who ſhould be appointed to collect this duty, for it was eaſily foreſeen that they would be expoſed to the fury of the populace, or would at leaſt bring upon themſelves a volley of imprecations and abuſe. In this edict it was declared that all who ſhould uſe theſe perſons ill, either in deed or in word, ſhould be puniſhed with death, as diſturbers of the public peace, and violators of the royal edicts; and becauſe it is very often uſeful to the Prince, (that he may be ſupplied with money all at once) to farm out his taxes, and it is to be feared that the Farmers and Underfarmers ſhould ſtir up tumults among the people, the King made another edict in which he preciſely determined what the Farmer could exact without fraud, and when, and in what manner he could exact it of every perſon.

I obſerve all theſe things the better to ſhew the capacity and prudence of GUSTAVUS; for it appears that he well knew what he had to fear from the people, and what was fit to be done in order to bring them into his meaſures, and to prevent the greateſt inconveniences on both ſides. It is in vain to murmur; a kingdom cannot poſſibly preſerve it's reputation abroad, and keep it's neighbours in awe, if the ſovereign has not the funds in readineſs; but for this purpoſe muſt there not be duties and exactors of theſe duties, under the protection of the laws? It is true if we except the firſt beginnings, the public peace requires much more that laws ſhould be made againſt the exactor, to reſtrain his avarice, than laws to guard him againſt any inſult.

theſe

In the beginning of this year, King GUSTAVUS had the affliction to loſe his only brother. This loſs was the more affecting, as GUSTAVUS had no children, and thus the King of Poland ſeemed to have better pretenſions, at leaſt for a day to come. That King was a terrible pretender, and it would be hard to find a houſe which has in the ſame time produced two Kings ſo warlike as GUSTAVUS and SIGISMUND, one King of Sweden, and the other of Poland, both deſcended from the illuſtrious houſe of VASA, and firſt couſins. The misfortune was that they were on bad terms together, and this proceeded from reaſons of intereſt which rendered their differences irreconcilable. Accordingly we ſee that they never found the leaſt opportunity to treat of the foundation of their differences: all they could do, was to agree on a ceſſation of arms. But though they agreed on a ceſſation, in order the better to examine the bottom of the affair, and to commence a deciſive treaty of peace, they never came to that point; for the truce being expired, the buſineſs was either to prolong it ſtill for ſome time, or to renew the war.

The laſt of theſe two courſes was taken in year 1623. GUSTAVUS not being willing to give his enemy the advantage of making war out of his own country, embarked in a fleet of ſixty-ſix ſail which he ſtationed near Dantzic, and by this quick and bold expedition he not only prevented SIGISMUND from executing his deſign of carrying the war into Sweden, but likewiſe obliged him to demand the prolongation of the truce till the firſt of June 1625, which was granted him.

Among the pacific actions of GUSTAVUS during this ceſſation of arms, Hiſtorians make a particular mention of his liberalities to the univerſity of Upſal, to which he granted ſeveral conſiderable funds for perpetuity, even from his own patrimonial eſtate; which enabled that univerſity to maintain a great many profeſſors and neceſſitous ſtudents.

ANNO 1624.

Eight years after, he founded the univerſity of Derpt in Livonia; and this could not be forgot by Hiſtorians, who commonly, being men of letters, think it very incumbent on them to immortalize the honour which Princes do to learning by granting it their protection; and it may be ſaid that the more a Prince performs praiſe-worthy actions, the more he ought to procure the favour of the learned, becauſe it is only by the teſtimony of their books that poſterity is acquainted with the greateſt heroes. AUGUSTUS owes the greateſt part of his glory to the intereſt he had made among the learned men of his court. Nothing therefore was more politic in GUSTAVUS than to gain by his bounties the love of a famous univerſity.

It had been agreed upon between the Kings of Sweden and Poland, that if during the truce which was to continue till the firſt of June 1625, a peace was not concluded, one party could not attack the other without having declared war on him two months before that firſt of June. GUSTAVUS deſiring to obſerve this condition, diſpatched a courier to the King of Poland to acquaint him that he would attack him at the end of the truce. He diſpatched him I ſay, in the time agreed upon; but the rigour of the ſeaſon ſo much retarded his journey, that he did not finiſh it in two months before the truce was expired. The Poles loudly complained of this want of ſincerity; the Swedes excuſed themſelves by the badneſs of the roads, and complained in their turn of ſeveral things, and eſpecially of the little inclination which the King of Poland ſhewed towards a peace. The Poliſh Ambaſſadors were of opinion that all manner of hoſtilities ought to ceaſe, whilſt the accommodation of the two crowns was negotiating; but Chancellor OXENSTIERN who was at the head of the Swediſh embaſſy, ſhewed that there was ſome artifice in requiring ſuch a ceſſation, while Sweden appeared to be in ſo good a condition to make great progreſs in the war, and repreſented the loſs his his maſter would ſuffer, if he neglected ſo favourable an opportunity, and waited peaceably till his enemy's troops were reinforced. In ſhort he required that ſeveral articles ſhould be granted to him, before he would promiſe a ceſſation of hoſtilities.

The Poles giving no poſitive anſwer, but inveighing againſt the conduct of Sweden both in their ſpeeches and writings, GUSTAVUS reſolved to anſwer them with ſword in hand, and as his valour and good-fortune had acquired him a great authority in his kingdom, he obtained of the ſtates all the aſſiſtance he deſired. They augmented the tax on cattle, and laid a new duty on all milled grains, a duty which the more eaſily paſſed as the common people ſaw that it would lie heavier on the rich than the poor. Beſides all this, the States-General of the kingdom made an act for keeping a ſettled number of troops, and promiſed the King a ſum of money for the maintenance of land and ſea forces.

With ſo many good helps, GUSTAVUS, finding himſelf in a condition to make a powerful irruption into his enemy's dominions, ſet ſail for Livonia, with a fleet of ſeventy-ſix ſhips, and in a ſhort time drove the Poles from all the places which they ſtill held in that province, from the important fort of Kokenhuſen, from Felburg, Duneburg, Nidorp, and Derpt. He diſcovered the intelligence which the Poles had in the city of Riga, and totally defeated the young SAPIEHA, who with more courage than prudence, had dared to face GUSTAVUS. He paſſed the Dwina, entered Livonia, and ſiezed on Poſwol, whither the Coſſacks had retired, after having made ſome incurſions on the Swedes, and he took the ſtrong town of Birſen, where he found more than ſixty pieces of cannon. He returned through Courland and the province of Semigalia, ſeized on Mittaw, Bouſchia, and ſeveral other places, and did not forget in ſo great a train of ſucceſs, to preſs SIGISMUND to an accommodation.

This is not ſurprizing. GUSTAVUS, having a very ſolid judgment, well knew that the proper time for a Prince to make peace is the time of his enemy's ill fortune; for if he cannot entirely ruin him, he does better to ſecure his conqueſts by a good treaty, while his enemy is weak and unfortunate, than hazzard them by continuing the war, the event of which repeated experience ſhews to be very uncertain. Thus we ſee that worſted Princes generally defer an accommodation with the victor as long as they can; which ſucceeds ſometimes well, ſometimes ill, there being no fixed and certain rule of human actions.

GUSTAVUS therefore judging that he had now a favourable time of making peace, ſent ſafe-guards to the Ambaſſadors of the King of Poland, by Meſſieurs HARWITS and HORN, and by SALVIUS, Great Sub-delegate of Chancellor OXENSTIERN in the conferences of peace. But for the very ſame reaſon that GUSTAVUS deſired the renewal of the conferences, SIGISMUND deſired nothing leſs, ſo that they were obliged to turn their thoughts to the war, and GUSTAVUS, no doubt, brave as he was, ſoon reſolved upon it.

The event convinced the King of Poland that his hopes that fortune would quit GUSTAVUS, were vain. The Lithuanian troops commanded by General SAPIEHA, and reinforced with ſeveral regiments of Coſſacks, Huſſars, Heyducks, and Germans, thought themſelves ſure of the victory, if they could engage the enemy in the open field. But the Swedes defeated them in a plain of the province of Semigalia, near Walonia, and taught them to know GUSTAVUS better. Upon this occaſion GUSTAVUS ſhewed them that he was none of thoſe warriors whoſe talent is confined to one only manner of fighting, and who being fit for taking towns, are not capable of winning a field battle, or who being able to ſucceed in places full of defiles and mountains, know not how to fight in a plain and open country.

On that day he performed all the duties of an able and courageous General, and gained ſo memorable a victory, that we may juſtly wonder why Hiſtorians have not more exactly preſerved the memory of it. But perhaps the laſt campaigns of GUSTAVUS have appeared to them ſo glorious, that they have ſaved all their abilities to ſpeak worthily of them, without much minding the reſt. Count TURN who commanded the right wing, and GUSTAVUS HORN, who commanded the left, acquired great praiſe in that battle.

This new victory made no change either in the diſpoſition of GUSTAVUS towards a peace, or the repugnancy of SIGISMUND to treat with a victorious enemy; ſo that the King of Sweden reſolved to try whether by diſtreſſing him more, he could not at laſt oblige Poland to terminate the differences between the two kingdoms. It is not ſurpriſing that GUSTAVUS ſo earneſtly deſired to put an end to that quarrel; for beſides the reaſon which I have already mentioned, he loved his ſubjects, and was tenderly loved by them, and as he knew that SIGISMUND and his deſcendants would on all occaſions proteſt againſt the excluſion which the States of Sweden had given them, and thus that Poland would never want a plauſible pretence for making war againſt the Swedes, he would have been glad to extirpate the ſeeds of thoſe troubles, and to give his country peace on that quarter, as well for the preſent, as for the time to come. For this end he deſired to ſettle the pretenſions of SIGISMUND, and to fix them in ſuch a manner by a deciſive treaty, that the ſucceſſion to the crown of Sweden might certainly be known, without being continually expoſed to the viciſſitudes of fortune, and to the chance of a war between the two rivals.

In order to reduce the King of Poland to the neceſſity of entering once for all into a treaty on his pretenſions, the King of Sweden thought fit to carry the war into Pruſſia. This is the name of a very conſiderable province, ſituated between Pomerania, the Baltic ſea, Poland, Lithuania, Livonia, and Courland. It was poſſeſſed for a long time by the knights of the Teutonic order, whoſe valour and power appear in Hiſtory with luſtre. But that power fell at laſt by the two moſt general cauſes of the overthrow of human grandeur, namely by vanity and corruption of manners. The pride of that order having carried them ſo far as to aim at aggrandizing themſelves at the expence of their neighbours, created them enemies, which ruined them; and the debauchery of the knights rendered them ſo odious both to GOD and man, that the Pruſſians were glad to get rid of ſuch maſters. Accordingly when JAGELLON, Great Duke of Lithuania, and afterwards King of Poland, whom they had dared to provoke, had chaſtiſed them in a terrible manner, though they did not amend for all that, the Pruſſians ſhook off their yoke, and ſubmitted to CASIMIR III, King of Poland.

Yet the order was not aboliſhed; for the Great Maſter LEWIS OF ERTICHAUSEN having gained a victory over CASIMIR, made an agreement with him in the year 1466, by which he yielded the weſtern Pruſſia to the crown of Poland, and held the eaſtern Pruſſia in loyalty and homage to the ſaid crown. After this manner the eaſtern Pruſſia became a fief of the crown of Poland, but becauſe the Great Maſter Albert of Brandenburg refuſed to pay the homage which he owed to King Sigismund, his uncle, the order was ſuppreſſed and converted into an hereditary duchy, dependent on the crown of Poland, with which Albert of Brandenburg was inveſted in the year 1525. This is now called Ducal Pruſſia, to diſtinguiſh it from Royal Pruſſia which belongs to Poland ſince the year 1466. The former belongs to the Electors of Brandenburg ſince the year 1611. But the Elector Frederic William *, full of life and of glory even to this day, has enjoyed the ſovereignty of it ever ſince the year 1657. I thought this little Hiſtorical digreſſion would not be diſagreeable to the reader.

From what I have juſt ſaid it appears, that when the King of Sweden went into Pruſſia, it belonged partly to Poland, and partly to the Elector of Brandenburg. Gustavus offered the latter a neutrality, and was glad that he accepted it; but for the greater precaution he demanded of him the port of Pillaw, as a pledge of his promiſe, and it was granted him. This port was very ſerviceable to Gustavus for exacting great contributions from the Dantzickers. Soon after he made himſelf maſter of Frawemberg and Braunſberg, from whence he expelled the Jeſuits, and ſent their library to the univerſity of Upſal; but it was not a compenſation to the Proteſtants for the library of the Elector Palatine, which had been ſent to Rome ſome years before; for there was no compariſon between theſe two libraries.

I know not whether the Jeſuits whom Gustavus had expelled from Riga in the year 1621, were ſorry to be treated in that manner by a Proteſtant Prince. As they are neither ſaid to be very humble, nor very diſintereſted, it is probable they were not much grieved to be uſed with that diſtinction, and to have ſo fine a pretence of glorying that it is to them chiefly the Heretics bear an ill will. It is certain they turn every thing to their own advantage, and ſo magnify their loſſes, repreſenting themſelves to the world as the ſole victims ſacrificed to the fury of ſectaries, that they get more wealth than they have loſt. But it is equally certain that Gustavus did not expel them through a ſpirit of perſecution; he expelled them, becauſe he had been informed that they meddled in too many affairs, and in a conquered town were obnoxious to a Prince whom they deemed an Heretic. They are therefore in the wrong to glory ſo much that the Proteſtants hate them more than the reſt of their communion. The moſt intelligent perſons of their church have been ſenſible that the true cauſe of the averſion which the Proteſtants bear them, is not a matter which they have reaſon to boaſt of. But let us return to Gustavus.

He was already one of thoſe warriors whoſe name alone ſtrikes the enemy with terror, and prevents ſtrong towns from preparing for a defence. Accordingly the report of his arrival having been ſpread throughout all Poliſh Pruſſia, in a very ſhort time Varmia, Ravenſburg, Elbing, Marienburg, Stum, Chriſtburg, Brodnitz, Wormitz, and the two iſles lying above Dantzic, between the branches of the Viſtula and the Nagpth, all fell into his hands. I am willing to believe that the abſence of Sigismund, and a ſecret jealouſy between his Generals, contributed to the ſucceſs of the King of Sweden. Notwithſtanding, it is certain that the principal glory of his ſucceſs is due to his diligence, his vigour, and the reputation he had acquired by his great exploits; his reputation going before him, aſtoniſhed his enemies, and prepared them to ſubmit: Beſides he had very good troops, and officers of conſummate experience, whom the example and glory of ſo great a King inſpired with a courage and ardour, capable of ſurmounting the greateſt difficulties.

The taking of Dantzic would have greatly augmented the glory of the King of Sweden. Nevertheleſs he did not attack that flouriſhing city, perceiving that he had neither troops, nor ſtrength enough to ſubdue it. He was contented not to have that town againſt him, and to threaten it from time to time, in order to draw the greateſt advantage from it, which he could, and to render it uſeleſs to the King of Poland. But the inhabitants proud of their riches, and full of themſelves, did not grant to Gustavus all he demanded. This obliged him to draw near them with his army, after he had paſſed the Viſtula and ſeized on Dirſchaw, which he put in a ſtate of defence. He ſignified to the Dantzickers that he expected that all their ſhips ſhould pay him a tribute; that they ſhould keep a perfect neutrality, furniſh him with proviſions for money, and ſend out of their harbour all Poliſh ſhips. They agreed to all theſe articles except the laſt; and not to irritate Gustavus by too blunt a refuſal of it, they ſent deputies to him ſeveral times, to lay before him their reaſons. By this means they carried their principal end, which was to amuſe Gustavus, and gain time, till the arrival of the King of Poland; for whom they deſigned to declare openly, as ſoon as they could do it, without putting themſelves too much in danger.

In effect, Sigismund arrived ſome time after in Pruſſia, with a conſiderable army. The loſs of ſo many towns and caſtles, and the impetuous courſe of Gustavus's victories had given him a cruel vexation, and raiſed in him an immoderate deſire of revenging himſelf. Having therefore brought together about twenty-thouſand men, he encamped at Graudentz; whereupon the Dantzickers eſpouſed his party ſo warmly, that

---

* Frederic William, Elector of Brandenburg, and firſt ſovereign Duke of Pruſſia, died on the twenty-ninth of April 1688. Therefore, as that Prince was living when Mr Bayle compoſed his Hiſtorical Diſcourſe on the Life of Guſtavus Adolphus, he muſt have written it before the year 1688.

they laid ſiege to Pautſke where GUSTAVUS had a garriſon, and made themſelves maſters of it; upon this likewiſe the Swedes treated them as enemies, and did them great miſchief.

After ſome attempts on Mariemburg, and the caſtle of Munden, which were very unfortunate to the Poles, SIGISMUND knowing that he ſhould loſe all his reputation, if he ſtayed longer in Pruſſia without doing any thing, decamped from Graudentz, and having paſſed the Viſtula, laid ſiege to Mew, in the ſmall province of Pomereillia. He knew GUSTAVUS too well to doubt of his coming to the relief of the beſieged. He therefore fortified himſelf upon an eminence, by which the Swedes muſt neceſſarily paſs in their way to Mew.

GUSTAVUS having drawn near that poſt, to attempt the relief of the place, was very much annoyed by the enemies cannon; but this only increaſed his deſire to force their intrenchments. Having therefore ſecured himſelf againſt the inſults of the Poles, he ordered the ground to be viewed, and underſtood that there was a ſmall by-path which led to the ſummit of the eminence. They were forced rather to climb than to walk, in order to reach it. Nevertheleſs, in a ſhort exhortation he made the ſoldiers, to ſhew them that there is nothing which courage and fidelity cannot compaſs, he ſo animated them, that they earneſtly deſired to march. Count TURN and General MUSTEN had the charge of this affair. They conducted it ſo wiſely that they gained the eminence, the ſoldiers having helped themſelves up by ſome branches of trees. They immediately killed the centinels and all they met, and were intrenching themſelves on the eminence, when they were warmly attacked by the Poliſh troops. The fight was maintained for two hours with great vigour, and the advantage was on the ſide of General MUSTEN, for he put the enemy to flight; notwithſtanding, when they returned to the charge, Count TURN retired, not to fly, but to gain a more favourable place. He was purſued, the fight began afreſh, and the Swedes boaſt of having ſlain a great number of the enemy. Was it otherwiſe, they cannot be denied the glory of having relieved the place, ſince SIGISMUND raiſed the ſiege of Mew.

Soon after he ſeemed to be diſpoſed towards an accommodation. They agreed on a place where the deputies of the two crowns ſhould confer on that important affair; but their conference came to nothing. The deputies having come out of their tents, obſerved one another for a long time; without opening their lips, or ſo much as ſaluting one another. Each of them was afraid leſt he ſhould not ſupport the honour of his maſter with a becoming gravity. Thus they were to take great care not to advance faſter than the deputies of the other party, and not begin to pay civilities. At laſt after ſeveral grave ſteps, ſeveral majeſtic looks, and a long ſilence, SCHEMUKI, one of the Poliſh Ambaſſadors, being probably tired of a countenance ſo forced, and ſo uſeleſs to the deſign which had brought them thither, opened the conference, and demanded for his maſter conditions which were abſolutely rejected. They prepared therefore for war. KONIECKSPOLSKI, a famous Poliſh General, formed an enterprize on Dirſchaw, but GUSTAVUS having thrown men and proviſions into that place, obliged him to retire with loſs. The other attempts which the King of Poland made on Mew and Mariemburg were not more ſucceſsful. Thus the campaign was very favourable to the Swedes.

To compleat his happineſs, GUSTAVUS became a father near the end of this ſame year 1626; it was indeed only of a daughter: but as the States of Sweden had already declared the daughters of the poſterity of CHARLES IX capable of ſucceeding to the crown, and as they renewed the ſame decree at this time, GUSTAVUS had no longer the grief not to ſee an heir to his kingdom. In effect, this daughter of whom the Queen of Sweden was delivered on the eighth of December 1626 ſucceeded him, and has at leaſt been as much known as GUSTAVUS, under the famous name of CHRISTINA.

What obliged the States to declare CHRISTINA heireſs of the kingdom ſoon after her birth, was that they obſerved SIGISMUND to be more proud and more inflexible, under pretence that there was no Prince in Sweden who could ſucceed GUSTAVUS. Therefore, in order to humble that pride, they thought fit to ſhew him that they had a ſucceſſor at hand, in the perſon of an infant newly born.

This was not the only reſolution which the States took at that time, in order to humble the pride of SIGISMUND; they came to ſeveral others which ought to mortify him ſtill more: for GUSTAVUS having laid before them the conditions of peace, which he had propoſed to the King of Poland, they reſolved that no better conditions ought to be offered to him, and that if he did not accept theſe, the war ought to be continued with greater vigour than ever. And the better to ſucceed in it, they promiſed the King not only the neceſſary ſupplies of money, but alſo their perſonal ſervices and their lives. In this we muſt admire the conduct and good fortune of GUSTAVUS: for whereas in ſeveral kingdoms, the aſſemblies of the States are only theatres of diſputes, where nothing is ever concluded but after a thouſand complaints, and a thouſand reproaches, the States of Sweden, meeting almoſt annually in the reign of GUSTAVUS, perfectly agreed to furniſh him with whatever he deſired, and even prevented his deſires. This is very remarkable; but it will appear more ſo, when we conſider that it was neceſſary to obtain the conſent of the deputies to the continuation, and even very often to the augmentation of the ſtate of the war, and that their buſineſs was almoſt always to provide for new levies of ſoldiers, and new equipments of fleets. This good fortune muſt be attributed, 1. To the addreſs of GUSTAVUS, who perſuaded his ſubjects that he deſired nothing ſo much as an end of the war, and that all the pains he took, and all the dangers to which he expoſed himſelf, were only directed to that end, but that he had to do with an enemy who aimed at nothing leſs than invading the whole kingdom, and extirpating the Proteſtant religion out of it: 2. To the glory he had acquired; for tho' the conqueſts of a King are generally very uſeleſs to his ſubjects, and though it is indifferent to them whether their ſovereign contents himſelf with the dominions of his anceſtors, or extends them, yet they are taken with I know not what admiration mixed with love of their Prince, when he renders himſelf famous over the whole world. The Te Deums which they frequently hear, and the bonfires they make for the taking of towns, or gaining of battles, diſpoſe them more chearfully to contribute to the charges of the war. And as it has been very well obſerved, that though valour is not the virtue of women, yet they prefer ſoldiers to all other men, ſo it may be ſaid, that though the conqueſts of a monarch are not the affair of his people, yet they ruin themſelves with more ſatisfaction for the ſake of a warlike Prince, than for the ſake of any other.

for

GUSTAVUS, before he took the field, did two things which ſhew his humanity, and the care he took of his ſubjects. He publiſhed an edict in favour of thoſe who were forced to leave their country on account of their religion. He offered them a ſure retreat in his own dominions, and promiſed them a general exemption from all public duties. As theſe unhappy people were very numerous, by reaſon of the furious and tyrannical zeal with which the Emperor was wretchedly poſſeſſed, ſeveral of them took the benefit of GUSTAVUS's generoſity; and this rendered his kingdom ſtill more flouriſhing.

Beſides, he deſired the States carefully to examine the propoſal which had been laid before him, for eſtabliſhing a company to trade to the Weſt-Indies. That company was eſtabliſhed; but the ſucceſs did not anſwer the hopes which had been conceived of it. In this, however, we muſt praiſe the virtue of that great Prince, who was moved to make this new eſtabliſhment, only by the facility which he hoped from it of inſtructing the Infidels, and promoting the benefit of the whole kingdom.

In the ſpring of the following year GUSTAVUS returned to Pruſſia, being reſolved to conquer the haughtineſs of the Dantzickers. For this purpoſe he paſſed into one of the iſles of the Viſtula, where they had ſeveral forts, and attacked the principal one. He would certainly have taken it, had not a muſket-ſhot which he received in his belly, forced him to abandon that enterpriſe. This diſgrace was largely recompenſed by the advantage which the Swedes gained at Keſmarck, a fort where the Poles had a garriſon. They were diſlodged from it, and immediately after a detachment of the Poliſh army, which came to relieve the garriſon, was defeated.

Some time after there was a ſharp engagement between the two armies at Dirſchaw, where the Swedes were encamped. The Poliſh infantry having attacked them, were ſo warmly received by GUSTAVUS's cavalry, that they would have been cut to pieces, had not the cavalry of the King of Poland come to their aſſiſtance. The Poles being ſuperior in number could not be repulſed but with difficulty; yet they were repulſed, and had not GUSTAVUS been dangerouſly wounded with a fauconet-ſhot, while he was viewing from an eminence the King of Poland's camp, it is very probable that the Swedes would either have cut the Poles to pieces, or put them to flight.

On this occaſion the principal officers of the army, having Chancellor OXENSTIERN at their head, made a moſt humble remonſtrance to the King, intreating his majeſty to have more care of his perſon than he had hitherto had. They repreſented to him that his life was abſolutely neceſſary for the good of the whole kingdom, and therefore that he ought to preſerve it with the ſame care as he did the welfare of his ſubjects, for whom he had ſo great a tenderneſs. GUSTAVUS anſwered that he was ſenſible of this mark of their affection; but told them at the ſame time that he did not believe himſelf to be ſo neceſſary to his kingdom as they repreſented, and was perſuaded that after his death, the providence of God would diſplay itſelf for Sweden in the ſame manner as it had hitherto done, 'God hath committed this charge to me, continued he, neither fear 'nor ſloth muſt make me neglect it; and what can happen more glorious to me than 'to loſe my life in fighting for the glory of God, and the good of my ſubjects?' The event has but too well ſhewn that the remonſtrance made leſs impreſſion than the anſwer.

His courage ſupported him during the greateſt pain in ſuch a manner, that he then preſerved all his preſence of mind, and even his gaiety; for his Phyſician not contented to conſider the wound, but having likewiſe exhorted him to take more care of himſelf for the future, GUSTAVUS ſmiling exhorted him in his turn not to meddle in another man's profeſſion, which he expreſſed in the Latin proverb ne ſutor ultra crepidam. Another time his Surgeon not being able to take the muſket-balls out of a wound which they had made, let them continue there, ſaid he, as an illuſtrious monument of a life which has not been ſpent in ſloth and idleneſs, alluding, no doubt, to a ſaying of ALEXANDER the Great.

As Gustavus was the ſoul of his army, we are not to imagine that it did any thing conſiderable, while he could not act by reaſon of his wounds. The Swedes were content to obſerve the Poles, who likewiſe did nothing remarkable during the reſt of that campaign, though the Emperor had ſent them ſome auxiliary troops commanded by the Duke of Holſtein. A peace was propoſed, and there was room to hope that it would be accepted by both parties, when the Spaniſh Ambaſſador came to break all their meaſures. He had his own ends; the houſe of Auſtria began to fear Gustavus, and it was their intereſt to neglect nothing to keep him at variance with Poland. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador, guided by this principle, flattered Sigismund with a thouſand vain hopes. He promiſed him a fleet of twenty-four men of war, ten thouſand ſoldiers, and two hundred thouſand crowns in money, which, in his opinion, would render him maſter of Sweden. Sigismund was credulous enough to give into the ſnare, and reckoned that the following campaign would make him King of Sweden. He therefore would not hearken to any peace, and by this means Gustavus had another expedition to make into Pruſſia in the year 1628.

It was always his maxim to make war in the enemy's country. He therefore made haſte this year to return into Pruſſia, knowing that the Poles deſigned to carry the war into his own dominions. His thoughts were chiefly bent upon humbling the proud city of Dantzic, from whence Sigismund drew his beſt ſupplies for the war which had for ſome time continued in royal Pruſſia. With this view, before he embarked, he publiſhed an edict, wherein he declared that he would confiſcate all ſhips belonging to Dantzic, which carried contraband goods, and that, with regard to merchandiſes of another ſort, he would not ſuffer any to be brought into that city, without paying a certain duty to the ſhips which he ſhould keep at the entry of the Viſtula; this ſhews that he did not prepare to take the city, but only to humble it. Gustavus's firſt approaches were ſucceſsful; for his fleet meeting with ſeven Dantzic ſhips between the town and the mouth of the river, took three or four of them, and ſunk one. What followed did not anſwer this happy beginning, for a very ſmall number of Poliſh ſhips beat forty Swediſh. The aſſaults made on ſome forts of Dantzic were ſo vigorouſly repulſed, that the Swedes loſt a great many men, whereas the Poles recovered Potſke and Mew, without any loſs. Theſe diſgraces were ſomewhat leſſened by the ſurpriſing of one of the iſles of the Viſtula, where the Swedes got twenty braſs guns.

The Poles perceiving their advantages were not yet deciſive, endeavoured to bring on a pitched battle. For this purpoſe they encamped pretty near the Swedes, and had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with them. Gustavus, who could not bear to be inſulted by the enemy, eſpecially when he was able to make head againſt them, finding he had twenty-four thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and three thouſand archers, drew up his army in battalia, to ſhew the Poles that he was as willing as they to come to a general engagement. They engaged and fought vigorouſly; but while Gustavus was bearing the efforts of the Poliſh army, and amuſing them with a part of his troops, he ſent the beſt of his horſe and foot, by a ſide-way, to attack the enemy in the rear; and by this march, well concerted and well executed, he put the Poles in diſorder, ſlew three thouſand of them, wounded Konieckpolski, the beſt of their Generals, took four of their field-pieces, fourteen colours, and returned victorious to his camp, with ſo much the more glory, as the loſs of ſeveral of his men ſhewed that the advantage had been obſtinately diſputed.

The city of Dantzic now began to be apprehenſive, becauſe after the battle it was more ſtraitened both from ſea and land. In effect, Gustavus was chiefly intent upon Dantzic, after he had gained that advantage over the Poliſh army. He ordered eight great men of war continually to cruize upon the coaſt, that nothing might enter into the town while he drew as near it as poſſible with his army. The inhabitants who deſired above all things to have the ſea open, and who were beſides very good ſeamen, were chiefly bent upon attacking theſe eight ſhips. They attacked them with ten of theirs, and after an engagement of three hours, put four of them to flight, made themſelves maſters of the admiral-ſhip, and would have alſo taken the vice-admiral, had not he who commanded it, blown it up, to deprive the enemy of the pleaſure and advantage of that capture. The Swedes loſt four hundred men, and the commander of their fleet. It is eaſy to imagine with what vexation and reſentment Gustavus was tranſported, when he ſaw that Merchants (for thus monarchs treat thoſe Republics which apply to commerce) triumphed over his ſhips, and led his Admiral into their harbour, to the view of all the citizens, and as a monument of their victory. But how could all this be helped? The beſt courſe that could be taken was unqueſtionably to ſend other ſhips in their room, inſtead of repining to no purpoſe; and this is what Gustavus did.

He ſent twelve ſhips to the mouth of the Viſtula to block up the town again on that ſide; by this means commerce began to be eſtabliſhed at Konigsberg, a town in Ducal Pruſſia, and to diminiſh in proportion at Dantzic. Theſe twelve ſhips not content to cruize, attacked the enemy's fleet upon the Viſtula, and after an engagement which laſted a whole day, they made themſelves maſters of one of the largeſt ſhips of Dantzic, Dantzic, called the Dutch houſe. Yet they did not carry her off, becauſe a lighted match falling by chance into the powder-magazine, blew up the ſhip; but thereby they gained more than they loſt, for the conſternation which ſeized the enemy at the diſmal ſight of it, obliged them to fly, and their admiral-ſhip foundred on a ſand-bank, where ſhe was entirely deſtroyed by the Swediſh cannon.

In the mean time the King had occupied ſeveral poſts around the city, had, with great labour, paſſed a moraſs about three German leagues long, and built three bridges of boats to bring over his army into a foreſt, from whence he preſſed the city more cloſely; and then at laſt the inhabitants were no longer ſo proud. The magiſtrates were afraid of a ſedition among the populace, becauſe the ſtop put to commerce, and the blockade of the town, had made want ſucceed that plenty and affluence to which the Dantzickers were accuſtomed, and for this reaſon they preſſed the King of Poland to make peace with Sweden. SIGISMUND had all the motives in the world to a peace, but what might chiefly induce him to it was, that the promiſes of the Spaniſh Ambaſſador proved vain and fruitleſs; for ſo far were twenty-four men of war from coming to his aſſiſtance, that on the contrary he was obliged to ſend nine of thoſe which lay before Dantzic to WALSTEIN, who then commanded for the Emperor in the provinces near the Baltic. This was doubly prejudicial to Dantzic, 1. As it weakened the naval forces of that city: 2. As it irritated againſt them the King of Denmark; for WALSTEIN employed theſe nine ſhips to maintain the unjuſt dominion which he had uſurped in the Baltic, and to diſturb the two northern kingdoms.

CHRISTIAN IV revenged himſelf by permitting his ſubjects to ſeize all ſhips belonging to Dantzic, and all ſhips trading to that place. Notwithſtanding all this, the famous city of Dantzic was preſerved.

The rains came to its relief; the Viſtula overflowed with ſo great force, that it broke all the bridges; whereby the ſeveral quarters of the Swediſh army were deprived of communication and proviſions. The waters having ſubſided, the Swedes were obliged to leave that place, and comfort themſelves in their retreat as well as they could, by taking, with an immenſe booty, Newemburg on the Viſtula, and Straſberg on the frontiers of the kingdom.

Newemburg was re-taken ſome time after, and the covetouſneſs of the ſoldiers was the occaſion of it. As they found a great deal of booty in thoſe parts, they diſperſed and did not keep a good guard, ſo that the Poles falling upon them in a village, ſlew many of them. They who eſcaped retired into the city, and promiſed to ſurrender it, if the Poles would ſave their lives. The Poles promiſed they would, and afterwards put them to the ſword. Then GUSTAVUS, ſo much the more irritated againſt the Poles, as they had broken the law of nations, made incurſions even to the gates of of Warſaw, and overthrew whatever oppoſed him. Among the priſoners who had been made in theſe incurſions, there were ſeveral women and maids. GUSTAVUS ſtrictly ordered that they ſhould be treated with all manner of civilities, and his orders had ſo great an effect that no injury was done to their honour; this rarely happens to female priſoners of war.

GUSTAVUS had alſo twice the advantage of the enemy before he returned to Stockholm; for General WRANGEL, Governor of Elbing, being informed that the Poles were marching towards Brodnitz, in order to beſiege it, paſſed the Dwina, at a ford which was ill defended, and ſuddenly falling upon them, defeated them, and ſeized their cannon and baggage. Beſides, WRANGEL having been ordered to ſcour the country with eight thouſand men, in order to bring proviſions to the Swediſh camp, which was greatly in want of them, met, near Straſberg, a conſiderable body of Huſſars and Coſſacks, whom he was obliged to fight. He would not, perhaps, have ſucceeded, if they had agreed among themſelves; but perceiving ſome miſintelligence among them, he ſo dextrouſly improved the opportunity, not giving them time to put themſelves in order, that he took and killed a great number of them; and what was ſtill more neceſſary, he carried off a convoy of two thouſand chariots laden with proviſions. By this means plenty was reſtored to the Swediſh camp which had ſuffered very much for want of proviſions during the greateſt part of the campaign.

At this time the town of Stralſund, threatned by WALSTEIN, implored the aſſiſtance of the King of Sweden, who ſent it powder and a ſuccour of five hundred men. This action greatly provoked the Imperialiſts, and made them hold a conduct which put them at variance with GUSTAVUS. This proved a great and irreparable prejudice to the court of Vienna, as we ſhall ſee in its place.

It looks as if the houſe of Auſtria had ſome foreſight of what they were to ſuffer by GUSTAVUS, ſo much did they labour to keep him engaged in the war with Poland. We have already ſeen how the Spaniſh Ambaſſador made magnificent promiſes, in order to put off the concluſion of a peace between the Kings of Sweden and Poland. Spain had no intention to furniſh the King of Poland either with twenty-four men of war, or ten thouſand ſoldiers, or two hundred thouſand crowns in money, in order to diſpoſſeſs GUSTAVUS of his dominions. Nevertheleſs, Spain gave hopes of all this, becauſe it was of great importance to that kingdom that Poland and Sweden ſhould continue at war, and becauſe the Spaniards knew that they could more eaſily find excuſes for their want of ſincerity, than repair the miſchiefs they apprehended from Sweden. Therefore they did not ſcruple to make their Ambaſſador act according to the definition which has been given of perſons of his character, ‘ that they are men ſent abroad to ‘ lye for the good of the State.’

Spain had played its part in the year 1627: the court of Vienna played theirs in the following years, by ſending troops to Sigismund, in order to make him obſtinate in refuſing any accommodation. General Arnheim commanded theſe auxiliary troops, in the year 1629; they conſiſted of five thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; and he had the misfortune to paſs for the cauſe of all the ill ſucceſs of Sigismund; whether he really did not act as he ought to have done for the advantage of Sigismund, or whether the latter ſeeking on whom to diſcharge his vexation (for there muſt always be ſomebody who may bear the blame) found no perſon more proper than the General of the Imperial troops. However, the campaign of this year 1629 was not ſo unſucceſsful to Sigismund, but that Gustavus ſhared with him in the caprices of fortune. For if on one ſide Herman Wrangel, Field-Marſhal, defeated Stanislaus Poloski, Caſtellan of Caminieck; the Swedes on the other ſide were forced to raiſe the ſiege of Thorn, and ſome time after there happened an engagement wherein Gustavus was made priſoner, but without being known, and in that manner he came back to his army. I am going to tell, in a few words, how the Poliſh authors relate this adventure.

They ſay that the great General Konieckpolski having attacked the Swediſh army, commanded by Gustavus in perſon, put them to flight, that Gustavus having rallied, returned to the charge, and fell into the hands of a trooper who ſeized him by the belt; that he eſcaped from this trooper by leaving with him his belt and hat, and that immediately after he was taken by another, who was going to kill him, when a German, who knew him, cried out that he was a ſervant of the Rheingrave, that upon this the trooper left him, and the German having given him a horſe, Gustavus rode all that night to Marienburg.

The Swedes ſay, that the army of the King of Poland, being re-inforced with Imperial troops, marched up to Gustavus, who prepared to receive them with his uſual intrepidity, and ordered the Rheingrave, who was nearer the enemy with a detachment of the army, not to engage; that notwithſtanding, the Rheingrave imagining he had a fair opportunity, attacked the Imperialiſts, but was forced to retire in diſorder, and with loſs; that Gustavus joined him, and obliged the Imperialiſts to retire; that after this the latter made as if they deſigned to march to the great iſle of the Viſtula, near Dantzic, that there was a ſharp engagement to hinder them, and that Gustavus, having mixed with them, was taken priſoner by a Polander, who knowing him in general to belong to the contrary party, commanded him to follow him; that Gustavus making a difficulty to obey, was upon the point of being killed, when a captain of the horſe, called Henry Soop, came up and brought the King off from this danger by killing the Polander, and that this captain was afterwards created Knight of the Order in the aſſembly of the States. What may be gathered as certain from theſe two different accounts, is, that the King of Sweden, tranſported by the heat of his courage, mixed among the enemy too far, and too ill accompanied. He was a great General, and weighed things with the greateſt ſedateneſs, but he ſometimes forgot himſelf in the action, and was not always maſter of his temper, heated with the paſſion of overcoming an enemy, who vigorouſly contended with him for victory.

The Swediſh Hiſtorians add, that from that day till the truce, there were ſeveral engagements, wherein Sigismund’s army was always worſted, and in ſome places with an irreparable loſs. But the Poliſh Hiſtorians ſay, on the contrary, that Sigismund being informed of the great advantage gained by General Konieckpolski over the Swediſh army, on the day when Gustavus ſo fortunately eſcaped, came immediately to his army, to improve that advantage, but that General Arnheim, who would not conſent to the ſiege of Marienburg, was the occaſion that all the fruit of ſo important a victory was loſt; that the King complained to Walstein of the perfidy of this General, and that Walstein recalled him, and ſubſtituted in his place, Adolphus, Duke of Holſtein, who did little ſervice, becauſe he was but little reſpected by the Germans who had ſerved under General Arnheim. Finally, that the laſt warlike exploit was performed by the Coſſacks in the iſle of Marienburg, where they defeated and killed the young Wrangel. According to this account, the Poles in that campaign ſuffered only by not improving their victory.

It would be a very difficult labour, and of a very doubtful ſucceſs, to enquire whether the Poles or the Swedes are moſt to be credited in their narratives. Let us be content to know that it is at leaſt unqueſtionable that Sigismund conſented to a truce for ſix years, tho’ the Emperor and the King of Spain diſſuaded him from it, as much as they could, and offered him great ſuccours, if he continued the war. It is equally unqueſtionable that Sigismund was a warlike Prince, and ſo paſſionately deſired to recover the kingdom of Sweden, of which he pretended that Gustavus was not the lawful poſſeſſor, that he conſented to the truce with the greateſt reluctancy. In fine, it is unqueſtionable that the truce was concluded on conditions glorious for Sweden; for it was agreed agreed that the port of Memel in Pruſſia, Elbing, Brunſberg, Pillaw, and all the places which the King of Sweden held in Livonia, ſhould remain in his poſſeſſion, that Marienburg ſhould be depoſited in the hands of the Elector of Brandenburg, and that if a peace was not concluded, Marienburg and Dirſau, which were reſtored to Poland, ſhould return to Sweden.

The Poliſh Hiſtorians, after this, may falſify and obſcure, as much as they pleaſe, the detail of this war; they will never be able to obſcure this truth, that the glory and advantage of it remained to Gustavus, and that he was at leaſt victor bello, - - - victorious in the war, if he was not moſt frequently victor pugna, - - - victorious in the battle. The truce could hardly fail to be concluded at that time; for both parties were greatly ſollicited to it by the Ambaſſadors of France, England, and Brandenburg.

The Elector of Brandenburg had been very much embarraſſed during the courſe of this war: at firſt he ſecretly favoured Gustavus, afterwards finding Gustavus had conquered the beſt part of Pruſſia, he knew not which of his neighbours ought to have his good wiſhes, nor whether it was more his intereſt that the Swedes ſhould poſſeſs that province, or be driven out of it by Sigismund, and then his thoughts were ſo confuſed that even Gustavus doubted whether he ought to truſt him or not, and therefore told him that he gave him ſix months to reſolve upon taking one ſide, or the other. He treated ſecretly with Gustavus; but becauſe Sigismund, whoſe vaſſal he was with reſpect to Ducal Pruſſia, which was at that time a fief depending on the crown of Poland, threatened to diveſt him of it, if he did not openly embrace his party, he broke with Sweden, and ſent ſuccours to the King of Poland. To extricate himſelf from ſuch troubleſome circumſtances, it was his intereſt more than that of any other Potentate, that theſe two Princes ſhould come to an accommodation.

In the next place, the Republic of Poland was ſo weary of a war, undertaken by Sigismund only to revenge his private quarrels, and to recover a kingdom which he had loſt by too blindly following the maxims and counſels of the Jeſuits, this Republic, I ſay, was ſo weary of a war which did not concern it, and had only ſtraitened the antient boundaries of Poland, without any appearance of repairing that loſs, far from conquering a new kingdom, that their diſcontentment in this affair was now generally known. The Dantzickers in particular were ſo weary of a war which weakened their commerce, and by conſequence deprived them of their greateſt advantage, that they extremely preſſed the King of Poland to accommodate with Sweden.

In fine, we muſt not doubt but that Gustavus, however inſatiable of war he may be thought, deſired to make an accommodation with Poland, either by a peace, or a ceſſation of arms. For by that accommodation he did not loſe the hopes of gratifying his warlike inclinations. The diſorders in Germany, his own particular intereſt to leſſen the power of the Emperor, who had made himſelf formidable in the Baltic, the ſollicitations of ſeveral States, which wiſhed that the houſe of Auſtria were confined within its juſt bounds, and the deſigns of that houſe towards an univerſal monarchy, all this opened to Gustavus the largeſt field for military valour, and he only wanted to be free on the ſide of Poland, to engage in the boldeſt and moſt glorious deſign that has appeared theſe many years. The houſe of Auſtria was not ignorant of it, and for this reaſon had greatly laboured to foment the war between him and Sigismund. But the efforts of that houſe were in vain. Gustavus concluded a treaty with the King of Poland, in the year 1629, for a longer time than either of them was to live. Let us now ſee how he employed the years which followed that truce; and becauſe the better to comprehend the reaſons of his conduct, it is fit to know the ſtate of Germany at that time, let us here give a ſhort and faithful account of the enterprizes of the houſe of Auſtria on the liberty of Europe in general, and that of the Proteſtant religion in particular.

AN

Hiſtorical Diſcourſe

On the LIFE of

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS,

KING OF SWEDEN.

CHAP. II.

Of the ſituation of affairs in Germany, when GUSTAVUS entered it.

THE houſe of Auſtria owes the beginning of its glory and power to RUDOLPH, Count of Hapſburg, elected Emperor in the year 1273. The merit of RUDOLPH was ſo generally acknowledged, that the Electors of the empire, by giving him their ſuffrages, put a ſtop to all the factions and cabals which had for a long time created diviſions in Germany, and they united all parties in the approbation of their choice. He worthily maintained the dignity they had conferred on him, and ſtrenuouſly laboured to ſupport the honour of the empire, but without forgetting the particular intereſts of his own houſe. In effect, if he would not ſuffer OTTOCARUS, King of Bohemia, to ſeize on Auſtria, in prejudice of the rights of the empire, his only view in this was to beſtow that country on his own ſon.

Auſtria had been erected into a Markgraviate by the Emperor Otho I, in favour of LEOPOLD, his brother-in-law, who had worthily diſcharged the commiſſion he had received from the Emperor HENRY I, to guard that frontier againſt the incurſions of the Hungarians. It was afterwards erected into a duchy by FREDERIC BARBAROSSA, in favour of one of LEOPOLD's deſcendants; and, in fine, the laſt male of that family, Anno 1260. named FREDERIC, having periſhed in the unfortunate expedition of CONRADINE againſt CHARLES OF ANJOU, in the tragical manner which every one knows, OTTOCARUS ſeized it by virtue of his wife's pretenſions, ſhe being the heireſs of FREDERIC. RUDOLPH being arrived at the Imperial dignity, declared that OTTOCARUS had ſeized on a country, which did not belong to him, ſince it was a fief appropriated to the male heirs. But his reaſons not being perſuaſive enough, he enforced them with good troops, cut off OTTOCARUS in a battle he gained over him near Vienna, in the year 1278, and inveſted his ſon ALBERT with the duchies of Auſtria and Stiria, and the lordſhips of Carniola and Windiſmarc. Since that time the name of Hapſburg appears no longer. RUDOLPH's poſterity only took the name of Auſtria, and have rendered it very famous. They erected that fief into an archduchy, and endowed it with ſeveral ample privileges.

This houſe has furniſhed Germany with fourteen Emperors, all in an uninterrupted ſucceſſion, excepting the three firſt; and Spain with ſix Kings, if we reckon in that number PHILIP, the father of the Emperor CHARLES V. Though RUDOLPH left ſons capable of ſucceeding him, yet the Electors did not chooſe an Emperor out of his family, but out of the illuſtrious houſe of Naſſaw, which to this day is one of the moſt glorious and flouriſhing in Europe. We may eaſily imagine that ALBERT OF AUSTRIA, the ſon of the Emperor RUDOLPH, was diſpleaſed at this election, and improved every conjuncture which might ruin his rival. He had powerful friends. He raiſed a formidable faction, laboured to get him depoſed, and himſelf elected in his room; in a word, he overcame the Emperor ADOLPHUS OF NASSAW in the battle Anno 1298. of Haſenfuet near Spire. Having perceived him at the head of a ſquadron in the hotteſt part of the engagement, he ſingled him out, and killed him, and by this means ſecured to himſelf the Imperial crown. ALBERT was killed ten years after by his own nephew, leaving ſeveral children by his marriage with ELIZABETH OF CARINTHIA. This marriage united Carinthia and Tirol to the patrimony of the houſe of Auſtria, and was, as it were, the prelude to the aggrandiſement of that houſe.

FREDERIC, ALBERT's eldeſt ſon, was undoubtedly very much affected with the barbarous action of his couſin; but perhaps was ſtill more diſpleaſed that HENRY VII, of the houſe of Luxemburg was then raiſed to the Imperial throne. He comforted himſelf as well as he could, with the hopes of a favourable opportunity, which he thought he had found after the death of HENRY. For ſome of the electors choſe him 1314. Emperor. It was indeed the leaſt part of them, and conſequently his election was not regular. But he found too great an advantage in believing it valid, not to maintain that it was ſo; he knew beſides, that, provided a Prince overcomes his rival, he will not want the means to rectify the irregularity of his election: accordingly FREDERIC uſed all his endeavours to ruin LEWIS OF BAVARIA, who had been elected by the greateſt number of ſuffrages, and whoſe election was conſequently more regular. As theſe two competitors were very brave, and ſupported by many friends, their diſpute kindled a war in Germany, which laſted eight years. Whatever makes a war conſiderable, happened in this, ſeveral encounters, ſeveral towns either beſieged or taken, two battles, in the laſt of which fortune openly declared againſt FREDERIC, by making him fall into the hands of his competitor, who did not ſet him at liberty till after three years impriſonment, and after he had made him ſwear to content himſelf with the empty title of King of the Romans, without ever pretending to the empire. He kept his promiſe; though, by reaſon of the great diſputes between LEWIS OF BAVARIA, and the Pope, he was tempted to believe, that a man is not held by the promiſe which he makes in priſon; and though the Pope himſelf ſtrongly ſollicited him to come either to Avignon, or to Rome, and aſſume the Imperial dignity. After his death, which happened in the year 1330, there paſſed a century before the poſterity of RUDOLPH of Hapſburg came again to the Imperial crown: but in the year 1438, this houſe, which has been ſo greatly beholden to marriages, again recovered that crown by virtue of a marriage, and got ſo ſure a hold of it, that they have wore it ever ſince.

The houſe of Luxemburg which had loſt the empire by the death of HENRY VII, 1346. recovered it thirty three years after, by the election of CHARLES IV, grandſon of HENRY, which was made even during the life of the Emperor LEWIS OF BAVARIA, and at the inſtigation of the Pope, his mortal enemy; but CHARLES was hardly acknowledged till after the death of LEWIS; moſt of the Princes, and all the cities of the empire having judged that the thunderbolts of the court of Rome did not hinder LEWIS OF BAVARIA from being their lawful ſovereign.

WENCESLAUS and SIGISMUND, both ſons of CHARLES IV, ſwayed the Imperial ſcepter after him, the former immediately after his father, who died in the year 1378; and the latter after the death of RUPERT Count Palatine, who having ſucceed WENCESLAUS depoſed by the electors of the Empire in the year 1400, died in 1411. SIGISMUND left an only daughter; who was married to ALBERT Duke of Auſtria, and brought him the Imperial crown, with the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary in the year 1438; for in all elective kingdoms he who marries the heireſs of the late King, is uſually preferred to all others. The reign of ALBERT was very ſhort; but in recompence FREDERIC OF AUSTRIA, his couſin, who ſucceeded him, filled the Imperial throne fifty-three years. He had the good fortune and addreſs to marry his ſon MAXIMILIAN with the richeſt heireſs in Europe, MARY OF BURGUNDY, only daughter of CHARLES THE BOLD, whoſe ambition and warlike temper are ſo well known. This marriage ſo conſiderably increaſed the power of the houſe of Auſtria, that perhaps it might have been wiſhed for the tranquillity of Chriſtendom that their power had not become greater. It might have been enough for one houſe to have annexed to it's antient partimony, and to the Imperial dignity, the provinces of the Low-Countries, ſo rich, ſo flouriſhing, and conveniently ſituated: nevertheleſs, the providence of GOD has been pleaſed to ſuffer the great power of ſome, and the jealouſy and diffidence of others to be a continual ſource of war; from whence we may conclude that the benefit of mankind requires that no Prince ſhould become too powerful.

However

However that may be, Maximilian having been elected Emperor in the year 1493, after the death of his father, married his ſon with Joan of Arragon, daughter of Ferdinand of Arragon, and Isabella of Castile, and by this means added to his houſe the great and vaſt eſtates which Ferdinand poſſeſſed, both in the new and the old world. The marriage of Ferdinand with Isabella of Castile brought him great advantages, both becauſe ſhe was heireſs of ſeveral great kingdoms, and becauſe ſhe was capable to ſecond her huſband in his great deſigns. To the kingdom of his fathers, and to thoſe of his wife, he added Granada, and Navarre, Naples, and Sicily, and all the countries diſcovered in the new world.

One could hardly have imagined that this great ſucceſſion concerned the houſe of Auſtria; for beſides that Ferdinand had a ſon, whom he took great care to marry betimes with the daughter of Maximilian, he had only beſtowed on Philip, ſon of the ſame Maximilian, the ſecond of his four daughters: yet notwithſtanding all this, ſhe became the heireſs of Ferdinand. The Prince, her brother, dying without iſſue, the Infanta Isabella, her eldeſt ſiſter, the wife of Dom Emanuel, King of Portugal, left only one ſon, who died in his infancy. Thus the Princeſs Joan inherited all this great ſucceſſion, and transferred it to her eldeſt ſon, who under the name of Charles V has been ſo famous in Europe. Anno

Charles, born at Ghent on St Matthias's day, which fell that year on the twenty-fifth of February, had loſt his father, when the death of his grandfather by the mother's ſide opened to him the ſucceſſion of all his kingdoms. His mother indeed was ſtill living, but the diſtraction of her mind not allowing her to reign, ſhe was obliged to reſign her authority; and thus Charles reigned alone ſome time after the death of King Ferdinand. Beſides the poſſeſſion of ſo many kingdoms, he had ſoon a new acceſſion of power. The Emperor Maximilian, his grandfather, dying on the twenty-ſecond of January 1519, he came to the Imperial crown ſix months after. For this he was partly beholden to his German extraction, and the ſeeming mediocrity of his genius. Otherwiſe, it is not to be doubted but that Francis I, King of France, would have been preferred to him; but the Germans were afraid of the temper, capacity, and courage of the latter, which had appeared on ſeveral occaſions. I need not ſay that Charles now became the moſt powerful Prince in Europe; that is obvious; but after what I have hinted of the ſeeming mediocrity of his genius, I muſt add either that the Germans knew him very ill, when they believed that he was not a great man, or that his genius opened by degrees, and was formed by experience in affairs. This Prince was certainly endowed with great qualities, and to his great courage was joined much judgment, and much of that capacity which is neceſſary for the ſovereign of a vaſt empire. 1500. 1516.

As miracles rarely happen, and it muſt have been a miracle if Charles V, endowed with ſuch qualities, and poſſeſſed of ſuch great power, had not aſpired after new kingdoms, ſeveral people believed that he introduced into the houſe of Auſtria the deſign of an univerſal monarchy, a deſign which that houſe is not now accuſed of, (the accuſation would be very unjuſt) but which was formerly imputed to them. Such a project neceſſarily required that his hereditary dominions ſhould border upon the dominions of Spain, or at leaſt that it ſhould not be difficult to bring troops from Spain to Germany, and from Germany to Spain. For this end Charles, not content to have added, to the patrimony of the houſe of Burgundy, what he wanted in the ſeventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, fortified himſelf in Italy as well as he could. Knowing alſo how neceſſary it is to be aſſured of England, in order to ſubject Europe, he did not paſs by the opportunity which was preſented, of marrying his eldeſt ſon with Queen Mary, the daughter of Henry VIII. I enter not into more particular conſiderations, becauſe they would carry me too far from my ſubject.

Several circumſtances made Charles V fail in the deſign of an univerſal monarchy, ſuppoſing he entertained it; but nothing traverſed that deſign more than the diſadvantage he had to live in an age ſo ill-timed for his purpoſe, as it produced a number of great men. For whereas there have often paſſed compleat centuries, in which we cannot obſerve any Prince of a diſtinguiſhed merit; in the age when Charles lived, appeared Henry VIII, King of England, a Prince courageous and bold, who never ſuffered the balance to incline too much to one ſide; Francis I, King of France, who thwarted the houſe of Auſtria in every thing, and every where, who had the heart of a lion, and the moſt active and ſtirring genius; Soliman, Emperor of the Turks, a great conqueror, and one of the moſt formidable neighbours that ever ravaged Hungary.

I ſay nothing of ſeveral brave and prudent German Princes, who oppoſed Charles V with great reſolution and glory.

He was too great a man to ſuffer himſelf to be poſſeſſed with a ſanguinary and ſuperſtitious ſpirit, which incites Princes to perſecute religions different from their own; ſo that it is probable whatever he did, with regard to the Proteſtants, proceeded either from a deſign of engaging the Pope to be always on his ſide, or from a fear leſt the eſtabliſhment of Lutheraniſm ſhould continue to be prejudicial to him, by reaſon of the too paſſionate zeal of the Papiſts. But as ſoon as he was ſenſible that it was not his

his intereſt to perſecute the Lutherans, like a man of great ſenſe and courge, he threw off all the complaiſance he had formerly ſhewn to the Pope, and rejected the counſels of Eccleſiaſtics, enemies to the public peace. From hence proceeded the treaty of Paſſaw, which gave full liberty of conſcience to all the States of the empire. Had he done this twenty years ſooner, he would have probably removed ſeveral obſtacles to the execution of his great deſign; but he was ſomewhat too late in pacifying the differences in point of religion.

Fortune had already forſaken him, and favoured HENRY II, imitating coquets (as he himſelf mournfully ſaid) with whom it is a ſtrong reaſon for preferring one man to another, that he is fifteen or twenty years younger. The diſpleaſure he had to out-live his good-fortune made him take the reſolution of leaving the world; but in ſuch a manner, as he might claim great merit by it; for he confined himſelf in the ſolitudes of a monaſtry, knowing that Eccleſiaſtics would give a fine turn to this action, and that of all the actions of his life this would be by them the moſt extolled.

CHARLES had committed one fault which he in vain endeavoured to repair; he had cauſed his brother FERDINAND to be elected King of the Romans. He conſidered, but too late, that in order to preſerve and increaſe the power of his houſe, it was highly important than all it's dominions ſhould be united in one perſon. He would therefore have been glad to revoke the election of FERDINAND, and ſubſtitute PHILIP his ſon in his room. But as FERDINAND rejected this propoſal, CHARLES beſtowing the Spaniſh monarchy on his ſon, was obliged to leave the Imperial crown to his brother; and in effect FERDINAND, who was already King of Hungary and Bohemia, obtained that crown, upon the retreat of CHARLES V.

FERDINAND refuſing to yield the empire to his nephew, raiſed a kind of miſunderſtanding which laſted for ſome time between the two branches of the houſe of Auſtria, the elder of which reigned in Spain, and the younger in Germany, as they do to this day. FERDINAND entirely embraced the principles of Toleration, which had been ſo wiſely followed by his predeceſſor in the treaty of Paſſaw. He had confirmed that treaty in the name of the Emperor his brother, in a Diet held at Augſburg in the year 1555, and three years after, he confirmed it a new, no longer as the bare deputy of his brother, but as fully inveſted with the Imperial authority.

ANNO 1564. His ſon MAXIMILIAN II, who ſucceed him, followed this noble example of moderation, and extended it even farther than his father had done, for he tolerated the exerciſe of Lutheraniſm in his own dominions, he highly deteſted the maſſacre of Paris, executed by the order of CHARLES IX, his ſon in law, and told HENRY III, as the latter paſſed through Vienna, that a Prince who tyrannizes over the conſciences of men, invades GOD's right, and often loſes the things of this world, by meddling too much with thoſe of the other.

He died in the year 1576, greatly regretted by the Proteſtants, and made room for his ſon RUDOLPH II, whoſe conduct did not degenerate from that of his late predeceſſors, while he was guided by his own judgment; for he applied himſelf to maintain the public tranquillity which Germany enjoyed ſince the treaty of Paſſaw, and imitating the moderation of his father and grand-father, he diſturbed no man in the poſſeſſion of his privileges, judging, with great truth, that it is the principal virtue of a ſovereign to content himſelf with the power he lawfully poſſeſſes. Far from treading in the ſteps of thoſe Princes, whoſe ambition diſturbs the public peace, it may be ſaid that he loved peace too much, and had not even the ambition of being maſter in his own family. This was very hurtful to Germany, becauſe diſaffected perſons abuſing the facility of RUDOLPH, found means to inſinuate themſelves into the Imperial council, and to extort from this Prince ſome attempts on the liberties of Germany, as appeared chiefly in the affair of Juliers.

1608. This honeſt Emperor ſuffered for his too great facility. His brother MATTHIAS ſo greatly abuſed it, that he forced RUDOLPH to yield to him the kingdom of Hungary, and Auſtria, and to conſent to his being crowned King of Bohemia. Theſe unnatural and violent proceedings of MATTHIAS, and the weakneſs of RUDOLPH in giving credit to the predictions of TYCHO-BRAHE', who ſtudied Aſtrology as well as Aſtronomy, ruined this unhappy Emperor. For TYCHO-BRAHE' having told him that he was threatened with ſome imminent danger from his own relations, and that he ought to be on his guard, threw him into ſo great fears that he no longer ventured to go abroad, or ſee any company; and as the conduct of MATTHIAS confirmed the aſtrological warning, the Emperor ſunk at laſt under his uneaſineſs and grief, and died on the eighteenth of January 1612, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

Though the Proteſtants of Germany had, generally ſpeaking, ſome reaſon to complain of RUDOLPH, who had ſome times been ſurprized into bad meaſures by the emiſſaries of the court of Rome, the Proteſtants of Bohemia, in particular, thought themſelves very happy under the clemency of this Emperor. In effect, he had granted a liberty of conſcience in Bohemia, Moravia, and Sileſia; and it is indiſputable that before the war in Bohemia, the Proteſtants of that kingdom were equal with the Papiſts in every reſpect but this, that they had not a King of their religion. This equality was not an uſurped power; but aroſe from the great privileges which RUDOLPH and his ſucceſſor Matthias had granted to the Bohemians of the communion ſub utraque; this was the diſtinction between the Proteſtants and thoſe of the Romiſh communion.

The Emperor MATTHIAS felt the ſame jealouſy of his authority, which he had raiſed againſt that of RUDOLPH, his predeceſſor. He had no children; his two brothers, the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, Grand-Maſter of the Teutonic order, and the Archduke ALBERT, Governor of the Low-Countries, had likewiſe none. Thus the ſucceſſion lay open to the children of the Archduke CHARLES, ſon of the Emperor FERDINAND.

This juncture was favourable to the Spaniards. They had the glory of the houſe of Auſtria extremely at heart, and believed it was the intereſt of that houſe that both the branches of it ſhould be governed by the ſame maxims; and as they had a better opinion of their own politics than of thoſe of the Germans, they were perſuaded that it would be more conducive to the common glory of the houſe of Auſtria, that the court of Vienna, inſtead of governing that of Spain, ſhould on the contrary be governed by it. Accordingly they reſolved no longer to defer making themſelves neceſſary to the Imperial court. Having obſerved that an opportunity of doing this ſeaſonably offered at the approaching election of an Emperor, they intimated to FERDINAND, the eldeſt ſon of the Archduke CHARLES that he had great need of their good offices, in order to ſucceed the Emperor MATTHIAS. This he believed, and attached himſelf to them as much as they deſired; ſo that they no longer doubted but if the empire was once in their hands, they ſhould diſpoſe of it as they would.

With this view they warmly undertook the affair, and propoſed FERDINAND to MATTHIAS as a perſon whom he ought immediately to adopt. They prevailed without much difficulty on the brothers of MATTHIAS to yield all their pretenſions to FERDINAND. In ſhort, they made it ſo much their buſineſs to inveſt him ſoon with the whole authority, that this gave the Emperor great uneaſineſs. So natural it is for Princes who have no children, and ſometimes even for thoſe who have, to be uneaſy when they obſerve the attachment of the people to their apparent ſucceſſor. But notwithſtanding this jealouſy, MATTHIAS acquieſced in the reaſons of the Spaniards, with regard to the crown of Bohemia, which they wiſhed he would diſpoſe of during his life, in favour of him whom they protected. They gave him to underſtand, that the affair was not to be left to the chance of an election made during the interregnum, leſt his heir ſhould be excluded; that after his death, the States of Bohemia, pretending that the kingdom was elective, might beſtow the crown on ſome Heretic Prince, and that in ſuch a caſe the empire would unqueſtionably paſs to another houſe. MATTHIAS, affected with a fear ſo dextrouſly inſpired, cauſed FERDINAND to be declared his ſucceſſor to the kingdom of Bohemia, in the year 1617.

Beſides the Spaniards made a ſecret treaty with FERDINAND, by which King PHILIP III renounced in his favour, all his rights to the hereditary countries of the houſe of Auſtria, ſituated in Germany; in conſideration of which FERDINAND engaged to deliver Alſacia to the Spaniards.

I thought it proper to make all theſe obſervations on the conduct of the four immediate ſucceſſors of CHARLES V, in order to undeceive the generality of readers, who taking only a ſuperficial and general view of things, falſly imagine that all the complaints which have been made againſt the houſe of Auſtria, fall as well on the German branch, as on the Spaniſh. Nothing is more untrue: for the whole conductof the houſe of Auſtria in Germany, while they were not directed by the Spaniards, was thought commendable, or at leaſt tolerable; and it is certain that the Princes of the empire would never have recurred to the remedies they uſed, had they not been perſuaded that the Imperial court blindly followed the orders which came from that of Madrid, and that the Jeſuits inſpired both theſe courts with the deſign of exterminating all the ſects, by ſetting up an Inquiſition. Here we have an inſtance of the weakneſs of our reaſonings. For what was ſeemingly more rational than to ſay, that, for the greater glory of the houſe of Auſtria, it was neceſſary that the court of Vienna ſhould act in concert with Spain, where there were ſo many wiſe men inſtructed in the politics of PHILIP II? And yet this concert has been the moſt hurtful both to the Emperor and the Spaniards, becauſe people were prejudiced with a frightful idea of the Spaniſh politics, on account of all that had paſſed in the Low-Countries, of the ſhare the Spaniards had taken in the civil-wars of France, of the invaſion of Portugal, of the extraordinary efforts they had made to dethrone Queen ELIZABETH, when they equipped their invincible Armada, and on ſeveral other accounts. Whether this prejudice was juſt or unjuſt, certain it is, that people had frightful thoughts of the government of Spain, and for this reaſon the German Princes ſtirred ſo much, as ſoon as they believed the Emperor was abandoned to the conduct of that ſtrange nation. Now from theſe great emotions aroſe the violent ſtorm which fell both upon the Emperor and Spain.

For the reſt, though I have ſaid, or may ſometimes ſay in the ſequel of this diſcourſe, that Spain was accuſed of aſpiring after univerſal monarchy, yet this muſt not be taken as if I aſſerted that the accuſation was juſt. In this I act merely as an Hiſtorian, who relates common reports, without warranting the truth of them. I have therefore no reaſon to be apprehenſive of provoking the Spaniards; and was I even to declaim againſt their former ambition, I do not think they would take it amiſs. In effect, they are at this day the firſt to blame thoſe Princes who hold a conduct like that which was imputed to them about fifty or threeſcore years ago, they are the firſt to exclaim againſt ambitious Princes who aggrandiſe themſelves at the expence of their neighbours, and they wiſh that all the powers in Europe would riſe in arms againſt them. They are in the right to wiſh this; it is enough for ambitious nations to indulge themſelves in the pleaſing imagination, that it is the part of a great ſoul to aſpire after the conqueſt of a great empire. It is not fit that they ſhould alſo have the pleaſure of conquering it. That would be too much. Let them freely enjoy pleaſing imaginations, but let them meet with a vigorous oppoſition, and ſuch as juſtice requires, when they would change their imaginations into realities.

Let us return to the Archduke FERDINAND. As ſoon as the Emperor MATTHIAS had cauſed him to be declared King of Bohemia, it was no longer doubted but that he would have him elected King of the Romans, eſpecially ſince, having ſome time after gone to Hungary, he cauſed him to be declared King of Hungary at Preſburg, on the firſt of June 1618.

The thoughts that FERDINAND would become Emperor extremely alarmed ſeveral German Princes, both becauſe they ſaw that the empire would by this means be inevitably perpetuated in the ſame family, notwithſtanding the golden bull, and becauſe FERDINAND would re-unite in himſelf all the hereditary countries of the German branch. They could not conceive how they ſhould preſerve their liberty under an Emperor ſo powerful, and governed by the Spaniards. The Proteſtant Princes feared him more than all the reſt, becauſe they looked upon him as a Prince educated by the Jeſuits, and who had already improved ſo much by the leſſons they had given him at Ingolſtadt, where he had ſtudied, that as ſoon as he had ſucceded his father, he had tolerated no ſect in his dominions. Yet he had found them full of people who followed the new opinions; but by menaces and ill-uſage he had forced a part of theſe people to change their religion, and had baniſhed all the reſt, whom neither the fear of exile, nor the confiſcation of their eſtates and goods, could force to go over to the Romiſh communion. This rendered him both odious and terrible to all the Proteſtants; but on the other hand, it greatly recommended him to the three eccleſiaſtical Electors; and as he wanted no more than one vote, and was ſure of giving that of the King of Bohemia to himſelf, he had great reaſon to depend upon ſucceeding the Emperor MATTHIAS.

The more this was likely to happen, the more did ſome Princes of Germany endeavour to prevent it. But none of them took this affair ſo much to heart as FREDERIC, Elector Palatine, the ſame who was King of Bohemia ſome time after. He was a Prince of great merit, and of exalted courage; and ſurely they who ſpeak otherwiſe of him, muſt be ranked among thoſe people of a vulgar underſtanding, who, judging of things only by the ſucceſs of them, imagine becauſe he was not ſucceſsful in his enterprize, that he was not a great man. This Prince therefore took great pains to repreſent to his colleagues how neceſſary it was not to proceed to the election of a King of the Romans during the life of MATTHIAS. He told them that they would be more at liberty, in the interregnum, to transfer the Imperial crown to another houſe, and that it was neceſſary to do ſo, becauſe if they did not interrupt the ſucceſſion of the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria at that juncture, when the direct line failed, they could never entertain any hopes of interrupting it, eſpecially if FERDINAND was elected, who being ſupported by a foreign power, and a numerous family, would eſtabliſh himſelf and his poſterity for ever in the Imperial throne.

But as theſe repreſentations were inſignificant ſpeeches, unleſs there was found a Catholic Prince fit to be Emperor, (for the Proteſtants had only three votes, and four at leaſt were neceſſary) FREDERIC caſt his eye on MAXIMILIAN, Duke of Bavaria, a Prince of diſtinguiſhed merit, and went to viſit him at Munich, on purpoſe to perſuade him to accept of the Imperial crown; promiſing him the votes of the three Proteſtant Electors, which, with that of the Archbiſhop of Cologn, whom he might depend upon, as being the Duke of Bavaria's own brother, would render the election infallible. The temptation was great: nevertheleſs, MAXIMILIAN reſiſted it, either becauſe he knew himſelf too well to oppoſe ſo ſtrong a party, or becauſe the Miniſters of the Pope and the King of Spain promiſed him other advantages, in the room of an empire which he could not preſerve againſt the enemies he would raiſe by accepting it; ſo that he preferred a fortune leſs exalted, but ſolid, to one more pompous but tottering. And who knows but that he was threatened in the name of GOD with ſome horrible chaſtiſement in this world, and with hell-torments in the other, if he accepted a crown, which, in the judgment of the court of Rome, could not be taken from the houſe of Auſtria, without manifeſt danger to religion?

I have already mentioned the journey of the Emperor MATTHIAS to Hungary. I add here, that during this journey the troubles of Bohemia broke forth; the Archbiſhop of Prague, and the Abbot Bruneau, gave the firſt occaſion to them; the former by demoliſhing a church which the Proteſtants had built at Cloſtergrab; and the latter by ſhutting up another. The Emperor RUDOLPH had permitted the Proteſtants, by his Letters-Patent, dated the ninth of July 1609, to build churches, hoſpitals, and ſchools, on their own ground in whatever juriſdiction they were ſituated, even without the permiſſion of the lord of the fief or high-juſticiary. They had peaceably enjoyed this privilege in the reign of MATTHIAS, and on a ſudden ſaw two private men, without the Emperor's order, and merely by their own authority, demoliſh and ſhut up their churches. This provoked them to the higheſt degree, not ſo much on account of theſe two churches, as becauſe they looked upon this as an omen of FERDINAND's conduct, from which they could only preſage melancholy conſequences; for ſince, without waiting for the approaching death of the good Emperor MATTHIAS, he ſignalized the beginnings of his reign by violences exceeding ſevere, they might be ſure that he would not long delay to proſcribe them, and to follow all the ſuggeſtions of the Jeſuits who led him.

Theſe fears increaſed ſome time after, by the approbation which was given in the Emperor's council to the violences of the Archbiſhop of Prague, and the Abbot Bruneau. The Proteſtants then ſaw that the old-age of MATTHIAS had delivered him a prey to his ſucceſſor; ſo that having no hopes but from the reſolution which they ſhould diſcover, they thought themſelves obliged to make FERDINAND, and the Spaniards, whoſe ſuggeſtions he followed, ſenſible that they ſhould engage in a very difficult and dangerous affair, if they undertook to annul their privileges. They thought that the more ſubmiſſive they ſhould be, the more ſhould they be trampled upon, and that they ought to render themſelves formidable by ſome bold ſtep, in order to ſtifle in their birth, the pernicious counſels which had been ſuggeſted to FERDINAND.

Accordingly they took reſolutions not only too bold, but inexcuſable on account of their violence. For not content to ſummon the States of the kingdom, in order to deliberate on the proper means of preſerving the privileges of the country, they opened theſe States on the twenty-firſt of May 1618, without any regard to the Emperor's prohibition; and two days after ſent ſeveral lords and deputies of towns to the council, in order to make their remonſtrances. Theſe diſcharged their commiſſion with an air not like that of ſupplicants. Accordingly their petition was not received in the manner which they thought the equity of their cauſe required, which provoked them ſo highly, that they threw out of the windows, as traitors to their country, Count MARTINITZ, Count NAUATA, and PHILIP FABRICIO, Secretary of State.

After ſuch a proceeding, the Bohemians found themſelves engaged a new, to break with FERDINAND, becauſe they could hope for nothing but by rendering themſelves the ſtrongeſt. Accordingly Count LA TOUR having made them ſenſible of the neceſſity they were under to repel force by force, they immediately ſent commiſſions for levying troops throughout the whole kingdom. This Count had been very ill treated by FERDINAND from a hatred to his religion; for he had baniſhed him out of Auſtria, and deprived him of his eſtate; and the Count expected no better uſage when FERDINAND ſhould come to the crown of Bohemia. This perſonal intereſt greatly prevailed on him to raiſe a general inſurrection in the kingdom, and furniſhed him with a lively and animated eloquence in the ſpeech he made to an aſſembly which he had ſummoned to meet. He repreſented to them the charms of liberty to which he invited them. Then he laid open to their view the loſs of their privileges, and ruin of their religion, which they muſt unavoidably ſuffer under a Prince governed by Spaniſh counſels, and by Monks, both equally enemies to their liberty and religion; under a Prince inſpired from his infancy with a violent hatred of Proteſtants, and who ſufficiently diſcovered what meaſures he would take hereafter, by thoſe which he had already taken in his own dominions, where the baniſhment of his ſubjects, the ruin and deſolation of families, and the confiſcation of lands and goods were the only monuments he had raiſed to his glory. He concluded with theſe memorable words. Remember that now there is room neither for repentance, nor for pardon. We muſt no longer reaſon, nor deliberate. We only want concord and ſteddineſs. The lot is caſt. If we prove victorious, we ſhall be a juſt, free, and ſovereign people; if we are conquered, we ſhall be traitors, perjured perſons, and rebels. He animated them to that degree, that they all reſolved on an inſurrection. They who diſapproved it, durſt not diſcover their ſentiments, for fear of being ill-uſed by the reſt: thus it commonly happens that men of a peaceable diſpoſition are carried down with the torrent of a faction.

Upon the news of this great revolution, the opinions of the court of Vienna were divided. FERDINAND's cabal were for ſeverely puniſhing the rebels. MATTHIAS, on the contrary, thought it proper to reclaim them by moderation, and by offering them new privileges. This was alſo the opinion of Cardinal GLESEL, his firſt Miniſter. The true cauſe of this opinion was not ſo much the clemency either of the Emperor, or of the Cardinal, though they were both moderate enough, as their jealouſy of the Spaniards. MATTHIAS could not ſend forces to Bohemia, without giving the command of them to FERDINAND, and that was giving it to the Spaniards, whoſe conduct diſpleaſed him, as he had ſhewn by declaring for the new Republic of Holland. Therefore the Emperor and his firſt Miniſter would have greatly wiſhed to avoid the war: but they could not prevent it, nor refuſe the command of the army to FERDINAND.

All they could do was to limit his authority, by giving him a council made up of the creatures of MATTHIAS. This diſpleaſed him ſo much that at the inſtigation of the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, without whom he did nothing, he reſolved to ruin Cardinal GLESEL, whom he believed to be the cauſe of the reſtrictions put upon his authority. In effect, after ſome complaints againſt the Cardinal's conduct, which tended to diſcredit him as a man too favourable to the Heretics, and too little concerned for the aggrandiſement of the houſe of Auſtria, he was ſeized in the antichamber of the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, and immediately carried to Inſpruch.

Very ſubmiſive excuſes were made to MATTHIAS for this proceeding: but as he loved the Cardinal, and beſides as the ſeizing of the Cardinal was a notorious contempt of his authority, all theſe ſubmiſſions did not pacify him. Whether awake or aſleep, he was heard loudly crying that his GLESEL muſt be reſtored to him. Nay it is ſaid, that, in order to revenge that affront, he was upon the point of going over to the malecontents of Bohemia. Cardinal DIETRICHSTEIN appeaſed him a little, by bringing the King of Bohemia, and the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, into his chamber, to aſk his pardon, and to proteſt that from thenceforth they would make no incroachment upon the Imperial authority. Nevertheleſs, the ſhort time he lived, he paſſed it in continual apprehenſions, feeling the judgment of GOD upon him, who permitted his couſin FERDINAND to deprive him of that authority, of which he himſelf had deprived his brother, the Emperor RUDOLPH. MATTHIAS died on the twentieth of March 1619.

The better to underſtand how the diſorders of Bohemia agitated the whole empire, it is fit to know that ever ſince the year 1608, the Proteſtants, oppreſſed in ſeveral places, and fearing leaſt their patience ſhould bring upon them new hardſhips, had laid the foundation of a particular alliance among ſeveral of them for their mutual preſervation. This was done in the aſſembly of Ahauſen, on the fourth of May 1618; but the alliance was only concluded in the aſſembly of Hall in Suabia. The following year this alliance took the name of the Union, and the Princes who entered into it, that of Correſpondents. The Elector Palatine was choſen the chief of the Union.

The Papiſts having met at Munich, made at the ſame time another alliance among themſelves, and gave it the pompous title of the Catholic League; they choſe for the chief of it the Duke of Bavaria, a very artful Prince, who well knew how to improve the public calamities to the advantage of his own houſe. Theſe two great parties, or if you will, theſe two great Leagues, obſerved each other, without proceeding to extremities; but at laſt the troubles of Bohemia having taken birth from an affair of religion, and the whole empire being poſſeſſed either with the fears, or the hopes that the ſucceſſor of MATTHIAS would perſecute the Proteſtants, both the Union and the League prepared for a war which appeared inevitable.

But there was this difference between the chiefs of the Union, and thoſe of the League, the latter acted with greater prudence and concord than the former, and ſignally triumphed over them. The Princes of the Union were not diligent enough in preparing for a war: they ſuffered themſelves to be amuſed with propoſals of accommodation, they gave the League time to bring together great forces, and after that, they could no longer brave it. They committed the fault which is very common in civil-wars, viz. that people endeavour to ſave appearances. If a party would ſave appearances, they muſt lie quiet, but if they will not lie quiet, they muſt puſh things to an extremity, without keeping any meaſures. It rarely happens but that otherwiſe they are at once both criminal and unfortunate. Let this be ſaid without any prejudice to the rights of the German Princes, who aſſert, that it was as lawful for them, with regard both to their civil and religious intereſts, to favour the cauſe of the Elector Palatine againſt FERDINAND, as it was for the King of France to favour the United-Provinces againſt the Spaniards, and for the King of Spain to favour ſometimes the League againſt the lawful heir of the crown, and ſometimes the Duke of Rohan againſt LEWIS XIII. But if they had a right to ſuccour the Proteſtants of Bohemia, who took arms againſt FERDINAND, they muſt at leaſt own that they did them very little ſervice. He who gave the moſt reputation to the arms of the Bohemians was ERNEST Count Mansfeld; who being informed of their inſurrection, when he was in Piedmont, in the ſervice of the Duke of Savoy, eagerly embraced that opportunity of ſignalizing himſelf, and offered them his ſervice with two thouſand men, whom the Duke allowed him to chooſe out of his troops, and maintained till the Count arrived in Bohemia. He was a brave man, who ſought ſuch opportunities in order to raiſe himſelf, and to ſubſiſt with ſplendor. He was natural ſon to PETER ERNEST, Count Mansfeld, Governor of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, and had abandoned Popery, after having made ſeveral campaigns in the Emperor's ſervice. He was cordially received by the malecontents of Hungary, who honoured him with the poſt of General of the artillery, and he became, with Count LA TOUR, one of the principal ſupports of the party.

The Imperial troops, which had been ſent into Bohemia under the command of Count BUQUOI, there exerciſed unheard-of cruelties and violences; this ſtill more exaſperated the Bohemians, and determined Sileſia and Luſatia to join them. The two parties fought, they beſieged, loſt, and took towns; but it is certain, that in the beginning, the Imperialiſts had the diſadvantage, and that almoſt all the towns of the kingdom fell into the hands of the male-contents.

As for the Princes of the Union, they contented themſelves with aſſembling at Rottemburg on the Tauber, from whence they ſent deputies to his Imperial majeſty, humbly deſiring him to conſider that all the Proteſtants of Germany had a great intereſt in the affair of Bohemia, and beſeeching him to recal his troops. The affair was brought to a negotiation. The Archbiſhop of Mentz, the Elector Palatine, the Elector of Saxony, and the Duke of Bavaria were nominated to make that accommodation; but the tedious proceedings ſo common in Germany in affairs of this nature, and the death of the Emperor MATTHIAS prevented all redreſs.

As the houſe of Auſtria pretended that the kingdom of Bohemia was hereditary, whereas the States of the kingdom maintained that it was elective, MATTHIAS would not ſubmit his couſin FERDINAND to the election of the Bohemians, when he made him their King; for that had been to acknowlege the juſtice of their pretenſions. Thus FERDINAND had not obtained the crown of Bohemia by election, and conſequently, according to the Bohemians, he had no right to it. For this reaſon, being informed that FERDINAND had been invited to the election of an Emperor as King of Bohemia, they repreſented to the Electoral College that he could not aſſiſt at the Diet in that capacity. Bnt theſe remonſtrances were not regarded. He was not only preſent at the election, but was alſo choſen Emperor on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt 1619.

The Pope, the King of Spain, and the whole Popiſh party, were ſo impatient to ſee FERDINAND upon the Imperial throne, becauſe they hoped he would deſtroy the Proteſtant religion throughout the whole empire, that there was no poſſibility of deferring the Diet which was to elect a ſucceſſor to MATTHIAS. They in vain repreſented that it was neceſſary to wait till theſe diſorders were ſomewhat appeaſed. The Popiſh party took all this for an artifice, and imagined that the Proteſtant Princes required time only the better to concert on the ways of excluding the King of Bohemia. Whereupon SUICOSD Archbiſhop of Mentz, one of the principal ſupports of the Catholic League, ſummoned the Electoral Diet to meet at Francfort on the twentieth of July 1619. This function belonged to him, both as great Chancellor of the German empire, in the capacity of Archbiſhop of Mentz; and as Dean of the Electoral College. FERDINAND was elected Emperor, as I have ſaid, on the twentieth of Auguſt following, and was crowned a few days after, to wit, on the ninth of September.

Never perhaps did he find himſelf in more perplexing circumſtances than the firſt year after the death of the Emperor MATTHIAS. The death of that Emperor revived the animoſity of the Bohemians, and their diffidence increaſed, as they knew that MATTHIAS, who was more inclined to ſoften than to irritate affairs, could no longer check the reſtleſs humour of FERDINAND. In vain he made them advantageous promiſes, they were not diſpoſed to hearken to them, nor to believe that they were any thing more than Jeſuitical artifices; beſides by accepting the amneſty which he offered them, they would have acknowleged him as their lawful ſovereign; which was very inconſiſtent with their pretenſions. Moſt of the neighbouring provinces followed their example. Sileſia and Luſatia had already done it; and Moravia did it ſome time after.

The States of upper Auſtria reſolved to keep the government in their own hands, till it ſhould be decided to whom the ſucceſſion lawfully belonged, whether to FERDINAND, or to ALBERT the brother of MATTHIAS; the Lower Auſtria was ſo full of male-contents, that it would have followed this example, had not the preſence of FERDINAND hindered it from revolting. But neither could his preſence nor authority ſtop the progreſs of Count LA TOUR, who drew near the Danube, paſſed that river, ſeized on the ſuburbs of Vienna, and beſieged the city with great hopes of taking it by the correſpondence he held with ſome perſons in it. Happily for FERDINAND Count DAMPIER defeated MANSFELD, which obliged LA TOUR to retire. Though this good fortune was followed by another more conſiderable, I mean the election of FERDINAND, yet he found himſelf plunged in new diſtreſſes, for on one ſide the Bohemians created FREDERIC Elector Palatine, their King, and on the other BETHLEN GABOR, Prince of Tranſilvania, entered like a torrent into Hungary, made himſelf maſter of Caſſovia, Altenburg, Preſburg, and ſeveral other places; while the Bohemian troops commanded by Count LA TOUR marching along the borders of Auſtria, threatned the capital city, and entered Hungary, to join the Prince of Tranſilvania.

All this was more than ſufficient to diſturb a Prince of the greateſt reſolution, and it muſt be owned that FERDINAND had more merit, and poſſeſſed more great qualities, than many Hiſtorians aſcribe to him, ſince he was proof againſt ſo many attacks, and not only acted like a man who was not aſtoniſhed, but likewiſe diſſipated all theſe factions, and rendered all the enterprizes of his enemies vain and fruitleſs.

If I did not remember that I mention theſe things only by way of digreſſion, I ſhould with pleaſure ſet forth all the events which heighten the fortune of this Prince; but as I muſt ſoon return to GUSTAVUS, I ſhall ſpeak of what followed only ſo far as it is neceſſary to give my readers a diſtinct idea of the State of Germany, when the King of Sweden entered it. Yet I ſhall do it in ſuch a manner, that the brevity of my narrative may not render it too dry, and obſcure the ſeries of the events.

To have a full view of the bad poſture of the Emperor's affairs, we muſt conſider that Bohemia, Sileſia, Moravia, Luſatia, and Auſtria, had taken arms againſt him, while the Tranſylvanian BETHLEN GABOR, a Prince of great credit at the Ottoman Porte, valiant, courageous, and already maſter of the greateſt part of Hungary, haſtens with extreme eagerneſs to make new conqueſts, and is on his march to join the malecontents. Beſides, we muſt look upon the inſurrection of theſe provinces, not as one of thoſe popular commotions which have no conſiderable chief, no diſcipline, nor counſel. They were great provinces, which, after having ſhaken off his yoke, were directed by wiſe and experienced men, who correſponded with the neighbouring States. Provinces which gave the command of their troops to famous Generals, or rather provinces very conſiderable for their number and forces, which choſe for their King one of the firſt Princes of the empire, young, valiant, ſon-in-law to the King of England, and nephew to Prince MAURICE, who was eſteemed a great General, and had great power in a flouriſhing Republic, at enmity with the Spaniards. Beſides, we muſt conſider that the houſe of Auſtria appeared too powerful to ſeveral Princes of Europe; that France, its antient enemy, was not the only ſtate which deſired to preſcribe limits to its great power; and that the Elector Palatine had accepted the crown of Bohemia with the conſent of the Proteſtant Princes of Germany; which ſuppoſes that they would aſſiſt him, with all their forces, againſt an enemy whom they all feared, being induced to it both by the intereſts of their religion, and of their States.

By ſhewing all the diſtreſſes and apprehenſions of FERDINAND in the beginning of his reign, methinks I have ſolidly refuted thoſe who have cenſured the Elector Palatine. Some have called him inconſiderate, as having accepted the crown of Bohemia againſt ~~all the~~ rules of prudence; others have ſaid that he was ſimple enough to yield to the importunities of his wife, a daughter of the King of England, and for that reaſon highly diſpleaſed that ſhe did not bear the glorious title of MAJESTY. All theſe cenſurers, I ſay, are people of a vulgar underſtanding, who think nothing commendable, but what is ſucceſsful, and blame all unfortunate enterprizes. Had they any penetration, they would find that human prudence is, properly ſpeaking, the ſport of the providence of GOD, who to humble us, and to convince us that he is the ſupreme governor of all things, very frequently permits that the beſt concerted enterprizes ſhould be defeated, and that the moſt raſh and inconſiderate ſhould ſucceed.

I will not give an inſtance of the former kind in the enterprize of the Elector Palatine, for I own it muſt be ranked among thoſe of a doubtful iſſue. But I believe when all things are carefully examined it will be granted me, that there was not more to be feared than to be hoped from that enterprize; and therefore that this Prince did nothing but what a man of courage might have done, without being guilty of imprudence. So that even if it was granted that the ambition and pride of his wife contributed to determine his accepting the crown of Bohemia, his conduct would nevertheleſs be commendable, ſince it is certain, that if a Prince may, without raſhneſs, engage in an enterprize, when the probability of ſucceeding in it, is equal to that of failing, and when a crown is the prize of the former, much more may he do it at the ſollicitation of his wife, who begs of him to give her a rank equal to her birth. But in ſpite of all that can be ſaid, the world will never be perſuaded that a Prince who has loſt all his dominions for having accepted a crown, acted prudently in accepting it. He who regulates his conduct according to the appearances of future events, is not, in the opinion of the world, a wiſe man, unleſs beſides he foreſees among future events, thoſe which happen contrary to all appearances. The world ridiculouſly imagines that ſucceſsful men forſaw all thoſe caprices of fortune to which they owed their ſucceſs, and conſequently that the unſucceſsful are much to be blamed for not having foreſeen thoſe caprices which defeated their enterprizes.

It was by ſeveral events which happened contrary to all appearances, that the Elector Palatine unhappily failed in his enterprize. It was eaſy to foreſee, ſay they, that King JAMES would aſſiſt his ſon-in-law no otherwiſe than by ſome offers of mediation, by letters and Ambaſſadors. This is the only ſervice he ever did to his allies: but this is exaggerated; for it was not improbable that a father, notwithſtanding his pacific temper would make ſome efforts in favour of his children; and even if we grant that the Elector ought to have looked upon England as a country loſt to the reſt of Europe, and whoſe fortune it ſeems to be not to concern itſelf for the oppreſſion of the weakeſt, were there not Princes enough beſides, from whom, according to all appearances, he might expect aſſiſtance?

Who could have believed that the Proteſtants of Germany would have abandoned the Elector Palatine, they, who under the name of Correſpondents had engaged from the year 1609 to maintain liberty, and the Proteſtant religion in the empire? They who believed that the Emperor was an enemy to both? They, in ſhort, who having been conſulted by FREDERIC, their chief, in the aſſembly held at Rottemburg on the twelfth of September 1619, anſwered that he ought to accept the crown of Bohemia, not only as being a new dignity, but alſo as what was neceſſary for the public good of Germany, and that of their allies, and adviſed him to ſet out immediately for Bohemia? Who could have believed that France, which, in thoſe times, exclaimed ſo loudly againſt Princes that are too powerful, and ſollicited all Europe to make leagues againſt the houſe of Auſtria, would neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of weakening it? Who could have believed that France would ſide with FERDINAND, againſt thoſe who aimed at depriving him of a part of his power? Who could have believed that BETHLEN GABOR, after ſuch fortunate beginnings, after all the reputation he had acquired, and all the intereſt he had with the Turk, would be of no ſervice to the Palatine. Let us therefore ſay, that FREDERIC was deceived by a train of events ſo ſingular, that the moſt refined prudence could never have ſuſpected it. Let us not believe thoſe who pretend that the vanity of the Duke of BOUILLON, his uncle, joined with that of the Electreſs, threw him into an imprudent undertaking. They ſay, that the Duke wrote to his friends at Paris, that while the King of France was making knights at Fountainbleau, he was making Kings in Germany. He might have ſaid ſo; but as he was one of the ableſt men of his age, it is not probable that he would have adviſed his nephew to accept a crown, if he ought in prudence to have refuſed it.

Obſerve that I only ſpeak of human and political prudence: I enter not into the queſtion whether FERDINAND was the true King of Bohemia, and whether, according to the ſpirit of the Chriſtian religion, the Palatine could accept that crown to which he was elected by the States of the kingdom. That is not the matter in queſtion. The queſtion at preſent is, whether according to the maxims of an ambition, vailed over with the notion of political prudence, FREDERIC did well to accept the crown of Bohemia; and after all I ſee no great difference between a Prince who accepts a crown which has been taken from a King depoſed, and a Prince who makes war on his neighbour in order to deprive him of his dominions. But though the Palatine had many reaſons to hope for ſucceſs in his enterprize, it was nevertheleſs unfortunate; ſo true it is that the divine prudence is pleaſed to confound the wiſdom of man.

As ſoon as FREDERIC was informed that the States of Bohemia, Sileſia, Luſatia, and Moravia, had unanimouſly choſen him their King, on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt 1619, (the very day before FERDINAND was elected Emperor at Frankfort) he aſſembled the Princes or Correſpondents at Rottemburg, who, as we have already ſeen, adviſed him to go to Bohemia as ſoon as poſſible, and take poſſeſſion of that crown. Neither he, nor the Electreſs his wife, had any averſion to it. Accordingly the ceremony of his coronation was only deferred till the fourth of November, and that of the Princeſs till the ſeventh. On the twenty-eighth of next April, the States of the kingdom choſe his eldeſt ſon, being ſix years of age, for his ſucceſſor. The Imperialiſts were not able to keep more than two places in Bohemia. Let us now ſee by what means FERDINAND ſurmounted all theſe diſtreſſes.

Religion was his principal machine for that purpoſe. He had approved his zeal for Popery by the two methods the moſt pleaſing to the people and the clergy; namely, by a great devotion for the Virgin Mary, the ſaints, relics, and images, and by perſecuting the Proteſtants. The firſt thing he did when he ſucceeded his father was to viſit the church of Our Lady of Loretto, and there to make a ſolemn vow, that even if it ſhould coſt him his life, he would exterminate all the ſects out of Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola. He engaged in the like vow after he was crowned King of Bohemia and Hungary; for he made a ſhort pilgrimage to an image of the Virgin Mary, which is in great reputation on the frontiers of Stiria, and there he ſolemnly promiſed to GOD to purge Bohemia, and the adjacent provinces, from the venom of Hereſy. Several years before his death he made a third vow which concerned Hungary, and wherein he promiſed to employ all imaginable means to reduce all that kingdom under the obedience of the Virgin, whom he uſed to call Generaliſſima in his letters, and in the orders he ſent to his Generals.

This ſignal devotion, as the Papiſts called it, or ſuperſtition, according to the Proteſtants, was both of great ſervice and of great prejudice to FERDINAND. He reaped many advantages from it for a long time, but at laſt it proved very prejudicial to the whole houſe of Auſtria, and has rather weakened than ſtrengthened the Popiſh party in Germany. If after this we ſhould wonder how his ſucceſſors came to follow his example, not only with regard to the exceſſive worſhip paid to the creatures, and the ſpirit of perſecution, but likewiſe with regard to the blind complaiſance he paid to the Monks, we ought to conſider, (and then our wonder will be over) that the Monks had the cunning to make them believe that all the bleſſings which God beſtows on the moſt auguſt houſe of Auſtria, are the rewards of its zeal for the extirpation of the Proteſtants, and that all the afflictions which GOD ſends on that houſe, proceed from its not being rigorous enough againſt the enemies of the Church. But this is a manifeſt contradiction: for if the ſeverity of the houſe of Auſtria was great enough to be rewarded by GOD, the indulgence of it could not deſerve to be chaſtiſed. But Kings and Emperors do not much regard this.

Be that as it will, it is great pity that FERDINAND was inſpired with a zeal ſo ſuperſtitious and inhuman; for it cannot be denied that he had great merit, and that he ought ought to be ranked among the illuſtrious men of that age. If we are not to believe that he deſerved all the encomiums beſtowed on him by the Jeſuit le Morman, his confeſſor, we muſt not on the other hand give credit to all that has been ſaid in his prejudice by the Hiſtorians of the contrary party. It is reported that Bethlen Gabor ſaid, it was dangerous to make war upon Ferdinand, becauſe he was neither daunted by adverſity, nor dazzled with proſperity. After the coronation of the Palatine, Ferdinand made it appear that he was able to do ſomething more than make vows to the Virgin Mary, for he uſed a very dextrous policy.

As his greateſt apprehenſion was leſt France ſhould ſend forces to the new King of Bohemia, he ſent Count Furstemberg Ambaſſador to the French court, and ordered him to repreſent that the deſign of the Proteſtants in Germany was only to ruin the Catholic religion, and that it was hoped his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty would powerfully aſſiſt the Emperor, who was engaged in ſo holy a cauſe. But he was far from repreſenting matters in this light to the correſpondent Princes. They held a famous aſſembly at Nuremberg, a little after the coronation of Frederic, who did not fail to be preſent there. Count Hohenzollern was ſent thither by his Imperial Majeſty, and proteſted in his name, that he never had any thing ſo much at heart as the public tranquillity, the peace of religion, and of the State, and the preſervation of the laws. He ſpoke afterwards of the affairs of Bohemia, and maintained that religion was only the pretext of the revolt, and that the Emperor had no difference with the Bohemians, on that account, nor would have any. At laſt he exhorted the aſſembly to find ways of accommodation, which might reſtore peace to the empire, in ſuch a manner as might conſiſt with the honour of his Imperial Majeſty.

This was very artful; for it was imagined that Ferdinand, prompted by the Jeſuits, aimed only at the ruin of the Proteſtant religion; and yet he intimates to the Proteſtant Princes that he has no ſuch deſign, that religion is no way concerned in the troubles of Germany, and that he does not deſign to make the leaſt attempt upon the liberty of conſcience. By theſe fine proteſtations he lulled them aſleep, ſo that they abandoned the unfortunate King of Bohemia.

It is true they did not come at once to ſuch a ſtrange reſolution, for the anſwer they gave to Count Hohenzollern made him fully ſenſible that they were aware of his artifice, and deſigned to aſſiſt the Palatine; but they did not long continue in that reſolution.

The Princes of the Catholic League meeting at Wirtſburg, at the ſame time that thoſe of the Evangelical Union met at Nuremberg, they reſolved to raiſe an army which ſhould be commanded by the Duke of Bavaria. This aſſembly at Wirtſburg was very numerous. There were preſent Ambaſſadors from the Emperor, Agents from the Spaniſh King, and Deputies from the Duke of Lorrain. Ferdinand's Ambaſſadors were far from ſaying that religion was not concerned in the quarrel, they ſtrongly inſiſted on the contrary. So that one of the chief affairs which were laid before this aſſembly, was the preſervation of the Catholic religion, threatned on all ſides with utter ruin. This was as artful a conduct at leaſt as that of declaring to the Proteſtants that religion was not concerned in the quarrel, and that the Emperor had no deſign to meddle in ſo tender a point: for moſt of the members of the Catholic League being either Prelates or Abbots, when Ferdinand perſuaded them that the Proteſtants intended to deſtroy the Romiſh Church, he affected them in the moſt ſenſible manner; thus Ferdinand intereſſed them in his cauſe by all that was deareſt to them, namely, by the fear of loſing a temporal and ſpiritual empire, which brought them great revenues, and made them lead a moſt delicious life.

The correſpondent Princes, alarmed at the great levies made by the Catholic League, ſent a deputation to the Duke of Bavaria, to acquaint him of their inclination to a peace, and preſented to him a long deduction of their ſentiments and demands. The Duke anſwered; they replied; and he alſo replied in his turn. There paſſed on both ſides complaints, reproaches, juſtifications, proteſtations, and, in general, whatever is employed in the quarrels of the pen which precede, or accompany, the firſt acts of hoſtility. The reſult was that the Catholic League made prodigious armaments, and artfully amuſed the Princes of the Evangelical Union, who were content to be on their guard.

We ſhall ſoon ſee the effect of Ferdinand's embaſſy to the court of France. As to the Ambaſſadors whom he ſent to Christian IV King of Denmark, and to the Duke of Brunſwic, they obtained all that their maſter could reaſonably expect, ſince theſe Princes promiſed to keep a perfect neutrality. The Ambaſſadors whom he ſent to Italy obtained of the Pope conſiderable ſupplies of money, beſides the troops ſent by ſome Italian Princes, and two levies made in Sicily and the kingdom of Naples. Ferdinand had ſo well perſuaded the world that his cauſe was the cauſe of the Church, that we may wonder the Pope did not publiſh a cruſade againſt the Correſpondents.

I know not whether it was owing to the addreſs of this Prince, or to the ſtupidity of the court of France, that the French loudly declared for him. But at leaſt it is certain that there never was a conduct more impolitic than this. France and the houſe of Auſtria had long been upon ſuch terms, that they took all advantages of each other, and it was then only ten years ſince the death of HENRY IV, when he was ready to begin a war, the deſign of which was to reduce both the Emperor and the King of Spain to a very low condition. That war had long been deſigned, and all the neceſſary preparations had been made for it. France had alſo for a long time openly ſupported the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, which had ſhaken off the Spaniſh yoke. The Spaniards had not been wanting on their ſide, and had like to have ruined the French monarchy, in the time of the League. In ſhort, no nation in Europe had more reaſon than France to weaken the houſe of Auſtria; and yet the French neglected the fineſt opportunity of doing it, and not content to do that houſe no prejudice, they rendered a ſignal ſervice to it, ſince they were the principal cauſe of the treaty of Ulm, which diſarmed the Correſpondent Princes, and ruined the affairs of the Palatine. The French boaſt of that overſight, which was a notorious and unpardonable blunder in politics. They have ſaid that France aſſiſted the Emperor for the love of religion. People muſt ſay ſomething to juſtify their faults, and cover them, if poſſible, with the cloke of religion. But on whom would they impoſe? If Popery was the cauſe why the French would not aſſiſt the King of Bohemia, why did they favour the Dutch, why did they make a League with the King of Sweden?

What is moſt probable is, that the Emperor's Ambaſſador arrived at Paris in the reign of a favourite who had meditated the ruin of Calviniſm. It is not certainly known whether the addreſs of the Spaniards, who at that time had many creatures at the court of France, whom they retained in good pay, inſpired the Conſtable DE LUYNES with the deſign of attacking the Huguenots; or whether he derived that deſign from the hopes he conceived that by ſignalizing his miniſtry by an enterprize extremely agreeable to the Monks and the rabble, he ſhould blot out the remembrance of the low and mean arts by which he had riſen to favour. But however that may be, he it was who kindled the civil wars which raged in France under the reign of LEWIS XIII. He had already broached this deſign, when FERDINAND ſent to demand aſſiſtance from the King of France. He had obſerved that the Emperor repreſented the quarrel between him and the new King of Bohemia, as an affair in which religion was concerned, and that the Duke of BOUILLON had not defeated this artifice, when he wrote to LEWIS XIII that the Catholics enjoyed all manner of liberty in the dominions of the male-contents, and therefore that the Emperor deceived him, when he affirmed that they deſigned to ruin his religion. Upon this the Conſtable had either honeſty, or ſimplicity enough to believe that it was not fit to aſſiſt Heretics abroad, while he perſecuted them at home.

Some have ſaid that he engaged in the deſign of ruining the affairs of the Palatine, becauſe the Spaniſh Ambaſſador had promiſed that his brother ſhould be married to the heireſs of CHAULNES, who was then at the court of the Infanta. Whatever might have been the cauſe of this conduct, it is certain that by his means it was reſolved that France ſhould favour the cauſe of FERDINAND. This was adding a ſecond fault to the former, for he had done very wrong to undertake the ruin of the Huguenots. By the treaty of Ulm he ſhewed that he was entirely ignorant of the principles which had guided the French politics for many years.

This treaty of Ulm was concluded on the third of July 1620, by the Duke of ANGOULESME, Count BETHUNE and Mr de CHATEAUNEUF Ambaſſadors extraordinary from France. By this treaty it was agreed that the Catholic League might act and undertake againſt Bohemia and the provinces incorporated with that kingdom, whatever they thought proper, and that the Evangelical Union ſhould not be allowed to make any oppoſition in favour of the Bohemians and their confederates. The Princes who compoſed that Union muſt have been ſtruck with ſtupidity, for they ſigned this treaty, which was certainly one of the greateſt blows to ruin the Elector Palatine and raiſe the fortune of the Emperor.

To this may be added two others; the firſt of which was the truce concluded with BETHLEN GABOR, and the ſecond the formidable armies levied by the Emperor, and commanded by the moſt experienced Generals in Europe. As for the truce, we muſt know that the Archduke CHARLES, brother to the Emperor FERDINAND, having been driven out of his Biſhopric of Breſlaw, when Sileſia ſhook off the yoke, retired to the court of the King of Poland, his brother-in-law, and obtained his permiſſion to levy ten thouſand men, who did the Emperor great ſervice, for HOMONAI, an Hungarian Baron, headed them, entered into Upper Hungary, defeated RAGOTSKI, General of BETHLEN GABOR's army, and very much contributed to the concluding of a truce for ten months between the Emperor, and the Prince of Tranſilvania. During this truce, FERDINAND's troops, freed from a great trouble, applied wholly to reduce the provinces which had withdrawn their obedience from the Emperor. And as theſe troops were very numerous, and had that affair only to execute, it is not ſurpriſing that they ſucceeded, nor muſt we praiſe ſo much the devotion of FERDINAND, as if in this affair it had wrought miracles, for ſure any other man, without being acquainted with the Holy Virgin, or St Ignatius, might have done the like exploits, had he been in the ſame circumſtances with FERDINAND.

Beſides the army of the Catholic League, which was in Suabia, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, at the ſame time that the Emperor publiſhed the ſentence of proſcription
On the 27th of February 1620. againſt FREDERIC; I ſay, beſides this army the command of which the Duke of Bavaria gave to TILLY, a General of great reputation, the King of Spain ſent the Emperor five thouſand horſe, and twenty thouſand foot, without reckoning the Levies which he ordered Count Ognate, his Ambaſſador at Vienna, to make for the Emperor in the States of Italy, and in Auſtria. The King of Poland ſent the Emperor five thouſand Coſſacks, and ſeveral Italian Princes furniſhed him either with money or ſoldiers. The troops commanded by Count BUQUOI in Hungary, drew near the revolted provinces, as ſoon as the truce was concluded with BETHLEN GABOR, greatly preſſed the Bohemians on the ſide of Lower Auſtria, and defeated them in ſeveral engagements. At the ſame time, HOMONAI entered Moravia and Sileſia, and ravaged theſe countries, and Count DAMPIERRE purſued the troops of Count LA TOUR as far as Bohemia.

This being the State of affairs when the Princes of the Evangelical Union promiſed by the treaty of Ulm to ſuffer thoſe of the Catholic League to do whatever they thought proper in favour of FERDINAND, and againſt the Elector Palatine, it was humanly impoſſible but that the Emperor muſt entirely ruin that unfortunate Prince who was King of Bohemia. We muſt not forget that the King of Spain ſent the Marquis SPINOLA with an army of twenty-five, or thirty thouſand men into the Palatinate, where notwithſtanding the reſiſtence of the Correſpondent Princes, he made himſelf maſter of a great many places. Nor muſt we forget that the Elector of Saxony, though a Proteſtant, took upon him to execute the Imperial Ban againſt Bohemia, and attacked Luſatia, at the ſame time that the Duke of Bavaria was marching againſt FREDERIC.

In ſuch a ſituation of affairs, this Duke could not doubt of the ruin of FREDERIC. Nevertheleſs being very politic, he judged that he muſt uſe great diligence, leſt he ſhould loſe this opportunity by ſome unexpected change. Therefore as ſoon as the treaty of Ulm was ſigned, his army advanced to Auſtria, and, laid waſte the whole country in ſuch a manner, putting the peaſants to the ſword and ſetting the houſes on fire, that the cities were terrified, and deſpairing of their ſafety, returned to their ANNO 1620. obedience, and ſubmitted to the diſcretion of the conqueror. Afterwards the Duke of Bavaria having joined BUQUOI, they reſolved to carry the war into the heart of Bohemia, and march directly to Prague, ſince FREDERIC, truſting to the promiſes of the Tranſilvanian, whoſe truce with the Emperor would ſoon expire, refuſed to reſign his crown. They actually entered it . . . .

CRITICAL REMARKS UPON THE
NEW EDITION
OF MORERI'S HISTORICAL DICTIONARY,
Publiſhed in the year 1704.

WITH

A Preface and ſeveral Obſervations written by Mr BAYLE, for the uſe of the new editors of that Dictionary.

Tranſlated into Engliſh from the third edition of the Original French.

To which are added, NEW OBSERVATIONS upon thoſe Critical Remarks, and on the edition of Moreri printed in the year 1725.

Mr BAYLE's PREFACE

CONCERNING

The ſecond edition of theſe CRITICAL REMARKS.

*THERE are few books of ſuch general uſe as an Hiſtorical Dictionary. The public is ſo convinced of this, that though it was well known that Moreri's Dictionary, even after it had been ſeveral times corrected, was full of faults, yet a great many editions of it have been ſold off. It is therefore doing a good ſervice to the Republic of Letters, to contribute to the correction of this Dictionary. For this reaſon it has been thought proper to reprint here (at Rotterdam) the Critical Remarks which an anonymous author publiſhed at Paris upon the laſt edition of Moreri. They may be uſeful both to thoſe who have already purchaſed that edition, and ſtill more ſo to thoſe who propoſe to make further amendments in that Dictionary.*

That laſt edition of Moreri, as well as the edition of Paris 1699, were reviſed by Mr Vaultier, and are undoubtedly much better than the preceding ones; for beſides that Mr Vaultier is a man of parts, his great vivacity does not hinder him from being extremely laborious and capable of a very long and deep application. This laſt quality is abſolutely neceſſary for thoſe who correct ſuch an extenſive and defective work as is the Dictionary of Moreri; but let a man be ever ſo much endowed with it, that he alone ſhould be able to perfect this work, does not ſeem poſſible; for there are certain little pains which a great genius cannot take, they are beneath him, he does not willingly undergo the trouble of correcting any thing elſe but the faults which are the moſt diffuſed through the body of the work, and while he beſtows his chief attention upon that, is it to be thought that he will take notice of a falſe date, of a proper name ill ſpelt, and of ſeveral other minute particulars, the correcting of which muſt be left to a man who is fit for examining punctilio's, and has more patience than vivacity of genius? Thoſe who ſhall attend to this will read the remarks of the anonymous author upon the edition in 1704, without leſſening the praiſes which Mr Vaultier has ſo juſtly merited.

In the preſent edition of theſe remarks, care has been taken to correct ſeveral errors of the preſs, beſides thoſe which are pointed out in the Errata of the Paris edition. The notes that are put in the margin ſerve to rectify, or to explain the text, or to give hints to the correctors of Moreri. It was thought proper to follow this method, in order to hinder the readers from being ſometimes miſtaken in believing that the remarks of the anonymous writer are always juſt. He is no doubt a man of better ſenſe than to take it ill, that we have preferred the intereſt of the public to that of him in particular: and as he ſeems diſpoſed to continue his remarks, which is a very commendable deſign, and may contribute much to the public advantage, it was thought that he would execute his deſign, and improve his talent with greater vigilance, and in a more beneficial way to the editors of the Hiſtorical Dictionary, if his Critical notes were ſometimes criticized upon. I ſay ſometimes, becauſe in his work there are certain things upon which we have made no obſervations though we might have animadverted upon them in a remark. For example,

He finds fault (a) that in enumerating the works of James Almain there is no notice taken of that which concerns the Laity. The very circumſtances of the time, adds he, ſhould have engaged the Editor to ſpeak of it with ſome exactneſs. This cenſure may be juſtly blamed; for the greateſt part of his readers will not underſtand it. A book which concerns the Laity, is ſomething ſo indeterminate that one may form a hundred different ideas of it. The circumſtances of the time are not indeed ſuch a general object, but they nevertheleſs include ſeveral things, and thus a reader who does not preciſely know the character of that book of Almain, will never be able to gueſs the relation it bears to the preſent times. Now as an Hiſtorical Dictionary ought to ſerve inſtead of a library to the ignorant, it ſhould be ſo contrived that the reader may find perſpicuity enough in the work itſelf to under- ſtand whatever is told in it without any other aſſiſtance. The ſame perſpicuity ſhould have appeared in the remarks of the anonymous writer, ſince they are a kind of ſupplement to Moreri, and a model for correcting him. It is therefore a fault to point out a book of Almain in a manner that is ſo obſcure to a vaſt number of readers. We may add that to conſult the conveniency of Moreri's Editors one ſhould ſave them as much trouble as it is poſſible, and give them proper directions. This is what has not been done with reſpect to the omiſſion that we find fault with concerning Almain, and it is what would have been done, if particular notice had been taken of the nature of the book, the place and time of the impreſſion, &c. I would willingly ſupply this defect if I had the neceſſary helps, but the only conjecture I can frame of our author's meaning is, that Almain wrote a book wherein he treated of the authority of the people, and of the authority of the church, and maintained that as the power of the people repreſented by the aſſembly of the States of the kingdom, is ſuperior to that of the head of the nation, that is to ſay to the power of the King, ſo the power of a council repreſenting the whole body of the Church is ſuperior to that of the Pope, notwithſtanding his primacy, and quality of head of the Church. It is certain that James Almain having learned from John Major, a Scotchman by nation, this doctrine concerning the authority of the people, defended it vigorouſly and made uſe of it as a proof of the ſuperiority of councils over the Pope. The catalogue of his books given by Dr de Launoi, (b) contains the following words: 'Expoſitio circa deciſiones quæſtionum Magiſtri Guillelmi Occam de poteſtate ſummi Pontificis, liberque inſcribitur de ſuprema poteſtate Eccleſiaſtica & laïca, ubi certa quædam eſt propoſitio quæ tunc ut apparuit, tolerabatur, ſed nunc tolerari deſiit. - - - - - - An expoſition concerning the deciſions of the queſtions of Maſter William Occam touching the authority of the Pope, and the book is intituled; Of the ſupreme power, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, where there is a certain propoſition, which, as it appeared then, was tolerated, but has now ceaſed to be ſo.' There have always been Divines in France who maintained the ſuperiority of the Pope over the council, and dextrouſly objected that thoſe who lay ſo great a ſtreſs upon the writings of Almain and Major for the contrary ſentiment, authorize a republican tenet altogether injurious to the majeſty of kings. This is what contributed to the ruin of the famous Dr Richer in the reign of Lewis XIII, for it was not purely out of complaiſance to the court of Rome that he was perſecuted, they prepoſſeſſed the court of France againſt him, by ſhewing that he warmly maintained the inferiority of the Pope for no other reaſon but becauſe he was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the tenet, That the States of the kingdom are ſuperior to the King, and may dethrone, expel, ſhut up in a monaſtery, and puniſh their King in what other manner they pleaſe. They produced a theſis which he had defended in the year 1591, that the States were indiſputably above the King, and that Henry III, had been juſtly proceeded againſt as a tyrant.

(a) Below at the article ALMAIN.

